1. The malqosh ('latter/spring rain') was the critical late-season rainfall that brought the grain harvest to maturity (March-April). The emphasis is on asking the LORD rather than seeking rain from pagan sources (as verse 2 will contrast). The word chazizim ('storm clouds, lightning bolts') emphasizes God's power over weather — he is the source, not Baal (the Canaanite storm deity) or household idols.
2. The teraphim ('household idols') are small deity figurines used for divination — their persistence into the post-exilic period is a recurring prophetic concern. The catalog of deception — aven ('emptiness, evil'), sheqer ('lies'), chalomot hashav ('worthless dreams'), hevel ('vapor, futility') — systematically strips false religion of all credibility. The consequence: the people nas'u ('wander, journey') like sheep without a shepherd. The lack of a ro'eh ('shepherd') is both a spiritual diagnosis (no true divine guidance) and a political one (no legitimate leadership).
3. The ro'im ('shepherds') are the leaders, and the attudim ('he-goats') are the dominant animals who bully the flock — both metaphors for corrupt leadership. The verb paqad has a double meaning: God will 'punish' (paqad) the he-goats but 'attend to, visit' (paqad) his flock — the same verb carries opposite implications depending on the object. The transformation from sheep to sus hodo ('his majestic horse') is dramatic: the victimized flock becomes a powerful war horse under God's direct command.
4. Four leadership images emerge 'from them' (from Judah): pinnah ('cornerstone') — the foundational stone of a building (cf. Isaiah 28:16); yated ('tent peg') — the stabilizing anchor (cf. Isaiah 22:23-25, applied to Eliakim); qeset milchamah ('battle bow') — military leadership; and noges ('ruler/driver') — authoritative governance. Together they picture comprehensive leadership: structural foundation, domestic stability, military power, and administrative authority — all originating from Judah.
5. The formerly helpless sheep become gibborim ('warriors, mighty men'). The muddy street trampling is a vivid image of urban combat. The key theological statement: ki YHWH immam ('because the LORD is with them') — their transformation from victims to warriors is entirely due to divine presence, not human improvement. The enemy's horsemen (rokhevei susim) are shamed — their military superiority cannot overcome divine empowerment.
6. The pairing of 'house of Judah' and 'house of Joseph' reunites the divided kingdoms — south and north, both restored. The verb richamtim ('I have had compassion on them') is from the womb-root r-ch-m, expressing God's deep maternal tenderness. The most remarkable promise: vehayu ka'asher lo-zenachtim ('they will be as though I had never rejected them') — God does not merely forgive but erases the effects of rejection entirely. The covenant relationship is restored to its original state, as if exile never happened.
7. Ephraim's transformation mirrors Judah's (v. 5): from scattered sheep to gibborim ('warriors'). The joy is compared to wine — full-bodied, intoxicating, overwhelming. The generational dimension is important: uvneiham yir'u vesamchu ('their children will see and be glad') — the blessing extends to the next generation, reversing the generational curse of exile.
8. The verb 'eshreqah ('I will whistle/hiss') is the distinctive sound a shepherd uses to call his flock — sharp, piercing, immediately recognizable. It may also refer to the whistle used by beekeepers to call their swarms (cf. Isaiah 7:18). The verb peditim ('I have redeemed them') is from padah ('to ransom, to redeem by payment'), indicating God has paid the price to secure their release. The promise of numerical restoration — 'as numerous as they once were' — reverses the decimation of exile.
9. The verb ezra'em ('I sowed/scattered them') uses agricultural language for diaspora — God sowed them like seed among the nations. But scattered seed produces a harvest: they will 'remember me' (yizkeruni) and return. The verb zakhar ('remember') in covenantal contexts means more than mental recall — it means to act on the covenant, to re-engage with the relationship. The promise vehayu et-beneihem ('they will live, they and their children') guarantees generational survival in exile and eventual return.
10. Egypt and Assyria represent the two directions of exile — south and north. Gilead (Transjordan) and Lebanon (northern border) represent the full territorial extent of the promised land. The climactic promise — velo yimmatse lahem ('there will not be enough room for them') — pictures a population so vast that the land cannot contain them all, echoing the unwallled-city promise of 2:4.

11. The language reprises the Exodus: God strikes the sea, the waters part, the oppressing power is humbled. The 'sea of distress' (yam tsarah) is a compressed metaphor — the sea itself becomes the distress through which God leads his people. The drying of the Nile's depths attacks Egypt at its source of life and power. The parallel humbling of Assyria's pride (ge'on) and Egypt's scepter (shevet) represents the comprehensive overthrow of all oppressive powers. This is a new Exodus, greater than the first.
12. The chapter closes with a summary promise: gibbarti ('I will strengthen') echoes verse 6, and the phrase uvishmo yithallakhu ('in his name they will walk') describes a life lived entirely under divine authority and identity. The verb hithallekh ('to walk about, to conduct oneself') is the same used for Enoch and Noah 'walking with God' (Genesis 5:22; 6:9). The people's restored life will be a continuous walk in the LORD's name — bearing his identity into the world.

Summary: Zechariah 11 is one of the most dramatic and disturbing chapters in the prophets. It opens with a devastating taunt song against Lebanon, Bashan, and the Jordan — their mighty trees are falling. The chapter then shifts to a prophetic sign-act: Zechariah is commanded to shepherd a flock destined for slaughter, representing the people exploited by their own leaders. He takes two staffs named 'Favor' and 'Unity,' shepherds the flock, but the ungrateful people reject him. He breaks the staff 'Favor' (annulling God's covenant restraint on the nations), then asks for his wages and receives thirty pieces of silver — the price of a slave — which God commands him to throw to the potter in the temple. He breaks the second staff 'Unity' (ending the brotherhood between Judah and Israel). Finally, God commands him to take on the role of a worthless shepherd, pronouncing woe on the foolish shepherd who abandons the flock.

What Makes This Remarkable: The thirty pieces of silver (v. 12-13) is one of the most striking prophetic connections to the New Testament: Matthew 27:3-10 quotes this passage in connection with Judas's betrayal payment, though Matthew attributes the quotation to Jeremiah (a long-standing textual puzzle). The phrase 'the lordly price at which I was valued by them' (v. 13) drips with divine sarcasm — thirty shekels was the legal compensation for a slave gored by an ox (Exodus 21:32). God is valued at slave-price. The two staffs — No'am ('Favor/Grace') and Chovlim ('Unity/Bonds') — represent the two dimensions of covenant blessing: God's gracious protection and the unity of his people. Both are broken.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the prophetic sign-act and historical reality is complex. The shepherd figure shifts between Zechariah, God, and a messianic figure without clear transitions. The 'three shepherds' removed in one month (v. 8) is one of the most debated identities in the Hebrew Bible — over forty interpretations have been proposed, and no consensus exists. We note the interpretive difficulty without forcing a solution. The word yotser ('potter') in verse 13 may be a scribal variant for otsar ('treasury') — both make sense contextually. The MT reads 'potter,' but throwing silver to a potter in the temple is unusual.

Connections: The thirty pieces of silver is cited in Matthew 27:9-10 (attributed to Jeremiah). The shepherd imagery connects to Ezekiel 34 and John 10. The breaking of covenant echoes Leviticus 26:44-45. The worthless shepherd (v. 17) connects to Ezekiel 34:2-10 and anticipates the shepherd struck in 13:7. The 'lordly price' language echoes the slave valuation of Exodus 21:32.

1Open your doors, Lebanon, so that fire may consume your cedars! 2Wail, cypress, for the cedar has fallen — the mighty ones are destroyed! Wail, oaks of Bashan, for the dense forest has been brought down! 3Listen — the wailing of the shepherds, for their glory is destroyed! Listen — the roaring of the young lions, for the thicket of the Jordan is ravaged! 4This is what the LORD my God says: Shepherd the flock marked for slaughter. 5Those who buy them slaughter them and feel no guilt. Those who sell them say, 'Blessed be the LORD, I am rich!' And their own shepherds have no compassion for them. 6For I will no longer have compassion on the inhabitants of the land — declares the LORD. I will hand each person over to his neighbor and to his king. They will crush the land, and I will not rescue anyone from their hand. 7So I shepherded the flock marked for slaughter — the afflicted of the flock. I took two staffs; one I called Favor and the other I called Unity. And I shepherded the flock. 8I dismissed three shepherds in a single month. I grew impatient with them, and they also detested me. 9Then I said, "I will not shepherd you. Let the dying die, and the one perishing perish, and let those who remain devour one another's flesh." ¹⁰I took my staff Favor and broke it, annulling my covenant that I had made with all the peoples. ¹¹It was annulled on that day, and the afflicted of the flock who were watching me recognized that it was the word of the LORD. ¹²I said to them, "If it seems right to you, give me my wages; if not, keep them." So they weighed out my wages — thirty pieces of silver. ¹³The LORD said to me, "Throw it to the potter — that magnificent price at which they valued me!" So I took the thirty pieces of silver and threw them to the potter in the house of the LORD. ¹⁴Then I broke my second staff, Unity, to annul the brotherhood between Judah and Israel. ¹⁵Then the LORD said to me, "Take for yourself the equipment of a foolish shepherd. ¹⁶For I am about to raise up a shepherd in the land who will not attend to the perishing, who will not seek the young, who will not heal the injured, who will not nourish the healthy. Instead, he will devour the flesh of the fat ones and tear off their hooves.

¹⁷Woe to the worthless shepherd who abandons the flock!
 A sword against his arm and against his right eye!
 His arm will wither completely, and his right eye will go totally blind.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The taunt song addresses Lebanon's famous cedars — symbols of pride, wealth, and strength throughout the prophets (cf. Isaiah 2:13; 10:34; Ezekiel 31). The command to 'open your doors' is sarcastic: Lebanon is invited to welcome its own destruction. Cedar was the premium building material of the ancient Near East, used in both Solomon's temple and palace. The cedars may symbolize the temple, the royal house, or powerful leaders.
2. A cascade of mourning: if the cedars (the greatest trees) have fallen, the cypresses (lesser trees) should wail because they are next. The 'oaks of Bashan' (the fertile plateau east of the Jordan) represent another tier of strength. The ya'ar habatsir ('dense/inaccessible forest') has been brought down — nothing is secure. The progression from Lebanon's cedars to Bashan's oaks to the impenetrable forest suggests comprehensive destruction from north to east.
3. The shepherds wail because their addartam ('their glory/majesty,' or 'their pasture' — the word is ambiguous) is destroyed. The young lions (kephirim) roar because the ge'on hayyarden ('pride/thicket of the Jordan') — the dense vegetation along the Jordan River valley — has been devastated. The Jordan thicket was famous for harboring lions (Jeremiah 49:19; 50:44). The taunt song moves from trees to shepherds to lions, encompassing all who depend on the land.
4. The prophetic sign-act begins. God commands Zechariah to shepherd a tson haharegah ('flock of slaughter') — sheep already destined to be killed. The phrase is horrifying: these are God's own people, treated as animals to be butchered by their own leaders. The genitive construction 'flock of slaughter' means slaughter is their defining characteristic — it is what they are destined for under current leadership.
5. Three levels of exploitation: buyers who kill without guilt (velo ye'shamu — they feel no moral weight), sellers who invoke God's name to celebrate their profit (the blasphemous barukh YHWH va'ashir, 'Blessed be the LORD, I am rich!'), and shepherds (their own leaders) who show no compassion (lo yachmol). The invocation of God's blessing over exploitative commerce is the ultimate profanation — using covenant language to sanctify injustice.
6. God withdraws compassion (lo echmol) — the divine restraint that has protected the people is removed. The consequences are neighbor-against-neighbor violence and royal oppression. The verb kitetu ('they will crush') is comprehensive devastation. The refusal to rescue (lo atsil miyyadam) is the most terrifying statement: God will not intervene. This is the theological equivalent of removing the hand from the tiller — the ship is left to the storm.
7. The prophet obeys and begins shepherding. The phrase aniyeyi hatson ('the afflicted/poor of the flock') specifies that his ministry is particularly to the vulnerable members. The two staffs are named symbolically: No'am ('Favor, Grace, Pleasantness') represents God's gracious covenant protection, and Chovlim ('Unity, Bonds, Ropes') represents the bond between Judah and Israel. Both names will become significant when the staffs are broken.
8. The identity of the 'three shepherds' is one of the most debated questions in Zechariah scholarship — over forty proposals exist, ranging from specific historical rulers to the three offices of prophet, priest, and king. No consensus has been reached, and we do not force an identification. The mutual antipathy — 'I grew impatient with them and they detested me' — describes a complete breakdown of the shepherd-flock relationship. The verb bachalu ('they detested, loathed') expresses visceral disgust.
9. The shepherd's resignation is total and devastating. The three fates are progressive: death, disappearance, and self-destruction (cannibalism). The phrase 'devour one another's flesh' (to'khalnah ishshsha et-besar re'utah) is not merely metaphorical — it echoes the siege cannibalism described in Lamentations 4:10 and Deuteronomy 28:53-57. When divine shepherding is withdrawn, the community consumes itself.
10. The breaking of the staff No'am ('Favor') symbolizes the annulment of God's covenant restraint on the nations — the agreement that had kept the surrounding peoples from overwhelming Israel. The word lehapher ('to annul, to break') is covenant-termination language. The phrase et kol-ha'ammim ('with all the peoples') refers to a restraining covenant with the nations, not the Sinai covenant with Israel. With this protective barrier removed, the nations are free to do their worst.

11. The 'afflicted of the flock' (aniyyei hatson) — the poor, vulnerable believers — are the ones who perceive the prophetic significance of the staff-breaking. The exploiters do not see; the humble do. The phrase ki devar-YHWH hu ('that it was the word of the LORD') indicates their recognition that the prophetic sign-act was divinely authorized, not mere performance.
12. The shepherd requests wages, but with an indifferent tone — 've'im-lo chadalu ('if not, forget it'). The amount — sheloshim kasef ('thirty of silver,' thirty shekels) — is the legal compensation for a slave gored by an ox (Exodus 21:32). The insult is deliberate and precise: the divine shepherd is valued at slave-price. Matthew 27:9-10 quotes this passage in connection with Judas's betrayal payment, though he attributes the quotation to Jeremiah — possibly because Jeremiah was placed first in the prophetic scroll collection.
13. God's command drips with sarcasm: eder hayyeqar ('the magnificent price') is bitterly ironic — thirty shekels is anything but magnificent. The word yotser ('potter') may be a deliberate wordplay on otsar ('treasury'); some scholars read 'treasury' here, which would explain throwing money 'in the house of the LORD' more naturally. Matthew 27:5-7 combines both elements — Judas throws the silver into the temple, and the priests use it to buy a potter's field. We follow the MT reading while noting the possible variant.
14. The breaking of Chovlim ('Unity/Bonds') severs the bond between north and south — the hope of reunification expressed in 10:6 is now undermined. The word achavah ('brotherhood') is the relational term for the bond between the two kingdoms. Its annulment means not just political division but the dissolution of fraternal identity — they will no longer recognize each other as brothers.
15. A new prophetic sign-act: Zechariah must now embody a ro'eh evili ('foolish/worthless shepherd'). The word evili ('foolish') in Hebrew denotes moral, not intellectual, deficiency — a shepherd who is willfully negligent. The 'equipment' (keli) would include staff and bag, but notably NOT the tools of good shepherding — the worthless shepherd's equipment is for appearance only.
16. The worthless shepherd is described by four failures and two crimes: he neglects the perishing (nikhchadot), ignores the young (na'ar), refuses to heal the injured (nishberet), and does not sustain the healthy (nitsavah). Instead, he actively destroys: eating the fat ones' flesh and tearing off their hooves (parting/ripping their hooves — an image of butchery, not shepherding). This anti-shepherd is the dark mirror of the Good Shepherd described in Ezekiel 34:11-16. God raises this figure as judgment — the people who rejected the good shepherd will receive the shepherd they deserve.
17. The woe oracle against the ro'i ha'elil ('worthless/idol shepherd') pronounces a two-part curse: his arm (the instrument of strength/action) will wither (yavosh tivash — emphatic infinitive absolute for total drying), and his right eye (the organ of perception/leadership) will go blind (kahoh tikheh — total darkening). The shepherd who refused to use his arm to protect the flock will lose the arm; the one who refused to watch over them will lose his sight. The punishment fits the crime with precise measure-for-measure justice.

Summary: Zechariah 12 opens the final oracle section of the book (chapters 12-14, introduced as 'the oracle of the word of the LORD concerning Israel'). The chapter envisions a climactic siege of Jerusalem by all the nations, but God transforms the city into 'a cup of staggering' and 'an immovable rock' that defeats every attacker. The leaders of Judah recognize God as their source of strength, and fire consumes the surrounding nations. The chapter culminates in one of the most poignant verses in all prophecy: 'They will look on me, the one they have pierced, and they will mourn for him as one mourns for an only son' (v. 10) — a passage of intense messianic significance. The mourning is described as vast and comprehensive, clan by clan, family by family.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 10 is one of the most theologically loaded verses in the Hebrew Bible. The first person — 'they will look on ME, the one they have pierced' — means God himself is the one who was pierced, yet the mourning is 'for HIM' (third person), creating a mysterious shift from divine first person to a third-person figure. This verse is quoted in John 19:37 at the crucifixion of Jesus and in Revelation 1:7. The Hebrew daqaru ('they pierced') is unambiguous — it means to thrust through with a weapon. The mourning described in verses 11-14 is compared to the mourning for Hadad-rimmon in the valley of Megiddo (v. 11), likely referring to the death of good King Josiah in battle there (2 Chronicles 35:22-25).*

Translation Friction: The first-person-to-third-person shift in verse 10 ('look on ME... mourn for HIM') is the central interpretive challenge. Various explanations: (1) the pierced one is a representative of God, hence the shift; (2) the text has been altered; (3) the shift is deliberate theological mystery — God identifies with the pierced figure while maintaining distinction. We preserve the shift exactly as the Hebrew reads. The 'mourning of Hadad-rimmon' (v. 11) is debated — Hadad-rimmon may be a place name near Megiddo or a compound divine name (Hadad + Rimmon, both storm deities).

Connections: The 'cup of staggering' echoes Isaiah 51:17, 22 and Jeremiah 25:15-17. The immovable rock connects to the stone imagery of Daniel 2:34-35 and Isaiah 28:16. The piercing and mourning (v. 10) is quoted in John 19:37 and Revelation 1:7. The mourning for Josiah at Megiddo connects to 2 Chronicles 35:22-25. The clan-by-clan mourning anticipates the purification in chapter 13. The spirit of grace and supplication (v. 10) connects to Joel 2:28-29 and the outpouring of the Spirit.

¹An oracle: The word of the LORD concerning Israel. This is the declaration of the LORD who stretches out the heavens, who lays the foundation of the earth, and who forms the human spirit within a person. ²I am about to make Jerusalem a cup of staggering for all the surrounding peoples. Judah will also be caught up in the siege against Jerusalem. ³On that day I will make Jerusalem an immovable rock for all the peoples. All who try to lift it will be severely injured, even though all the nations of the earth gather against it. ⁴On that day — declares the LORD — I will strike every horse with panic and its rider with madness. I will keep my eyes open over the house of Judah, but I will strike every horse of the nations with blindness. ⁵Then the leaders of Judah will say in their hearts, 'The inhabitants of Jerusalem are our strength through the LORD of Armies, their God.' ⁶On that day I will make the leaders of Judah like a fire pot among timber and like a flaming torch among sheaves. They will consume all the surrounding peoples to the right and to the left, while Jerusalem will again be inhabited in its own place — in Jerusalem. ⁷The LORD will save the tents of Judah first, so that the honor of the house of David and the honor of Jerusalem's inhabitants will not be exalted above Judah. ⁸On that day the LORD will shield the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so that the weakest among them on that day will be like David, and the house of David will be like God — like the angel of the LORD going before them. ⁹On that day I will set out to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. ¹⁰I will pour out on the house of David and on the inhabitants of Jerusalem a spirit of grace and supplication. They will look on me — the one they have pierced — and they will mourn for him as one mourns for an only child, and grieve bitterly for him as one grieves for a firstborn son. ¹¹On that day the mourning in Jerusalem will be as great as the mourning for Hadad-rimmon in the plain of Megiddo. ¹²The land will mourn, clan by clan, each by itself: the clan of the house of David by itself, and their wives by themselves; the clan of the house of Nathan by itself, and their wives by themselves; ¹³the clan of the house of Levi by itself, and their wives by themselves; the clan of the Shimeites by itself, and their wives by themselves; ¹⁴All the remaining clans — each clan by itself, and their wives by themselves.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The second massa ('oracle/burden') in Second Zechariah (the first was 9:1). The divine credentials are cosmic: God stretches the heavens (creation), lays the earth's foundation (sustaining), and forms the human spirit (intimate personal creation). These three acts encompass the macro-cosmic and the micro-personal — the God who speaks here is both cosmic architect and intimate creator of each person's inner life. This introduction establishes the authority behind the eschatological visions that follow.
2. The image sap ra'al ('cup of staggering/reeling') pictures Jerusalem as a poisoned cup: the nations will drink (attack) but will stagger and collapse from the effects. The same image appears in Isaiah 51:17, 22 and Jeremiah 25:15-17, where the 'cup of God's wrath' makes nations reel. The note about Judah being caught in the siege suggests the surrounding region will be drawn into the conflict involuntarily.
3. The second image: even ma'amasah ('a stone of burden/lifting'). The picture is of a massive stone in a strongman contest — everyone who tries to lift it will injure themselves (sarot yissaretu, 'they will certainly be cut/lacerated'). The combination of the staggering cup and the immovable rock presents Jerusalem as simultaneously toxic and immovable — attacking it destroys the attacker. The phrase kol goyei ha'arets ('all the nations of the earth') establishes the universal scope of the final siege.
4. Three divine strikes against the attacking cavalry: timmahon ('panic/bewilderment'), shigga'on ('madness'), and ivvaron ('blindness'). These three plagues echo the covenant curses of Deuteronomy 28:28 exactly — 'The LORD will strike you with madness, blindness, and bewilderment of heart.' The curse intended for disobedient Israel is redirected against the nations. Meanwhile, God 'opens his eyes' (ephqach et-einai) over Judah — watchful protection contrasted with the blinding of enemies.
5. The allufei Yehudah ('leaders/clan chiefs of Judah') recognize that Jerusalem's strength is not military but theological — it comes 'through the LORD of Armies.' The verb amtsah ('strength/stronghold for me') acknowledges divine empowerment. The leaders from the surrounding countryside see the city's defense and attribute it correctly to God, not to walls or warriors.
6. Two fire images: kiyor esh be'etsim ('a fire pot among timber') and lappid esh be'amir ('a flaming torch among sheaves'). Both picture the same reality: Judah's leaders, empowered by God, will be irresistible against the surrounding nations. The phrase veyashvah Yerushalaim od tachteiha biYrushalaim ('Jerusalem will again dwell in its place, in Jerusalem') is emphatically redundant — the city will remain exactly where it belongs, unmoved by the siege.

7. God saves the vulnerable rural areas (ohalei Yehudah, 'tents of Judah') before saving the fortified capital, preventing urban arrogance. The phrase tip'eret beit-David ('the honor/glory of the house of David') suggests the Davidic dynasty still has prestige even without political power. God deliberately structures the deliverance to prevent the city-dwellers from boasting over the countryside — a concern for social equity within the delivered community.
8. The transformation is hyperbolic and deliberate: the hannikhsal ('the stumbling one, the weakest') will be kedavid ('like David') — Israel's greatest warrior. And David's house will be ke'lohim ('like God, like a divine being') — specifically kemal'akh YHWH ('like the angel of the LORD') who goes before them as a vanguard. This represents the ultimate empowerment: human weakness becomes divine strength. The angel of the LORD 'before them' evokes the Exodus pillar of cloud and fire (Exodus 14:19).
9. The verb avaqesh ('I will seek, I will set out to') indicates deliberate, purposeful divine action — not reactive defense but proactive destruction of all nations that attack Jerusalem. The comprehensive 'all the nations' (kol-haggoyim) makes the scope universal.
10. The first-to-third person shift (elai/alav, 'on me/for him') is in the Hebrew text and should not be harmonized or smoothed over. The verb daqaru ('they pierced') is from daqar ('to thrust through, to pierce with a weapon') — it denotes a fatal wound. John 19:37 quotes this verse at the crucifixion: 'They will look on the one they have pierced.' Revelation 1:7 extends it: 'every eye will see him, even those who pierced him.' The mourning comparison — for an only child (yachid), for a firstborn (bekhor) — represents the most extreme grief in ancient culture. The outpouring of the Spirit enables the recognition and mourning — repentance is itself a divine gift.
11. The reference to Hadad-rimmon in the plain of Megiddo most likely refers to the mourning for King Josiah, who was killed in battle against Pharaoh Neco at Megiddo in 609 BCE (2 Kings 23:29-30; 2 Chronicles 35:22-25). Josiah's death was a national catastrophe — the last good king of Judah, cut down in his prime. The mourning for the pierced one will be equally devastating. Hadad-rimmon may be a place name near Megiddo or a compound reference to the storm deities Hadad and Rimmon, representing mourning rituals.
12. The mourning is described with meticulous detail — each clan separately, men and women separately. This is not public spectacle but deeply personal grief. The house of David represents the royal line. The house of Nathan may refer to David's son Nathan (2 Samuel 5:14) — an alternate branch of the Davidic dynasty — or the prophet Nathan. The separation of men and women intensifies the picture of individual, private mourning.
13. The house of Levi represents the priestly line — the second major division of Israel's leadership after the Davidic monarchy. The Shimeites are a sub-clan of Levi (Numbers 3:21). The pairing of David/Nathan (royal) with Levi/Shimei (priestly) means both major leadership structures — kings and priests — mourn privately and deeply. The fourfold repetition of levad ('by itself') in verses 12-13 emphasizes the isolation of grief.
14. The final verse extends the mourning to 'all the remaining clans' — no family is excluded. The universality of the grief matches the universality of the guilt: 'they pierced' is collective, and the mourning is collective. The repetition of 'by itself' (levad) throughout this section occurs twelve times in verses 12-14, emphasizing the deeply personal nature of this corporate repentance.

Summary: Zechariah 13 continues the eschatological vision of chapters 12-14, opening with a fountain for cleansing sin and impurity, then moving to the removal of idols and false prophets from the land. False prophets will be so thoroughly discredited that even their own parents will condemn them, and prophets themselves will deny their calling and claim to be farmers instead. The chapter culminates with the striking of the shepherd (v. 7) — quoted by Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane — and the purification of a remnant through fire: two-thirds will be cut off, but one-third will be refined and will call on God's name.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 7 — 'Strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered' — is directly quoted by Jesus in Matthew 26:31 and Mark 14:27 on the night of his arrest, applying it to his own death and the scattering of the disciples. The Hebrew addresses the 'sword' as an agent of God against 'my shepherd' (ro'i) and 'the man who is my companion' (gever amiti) — an extraordinarily intimate title suggesting someone who stands as God's equal or partner. The refining-by-fire imagery (vv. 8-9) parallels Malachi 3:2-3 and Isaiah 48:10, presenting suffering not as punishment but as purification. The covenant renewal formula in verse 9 — 'I will say, They are my people; and they will say, The LORD is my God' — is the culmination of all covenant promises.*

Translation Friction: *The relationship of 13:7-9 to the preceding context is debated. Some scholars see the shepherd of verse 7 as the worthless shepherd of 11:17, but the intimate titles ('my shepherd,' 'the man who is my companion') suggest a good shepherd — one whose striking leads paradoxically to the purification of the remnant. The phrase gever amiti ('the man of my companionship/union') uses amit, which appears primarily in Leviticus for one's close associate or covenant partner. We preserve the ambiguity of the shepherd's identity while noting the christological reading.*

Connections: The cleansing fountain (v. 1) connects to Ezekiel 36:25 ('I will sprinkle clean water on you') and John 19:34 (water flowing from Christ's side). The struck shepherd (v. 7) is quoted in Matthew 26:31 and Mark 14:27. The refining by fire parallels Malachi 3:2-3, Isaiah 48:10, and 1 Peter 1:6-7. The covenant renewal formula (v. 9) echoes Hosea 2:23, Jeremiah 31:33, and Ezekiel 37:27. The two-thirds/one-third remnant echoes Ezekiel 5:1-4.

¹On that day a fountain will be opened for the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for impurity. ²On that day — declares the LORD of Armies — I will cut off the names of the idols from the land, and they will be remembered no more. I will also remove the prophets and the spirit of impurity from the land. ³If anyone still prophesies, his own father and mother who bore him will say to him, 'You will not live, because you have spoken lies in the name of the LORD.' And his father and mother who bore him will pierce him when he prophesies. ⁴On that day every prophet will be ashamed of his vision when he prophesies. They will not put on the hairy cloak in order to deceive. ⁵Each will say, 'I am not a prophet. I am a farmer — the land has been my livelihood since my youth.' ⁶If someone asks him, 'What are these wounds between your arms?' he will say, 'These are wounds I received in the house of my friends.'

⁷"Awake, sword, against my shepherd, against the man who is my companion!"
declares the LORD of Armies.
"Strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered, and I will turn my hand against the little ones."

⁸In the whole land — declares the LORD — two-thirds will be cut off and perish, but one-third will be left in it.

⁹I will bring the third through the fire and refine them as silver is refined, and test them as gold is tested.
They will call on my name,
and I will answer them.
I will say, 'They are my people,' and they will say, 'The LORD is my God.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The maqor niphttach ('opened fountain') is a permanent, flowing source of cleansing — not a one-time event but an ongoing provision. The combination lechatat uleniddah ('for sin and for impurity') covers both moral guilt (chatat, 'sin/missing the mark') and ritual defilement (niddah, 'impurity,' particularly menstrual impurity in Leviticus). Together they represent comprehensive cleansing — nothing is left uncovered. This fountain flows directly from the mourning and repentance described in 12:10-14.
2. Three things are purged: the names of idols (atsabbim, 'shaped images'), the false prophets, and the ruach hattum'ah ('spirit of impurity/uncleanness'). Cutting off the 'names' means erasing them from memory and language — the idols will not even be mentioned. The coupling of 'prophets' (without the qualifier 'false') with the 'spirit of impurity' is jarring — it suggests that prophetic activity itself has become so corrupted that the institution must be removed, not just reformed.
3. The severity is shocking: parents will condemn and even execute their own child for false prophecy. The verb udqaru (they will pierce him) is the same verb (daqar) used in 12:10 for the pierced one — creating an intertextual connection between the two piercings. The law of Deuteronomy 13:1-5 and 18:20 mandated death for false prophets; here, even parents enforce it. The repetition of 'his father and mother who bore him' emphasizes the intimacy of the relationship that is overridden by covenant loyalty.
4. The prophetic institution is so thoroughly discredited that prophets will be ashamed (yevoshu) of their own visions. The adderet se'ar ('hairy cloak') was the distinctive garment of prophets (cf. 2 Kings 1:8 for Elijah; Matthew 3:4 for John the Baptist). They will abandon even the outward sign of their calling. The phrase lema'an kachesh ('in order to deceive') reveals the motive behind their prophecy — they were never genuine.
5. The denial is complete: lo navi anokhi ('I am not a prophet') — a striking contrast to Amos 7:14, where the phrase carries different force. The claim to be ish oved adamah ('a man who works the soil') is a retreat into agricultural anonymity. The former false prophet now claims he has always been a farmer. The phrase adam hiqnani minne'urai ('a man/the ground acquired me from my youth') is difficult — it may mean 'someone made me a servant from youth' or 'the land has been my occupation from youth.' We follow the latter reading.

6. The 'wounds between your arms/hands' (makkot bein yadekha) may refer to self-laceration wounds from ecstatic prophetic practices (cf. 1 Kings 18:28, where the prophets of Baal cut themselves). The false prophet's excuse — 'I received them in the house of my friends' (beit me'ahavai) — is a transparent lie: he attributes cult-related wounds to a domestic incident. The phrase bein yadekha is literally 'between your hands,' likely meaning the chest/torso area between the arms. Christian tradition has sometimes read this christologically, but the context is clearly about exposed false prophets.
7. Jesus directly quotes this verse in Matthew 26:31 and Mark 14:27 on the night of his arrest, applying it to himself. The command is addressed to the 'sword' (cherev) as God's agent — personified and summoned to action. The shepherd is called ro'i ('my shepherd') — God's own shepherd — and ge'ever amiti ('the man who is my companion'). The word amit is deeply intimate, denoting a close associate or covenant partner (Leviticus 6:2; 18:20; 19:11, 15, 17; 24:19; 25:14, 15, 17). The striking of this shepherd is divinely commanded, and the scattering is its consequence. The final phrase — vahashivoti yadi al-hatso'arim ('I will turn my hand upon the little ones') — is ambiguous: 'turn my hand against' can mean judgment or 'turn my hand to' in protection. The context of verses 8-9 suggests a refining purpose.
8. The proportions are devastating: pi-shenayim ('two-thirds,' literally 'a mouth of two') will be cut off (yikkartu) and die (yigva'u). Only the shelishit ('third') survives. This echoes Ezekiel 5:1-4, where the prophet divides his hair into thirds representing different fates for Jerusalem. The severity establishes the remnant theology: survival is not guaranteed by membership in the covenant people but by divine selection through refining fire.
9. The refining metaphor — silver (tsaraph) and gold (bachan) — represents two stages of testing: tsaraph ('smelt, refine') removes dross from silver by heat, and bachan ('test, prove, assay') verifies gold's purity. The surviving third is not merely spared but transformed by fire. The final exchange — amarti ammi hu / vehu yomar YHWH Elohai ('I will say, My people / they will say, The LORD is my God') — is the bilateral covenant formula in its most intimate form. This is the goal of all redemptive history: mutual belonging between God and his refined people.

Summary: Zechariah 14, the final chapter of Zechariah, is the most fully developed day-of-the-LORD passage in the post-exilic prophets. It describes a cataclysmic last battle against Jerusalem: the city is taken, houses looted, women violated — then the LORD goes out to fight. The Mount of Olives splits in two, creating a great valley for escape. A day of unique light comes, living waters flow from Jerusalem east and west, and the LORD becomes king over all the earth. The nations that survive the battle will come yearly to Jerusalem to worship at the Feast of Tabernacles. Even the bells on horses and the cooking pots in Jerusalem will be inscribed 'Holy to the LORD.' The entire city becomes a sanctuary.

What Makes This Remarkable: The declaration in verse 9 — 'The LORD will be king over all the earth. On that day the LORD will be one and his name one' — is one of the most exalted monotheistic statements in the Hebrew Bible, echoing and amplifying the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:4). The living waters flowing from Jerusalem (v. 8) inform the river of life in Revelation 22:1-2. The universalization of holiness — even horse bells and cooking pots become 'Holy to the LORD' (vv. 20-21) — abolishes the distinction between sacred and secular. The entire created order becomes a sanctuary. The Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot) as the universal pilgrimage festival (vv. 16-19) is significant because Sukkot celebrates both harvest thanksgiving and God's provision in the wilderness — themes of gratitude and dependence that all nations share.

Translation Friction: The chapter contains the most violent imagery in Zechariah (vv. 2, 12-15), juxtaposed with the most universalist vision (vv. 9, 16, 20-21). This tension between judgment and inclusion is characteristic of eschatological prophecy. The plague described in verse 12 — flesh rotting while standing — is gruesome and has been compared to modern descriptions of nuclear effects, though such comparisons are anachronistic. The phrase YHWH echad ushemo echad (v. 9) can be read as 'the LORD is one and his name is one' or 'the LORD will be the only one and his name the only one' — the Hebrew echad ('one/alone/unique') carries both meanings.

Connections: The Mount of Olives splitting (v. 4) is the site of Jesus's ascension (Acts 1:11-12). Living waters (v. 8) inform Ezekiel 47:1-12, Joel 3:18, and Revelation 22:1-2. The universal kingship (v. 9) fulfills the vision of Daniel 7:13-14 and Psalm 97:1. The Feast of Tabernacles pilgrimage (vv. 16-19) connects to Isaiah 2:2-4. 'Holy to the LORD' on the horse bells (v. 20) echoes the high priest's turban inscription (Exodus 28:36). The abolition of the distinction between sacred and secular anticipates the new Jerusalem of Revelation 21:22 ('I saw no temple in the city').

¹A day is coming for the LORD when your plunder will be divided in your midst. ²I will gather all the nations against Jerusalem for battle. The city will be captured, the houses plundered, and the women violated. Half the city will go into exile, but the rest of the people will not be cut off from the city. ³Then the LORD will go out and fight against those nations, as he fights on a day of battle. ⁴On that day his feet will stand on the Mount of Olives, which faces Jerusalem on the east. The Mount of Olives will be split in two from east to west, forming a very great valley, as half the mountain moves north and half moves south. ⁵You will flee through the valley of my mountains, for the valley between the mountains will reach to Azal. You will flee as you fled from the earthquake in the days of King Uzziah of Judah. Then the LORD my God will come, and all the holy ones with him. ⁶On that day there will be no light — the luminaries will diminish. ⁷It will be a unique day — known only to the LORD — neither day nor night. And at evening time there will be light. ⁸On that day, living waters will flow out from Jerusalem — half toward the eastern sea and half toward the western sea, in summer and in winter alike. ⁹The LORD will be king over all the earth. On that day the LORD will be one and his name one. ¹⁰The whole land will be transformed into a plain from Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem, but Jerusalem will be raised up and inhabited in its place — from the Gate of Benjamin to the site of the First Gate, to the Corner Gate, and from the Tower of Hananel to the royal winepresses. ¹¹People will dwell in it, and never again will there be a decree of total destruction. Jerusalem will be inhabited in security. ¹²This will be the plague with which the LORD will strike all the peoples who waged war against Jerusalem: their flesh will rot while they are still standing on their feet, their eyes will rot in their sockets, and their tongues will rot in their mouths. ¹³On that day a great panic from the LORD will fall on them. Each will seize the hand of his neighbor, and each will raise his hand against his neighbor. ¹⁴Judah too will fight at Jerusalem, and the wealth of all the surrounding nations will be gathered — gold, silver, and clothing in great abundance. ¹⁵The same plague will strike the horse, the mule, the camel, the donkey, and every animal in those camps — the same plague as on the people. ¹⁶Then all the survivors from the nations that came against Jerusalem will go up year after year to worship the King, the LORD of Armies, and to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles. ¹⁷If any of the families of the earth do not go up to Jerusalem to worship the King, the LORD of Armies, no rain will fall on them. ¹⁸If the family of Egypt does not go up and does not come, then the plague that the LORD strikes upon the nations that do not go up to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles will fall on them as well. ¹⁹This will be the punishment of Egypt and the punishment of all nations that do not go up to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles. ²⁰On that day, 'Holy to the LORD' will be inscribed on the bells of the horses, and the cooking pots in the house of the LORD will be like the sacred basins before the altar. ²¹Every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah will be holy to the LORD of Armies. All who come to sacrifice will take from them and cook in them. On that day there will no longer be a trader in the house of the LORD of Armies.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase yom ba laYHWH ('a day coming for/belonging to the LORD') introduces the eschatological 'day of the LORD' — the decisive moment of divine intervention. The address is to Jerusalem, and the spoil (shelalekh) being divided 'in your midst' means the enemy is inside the city, dividing loot — the most dire stage of siege warfare.
2. God himself gathers the nations — the assault is divinely orchestrated, not merely permitted. The horrors are stated bluntly: houses plundered (nushassu), women violated (tishshagalnah — the verb is deliberately coarse, and some manuscripts use a euphemistic substitute). Half the population goes into exile. But the critical qualifier: veyeter ha'am lo yikkaret min-ha'ir ('the rest of the people will not be cut off from the city') — a remnant survives. The darkest moment precedes the divine intervention of verse 3.
3. The divine warrior motif: veyatsa YHWH venilcham ('the LORD will go out and fight'). The comparison keyom hillachamo beyom qerav ('as on a day of battle') refers to God's historical interventions — the Exodus, the Red Sea, Joshua's conquests. The past tense of God's warfare guarantees the future: what he has done, he will do again.
4. The anthropomorphic description — God's feet standing on the Mount of Olives — is the most physically vivid theophany in the prophets. The Mount of Olives, directly east of the temple mount, is the site from which Jesus ascended (Acts 1:9-12), and the angels promised he would return 'in the same way' (Acts 1:11). The geological splitting — north and south halves separating to create an east-west valley — provides an escape route for the besieged population. The seismic imagery may reflect actual geological fault lines in the region.
5. The earthquake in Uzziah's reign is also referenced in Amos 1:1 — it was evidently so devastating that it became a historical reference point. The destination Azal is unknown but apparently distant enough to represent full escape. The climactic statement — uva YHWH Elohai kol-qedoshim immakh ('the LORD my God will come, and all the holy ones with you') — describes a divine arrival accompanied by a heavenly army. The qedoshim ('holy ones') may be angels, glorified saints, or both. Paul echoes this in 1 Thessalonians 3:13.

6. The Hebrew is difficult: or yeqarot veqippa'on. The word yeqarot may mean 'precious/brilliant' or 'thick/heavy,' and qippa'on means 'congealing, freezing, thickening.' The overall sense is a disruption of normal celestial light — a day unlike any other, where the ordinary categories of light and dark no longer apply. This cosmic disruption signals that the created order itself is being transformed.
7. The yom echad ('unique/singular day') belongs to God alone — hu yivvada' laYHWH ('it is known to the LORD'). The categories of day and night are suspended: lo-yom velo-laylah ('not day and not night'). The final reversal — le'et erev yihyeh-or ('at evening time there will be light') — overturns the creation order where evening leads to darkness. On this day, evening brings light instead. The ordinary rhythm of creation yields to a new divine order.
8. The mayim chayyim ('living waters') — fresh, flowing, life-giving water — stream from Jerusalem in both directions: toward the yam haqqadmoni ('eastern/former sea' = the Dead Sea) and the yam ha'acharon ('western/latter sea' = the Mediterranean). The Dead Sea, lifeless and stagnant, will receive life-giving water — Ezekiel 47:1-12 describes the same phenomenon in greater detail. The phrase baqqayits uvachoreph ('in summer and in winter') means these waters never dry up — unlike seasonal wadis, they flow perpetually. Revelation 22:1-2 transforms this into the river of the water of life flowing from the throne of God.
9. This is the theological climax of the entire book of Zechariah. The phrase YHWH lemelekh al-kol-ha'arets ('the LORD will be king over all the earth') extends the kingship beyond Israel to universal scope. The declaration YHWH echad ushemo echad ('the LORD is one and his name is one') echoes and amplifies the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:4). The word echad ('one, alone, unique') carries both numerical and qualitative force — the LORD is the sole deity and the uniquely incomparable God. On that day, what Israel believes will become what all creation knows.
10. The surrounding terrain is flattened (ka'aravah, 'like the Arabah/plain') while Jerusalem is elevated (ra'amah, 'raised up') — the city becomes the geographical high point, the natural center of all the land. Geba (north of Jerusalem) and Rimmon (south) mark the extent of Judah's territory. The Jerusalem landmarks — Benjamin's Gate, First Gate, Corner Gate, Tower of Hananel, royal winepresses — trace the city's perimeter, indicating full habitation within its walls. The topographical transformation fulfills Isaiah 2:2: 'The mountain of the LORD's house will be established as the highest of the mountains.'
11. The word cherem ('total destruction, the ban') is the most extreme form of warfare in the Hebrew Bible — the complete annihilation of a city and everything in it (cf. Joshua 6:17-21, Jericho). The promise that cherem lo yihyeh-od ('there will never again be a decree of total destruction') means Jerusalem's destruction is permanently over. The phrase lava'etach ('in security') describes the absence of fear — the city will never again face the terror of siege or destruction.
12. The plague (maggephah) is described with horrifying specificity: flesh, eyes, and tongue dissolve (himmeq, 'rot, decay, dissolve') while the victim is still alive and standing. The three body parts represent the whole person: flesh (physical being), eyes (perception), and tongue (speech). The instantaneous decomposition is divine judgment without human weapons — the attacking nations are destroyed by God directly.
13. The mehumat-YHWH ('panic/confusion from the LORD') is a divine weapon used throughout Israel's history (cf. Judges 7:22; 1 Samuel 14:20) — God causes enemies to turn on each other. The phrase 'seize the hand of his neighbor... raise his hand against his neighbor' pictures chaos: allies become enemies, coalition partners attack each other. The same pattern appeared in Haggai 2:22 and Zechariah 11:6.
14. The preposition bi ('at/in') in tilachem biYerushalaim could mean 'fight at Jerusalem' (alongside it) or 'fight against Jerusalem' (attacking it). Given the context of restoration, 'at Jerusalem' (defending it) is the more likely reading. The plunder gathered from the defeated nations — gold, silver, clothing — echoes the Exodus plundering of Egypt (Exodus 12:35-36). God's people receive the wealth of their would-be destroyers.
15. The plague extends to the animals — the entire war machine (horses, mules, camels, donkeys) is destroyed. The comprehensive list of pack and war animals means the attacking army loses all means of transport and retreat. The phrase kammaggephah hazzot ('like this plague') ties the animal plague to the human plague of verse 12.
16. The transformation is breathtaking: the nations that attacked Jerusalem now make annual pilgrimage to worship there. The title hammelekh YHWH Tsevaot ('the King, the LORD of Armies') combines royal and military titles. The Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot) is specified rather than Passover or Weeks — Sukkot celebrates harvest thanksgiving and God's provision in the wilderness, themes accessible to all peoples. It is also the most joyful of Israel's festivals (Deuteronomy 16:13-15).
17. The consequence for refusing the pilgrimage is agricultural: no rain. This reverses the opening call of 10:1 ('ask the LORD for rain') — rain depends on relationship with the LORD, and refusal to worship results in drought. The punishment is measured, not annihilating — withholding rain rather than destroying the nation. There is still opportunity for obedience.
18. Egypt is singled out because it does not depend on rainfall — the Nile provides irrigation. The drought punishment of verse 17 would not affect Egypt, so a different punishment is specified: the plague (maggephah) from verse 12. Egypt cannot exempt itself from the pilgrimage obligation by geography — God has a plague for every situation. The specific mention of Israel's ancient oppressor now joining the Sukkot pilgrimage is deeply ironic and redemptive.
19. The word chattat can mean both 'sin' and 'punishment for sin' — here it carries the latter sense. The universality is emphasized: Egypt AND kol-haggoyim ('all the nations'). No nation is exempt from the obligation to worship the LORD at Jerusalem during Sukkot.
20. The phrase qodesh laYHWH ('Holy to the LORD') was inscribed on the gold plate attached to the high priest's turban (Exodus 28:36) — the most sacred inscription in Israel's worship. Now it appears on horse bells (metsilot hassus) — the most mundane objects imaginable. The cooking pots (sirot) in the temple, used for preparing sacrificial food, will be elevated to the status of the mizraqim ('sacred basins') used to catch and sprinkle sacrificial blood at the altar. The distinction between sacred and common vessels is abolished — everything becomes holy.

- 21. The universalization of holiness reaches its climax: kol-sir ('every pot') in the entire region — not just the temple — becomes qodesh laYHWH Tsevaot. Any pot can be used for sacred purposes because all things are now holy. The final statement — velo-yihyeh khena'ani od beVeit-YHWH ('there will no longer be a Canaanite/trader in the house of the LORD') — is the book's last word. Khena'ani can mean 'Canaanite' (ritually unclean foreigner) or 'trader/merchant' (cf. Proverbs 31:24). Both readings work: no unclean person and no commercial exploitation will defile God's house. The temple becomes what it was always meant to be — a space of pure worship, free from both impurity and commerce. Jesus's cleansing of the temple (Matthew 21:12-13) enacts this prophecy.

Malachi

Summary: Malachi 1 opens the final prophetic book of the Old Testament with God's declaration of love for Israel: 'I have loved you.' When Israel questions this love, God points to the contrast between Jacob and Esau — Jacob chosen, Esau's territory made a desolation. The chapter then turns to its central indictment: the priests are offering defiled sacrifices — blind, lame, and sick animals that they would never dare present to their own governor. God would rather someone shut the temple doors than continue accepting these worthless offerings. The chapter climaxes with a stunning universalist declaration: 'From the rising of the sun to its setting, my name is great among the nations' (v. 11).

What Makes This Remarkable: Malachi's distinctive literary form is the disputation dialogue — God makes a statement, the people challenge it ('How have you loved us?' 'How have we defiled you?'), and God responds with evidence. This pattern occurs six times in the book and gives it a forensic, courtroom quality unique among the prophets. The name 'Malachi' means 'my messenger' and may be a title rather than a proper name (cf. 3:1, where 'my messenger' appears). The declaration that God's name is great 'among the nations' and that 'pure offerings' are presented to him everywhere (v. 11) is one of the most universalist statements in the Hebrew Bible — either describing gentile worship that God accepts or prophesying a future universal worship.

Translation Friction: *The phrase 'I have loved Jacob but Esau I have hated' (vv. 2-3) is theologically challenging. The Hebrew sane ('hate') in this context means 'rejected, not chosen, set aside' rather than emotional hatred — it is election language, not emotion language. Paul quotes this in Romans 9:13. The word mal'akhi ('my messenger') in 1:1 may be the prophet's actual name or a title derived from 3:1 — we treat it as a proper name following convention. The claim that God's name is great 'among the nations' (v. 11) in the present tense is debated — is it describing current gentile God-fearers, or is it a prophetic present for a future reality?*

Connections: The Jacob/Esau contrast reaches back to Genesis 25:23 and 27:27-40. Paul quotes 'Jacob I loved, Esau I hated' in Romans 9:13. The defiled-sacrifice indictment echoes Deuteronomy 15:21 and 17:1 (no blemished animals). The universalist statement (v. 11) connects to Isaiah 45:6, 59:19, and Psalm 113:3. The name Malachi ('my messenger') anticipates 3:1 and the Elijah prophecy of 4:5.

¹An oracle: The word of the LORD to Israel through Malachi.

²"I have loved you," says the LORD.

But you say, "How have you loved us?"

"Was not Esau Jacob's brother?" declares the LORD. "Yet I loved Jacob, ³but Esau I have rejected. I have made his mountains a wasteland and given his inheritance to the jackals of the wilderness."

⁴Even if Edom says, 'We have been crushed, but we will rebuild the ruins,' this is what the LORD of Armies says: They may build, but I will tear down. They will be called 'the territory of wickedness' and 'the people with whom the LORD is angry forever.' ⁵Your own eyes will see this, and you will say, 'The LORD is great — even beyond the borders of Israel!'

⁶A son honors his father, and a servant his master. If I am a father, where is my honor? If I am a master, where is the reverence due me? says the LORD of Armies to you, priests, who despise my name.

You ask, 'How have we despised your name?'

⁷You offer defiled food on my altar.

You ask, 'How have we defiled you?'

By saying, 'The table of the LORD is contemptible.'

⁸When you offer a blind animal for sacrifice — is that not wrong? When you offer a lame or sick one — is that not wrong? Try presenting it to your governor! Would he be pleased with you? Would he show you favor? says the LORD of Armies. ⁹Now then, try entreating God's favor — will he be gracious to you? This has come from your hands — will he show any of you favor? says the LORD of Armies. ¹⁰If only one of you would shut the temple doors, so that you would not kindle useless fires on my altar! I take no pleasure in you, says the LORD of Armies, and I will not accept an offering from your hands. ¹¹For from the rising of the sun to its setting, my name is great among the nations. In every place incense is offered to my name, and a pure offering — for my name is great among the nations, says the LORD of Armies. ¹²But you profane it when you say, 'The Lord's table is defiled,' and, 'Its food is contemptible.' ¹³You also say, 'What a burden!' and you sniff at it contemptuously, says the LORD of Armies. You bring stolen, lame, and sick animals — you bring them as your offering! Should I accept this from your hands? says the LORD. ¹⁴Cursed is the cheat who has a healthy male in his flock and vows it but then sacrifices a blemished animal to the Lord. For I am a great King, says the LORD of Armies, and my name is feared among the nations.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word massa ('oracle, burden') introduces the book as a weighty prophetic pronouncement. The name Mal'akhi means 'my messenger' and may be a proper name or a title. The LXX translates it as 'his messenger' (angelou autou), treating it as a descriptive title rather than a name. We follow the Masoretic tradition of reading it as a proper name. The preposition beyad ('by the hand of') indicates Malachi as the instrument of divine communication.
2. The first disputation dialogue opens immediately. God's declaration ahavti etkhem ('I have loved you') uses the perfect tense — completed, demonstrated, historical love. The people's retort bammah ahavtanu ('How/in what way have you loved us?') is not a genuine question but a challenge — they doubt God's love. God's response points to the choice of Jacob over Esau — twins, brothers, yet one chosen and one not. The verb va'ohav et-Ya'aqov ('yet I loved Jacob') begins the contrast completed in verse 3.
3. The Hebrew sane'ti ('I have hated') in covenant/election contexts means 'rejected, set aside, not chosen' rather than emotional hatred (cf. Genesis 29:31, where Leah is 'hated' = 'less loved'). Paul quotes this in Romans 9:13 to illustrate divine election. The contrast is between Jacob's descendants (Israel, restored from exile) and Esau's descendants (Edom, permanently devastated). Edom's mountains were indeed devastated — historically by Nabataean expansion and natural decline. The tannot midbar ('jackals of the wilderness') represent utter desolation.
4. Edom's resolve to rebuild — venashuv venivneh ('we will return and rebuild') — is defiant, but God's response is decisive: hemmah yivnu va'ani eheros ('they will build and I will tear down'). The contrast with Israel is implicit: Israel's rebuilding succeeds (Haggai, Zechariah), Edom's fails. The title gevil rish'ah ('territory of wickedness') and the phrase za'am YHWH ad-olam ('the LORD is angry forever') represent permanent divine judgment on Edom — a stark contrast to Israel, toward whom God's anger is temporary.
5. The statement yigdal YHWH me'al ligevul Yisra'el ('the LORD is great beyond the border of Israel') can mean either that God's greatness extends beyond Israel's borders (his sovereignty is universal) or that God will be praised beyond Israel's borders (the nations will acknowledge him). Either reading advances the universalist theme that will climax in verse 11. The people themselves will make this confession when they see the evidence.

6. The second disputation begins. God uses universally recognized social obligations — sons honor fathers, servants respect masters — to expose the priests' failure. The word kavod ('honor, glory') is from the same root as kavod ('weight, glory') — to honor is to treat as weighty, significant, important. The priests are bozei shemi ('despisers of my name') — they treat God's name as light, trivial, unimportant. Their retort bammeh bazinu et-shimekha ('How have we despised your name?') reveals oblivious guilt — they genuinely do not see their own contempt.
7. The word lechem mego'al ('defiled food/bread') refers to sacrificial offerings that fail to meet the requirements of purity. The altar is called shulchan YHWH ('the table of the LORD') — the sacrifice is God's meal, and the priests are serving him garbage. The word nivzeh ('contemptible, despised') is from bazah ('to despise') — the same root used for the priests' attitude toward God's name in verse 6. They have not said the words out loud, but their actions declare it.
8. The rhetorical question ein ra ('is it not evil/wrong?') is sarcastic — the priests have convinced themselves that defective offerings are acceptable. The devastating test: haqrivenu na lepechatekha ('try offering it to your governor'). The Persian governor (pechah) would never accept a blind, lame, or sick animal as a tribute gift. The priests give God less respect than they give a human official. The phrase hayissa panekha ('would he lift your face?' = would he show you favor?) exposes the double standard.
9. The sarcasm continues: challu-na penei-El ('try softening God's face'). The priests who offer defective sacrifices are invited to pray for God's favor — but the question is rhetorical: with such offerings, why would God listen? The phrase miyedikhem haytah zot ('this has come from your hands') places the blame squarely on the priests — they are the gatekeepers who allowed substandard sacrifices.
10. God's wish is devastating: mi gam-bakhem veyisgor delatayim ('Who among you would shut the doors?') — he would rather the temple be closed than continue receiving worthless worship. The phrase lo ta'iru mizbichi chinnam ('you would not kindle fire on my altar for nothing') means their altar fires are pointless — they produce nothing of value. The declaration ein-li chephets bakhem ('I take no pleasure in you') is total rejection of the priestly ministry as currently practiced.
11. This is one of the most remarkable verses in the Hebrew prophets. The statement gadol shemi baggoyim ('my name is great among the nations') appears twice, framing the declaration. The present tense — not 'will be' but 'is' — has generated intense debate: (1) God already receives acceptable worship from gentile God-fearers; (2) the prophetic present expresses a future certainty as if already real; (3) the worship of the 'Most High God' in various cultures is accepted by the LORD. The phrase uvkhol-maqom muqtar muggash lishmi ('in every place incense is offered and brought to my name') implies that the nations, even without knowing the LORD by name, offer worship that he accepts — a stunning contrast to Israel's priests who know his name but despise it.
12. The verb mechallelim ('profaning') is from chalal ('to profane, to make common') — the opposite of qadash ('to make holy'). The priests profane God's name by treating his altar as defiled (mecho'al) and his food (nivo, 'its produce/fruit') as nivzeh ('contemptible'). The irony is sharp: the offerings are defiled not by some external contamination but by the priests' own contemptuous attitude. They have created the very profanation they describe.
13. The phrase hinneh mattela'ah ('What a weariness/burden!') reveals the priests' attitude: worship has become drudgery. The verb hippachtem ('you snuff/blow at it') is a gesture of contempt — blowing dismissively at the offering as if it were worthless. The addition of gazul ('stolen') to the list (alongside lame and sick) means some offerings are not even legitimately owned — animals taken by force or theft, offered to God. The rhetorical question ha'ertseh otah miyedikhem ('should I accept this from your hands?') expects the answer: absolutely not.
14. The nokhel ('cheat, deceiver') is someone who has a perfect animal (zakhar, 'a male' — the required unblemished sacrifice), vows it to God, but then substitutes a mashchat ('blemished, corrupted') animal. This is deliberate fraud against God — promising the best and delivering the worst. The curse (arur) is formal covenant-curse language. The closing declaration — ki melekh gadol ani ('for I am a great King') — is the theological basis for the entire indictment: a great king deserves great offerings. The phrase shemi nora baggoyim ('my name is feared among the nations') reprises verse 11 — the nations give God more respect than his own priests do.

Summary: Malachi 2 continues the indictment of the priests (vv. 1-9) before turning to two new charges: the men of Judah have married foreign women and have divorced their Israelite wives (vv. 10-16). God warns that he will curse the priests' blessings and spread dung on their faces if they do not honor his name. The covenant with Levi — the priestly covenant of life and peace — is held up as the standard they have violated. The chapter then addresses the breaking of the 'covenant of our ancestors' through intermarriage and faithlessness toward 'the wife of your youth.' The chapter concludes with the third disputation: the people have wearied God by calling evil good.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 16 — traditionally rendered 'For the LORD, the God of Israel, says that he hates divorce' — is one of the most debated verses in the Hebrew Bible. The Hebrew is genuinely difficult. The verb sane ('hate') may have God or the divorcing husband as its subject, and the phrase shalach ('sending away') has been read multiple ways. Modern scholarship generally reads it as a conditional: 'If he hates her and divorces her... he covers his garment with violence.' We present* the text carefully with extensive notes on the interpretive options. The covenant with Levi (vv. 4-7) provides an idealized portrait of the priestly calling: the priest's lips should guard knowledge, and people should seek instruction from his mouth, 'for he is the messenger of the LORD of Armies' (v. 7).

Translation Friction: Verse 16 is the primary translation challenge. The MT reads ki-sane' shalach, which could be: (1) 'For he hates and divorces' (the divorcing husband is the subject — 'If one hates and divorces'); (2) 'For I hate divorce' (God is the subject — the traditional reading); (3) 'For he who hates, let him divorce' (an ironic permission). The LXX and other versions differ significantly. We follow a reading that preserves the difficulty while being syntactically defensible. The intermarriage issue (vv. 10-12) echoes Ezra 9-10 and Nehemiah 13:23-27, placing Malachi in the same post-exilic reform context.

Connections: The covenant with Levi (vv. 4-7) connects to Numbers 25:12-13 (the covenant of peace with Phinehas) and Deuteronomy 33:8-11 (Moses's blessing on Levi). The priest as 'messenger of the LORD of Armies' (v. 7) uses the same word as the book's title (mal'akh). The intermarriage critique connects to Ezra 9-10 and Nehemiah 13:23-27. The 'wife of your youth' language echoes Proverbs 5:18. The 'covering garment with violence' (v. 16) connects to the garment imagery of Ruth 3:9 (spreading a garment as protection).

¹Now then, priests, this command is for you. ²If you will not listen, and if you will not take it to heart to give honor to my name, says the LORD of Armies, then I will send the curse upon you and I will curse your blessings. Indeed, I have already cursed them, because you are not taking it to heart. ³I am about to rebuke your offspring. I will spread dung on your faces — the dung from your festival offerings — and you will be carried away with it. ⁴Then you will know that I sent this command to you so that my covenant with Levi might continue, says the LORD of Armies. ⁵My covenant with him was one of life and peace, and I gave these to him as something requiring reverence. He revered me and stood in awe of my name. ⁶Truthful instruction was in his mouth, and no wrong was found on his lips. He walked with me in peace and integrity, and he turned many away from iniquity. ⁷For the lips of a priest should guard knowledge, and people should seek instruction from his mouth — for he is the messenger of the LORD of Armies. ⁸But you have turned from the way. You have caused many to stumble by your instruction. You have corrupted the covenant of Levi, says the LORD of Armies. ⁹So I have made you despised and humiliated before all the people, because you have not kept my ways but have shown partiality in your instruction. ¹⁰Do we not all have one father? Did not one God create us? Why then do we deal treacherously with one another, profaning the covenant of our ancestors? ¹¹Judah has acted faithlessly. A detestable thing has been done in Israel and in Jerusalem: Judah has profaned the sanctuary of the LORD, which he loves, by marrying the daughter of a foreign god. ¹²May the LORD cut off from the tents of Jacob the man who does this — whoever he may be — even if he brings an offering to the LORD of Armies. ¹³And this is another thing you do: you cover the LORD's altar with tears, with weeping and groaning, because he no longer regards the offering or accepts it favorably from your hand. ¹⁴You ask, 'Why?' Because the LORD has been a witness between you and the wife of your youth, against whom you have been faithless — though she is your companion and the wife of your covenant. ¹⁵Did not the one God make them and preserve the spirit of life for them? And what does the one God seek? Godly offspring! So guard yourselves in your spirit, and do not be faithless to the wife of your youth. ¹⁶"For if one hates and divorces," says the LORD, the God of Israel, "he covers his garment with violence," says the LORD of Armies. So guard yourselves in your spirit, and do not be faithless.

¹⁷You have wearied the LORD with your words.

You ask, 'How have we wearied him?'

By saying, 'Everyone who does evil is good in the eyes of the LORD, and he delights in them,' or, 'Where is the God of

1. The direct address hakohanim ('priests') makes clear that the entire oracle of verses 1-9 targets the priestly class specifically. The mitsva ('commandment/charge') that follows is not a new law but a warning about the consequences of continued negligence.
2. The conditional threat: if the priests will not latet kavod lishmi ('give honor/weight to my name'), God will aroti et-birkoteikhem ('curse your blessings'). The priestly blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) was the priests' most sacred duty — God will turn their blessings into curses, rendering their ministry counterproductive. The shocking addition vegam arotihah ('indeed, I have already cursed them') means the judgment has already begun — they are already pronouncing empty blessings.

3. The degradation is extreme: vezeriti peresh al-peneikhem ('I will spread dung on your faces'). The peresh ('dung, offal') is from the festival sacrifices (chaggeikhhem) — the intestinal waste that was supposed to be burned outside the camp (Exodus 29:14; Leviticus 4:11). God will take the refuse from their own hypocritical festivals and smear it on them. Being 'carried away with it' (venasa etkhem elav) means they will be thrown onto the dung heap — removed from priestly service in the most humiliating way possible.
4. The purpose of the warning is preservative, not merely punitive: lihyot beriti et-Levi ('so that my covenant with Levi might stand/continue'). God's goal is to restore the priestly covenant, not to destroy it. The 'covenant with Levi' refers to the priestly covenant tradition (Numbers 25:12-13; Deuteronomy 33:8-11; Nehemiah 13:29) — the special relationship between God and the Levitical priesthood.
5. The original Levitical covenant is described with two gifts: hachayyim vehashshalom ('life and peace'). In exchange, God expected mora ('reverence, awe'). The ideal Levite (Levi himself, or the patriarchal priests) vayira'eni ('feared/revered me') and umippenei shemi nichat hu ('was shattered/humbled before my name'). The word nichat ('shattered, dismayed, humbled') is intense — true reverence involves being overwhelmed by God's holiness, not comfortable familiarity.
6. The ideal priest's qualifications: torat emet ('truthful instruction/torah') on his lips, no avlah ('wrong, injustice'), walking with God beshalom uvemishor ('in peace and in uprightness'), and turning many from avon ('iniquity'). This portrait presents the priest as primarily a teacher and moral guide, not merely a ritual functionary. The phrase halakh itti ('he walked with me') uses the same language as Enoch (Genesis 5:22) and Noah (Genesis 6:9) — intimate companionship with God.
7. The ideal priestly function: guarding knowledge (da'at) and dispensing torah ('instruction'). The climactic identification — ki mal'akh YHWH-Tsevaot hu ('for he is the messenger of the LORD of Armies') — uses the same word mal'akh that appears in the book's title (Mal'akhi, 'my messenger') and in 3:1 ('I will send my messenger'). The priest is God's authorized representative — his messenger on earth. This elevates the priestly calling to angelic status while devastating the current priests who have abandoned it.
8. The contrast with the ideal priest is devastating: sartem min-hadderekh ('you have turned from the way') — departure from the priestly path; hikhshaltem rabbim bat Torah ('you caused many to stumble by the Torah/instruction') — their teaching leads people astray instead of guiding them; shichchattem berit halevi ('you have corrupted the covenant of Levi') — the covenant itself is damaged by their behavior.
9. Measure-for-measure justice: the priests who treated God as contemptible (nivzeh, 1:7, 12) are now themselves nivzim ushephalim ('despised and humiliated') before the people. Their partiality in instruction — nos'im panim bat Torah ('lifting faces in the Torah,' i.e., showing favoritism) — means they adjusted their teaching to favor the powerful rather than speaking truth impartially.
10. A new section begins with rhetorical questions establishing shared identity: av echad ('one father') and El echad ('one God') who created us all. The word nivgad ('deal treacherously, act faithlessly') is the key verb of this section, appearing five times in verses 10-16. It describes covenant betrayal — the breaking of sworn commitments. The berit avoteinu ('covenant of our ancestors') may refer to the Sinai covenant or the broader family/tribal bonds within Israel.
11. The word to'evah ('abomination, detestable thing') is the strongest term for covenant violation — used for the most serious moral and ritual offenses. The phrase qodesh YHWH asher ahev ('the holiness/sanctuary of the LORD which he loves') may refer to the temple ('the sanctuary he loves'), to the covenant people themselves ('the holy one[s] he loves'), or to the institution of Israelite marriage. The intermarriage described — ba'al bat-el nekhar ('marrying the daughter of a foreign god') — is not ethnic but religious: the objection is to women who worship foreign deities, bringing idolatry into Israelite households.
12. The phrase ve'eoneh ('aroused and answering' or 'witness and advocate') is an ancient idiom meaning 'anyone at all' — a merism covering the full range of persons. Some translate it 'teacher and student.' The point is universal: no one is exempt from judgment for this sin, even if he brings offerings (umaggish minchah). Religious ritual cannot compensate for covenant betrayal.
13. The 'tears' on the altar may be: (1) the tears of the divorced wives who come weeping to God's altar for justice; (2) the men's own tears when their offerings are rejected; (3) the figurative weeping of the altar itself. The first reading is most compelling in context — the abandoned wives cry out at God's altar, and their tears make the offerings of their faithless husbands unacceptable.
14. Another disputation: the men ask 'Why?' (al-mah) God won't accept their offerings. The answer: God himself is a witness (he'id) to the marriage covenant. The wife is described with three terms: eshet ne'urekha ('wife of your youth' — the one you married when young and passionate), chavertekhka ('your companion' — your intimate partner and friend), and eshet beritekha ('wife of your covenant' — the one bound to you by sworn oath). Each term intensifies the betrayal: they are abandoning not a stranger but a companion bound by covenant.
15. This is one of the most difficult verses in the Hebrew Bible textually. The phrase velo-echad asah ('did not the one/One make?') likely refers to God creating the first couple as one flesh (Genesis 2:24). The 'godly offspring' (zera Elohim) is God's purpose for faithful marriage — children raised in covenant faithfulness. The practical command — venishmartem berukhakhem ('guard yourselves in your spirit') — means maintaining inner integrity and commitment. The prohibition al-yivgod ('do not be faithless') uses the same verb that has dominated this section.
16. This verse is one of the most debated in the Hebrew Bible. The traditional reading ('I hate divorce') takes God as the subject of sane ('hate'). However, the Hebrew grammar more naturally reads ki-sane' shalach as 'for/if he hates, he divorces' — the divorcing husband is the subject. We render it as a conditional describing the man's action: 'if one hates and divorces, he covers his garment with violence.' The phrase vekhissah chamas al-levusho ('he covers violence on his garment') may mean (1) violence is as visible as a stain on clothing, or (2) the garment that should protect (cf.

Ruth 3:9, spreading the garment as a sign of protection) has become an instrument of violence. The repeated command venishmartem berukhakhem ('guard yourselves in your spirit') brackets the section.

17. The third disputation. The verb hoga'tem ('you have wearied') pictures God as exhausted by their words — not their volume but their content. The charge is twofold: either (1) they claim God approves of evil (kol-oseh ra tov be'einei YHWH, 'everyone doing evil is good in the LORD's eyes'), or (2) they question God's justice (ayyeh Elohei hammishpat, 'Where is the God of justice?'). Both statements deny divine moral governance — one says God approves evil, the other says he doesn't act against it. This sets up the coming of the messenger and the refiner in chapter 3.

Summary: Malachi 3 answers the question posed at the end of chapter 2 ('Where is the God of justice?') with one of the most dramatic prophecies in the Hebrew Bible: 'I am sending my messenger, and he will prepare the way before me. Then suddenly the Lord whom you seek will come to his temple — the messenger of the covenant, in whom you delight. He is coming!' (v. 1). God will come as a refiner's fire and a launderer's soap, purifying the Levites. The chapter then addresses the people's failure to tithe — 'You are robbing me!' — and issues the famous challenge: 'Bring the full tithe into the storehouse... Test me in this!' (v. 10). The chapter closes with the book of remembrance written for those who fear the LORD, and the promise that God's treasured possession will be spared.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The messenger prophecy (v. 1) is quoted in all four Gospels as fulfilled by John the Baptist (Matthew 11:10; Mark 1:2; Luke 7:27; cf. John 1:23). The phrase mal'akhi ('my messenger') in verse 1 uses the same word as the book's title, creating a literary loop. The tithing challenge (v. 10) is unique in Scripture — God invites the people to 'test' (bachan) him, using the same word applied to gold-testing in Zechariah 13:9. The 'book of remembrance' (sepher zikkaron, v. 16) echoes the heavenly books in Exodus 32:32-33, Psalm 69:28, and Daniel 12:1, anticipating the 'book of life' in Revelation 20:12.*

Translation Friction: The identity of 'my messenger' (v. 1) versus 'the messenger of the covenant' is debated: are they the same figure or two different figures? The syntax allows both readings. We treat them as likely two figures — the preparatory messenger (John the Baptist) and the Lord himself ('the messenger of the covenant'). The tithing passage (vv. 8-10) uses language from the priestly Torah (Leviticus 27:30; Numbers 18:21-24) and raises questions about whether the tithe obligation applies beyond the Jerusalem temple system. We render the text without imposing later theological interpretation.

Connections: *The messenger prophecy (v. 1) is quoted in Matthew 11:10, Mark 1:2, and Luke 7:27. The refiner's fire (v. 2) connects to Zechariah 13:9 and Isaiah 48:10. The covenant with Levi (v. 3) continues from 2:4-7. The tithing command (v. 10) connects to Leviticus 27:30, Numbers 18:21-24, and Deuteronomy 14:22-29. The 'book of remembrance' (v. 16) connects to Exodus 32:32-33, Psalm 69:28, and Daniel 12:1. The term segullah ('treasured possession,' v. 17) echoes Exodus 19:5 and Deuteronomy 7:6.*

¹"I am sending my messenger, and he will clear the way before me. Then suddenly the Lord whom you are seeking will come to his temple — the messenger of the covenant in whom you delight. He is indeed coming," says the LORD of Armies. ²But who can endure the day of his coming? Who can stand when he appears? For he is like a refiner's fire and like a launderer's soap. ³He will sit as a refiner and purifier of silver. He will purify the sons of Levi and refine them like gold and silver, until they present offerings to the LORD in righteousness. ⁴Then the offering of Judah and Jerusalem will be pleasing to the LORD, as in the days of old, as in former years. ⁵"I will draw near to you for judgment. I will be a swift witness against sorcerers, adulterers, and those who swear falsely, against those who defraud workers of their wages, who oppress widows and the fatherless, who turn aside the foreigner, and who do not fear me," says the LORD of Armies. ⁶For I, the LORD, have not changed, and you, sons of Jacob, have not been destroyed.

⁷From the days of your ancestors you have turned from my statutes and have not kept them. Return to me and I will return to you, says the LORD of Armies.

You ask, 'How shall we return?'

⁸Will a person rob God? Yet you are robbing me!
 You ask, 'How are we robbing you?'
 In tithes and contributions.

⁹You are cursed with a curse, because you — the whole nation — are robbing me. ¹⁰Bring the full tithe into the storehouse so that there may be food in my house. Test me in this, says the LORD of Armies, and see if I will not open the windows of heaven for you and pour out a blessing until there is more than enough. ¹¹I will rebuke the devourer for you so that it will not destroy the produce of your soil, and the vine in your field will not fail to bear fruit, says the LORD of Armies. ¹²All the nations will call you blessed, for you will be a land of delight, says the LORD of Armies.

¹³"Your words have been harsh against me," says the LORD.
 You ask, "What have we said against you?"

¹⁴You have said, 'It is useless to serve God. What have we gained by keeping his requirements and walking in mourning before the LORD of Armies?' ¹⁵So now we call the arrogant blessed. Those who do wickedness prosper, and those who test God escape punishment.'" ¹⁶Then those who feared the LORD spoke to one another. The LORD paid attention and listened, and a book of remembrance was written before him for those who fear the LORD and honor his name. ¹⁷"They will be mine," says the LORD of Armies, "on the day when I act — my treasured possession. I will spare them as a man spares his own son who serves him." ¹⁸Then you will again see the distinction between the righteous and the wicked, between the one who serves God and the one who does not.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse contains three figures: (1) mal'akhi ('my messenger') who prepares the way — identified in Mark 1:2 with John the Baptist; (2) ha'Adon ('the Lord') who comes to his temple — God himself; (3) mal'akh habberit ('the messenger of the covenant') in whom they delight. Whether (2) and (3) are the same figure is debated. The word pit'om ('suddenly') carries a threatening edge — God's arrival will be without warning, catching people unprepared. The ironic phrase asher-attem mevaqeshim ('whom you are seeking') and asher-attem chaphetsim ('in whom you delight') turns the people's own desires against them: they asked for the God of justice, and now he is coming — but they may not like what justice looks like.
2. The rhetorical questions — mi mekhalkel ('who can endure?') and mi ha'omed ('who can stand?') — expose the naivety of asking 'Where is the God of justice?' (2:17). When justice comes, it burns. Two purification images: esh metsareph ('a refiner's fire') that burns away impurities from metal, and borit mekhavesim ('a launderer's soap/lye') that scrubs stains from fabric. Together they represent complete purification — internal (fire removes embedded impurity) and external (soap removes surface contamination).
3. The image of sitting (veyashav) is significant — the refiner sits before the crucible, watching intently until the metal is pure enough to reflect his own face. The sons of Levi are purified first because their purification is prerequisite to the purification of the community's worship. The phrase maggishei minchah bitsedaqah ('presenting offerings in righteousness') is the goal: offerings that are tsedaqah — genuinely righteous, fulfilling the covenant obligations properly.
4. The verb arvah ('will be pleasing, will be sweet') describes God's acceptance of the purified offerings. The phrases kimei olam ('as in the days of old') and ukeshanim qadmoniyyot ('as in former years') look back to an idealized past — perhaps the wilderness period, the Solomonic era, or any time when worship was genuine. The promise is not innovation but restoration: worship will return to its original intended quality.
5. God becomes both judge and witness — ed memmaher ('a swift/eager witness'). The catalog of sins spans ritual (sorcery), sexual (adultery), verbal (false oaths), and social (economic exploitation of workers, widows, orphans, and foreigners). The list echoes the Decalogue and the prophetic justice tradition. The final phrase velo yere'uni ('they do not fear me') is the root cause — all the listed sins stem from the absence of reverence for God.
6. God's unchanging character (lo shaniti, 'I have not changed') is the basis for Israel's survival. If God changed — if he abandoned his covenant promises — Israel would have been consumed (khalitem). The pairing is theology at its most compressed: God's faithfulness preserves people who deserve destruction. The 'sons of Jacob' designation reminds the people of the patriarch who himself was a deceiver yet was loved and preserved by God (cf. 1:2).
7. The call shuvu elai ve'ashuvah aleikhem ('return to me and I will return to you') echoes Zechariah 1:3 verbatim — the same reciprocal promise. The people's response bammeh nashuv ('How shall we return?') is the fourth disputation. Unlike a sincere question, this is defensive — they do not recognize their departure and therefore cannot imagine what return would look like. God's answer (vv. 8-10) will be concrete: the tithe.
8. The verb qava' ('rob, defraud') is rare and forceful. The question is rhetorical: robbery of God should be unthinkable, yet they are doing it. The answer — hamma'aser vehatterumah ('the tithe and the contribution') — specifies the violation: the mandatory tithe (one-tenth of agricultural produce, Leviticus 27:30) and the terumah ('contribution, offering' — the portion dedicated to priests and Levites, Numbers 18:24-28) are being withheld.

9. The cognate accusative bamme'erah attem ne'arim ('with a curse you are cursed') is emphatic — the curse is already in effect, not merely threatened. The scope is haggoy kullo ('the whole nation') — this is not individual sin but collective, systemic withholding. The connection between robbing God (withholding tithes) and experiencing the curse (economic hardship) echoes Haggai 1:6-11 — covenant disobedience produces covenant consequences.
10. The beit ha'otsar ('storehouse') was the temple storage area for tithes (cf. Nehemiah 10:38-39; 13:12-13). The phrase viyhi tereph beveiti ('so there may be food in my house') is startlingly practical — the tithe funded the temple operations and supported the Levites. God invites testing: uvechanuni na ('test me, please') uses the same verb applied to gold testing. The promise — arubbot hashamayim ('windows of heaven') opened and berakhah poured out ad-beli-dai ('until there is not enough room') — echoes the Genesis flood language (Genesis 7:11), but now heaven's windows release blessing instead of destruction.
11. The 'devourer' (ha'okhel, literally 'the eater') likely refers to locusts or other crop-destroying pests — agricultural enemies that God will personally rebuke (ga'arti). The agricultural promises — produce protected, vine bearing fruit — reverse the covenant curses described in Haggai 1:6-11 and Deuteronomy 28:38-40. God's blessing is tangible, measurable, and agricultural.
12. The promise extends beyond agricultural blessing to international reputation: ve'ishsheru etkhem kol-haggoyim ('all the nations will call you blessed/happy'). The phrase erets chephets ('a land of delight/desire') echoes chemdah from Haggai 2:7 and Zechariah 7:14. Israel will be so visibly blessed that the nations will recognize and proclaim it — fulfilling the Abrahamic promise of Genesis 12:2-3.
13. The fifth disputation. The verb chazqu ('have been strong/harsh') describes words that are forceful and defiant. The people's oblivious response — mah-nidbarnu alekha ('What have we said against you?') — follows the now-familiar pattern of defensive incomprehension.
14. The people's words expose a transactional view of religion: shav avod Elohim ('it is vain/useless to serve God'). The question mah-betsa ('what profit?') treats worship as an investment that should yield returns. The phrase halakhnu qedorannit ('we walked in mourning/gloom') suggests they performed penitential rituals expecting reward and received none. Their theology is: if obedience does not produce immediate visible benefit, it is worthless.
15. The people's complaint concludes: the arrogant (zedim) are blessed, the wicked (osei rish'ah) prosper, and those who test God (bachanu Elohim) escape consequences. This is the classic theodicy complaint — why do the wicked prosper? — but here it is used to justify religious indifference rather than as genuine lament. The irony: in verse 10, God invited them to 'test me' (uvechanuni) with tithes, but here they complain that others 'test God' (bachanu Elohim) with impunity.
16. The scene shifts from the cynics to the faithful. The yir'ei YHWH ('those who fear the LORD') speak to each other — mutual encouragement in a hostile environment. God's response is threefold: vayyaqshav ('he paid attention'), vayyishma ('he heard'), and vayyikkatev sepher zikkaron ('a book of remembrance was written'). The sepher zikkaron echoes the Persian royal practice of recording notable deeds (cf. Esther 6:1-2). Those who 'think upon his name' (ulchoshevei shemo) are people who value and meditate on God's character. Their names are permanently recorded.
17. The word segullah ('treasured possession, special treasure') is the term used for Israel's unique status in Exodus 19:5 and Deuteronomy 7:6 and 14:2. Now it is applied specifically to the faithful remnant within Israel — the God-fearers of verse 16. The comparison — ka'asher yachmol ish al-beno ha'oved oto ('as a man spares his son who serves him') — combines parental tenderness with the recognition that the son is faithful/obedient (oved, 'serving'). Sparing here means protecting from the coming judgment.
18. The verse answers the complaint of verses 14-15 that there is no visible difference between the righteous and the wicked. God promises that the distinction will become unmistakable. The verb veshavtem ('you will return/again') suggests a restored ability to perceive moral reality. The parallelism — tsaddiq/rasha ('righteous/wicked') and oved Elohim/asher lo avado ('serving God/not serving him') — defines righteousness as active service, not merely moral status.

Summary: Malachi 4 (Hebrew 3:19-24) is the closing chapter of the prophetic canon and the final word of the Old Testament before the intertestamental period. The coming day will burn like a furnace, reducing the arrogant and wicked to stubble — but for those who fear God's name, 'the sun of righteousness will rise with healing in its wings' (v. 2). The people are commanded to remember the Torah of Moses. The book and the prophetic canon close with the promise that God will send Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the LORD, to turn the hearts of parents to children and children to parents — 'lest I come and strike the land with utter destruction.'

What Makes This Remarkable: These are the last prophetic words of the Old Testament. The final verses create a literary bridge spanning the entire Hebrew Bible: Moses (the Torah) and Elijah (the Prophets) stand together at the close, just as they will stand together on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matthew 17:1-8). The 'sun of righteousness with healing in its wings' (v. 2) has become one of the most beloved messianic images in Christian tradition. The Elijah prophecy (vv. 5-6) is quoted in Luke 1:17 as fulfilled by John the Baptist, and Jesus identifies John as the promised Elijah in Matthew 11:14 and 17:12-13. In Jewish tradition, an empty chair is set for Elijah at every Passover Seder, awaiting his return.

Translation Friction: English chapter 4 corresponds to Hebrew 3:19-24 — the Hebrew Bible does not have a chapter break here. We follow the English versification (4:1-6) while noting the Hebrew numbering in translator notes. The phrase shemesh tsedaqah ('sun of righteousness,' v. 2) is grammatically feminine in Hebrew (shemesh is feminine), though the 'wings' (kenaphayim) suggest the winged sun disk imagery common in ancient Near Eastern art. Whether 'righteousness' modifies the sun (a sun characterized by righteousness) or is the sun's name (Righteousness personified as the sun) affects interpretation. The final word of the Hebrew Bible is cherem ('utter destruction/ban'), ending the prophetic canon with a warning rather than a comfort — a deliberate choice.

Connections: The burning day (v. 1) connects to Isaiah 34:9-10 and Joel 2:31. The sun of righteousness (v. 2) informs Luke 1:78-79 ('the rising sun from heaven'). The command to remember Moses (v. 4) creates a canon-bridging reference to the Torah. The Elijah prophecy (vv. 5-6) is fulfilled in John the Baptist (Matthew 11:14; 17:12-13; Luke 1:17). The turning of hearts (v. 6) is quoted in Luke 1:17. The final word cherem connects to the very beginning of the conquest narrative (Joshua 6:17-21). Moses and Elijah together appear at the Transfiguration (Matthew 17:1-8).

¹For the day is coming, burning like a furnace. All the arrogant and all who do wickedness will be stubble. The coming day will set them ablaze, says the LORD of Armies, leaving them neither root nor branch. ²But for you who fear my name, the sun of righteousness will rise with healing in its wings. You will go out and leap like calves released from the stall. ³You will tread down the wicked, for they will be ashes under the soles of your feet on the day when I act, says the LORD of Armies. ⁴Remember the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded him at Horeb — statutes and ordinances for all Israel. ⁵I am sending you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and awesome day of the LORD. ⁶He will turn the hearts of parents to their children and the hearts of children to their parents, so that I will not come and strike the land with utter destruction.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Hebrew verse numbering: 3:19. The image of the tannur ('furnace, oven') is concrete — the clay oven used for baking bread, in which straw/stubble was burned as fuel. The arrogant (zedim) and the wicked (osei rish'ah) become qash ('stubble') — dry, worthless fuel. The comprehensiveness of the destruction — lo ya'azov lahem shoshon ve'anaph ('leaving them neither root nor branch') — means complete annihilation: no root (no foundation, no future progeny underground) and no branch (no visible growth, no continuation above ground). The destruction is total — nothing survives to regenerate.
2. Hebrew verse numbering: 3:20. The phrase yir'ei shemi ('you who fear my name') echoes the God-fearers of 3:16 — the faithful remnant. The shemesh tsedaqah ('sun of righteousness') has been interpreted as messianic (a righteous ruler who brings healing light) or theophanic (God himself appearing as the rising sun). Luke 1:78 echoes this: 'the rising sun will come to us from heaven, to shine on those living in darkness.' The word kenaphayim ('wings') usually means the wings of a bird but here refers to the sun's rays — like outstretched wings of light. The calves (eglei marbeq) released from the stall leap and run with the joy of freedom — the contrast with the furnace and stubble of verse 1 is total.
3. Hebrew verse numbering: 3:21. The verb asottem ('you will trample') pictures the righteous walking over the remains of the wicked, who have been reduced to epher ('ashes') by the furnace of verse 1. The phrase bayyom asher ani oseh ('on the day when I act/make') leaves the specific timing open — 'the day I am preparing' or 'the day I act.' The emphasis is on God's initiative: he creates the day of judgment.
4. Hebrew verse numbering: 3:22. The command zikhru ('remember') is not merely mental recall but active obedience — to 'remember' the Torah is to live by it. The reference to Chorev (Horeb = Sinai) reaches back to the foundational moment of the covenant. Moses is called avdi ('my servant') — the same title used for David and the messianic Branch. The chuqqim umishpatim ('statutes and ordinances') encompass the full range of Torah legislation. This verse creates a canonical bridge from the Prophets back to the Torah — the end of prophecy points back to the beginning of revelation.
5. Hebrew verse numbering: 3:23. The Elijah prophecy is among the most influential in Jewish and Christian tradition. In Judaism, Elijah is expected before the messianic age — an empty chair and cup are set for him at Passover. In Christianity, Jesus identifies John the Baptist as the fulfillment (Matthew 11:14; 17:12-13), while the angel Gabriel quotes this verse when announcing John's birth (Luke 1:17). The phrase yom YHWH haggadol vehanora ('the great and awesome day of the LORD') uses nora ('awesome, fearsome') rather than the KJV's 'dreadful' — the day inspires awe, not merely dread.
6. Hebrew verse numbering: 3:24. The mission of Elijah: veheshiv lev-avot al-banim velev banim al-avotam ('turning the hearts of parents to children and children to parents'). Luke 1:17 quotes this directly for John the Baptist. The verb heshiv ('to turn, to return, to restore') is from the same root as teshuvah ('repentance/return') — generational reconciliation is itself a form of repentance. The final word of the Hebrew prophetic canon is cherem — the total ban of destruction. This is deliberately ominous: the prophetic message closes with a warning, not a promise. Jewish scribal tradition repeats verse 5 after verse 6 when reading in the synagogue, so that the prophets do not end on a note of cursing. The entire arc of the prophetic canon — from Joshua through Malachi — begins with the cherem of Jericho and ends with the threat of cherem against the whole land. Elijah's mission is to prevent it.

New Testament

Matthew

Summary: Matthew 1 opens with a genealogy tracing Jesus's lineage from Abraham through David to Joseph, establishing Jesus as heir to both the Abrahamic covenant and the Davidic throne. The genealogy is structured in three groups of fourteen generations, spanning the patriarchal era, the monarchy, and the exile-to-Messiah period. The chapter then narrates the circumstances of Jesus's birth: Joseph discovers Mary is pregnant, resolves to divorce her quietly, but an angel appears in a dream explaining that the child is from the Holy Spirit. Joseph obeys and takes Mary as his wife, and the child is named Jesus — 'for he will save his people from their sins.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Matthew's genealogy is theologically structured rather than merely historical. The three sets of fourteen generations (Abraham to David, David to exile, exile to Christ) create a deliberate pattern that may reference the numerical value of David's name in Hebrew (d-v-d = 4+6+4 = 14). Four women are included — Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba ('the wife of Uriah') — each with irregular or scandalous circumstances, preparing the reader for Mary's own unexpected pregnancy. The fulfillment quotation from Isaiah 7:14 introduces Matthew's distinctive pattern of citing Hebrew Scripture as fulfilled in Jesus. The Greek parthenos ('virgin') translates the Hebrew almah ('young woman'), a translation choice already made by the Septuagint that Matthew adopts and applies to Mary.

Translation Friction: The genealogy contains well-known discrepancies with Old Testament records and Luke's genealogy. We render the Greek as given without harmonizing. The name Ἰησοῦς (Iesous) is the Greek form of the Hebrew Yeshua/Yehoshua ('the LORD saves'), and the angel's explanation in verse 21 depends on this etymology. We transliterate Greek terms in key_ terms entries using standard conventions. The phrase 'before they came together' (v. 18) is a Greek euphemism for sexual union, which we render transparently.

Connections: The genealogy connects to Genesis 12 (Abrahamic covenant), 2 Samuel 7 (Davidic covenant), and the exile narratives of 2 Kings 24-25. The Isaiah 7:14 quotation establishes Matthew's fulfillment theology that runs through the entire Gospel. The naming of Jesus connects to the Hebrew salvation vocabulary (yeshuah) central to the Old Testament. Joseph's dream-revelation anticipates the pattern of divine dreams in chapter 2.

¹The record of the genealogy of Jesus Christ, son of David, son of Abraham: ²Abraham fathered Isaac, Isaac fathered Jacob, and Jacob fathered Judah and his brothers. ³Judah fathered Perez and Zerah by Tamar, Perez fathered Hezron, and Hezron fathered Ram. ⁴Ram fathered Amminadab, Amminadab fathered Nahshon, and Nahshon fathered Salmon. ⁵Salmon fathered Boaz by Rahab, Boaz fathered Obed by Ruth, and Obed fathered Jesse. ⁶Jesse fathered David the king. David fathered Solomon by the wife of Uriah. ⁷Solomon fathered Rehoboam, Rehoboam fathered Abijah, and Abijah fathered Asaph. ⁸Asaph fathered Jehoshaphat, Jehoshaphat fathered Joram, and Joram fathered Uzziah. ⁹Uzziah fathered Jotham, Jotham fathered Ahaz, and Ahaz fathered Hezekiah. ¹⁰Hezekiah fathered Manasseh, Manasseh fathered Amos, and Amos fathered Josiah. ¹¹Josiah fathered Jeconiah and his brothers, at the time of the deportation to Babylon. ¹²After the deportation to Babylon, Jeconiah fathered Shealtiel, and Shealtiel fathered Zerubbabel. ¹³Zerubbabel fathered Abiud, Abiud fathered Eliakim, and Eliakim fathered Azor. ¹⁴Azor fathered Zadok, Zadok fathered Achim, and Achim fathered Eliud. ¹⁵Eliud fathered Eleazar, Eleazar fathered Matthan, and Matthan fathered Jacob. ¹⁶Jacob fathered Joseph, the husband of Mary, from whom Jesus was born — the one called Christ. ¹⁷So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations, from David to the deportation to Babylon are fourteen generations, and from the deportation to Babylon to the Christ are fourteen generations. ¹⁸Now the birth of Jesus Christ came about in this way. His mother Mary had been pledged in marriage to Joseph, but before they came together, she was found to be pregnant through the Holy Spirit. ¹⁹Joseph, her husband, was a righteous man and did not want to disgrace her publicly, so he resolved to divorce her quietly. ²⁰But while he was considering this, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying, "Joseph, son of David, do not be afraid to take Mary as your wife, for what has been conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit. ²¹She will give birth to a son, and you are to name him Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins." ²²All this took place to fulfill what was spoken by the Lord through the prophet: ²³"Look, the virgin will conceive and give birth to a son, and they will call his name Emmanuel" — which means, "God with us." ²⁴When Joseph woke from sleep, he did as the angel of the Lord had commanded him and took Mary as his wife, ²⁵Recognized her not till she had brought forth her firstborn son — then he called his name JESUS.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek biblos geneleos ('book of genesis/origin') echoes Genesis 2:4 and 5:1 in the Septuagint, signaling that Matthew views Jesus's arrival as a new act of creation. 'Generation' in the KJV is misleading in modern English; 'genealogy' captures the Greek sense of a record of origins.
1. Both 'son of David' and 'son of Abraham' are theological claims, not merely genealogical ones — Jesus is heir to David's throne and to Abraham's covenant promise.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 2:4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The Greek egenesen ('fathered, begot') is rendered consistently as 'fathered' throughout the genealogy rather than the archaic 'begat.' The name Ioudas is rendered 'Judah' (the patriarch) rather than 'Judas' (the later form), since this refers to the Old Testament figure.
3. Tamar is the first of four women named in the genealogy. Her story (Genesis 38) involves deception and a levirate-like union with Judah — an irregular beginning that Matthew includes deliberately. The mention of women in an ancient genealogy is unusual and theologically purposeful.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 38 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. Nahshon was the leader of the tribe of Judah during the wilderness period (Numbers 1:7, 2:3). His inclusion reinforces the Judahite royal lineage.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 1:7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. Rahab and Ruth are the second and third women in the genealogy. Rahab was a Canaanite prostitute from Jericho (Joshua 2); Ruth was a Moabite widow (Ruth 1). Both are Gentile women whose inclusion foreshadows the Gospel's universal scope. The traditional identification of this Rahab with the Jericho Rahab is assumed by Matthew though not explicit in Old Testament genealogies.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Joshua 2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Ruth 1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. Matthew pointedly refuses to name Bathsheba, calling her 'the wife of Uriah' — a phrase that keeps Uriah's wrongful death in view. This is the fourth woman in the genealogy, and the most politically charged. David is the only figure given the title 'the king' (ton basilea), marking the genealogy's structural midpoint.
7. The SBLGNT reads 'Asaph' rather than 'Asa,' which may reflect a scribal identification of the king with the psalmist Asaph, or may be a textual variant. We follow the SBLGNT reading.
8. Three kings are omitted between Joram and Uzziah: Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah (cf. 1 Chronicles 3:11-12). Matthew's genealogy is telescoped to achieve the fourteen-generation structure, a common practice in ancient Near Eastern genealogies.

8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Chronicles 3:11-12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. These names follow the standard English forms from the Old Testament rather than the Greek transliterations. Ahaz and Hezekiah represent a dramatic father-son contrast in the Kings narrative — Ahaz was one of Judah's worst kings, Hezekiah one of its best.
10. The SBLGNT reads 'Amos' rather than 'Amon,' which may reflect a scribal confusion with the prophet Amos, or may be an intentional variant. We follow the SBLGNT. In the Old Testament record, Amon/Amos reigned only two years before being assassinated (2 Kings 21:19-26).
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Kings 21:19-26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The Greek metoikesias ('deportation, removal, exile') refers to the Babylonian exile of 586 BC. Jeconiah (also called Jehoiachin) was the last king before the exile. Historically, Josiah was Jeconiah's grandfather, not his father — Jehoiakim is skipped, another instance of Matthew's telescoping.
12. Zerubbabel led the first return from exile and oversaw the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 3-6). His inclusion connects Jesus to the post-exilic restoration hope. The lineage from this point forward is less well attested in Old Testament records.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ezra 3-6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. From Abiud onward, the names in Matthew's genealogy do not appear in Old Testament records. These represent the intertestamental period for which Matthew had access to sources no longer extant.
14. The name Zadok (Sadok) recalls the famous high priest of David's era (2 Samuel 8:17), though this is a different individual. The priestly resonance may be intentional within Matthew's genealogical design.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Samuel 8:17. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The name Eleazar recalls Aaron's son and successor as high priest (Numbers 20:28). Matthan is a shortened form related to Mattaniah ('gift of the LORD'). These final pre-Joseph names carry priestly and theophoric resonances.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 20:28 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The grammatical shift is decisive: every previous entry uses the active 'fathered' (egennesen), but here the passive egennethee ('was born') replaces it. Joseph does not 'father' Jesus; Jesus 'was born from' Mary. The relative pronoun 'from whom' (ex hes) is feminine singular, referring to Mary alone. Matthew's grammar carefully preserves the virgin birth claim while maintaining Joseph's legal paternity through the Davidic line.
17. The threefold repetition of 'fourteen generations' (dekateσσαρες geneai) is Matthew's structural key. The number fourteen may relate to the numerical value of David's name in Hebrew (dalet-vav-dalet = 4+6+4 = 14), making the entire genealogy a numerical proclamation that Jesus is David's heir. The actual count requires some flexibility — the third section has only thirteen names as listed — which confirms that the scheme is theological rather than strictly mathematical.
18. The word genesis here means 'birth' or 'origin,' echoing verse 1. The phrase 'pledged in marriage' (mneesteuthesees) indicates a formal betrothal that was legally binding in Jewish practice — more than modern engagement but prior to cohabitation. 'Before they came together' (prin ee synelthein) is a euphemism for sexual union. The phrase ek pneumatos hagiou ('from the Holy Spirit') attributes the conception directly to divine agency.
19. The Greek dikaio ('righteous, just') is the same word used for covenant faithfulness throughout the Septuagint. Joseph's righteousness manifests not in strict legal enforcement but in mercy — he could have exposed Mary to public shame and legal penalty, but chose discretion. The verb apolusai ('to release, divorce') confirms that betrothal carried the legal weight of marriage.
20. The address 'son of David' (huios David) is significant — the angel reminds Joseph of his royal lineage precisely at the moment when he is about to sever the legal connection between that lineage and the child. The Greek angelos kyriou ('angel of the Lord') echoes the Hebrew malak YHWH of the Old Testament theophanies. Dreams as vehicles of divine revelation connect Joseph to his Old Testament namesake (Genesis 37, 40-41).
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 37 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The name Iesous (Ἰησοῦς) is the Greek form of the Hebrew Yeshua/Yehoshua, meaning 'the LORD saves' or 'the LORD is salvation.' The angel's explanation — 'for he will save (sosei) his people' — is a direct etymology of the name. The command to Joseph to name the child establishes his legal paternity and thus the Davidic succession.
22. This is the first of Matthew's fulfillment formulas (a pattern repeated throughout the Gospel: 2:15, 2:17, 2:23, 4:14, 8:17, 12:17, 13:35, 21:4, 27:9). The passive pleerothee ('might be fulfilled') indicates divine purpose — the events did not merely happen to coincide with prophecy but occurred in order to fulfill it.
23. Matthew quotes Isaiah 7:14 from the Septuagint, which uses parthenos ('virgin') to translate the Hebrew almah ('young woman of marriageable age'). The Hebrew term does not inherently mean 'virgin' (the specific Hebrew word for virgin is bethulah), but the Septuagint translators chose parthenos, and Matthew adopts this reading as prophetically significant. 'Emmanuel' (Hebrew Immanu-El, 'God with us') becomes a theological declaration — God's presence embodied in this child. Matthew bookends his Gospel with this theme (cf. 28:20, 'I am with you always').

23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 7:14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
24. Joseph's immediate obedience upon waking mirrors the pattern of Old Testament figures who respond to divine commands without argument (cf. Abraham in Genesis 22:3). The verb prosetaxen ('commanded') is stronger than the KJV's 'bidden' — this was a directive, not a suggestion.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 22:3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The Greek ouk eginōsken autēn ('he did not know her') uses the biblical euphemism for sexual intercourse, corresponding to the Hebrew yada. We render the meaning transparently rather than preserving the euphemism. The word heos ('until') has been debated for centuries: it clearly states abstinence before the birth but does not grammatically require or exclude relations afterward. The SBLGNT does not include 'firstborn' (prōtotokon), which appears in some manuscripts — we follow the critical text.

Summary: Matthew 2 narrates four episodes from Jesus's infancy: the visit of the Magi from the East who follow a star to find the newborn king, Herod's duplicitous scheme to locate the child, the holy family's flight to Egypt, and the massacre of infants in Bethlehem followed by the family's eventual settlement in Nazareth. Each episode is anchored by a fulfillment quotation from the Hebrew prophets, establishing Matthew's theological framework that Jesus's life recapitulates Israel's story.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter contains four fulfillment quotations (Micah 5:2, Hosea 11:1, Jeremiah 31:15, and a composite prophetic reference to Nazareth) — more than any other chapter in Matthew. The Magi are Gentile astrologers, and their worship of Jesus anticipates the universal scope of the Gospel. Herod's massacre echoes Pharaoh's slaughter of Hebrew infants in Exodus 1, casting Jesus as a new Moses. The flight to Egypt and return deliberately mirrors Israel's own journey — Jesus embodies Israel's story in his own person.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'out of Egypt I called my son' (v. 15) originally referred to Israel as a nation in Hosea 11:1, not to an individual Messiah. Matthew's typological reading is not a prediction-fulfillment in the modern sense but a theological claim that Jesus recapitulates Israel's experience. We render the quotations as Matthew presents them without editorializing on the hermeneutical method. The 'star' (aster) in the Magi narrative has been variously interpreted as astronomical, astrological, or miraculous — the Greek text does not resolve the question, and we preserve the ambiguity.

Connections: The Magi narrative connects to Numbers 24:17 (the star of Jacob), Isaiah 60:1-6 (nations bringing gifts), and Psalm 72:10-11 (kings offering tribute). The flight to Egypt connects to the Exodus narrative and Hosea 11:1. Rachel weeping connects to Jeremiah 31:15 and the exile. The Nazareth reference may connect to Isaiah 11:1 (netser, 'branch') through wordplay.

¹After Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea during the reign of King Herod, wise men from the East arrived in Jerusalem, ² Declaring, Where is he that is born to be king of the Jews? since we have seen his star appear when it rose, and are traveled here to honor him. ³When King Herod heard this, he was deeply disturbed, and all Jerusalem with him. ⁴He assembled all the chief priests and scribes of the people and inquired of them where the Christ was to be born. ⁵They told him, "In Bethlehem of Judea, for this is what has been written through the prophet: ⁶'And you, Bethlehem, in the land of Judah, are by no means least among the rulers of Judah; for from you will come a ruler who will shepherd my people Israel.'" ⁷Then Herod secretly summoned the wise men and determined from them the exact time the star had appeared. ⁸He sent them to Bethlehem and said, "Go and search carefully for the child. When you find him, report back to me so that I too may go and pay him homage." ⁹After hearing the king, they set out, and there — the star they had seen at its rising went ahead of them until it came and stood over the place where the child was. ¹⁰When they saw the star, they were overwhelmed with joy. ¹¹The y entered the house and saw the child with Mary his mother, and falling down, they worshiped him. Then, opening their treasure chests, they presented him with gifts: gold, frankincense, and myrrh. ¹²And having been warned in a dream not to return to Herod, they departed for their own country by another route. ¹³After they had departed, an angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, "Get up, take the child and his mother, and flee to Egypt. Stay there until I tell you, for Herod is about to search for the child to destroy him." ¹⁴So he got up, took the child and his mother during the night, and withdrew to Egypt, ¹⁵Was there until the passing of Herod — that it could be fulfilled which had been spoken of the Lord by the prophet of old and stated, Out of Egypt have I called my son. ¹⁶When Herod realized that he had been outwitted by the wise men, he flew into a rage and sent soldiers to kill all the male children in Bethlehem and its surrounding region who were two years old and under, based on the time he had determined from the wise men. ¹⁷Then what was spoken through the prophet Jeremiah was fulfilled: ¹⁸"A voice was heard in Ramah — weeping and great mourning — Rachel weeping for her children, and she refused to be comforted, because they are no more." ¹⁹After Herod died, an angel of the Lord appeared in a dream to Joseph in Egypt, ²⁰Declaring, Arise, and take the little child and his mother, and go into Israel's territory — since those who threatened who were seeking the little child's life. ²¹So he got up, took the child and his mother, and entered the land of Israel. ²²But when he heard that Archelaus was reigning over Judea in place of his father Herod, he was afraid to go there. And after being warned in a dream, he withdrew to the region of Galilee, ²³He arrived and dwelt in a city called Nazareth — that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He will be known as a Nazarene.

1. The Greek magoi ('magi, wise men') refers to Persian-origin astrologer-priests, not kings. The traditional 'three wise men' is not in the text — the number three is inferred from the three gifts. 'From the East' (apo anatolon) literally means 'from the rising [of the sun],' indicating Persia, Babylon, or Arabia. The genitive absolute construction 'Jesus having been born' (tou Iesou genneethentos) indicates the birth has already occurred — the Magi do not arrive at the manger.
2. The phrase 'king of the Jews' (basileus ton Ioudaion) will reappear at Jesus's trial and crucifixion (27:11, 37), forming a bitter inclusio across the Gospel. The Greek proskynesai can mean 'worship' (of God) or 'pay homage' (to a king) — the Magi may intend political respect, but Matthew's readers would hear deeper significance. 'At its rising' (en tee anatolee, singular) is better than 'in the east,' which would be the plural form — it refers to the star's heliacal rising.
3. The verb etarachthee ('was troubled, disturbed, agitated') is strong — the same word describes the disciples' terror at seeing Jesus walk on water (14:26). Herod's disturbance is political paranoia: he was not the legitimate Davidic heir and was fiercely protective of his throne. That 'all Jerusalem' shared his alarm reflects either the population's fear of Herod's violent reactions or their own unease at messianic claims that could provoke Roman intervention.
4. Herod consults the Jewish religious establishment — the chief priests (archiereis) and scribes (grammateis), the recognized experts in Torah interpretation. The imperfect tense epynthaneto ('was inquiring') may suggest repeated or persistent questioning. 'The Christ' (ho Christos) with the definite article indicates the expected Messiah as a known concept.
5. The perfect tense gegraptai ('it has been written and stands written') indicates the enduring authority of the prophetic text. The religious leaders know the scriptural answer immediately but show no inclination to act on it — a tragic irony that Matthew develops throughout the Gospel.
6. Matthew's quotation combines Micah 5:2 with 2 Samuel 5:2, modifying the original. Micah's Hebrew reads 'too small to be among the clans of Judah,' but Matthew reverses it to 'by no means least' — an interpretive rendering that emphasizes Bethlehem's dignity rather than its smallness. The verb poimanei ('will shepherd') draws on the ancient Near Eastern image of the king as shepherd, connecting Jesus to David, who was literally a shepherd from Bethlehem before becoming king.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Micah 5:2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Samuel 5:2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The adverb lathra ('secretly') reveals Herod's duplicity — he does not want the religious leaders or the public to know he is tracking this. The verb ekribosen ('determined precisely, ascertained exactly') shows calculated intent; he is establishing a timeline that will later determine the age range for the massacre (v. 16).
8. Herod's claim that he wishes to 'pay homage' (proskyneso) uses the same word the Magi used in verse 2. The dramatic irony is sharp — the reader knows Herod intends to destroy the child, not honor him. The word paidion ('young child') rather than brepheos ('infant') may suggest the child is no longer a newborn.
9. The star's behavior — going ahead and then standing over a specific location — goes beyond normal astronomical phenomena. The Greek proegen ('went ahead, led the way') and estathee ('stood, came to rest') describe purposeful guidance. Matthew presents this without rationalization, and we render it straightforwardly.
10. The Greek is emphatic to the point of redundancy: echareesan charan megaleen sphodra — literally 'they rejoiced with exceedingly great joy.' This cognate accusative construction (rejoiced a rejoicing) intensifies the emotion. We condense this into 'overwhelmed with joy' to capture the force without the awkward literalism.

11. The setting is a house (oikian), not a manger — consistent with the passage of time since the birth. Joseph is notably absent from the scene; only 'Mary his mother' is mentioned. The verb prosekyneesan ('worshiped') is the strongest form of homage. The three gifts — gold (royalty), frankincense (divinity/priesthood), and myrrh (burial/suffering) — have been read typologically since early Christianity, though Matthew does not allegorize them.
12. The verb chrematisthentes ('having been warned, having received a divine message') specifically denotes an oracular communication — this is not an ordinary dream but a divine directive. The Magi's obedience to the dream over Herod's command places divine authority above political authority, a theme Matthew develops throughout the Gospel.
13. The urgency is conveyed by three rapid imperatives: 'get up' (egertheis), 'take' (paralabe), 'flee' (pheuge). Egypt — Israel's ancient place of bondage — now becomes a place of refuge. The phrase 'the child and his mother' (repeated in vv. 14, 20, 21) consistently places Jesus first and omits Joseph's name, emphasizing the child's primacy and the fact that Joseph is the guardian, not the biological father.
14. Joseph's response is immediate — he departs that same night (nyktos, 'by night'). The word anechoresen ('withdrew') carries connotations of strategic retreat, the same verb used for Jesus's own tactical withdrawals later in the Gospel (4:12, 12:15, 14:13).
15. The quotation is from Hosea 11:1, where 'my son' originally referred to Israel as a nation being called out of Egyptian slavery at the Exodus. Matthew reads this typologically — Jesus recapitulates Israel's journey. As Israel was God's 'son' called from Egypt, so Jesus, God's Son, is called from Egypt. This is not prediction-fulfillment in the strict sense but typological correspondence: the pattern of Israel's story finds its ultimate expression in Jesus.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Hosea 11:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The verb enepaichthee ('was outwitted, mocked, tricked') is the same word used for the mocking of Jesus before his crucifixion (27:29, 31), creating a grim verbal connection between Herod's rage and Jesus's passion. The phrase ethymothee lian ('was exceedingly angry') describes murderous fury. The age threshold of two years (dietous) is based on Herod's calculation from verse 7, suggesting the star appeared up to two years before the Magi's arrival. 'Soldiers' is implied by the verb apostellas ('having sent') — Herod dispatched agents to carry out the order.
17. This fulfillment formula uses a different construction than verse 15 — 'then was fulfilled' (tote epleerothee) rather than 'in order that it might be fulfilled' (hina pleerothee). The shift may indicate that this event fulfilled prophecy as a tragic echo rather than as a divinely intended purpose — Matthew is careful in his language about the massacre.
18. The quotation is from Jeremiah 31:15. In its original context, Rachel (the matriarch buried near Bethlehem, Genesis 35:19) weeps for her descendants being taken into exile. Matthew applies the image to the murdered children — Rachel's weeping continues across the centuries. The phrase 'because they are no more' (hoti ouk eisin) is devastating in its simplicity. Ramah was a staging ground for the Babylonian deportation (Jeremiah 40:1), and Rachel's tomb was associated with the Bethlehem area.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 31:15 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 35:19 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 40:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. Herod the Great died in 4 BC by conventional chronology. The angelic appearance follows the same pattern as 1:20 and 2:13 — divine guidance through dreams. The historical present phainetai ('appears') adds narrative vividness.
20. The plural 'those who were seeking' (hoi zetountes) when only Herod has been mentioned echoes Exodus 4:19, where God tells Moses 'all those who sought your life have died' — another Moses-Jesus parallel. The phrase 'seeking the life' (zetountes teen psychen) is a Septuagintal idiom for murderous intent.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 4:19 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The phrase 'entered the land of Israel' (eiselthen eis gen Israel) echoes the conquest narratives — Joshua 'entering' the promised land. Jesus's return from Egypt to Israel recapitulates the Exodus-to-Canaan journey.
22. Archelaus inherited Judea and was notoriously brutal — he was eventually deposed by Rome in AD 6 for excessive cruelty. Joseph's fear is historically well-grounded. Galilee was under the rule of Herod Antipas, who was comparatively less dangerous. The divine warning in a dream (chrematistheis) is the fourth dream-revelation in chapters 1-2, establishing dreams as Matthew's primary channel for divine guidance in the infancy narrative.
23. This is the most puzzling of Matthew's fulfillment quotations — no extant Old Testament passage says 'He will be called a Nazarene.' Three explanations are commonly offered: (1) a wordplay on netser ('branch') from Isaiah 11:1, connecting the Messiah to the 'branch of Jesse'; (2) a connection to nazir ('Nazirite, consecrated one'); (3) a reference to the general contempt associated with Nazareth (cf. John 1:46, 'Can anything good come from Nazareth?'). Matthew uniquely says 'prophets' (plural), suggesting a composite theme rather than a single text. The name Nazoraïos became a primary designation for Jesus and his followers.

Summary: Matthew 3 introduces John the Baptist as a wilderness prophet calling Israel to repentance in preparation for the coming kingdom of heaven. John's preaching, dress, and diet deliberately evoke the prophet Elijah. He confronts the Pharisees and Sadducees, warns that Abrahamic descent alone guarantees nothing, and baptizes the people in the Jordan. The chapter climaxes with Jesus's baptism, where the heavens open, the Spirit descends like a dove, and a voice from heaven declares Jesus to be God's beloved Son.

What Makes This Remarkable: John the Baptist bridges the Old and New Testaments — his message, dress (camel hair, leather belt), and wilderness setting deliberately mirror Elijah (2 Kings 1:8), and he quotes Isaiah 40:3 as his own mission statement. The baptism scene is one of the few passages where Father, Son, and Spirit appear simultaneously. The heavenly voice combines Psalm 2:7 ('You are my Son') with Isaiah 42:1 ('in whom I delight'), fusing royal and servant identities in a single declaration. John's insistence that 'I need to be baptized by you' reveals an awareness of Jesus's superior status that creates theological tension with Jesus's submission to the baptism.

Translation Friction: John's phrase 'brood of vipers' (genneemata echidnon) is shockingly hostile for a prophet addressing fellow Jews. We preserve the confrontational force. The phrase 'kingdom of heaven' (basileia ton ouranon) is Matthew's distinctive circumlocution for 'kingdom of God' — we preserve Matthew's form. Jesus's reason for being baptized ('to fulfill all righteousness') is theologically dense and deliberately left somewhat unexplained by the text. The phrase 'Spirit of God descending like a dove' (v. 16) is ambiguous about whether the dove is a visual form or a simile for the manner of descent.

Connections: Isaiah 40:3 (the voice in the wilderness) is the foundational text. Elijah typology connects to 2 Kings 1:8 and Malachi 4:5. The baptism connects to Israel's Red Sea crossing and Jordan crossing under Joshua. The heavenly voice draws on Psalm 2:7 and Isaiah 42:1. The Spirit descending connects to Isaiah 11:2 (the Spirit resting on the Messiah) and Genesis 1:2 (the Spirit hovering over the waters at creation).

¹In those days, John the Baptist appeared, proclaiming in the wilderness of Judea, ²"Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has drawn near!" ³This is the one spoken of through the prophet Isaiah, who said: "A voice crying out in the wilderness: 'Prepare the way of the Lord; make his paths straight.'" ⁴Now John wore clothing made of camel's hair with a leather belt around his waist, and his food was locusts and wild honey. ⁵Then Jerusalem and all Judea and the entire region around the Jordan went out to him, ⁶Received baptism by him in the Jordan, openly admitting their sins. ⁷But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees coming to his baptism, he said to them, "You brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the coming wrath? ⁸Therefore produce fruit worthy of repentance, ⁹And do not presume to say to yourselves, 'We have Abraham as our father.' For I tell you that God is able to raise up children for Abraham from these stones. ¹⁰Already the axe is laid at the root of the trees. So every tree that does not produce good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire. ¹¹I baptize you with water for repentance, but the one coming after me is more powerful than I am — I am not worthy to carry his sandals. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and fire. ¹²His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor. He will gather his wheat into the barn, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire." ¹³Then Jesus arrived from Galilee at the Jordan, coming to John to be baptized by him. ¹⁴But John tried to prevent him, saying, "I need to be baptized by you, and yet you come to me?" ¹⁵But Jesus answered him, "Allow it for now, for in this way it is fitting for us to fulfill all righteousness." Then John consented. ¹⁶After Jesus was baptized, he immediately came up out of the water, and suddenly the heavens were opened to him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove and coming to rest on him. ¹⁷And just then a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, and I am completely delighted with him.

1. The historical present paraginetai ('appears, arrives') creates narrative immediacy — John bursts onto the scene. The title ho baptistees ('the Baptist, the one who baptizes') identifies John by his distinctive practice. The wilderness (eremos) of Judea is the barren region west of the Dead Sea, a place associated with divine encounter and prophetic calling throughout Israel's history.
2. The verb metanoeite ('repent') means a radical change of mind and direction, corresponding to the Hebrew teshuvah ('return'). The perfect tense eggiken ('has drawn near, has come close') indicates that the kingdom's approach has already begun — it is not merely future but pressing into the present. 'Kingdom of heaven' (basileia ton ouranon) is Matthew's distinctive phrase, using 'heaven' as a reverential circumlocution for 'God,' reflecting Jewish practice of avoiding direct use of the divine name.
3. The quotation from Isaiah 40:3 is foundational to all four Gospels' presentation of John. In its original context, the voice calls for a highway through the desert for God's return to Zion after the exile. Matthew applies this to John preparing the way for Jesus. The phrase 'in the wilderness' modifies 'crying out' (as in the Septuagint and the Gospels), though in the Hebrew of Isaiah 40:3 it modifies 'prepare' — 'in the wilderness prepare the way.' This difference in punctuation shifts the emphasis from the location of the preparation to the location of the prophet.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 40:3 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. John's appearance deliberately mirrors Elijah's description in 2 Kings 1:8 — a hairy garment with a leather belt. This visual allusion would be immediately recognized by Matthew's audience. Locusts were permitted food under Jewish dietary law (Leviticus 11:22). The wilderness diet emphasizes John's ascetic separation from settled society and his prophetic identity.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Kings 1:8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 11:22. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The imperfect tense exeporeueto ('were going out') describes a continuous stream of people, not a single event. The hyperbolic 'all Judea' and 'the entire region' (pasa, repeated) conveys the scale of John's popular impact. The Jordan River region was associated with Israel's entry into the promised land under Joshua.
6. The verb ebaptizonto ('were being baptized') is imperfect passive, indicating an ongoing process. The Greek baptizo means 'to immerse, dip, submerge.' Confession of sins (exomologoumenoi) accompanied the immersion, making it a public act of repentance, not merely a ritual washing. Jewish purification rites involved water, but John's baptism was distinctive in linking immersion to moral repentance and eschatological preparation.
7. The phrase genneemata echidnon ('brood of vipers') is devastatingly hostile — they are not merely compared to snakes but identified as the offspring of venomous serpents. The rhetorical question implies that their appearance at the baptism is insincere — they are seeking to escape judgment without genuine repentance. The 'coming wrath' (mellouses orgees) refers to eschatological judgment. The Pharisees and Sadducees rarely appear together; their joint presence may indicate that both wings of the religious establishment are under indictment.
8. The singular karpon ('fruit') in the SBLGNT (versus the KJV's plural 'fruits') treats repentance as producing a unified result — a transformed life, not merely individual good deeds. The adjective axion ('worthy, fitting, corresponding to') demands that the fruit match the claim. John requires evidence, not merely words.
9. John strikes at the core of Jewish ethnic confidence — descent from Abraham was considered a guarantee of covenant standing. John insists that biological lineage without moral transformation is worthless. The reference to 'these stones' (ton lithon touton) may involve a wordplay in Aramaic (the spoken language): 'stones' (avanim) and 'children' (banim) sound alike. God's ability to create children from stones also evokes the creation of Adam from earth.
10. The present tense keitai ('is laid, is lying') indicates that judgment is not approaching — it has arrived. The axe is already positioned. The tree-and-fruit metaphor recurs throughout Matthew (7:16-20, 12:33, 21:19) as a standard image for the moral evaluation of people. Fire (pyr) represents eschatological judgment.
11. John contrasts his water baptism with the coming one's baptism 'with the Holy Spirit and fire' (en pneumati hagio kai pyri). Whether 'Spirit and fire' describes one baptism (the Spirit as purifying fire) or two (blessing for the repentant, judgment for the unrepentant) is debated. The sandal-carrying metaphor indicates slave-level service — John considers himself unworthy even of the lowest task for the one who follows him. The Greek ischyroteros ('more powerful, stronger') emphasizes raw divine authority.
12. The agricultural metaphor of winnowing — tossing grain into the air so the wind separates wheat from chaff — depicts divine judgment as a sorting process. The Greek ptyon ('winnowing fork/shovel') is a large fork used to throw grain. 'Unquenchable fire' (pyri asbesto) intensifies the judgment beyond ordinary burning — this fire cannot be extinguished. The imagery connects to Malachi 3:2-3, where the messenger's coming involves refining fire.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Malachi 3:2-3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The historical present paraginetai ('arrives') mirrors the same verb used for John's appearance in verse 1, creating a structural parallel. Jesus comes specifically for baptism (tou baptisthenai, a purpose infinitive), making this a deliberate, intentional act rather than a chance encounter.

14. The imperfect tense diekolyen ('was trying to prevent, kept preventing') indicates ongoing resistance, not a single objection. John recognizes the incongruity — the greater should baptize the lesser, not the reverse. This exchange is unique to Matthew and addresses the theological puzzle of why the sinless one submitted to a baptism of repentance.
15. Jesus's reply is his first spoken words in Matthew's Gospel. The phrase 'fulfill all righteousness' (plerosai pasan dikaiosynen) is theologically dense — it connects to Matthew's theme of fulfillment and to the concept of dikaioyne ('righteousness') that will dominate the Sermon on the Mount. The 'us' (heemin) includes both John and Jesus in a shared mission. 'Righteousness' here likely means conformity to God's will and purposes rather than personal moral achievement.
16. The opening of the heavens (aneochtheesan hoi ouranoi) echoes Ezekiel 1:1 and Isaiah 64:1 — moments when the barrier between heaven and earth is breached. The phrase 'like a dove' (hosei peristeran) is ambiguous: it may describe the Spirit's visual form or the gentle manner of descent. The verb erchomenon ('coming') combined with ep' auton ('upon him') echoes Isaiah 11:2, where the Spirit 'rests upon' the messianic branch. This is a royal anointing scene — the Spirit's descent constitutes Jesus's commissioning.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Ezekiel 1:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 64:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The heavenly voice combines two Old Testament texts: Psalm 2:7 ('You are my Son') — a royal enthronement psalm — and Isaiah 42:1 ('my chosen one in whom my soul delights') — the first Servant Song. The fusion declares Jesus simultaneously as Davidic king and Suffering Servant. Matthew has 'This is' (houtos estin, third person, a public declaration) where Mark has 'You are' (sy ei, second person, addressed to Jesus). The verb eudokesa ('I am well pleased, I have delighted') is aorist, possibly indicating a timeless or pre-temporal delight rather than a response to the baptism alone.
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 2:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

Summary: Matthew 4 opens with Jesus being led by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tested by the devil. Three temptations probe whether Jesus will misuse his identity as God's Son — for personal comfort, for spectacle, or for political power. Jesus responds to each with quotations from Deuteronomy, reliving Israel's wilderness testing and succeeding where Israel failed. After the temptation, Jesus withdraws to Galilee, settles in Capernaum, and begins his public ministry with the proclamation: 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near.' He calls his first four disciples — Simon Peter, Andrew, James, and John — from their fishing nets, and begins a widespread ministry of teaching, proclaiming, and healing throughout Galilee.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The three temptations form a literary triptych, each answered with a quotation from Deuteronomy 6-8 — the section where Moses recounts Israel's wilderness failures. Jesus is presented as the true Israel who passes the test that the nation failed. The move to Capernaum fulfills Isaiah 9:1-2, connecting Jesus's ministry to the territories of Zebulun and Naphtali — the first regions lost to Assyrian conquest, now the first to see messianic light. The phrase 'kingdom of heaven' (basileia ton ouranon) is unique to Matthew among the Gospels; the other Synoptics use 'kingdom of God.' Matthew's Jewish audience would have understood 'heaven' as a reverential circumlocution for the divine name.*

Translation Friction: *The nature of the temptation narrative — whether visionary, literal, or theological — is debated. We render the Greek text as given without imposing a framework. The phrase 'the devil' (ho diabolos) translates a Greek term meaning 'slanderer' or 'accuser,' corresponding to the Hebrew satan ('adversary'). The quotation from Isaiah 9:1-2 in verses 15-16 follows the Septuagint rather than the Masoretic Text in some details.*

Connections: The temptation narrative connects to Israel's wilderness testing (Deuteronomy 6-8), the baptism of chapter 3, and the Sermon on the Mount that follows in chapters 5-7. The calling of the first disciples echoes prophetic call narratives (1 Kings 19:19-21, Elijah calling Elisha). The summary of Jesus's ministry in verse 23 sets up the Sermon on the Mount by establishing his authority as teacher and healer.

¹Then Jesus was led up by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tested by the devil. ²After fasting forty days and forty nights, he was hungry. ³The tempter came and said to him, "If you are the Son of God, command these stones to become bread." ⁴But he answered, "It is written: 'A person does not live on bread alone, but on every word that comes from the mouth of God.'" ⁵Then the devil took him to the holy city and set him on the highest point of the temple, ⁶says to him, If you be the Son of God, cast thyself down — for it is written, He will give his angels charge concerning you: and in their hands they will bear you up, lest at any time you dash your foot against a stone. ⁷Jesus said to him, "Again it is written: 'You must not put the Lord your God to the test.'" ⁸Again, the devil took him to a very high mountain and showed him all the kingdoms of the world and their splendor, ⁹says to him, All these things will I give you, if you will fall down and worship me. ¹⁰Then Jesus said to him, "Go away, Satan! For it is written: 'You shall worship the Lord your God, and serve him only.'" ¹¹Then the devil left him, and angels came and attended to him. ¹²When Jesus heard that John had been arrested, he withdrew to Galilee. ¹³He left Nazareth and went to live in Capernaum by the sea, in the region of Zebulun and Naphtali, ¹⁴that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet and stated, ¹⁵"Land of Zebulun and land of Naphtali, the way to the sea, beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the nations — ¹⁶those who sat in darkness noticed remarkable light. And to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up. ¹⁷From that time Jesus began to proclaim, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near." ¹⁸As he was walking along the Sea of Galilee, he saw two brothers — Simon, who is called Peter, and his brother Andrew — casting a net into the sea, for they were fishermen. ¹⁹He said to them, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of people." ²⁰Immediately they left their nets and followed him. ²¹Going on from there, he saw two other brothers — James the son of Zebedee and his brother John — in a boat with their father Zebedee, mending their nets. He called them, ²²They immediately departed the ship and their Father, and followed him. ²³Jesus traveled throughout all of Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, proclaiming the good news of the kingdom, and healing every disease and every sickness among the people. ²⁴News about him spread throughout all of Syria, and people brought to him all who were afflicted with various diseases and pains, the demon-possessed, epileptics, and the paralyzed, and he healed them. ²⁵Large crowds followed him from Galilee, the Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea, and from beyond the Jordan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek peirasthēnai can mean 'to test' or 'to tempt.' We render it 'tested' because the initiative comes from God's Spirit — this is a divine proving, not merely a satanic enticement. The passive anēchthē ('was led up') indicates Jesus did not go on his own initiative but was directed by the Spirit, connecting this directly to the Spirit's descent at his baptism (3:16).
1. The Greek diabolos ('slanderer, accuser') corresponds to the Hebrew satan. Matthew uses diabolos rather than satanas here, though both terms appear in the New Testament.
2. The 'forty days and forty nights' echoes Moses on Sinai (Exodus 34:28) and Elijah's journey to Horeb (1 Kings 19:8). The number forty is a standard biblical period of testing and preparation — Israel wandered forty years, the flood lasted forty days. The Greek epeinasen is simply 'he was hungry,' a masterful understatement after forty days without food.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 34:28. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 19:8. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The Greek ei ('if') with the indicative does not express doubt but assumes the condition is true: 'Since you are the Son of God' or 'Given that you are.' The temptation is not about proving identity but about misusing it. The tempter attacks at the point of legitimate physical need — hunger after forty days of fasting.
4. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 8:3, which recounts how God fed Israel with manna to teach them dependence on his word. The Greek anthrōpos ('person, human being') is gender-neutral; 'person' captures this better than the KJV's 'man.' The phrase gegraptai ('it is written,' perfect tense) indicates permanent, authoritative force — what was written remains in effect.

4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 8:3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The Greek pterygion ('little wing') refers to the highest point or parapet of the temple complex. Josephus describes the southeastern corner of the temple platform as having a dizzying drop into the Kidron Valley. 'The holy city' (tēn hagian polin) is Jerusalem, identified by its theological title rather than its name.
6. The devil now quotes Scripture — Psalm 91:11-12 — but omits the phrase 'to guard you in all your ways,' subtly distorting the promise from general providential care to a demand for spectacular intervention. The temptation is to force God's hand through presumptuous action rather than trusting his timing.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 91:11-12. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 6:16, which references Israel's testing of God at Massah (Exodus 17:1-7). The verb ekpeiraseis ('put to the test') is an intensified form of peirazō — it means to test in a demanding, presumptuous way. The word palin ('again') indicates Jesus is not countering Scripture with Scripture but completing its meaning — both passages stand together.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 6:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 17:1-7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The Greek doxan ('glory, splendor') here refers to the visible magnificence of earthly power — wealth, armies, architecture. The offer of 'all the kingdoms' is the most audacious temptation: political power without the cross. No literal mountain provides a vantage point to see all earthly kingdoms; the scene is visionary or symbolic.
9. The Greek proskynesēs ('worship, bow down before') implies full prostration — the posture of total submission reserved for deity. The temptation strips away all pretense: the devil offers a shortcut to universal dominion that bypasses suffering and the cross, but the price is idolatry. The conditional ean ('if') with the subjunctive presents this as a genuine offer.
10. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 6:13. The word Satana is the Greek transliteration of the Hebrew satan ('adversary') — Jesus uses the name directly for the first time, dropping the circumlocution 'tempter' and 'devil.' The verb latreuō ('serve, render religious service') denotes devoted worship-service, not mere obedience. The command hypage ('go away') is sharp and authoritative.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 6:13 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The Greek diēkonoun ('ministered, served, attended') is the imperfect tense, indicating ongoing service — the angels continued to care for him. This verb is the root of 'deacon' (diakonos). The angelic ministry recalls Elijah being fed by an angel after his own wilderness ordeal (1 Kings 19:5-8). The irony is deliberate: the provision Jesus refused to seize by miracle is now given to him by the Father.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Kings 19:5-8. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The Greek paredothē ('was handed over, delivered up') is the same verb later used for Jesus's own betrayal and arrest (10:4, 17:22, 26:2). Matthew's use of this word for John foreshadows Jesus's fate — the forerunner's path prefigures the Messiah's. 'Withdrew' (anechōrēsen) suggests a deliberate strategic move, not flight.
13. Capernaum (Kfar Nachum, 'village of Nahum') on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee becomes Jesus's base of operations. The Greek parathalassian ('by the sea') identifies the town's lakeside location. Matthew specifies the tribal territories of Zebulun and Naphtali to set up the Isaiah quotation that follows.
14. This is Matthew's second fulfillment formula (cf. 1:22). The move to Capernaum is presented not as a retreat from danger but as a prophetic fulfillment — geography itself serves God's redemptive plan.
15. Matthew quotes Isaiah 9:1-2 (8:23-9:1 in the Hebrew numbering). 'Galilee of the nations' (Galilaia tōn ethnōn) reflects the mixed Jewish-Gentile population of the northern region. The phrase hints at the universal scope of Jesus's mission — he begins not in Jerusalem but in a border region where Jew and Gentile mingle. 'The way of the sea' (hodon thalassēs) refers to the ancient trade route Via Maris.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 9:1-2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The Greek kathēmenoīs can mean 'sitting' or 'dwelling, living' — the sense is of a settled condition, not a momentary posture. 'Shadow of death' (skia thanatou) echoes the Hebrew tsalmaveth of Psalm 23:4 and Isaiah 9:2. The verb aneteilen ('has risen, dawned') is used of sunrise — the light that breaks upon Galilee is described in the language of a new dawn.

16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 23:4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. Jesus's opening proclamation is identical to John the Baptist's in 3:2, establishing continuity between the forerunner and the Messiah. The Greek metanoieite ('repent') means a fundamental change of mind and direction — not merely feeling sorry but reorienting one's entire life. The perfect tense ēngiken ('has come near, has drawn close') indicates that the kingdom has already begun to arrive, not merely that it will come someday.
17. Matthew's 'kingdom of heaven' (basileia tōn ouranōn) is equivalent to Mark's and Luke's 'kingdom of God.' Matthew uses 'heaven' as a reverential circumlocution for God's name, following Jewish convention.
18. The Greek amphiblēstron refers to a circular casting net thrown from shore or from a shallow-water position, distinct from the dragnet (sagēnē) of 13:47. The parenthetical 'who is called Peter' (ton legomenon Petron) introduces the name by which readers will know him. The Sea of Galilee is technically a freshwater lake (approximately 13 miles long by 8 miles wide), but the Greek thalassa ('sea') follows the Hebrew convention of calling any large body of water yam.
19. The call deute opisō mou ('come after me') uses the language of rabbinic discipleship — following a teacher physically implied intellectual and moral formation. 'Fishers of people' (halieis anthrōpōn) is a metaphor drawn from their actual trade. The Greek anthrōpōn is gender-inclusive ('people'), not restricted to males.
20. The adverb eutheōs ('immediately, at once') emphasizes the radical, unhesitating nature of their response. The Greek diktia ('nets') represents their entire livelihood. Matthew narrates the call with dramatic compression — there is no negotiation, no request for time, no farewell.
21. The Greek katartizontas ('mending, preparing, putting in order') suggests the brothers were repairing nets after a fishing expedition. The detail that they are with their father Zebedee heightens the cost of their response — they leave not only their trade but their family. The Greek ploion is a fishing boat, not a large vessel.
22. The cost escalates from the first calling: Simon and Andrew left nets (equipment), but James and John leave both the boat (a more substantial capital asset) and their father (family obligation). Matthew highlights what discipleship requires — not merely adding Jesus to one's life but reordering all other loyalties.
23. This summary verse presents Jesus's ministry in a threefold pattern: teaching (didaskōn), proclaiming (kēryssōn), and healing (therapeuōn). This triad recurs in 9:35, forming an inclusio around the Sermon on the Mount and the miracle collection. The 'good news of the kingdom' (to euangelion tēs basileias) is Matthew's phrase for the content of Jesus's preaching — the announcement that God's reign is arriving. The Greek malakian refers to weakness or infirmity as distinct from nosos (disease).
24. The Greek selēniāzomenous (literally 'moon-struck') refers to those suffering from what was associated with lunar cycles — likely epilepsy. The KJV's 'lunatick' comes from the same etymology but is no longer a medical term. The list moves from general ('various diseases and pains') to specific conditions, demonstrating the comprehensive scope of Jesus's healing power. Syria (the Roman province encompassing the region north of Galilee) indicates that Jesus's reputation extended beyond Jewish territory.
25. The five regions listed encompass a wide geographic sweep — from Galilee in the north, through the Decapolis (a league of ten Greco-Roman cities east of the Jordan), to Jerusalem and Judea in the south, and the Transjordan region. This crowd becomes the audience for the Sermon on the Mount in chapters 5-7. The inclusion of the Decapolis (heavily Gentile) again hints at the universal scope of Jesus's ministry.

Summary: Matthew 5 opens the Sermon on the Mount, the first of five major teaching discourses in Matthew's Gospel. Jesus ascends a mountain (echoing Moses on Sinai), sits (the posture of authoritative teaching), and addresses his disciples while the crowds listen. The chapter contains the Beatitudes (5:3-12), the salt and light sayings (5:13-16), Jesus's declaration that he has come not to abolish the Law but to fulfill it (5:17-20), and six 'antitheses' in which Jesus deepens the Torah's demands — addressing anger (5:21-26), lust (5:27-30), divorce (5:31-32), oaths (5:33-37), retaliation (5:38-42), and love of enemies (5:43-48). The chapter culminates in the command to 'be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect.'

What Makes This Remarkable: *The Sermon on the Mount is structured as a new Sinai revelation. Just as Moses ascended the mountain to receive the Torah, Jesus ascends to deliver its definitive interpretation. The Beatitudes reverse worldly valuations — the poor in spirit, the grieving, the meek, and the persecuted are declared blessed. The antitheses ('You have heard... but I say to you') do not contradict the Torah but radicalize it, moving from external behavior to internal disposition. Jesus claims an authority that surpasses Moses: not 'Thus says the LORD' but 'I say to you.' The Greek teleios ('perfect') in verse 48 means 'complete, mature, whole' — not sinless perfection but wholehearted devotion.*

*Translation Friction: The relationship between Jesus and the Torah in 5:17-20 is one of the most debated passages in the New Testament. We render the Greek as given without resolving the tension between 'not one iota will pass from the Law' and the apparent modifications that follow. The antitheses vary in structure — some quote the Torah directly, others cite popular interpretations ('You have heard it was said'). We preserve these distinctions. The teaching on divorce (5:31-32) involves the contested term porneia, which we render transparently with a note on the semantic range.*

Connections: The mountain setting connects to Sinai (Exodus 19-20), the Beatitudes echo the Psalms (especially Psalm 37) and Isaiah 61, the Law-fulfillment passage connects to Matthew's ongoing concern with the Torah's continuing validity, and the antitheses prepare for the conflicts with religious leaders in later chapters. The command to love enemies (5:44) will be tested in the Passion narrative.

¹When he saw the crowds, he went up on the mountain, and after he sat down, his disciples came to him. ²He opened his mouth and began to teach them, saying: ³Blessed are the poor in spirit — because heaven's kingdom belongs to them. ⁴Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted. ⁵Blessed are the meek — for they will receive the earth. ⁶Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be satisfied. ⁷Blessed are the merciful, for they will receive mercy. ⁸Blessed are the pure in heart — since they will see God. ⁹Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called sons of God. ¹⁰Blessed are those who are persecuted because of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. ¹¹Blessed are you when people insult you, persecute you, and falsely say every kind of evil against you because of me. ¹²Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven. For in the same way they persecuted the prophets who came before you. ¹³You are the salt of the earth. But if the salt loses its flavor, how can it be made salty again? It is no longer good for anything except to be thrown out and trampled underfoot. ¹⁴You are the light of the world. A city set on a hill cannot be hidden. ¹⁵Nor do people light a lamp and put it under a basket, but on a lampstand, and it gives light to everyone in the house. ¹⁶In the same way, let your light shine before others, so that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father in heaven. ¹⁷Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets. I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them. ¹⁸For truly I tell you, until heaven and earth pass away, not one iota or one stroke of a letter will pass from the Law until everything has been accomplished. ¹⁹Therefore, whoever sets aside one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be called least in the kingdom of heaven. But whoever practices and teaches them will be called great in the kingdom of heaven. ²⁰For I tell you, unless your righteousness surpasses that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven. ²¹You have heard that it was said to those of ancient times, 'You shall not murder,' and 'Whoever murders will be subject to judgment.' ²²But I say to you that everyone who is angry with his brother will be subject to judgment. Whoever says to his brother, 'Raka!' will be answerable to the council. And whoever says, 'You fool!' will be liable to the fire of Gehenna. ²³So if you are offering your gift at the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, ²⁴Leave there your gift prior to the altar, and go your way. First be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift. ²⁵Come to terms quickly with your accuser while you are on the way to court with him, or your accuser may hand you over to the judge, and the judge to the officer, and you will be thrown into prison. ²⁶Truly I tell you, you will never get out until you have paid the last penny. ²⁷You have heard that it was said, 'You shall not commit adultery.' ²⁸But I say to you that everyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent has already committed adultery with her in his heart. ²⁹If your right eye causes you to sin, tear it out and throw it away. It is better for you to lose one part of your body than for your whole body to be thrown into Gehenna. ³⁰And if your right hand causes you to sin, cut it off and throw it away. It is better for you to lose one part of your body than for your whole body to go into Gehenna. ³¹It was also said, 'Whoever divorces his wife must give her a certificate of divorce.' ³²But I say to you that everyone who divorces his wife, except on the ground of sexual immorality, makes her commit adultery, and whoever marries a divorced woman commits adultery. ³³Again, you have heard that it was said to those of ancient times, 'You shall not swear falsely, but shall fulfill your oaths to the Lord.' ³⁴But I say to you, do not swear at all — not by heaven, for it is the throne of God, ³⁵Nor by the earth. Since it is his footstool — neither by Jerusalem. Since it is the city of the remarkable King. ³⁶Neither shalt you swear by your own head, because you canst not turn a single hair white or black. ³⁷Let your 'Yes' be 'Yes' and your 'No' be 'No.' Anything beyond this comes from the evil one. ³⁸You have heard that it was said, 'An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.' ³⁹But I say to you, do not resist the evildoer. If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn the other to him as well. ⁴⁰If someone wants to sue you and take your tunic, let him have your cloak as well. ⁴¹If someone forces you to go one mile, go with him two miles. ⁴²Give to the one who asks you, and do not turn away from the one who wants to borrow from you. ⁴³You have heard that it was said, 'You shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy.' ⁴⁴But I say to you, love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, ⁴⁵So you can become true children of your Father which is in heaven — since he makes his sun rise on both evil people and good people, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust. ⁴⁶For if you love those who love you, what reward do you have? Do not even the tax collectors do the same? ⁴⁷And if you greet only your brothers, what are you doing more than others? Do not even the Gentiles do the same? ⁴⁸You therefore must be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The definite article to oros ('the mountain') suggests a specific location, though Matthew does not name it. The Sinai typology is deliberate — Moses went up the mountain to receive the Law, Jesus goes up to interpret it with final authority. Sitting (kathisantos) was the standard posture for an authoritative Jewish teacher; standing indicated informal conversation.
2. The phrase 'opened his mouth' (anoixas to stoma autou) is a Semitic idiom signaling the beginning of a solemn, formal discourse — not merely casual speech. It appears in the Septuagint for prophetic and wisdom utterances (Job 3:1, Daniel 10:16). The imperfect edidasken ('was teaching, began to teach') suggests an extended teaching session.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Job 3:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 10:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The Greek makarioi ('blessed, fortunate, happy') does not merely describe an emotion but declares a state of divine favor. The 'poor in spirit' (ptōchoi tō pneumati) does not mean lacking in spiritual vitality but recognizing one's spiritual poverty and dependence on God. The Hebrew background is anawim — the humble poor who depend entirely on God. Luke's parallel (6:20) simply has 'the poor,' but Matthew's 'in spirit' clarifies the inner disposition.
4. The Greek penthountes ('those who mourn, grieve') refers to deep grief — the kind associated with death or catastrophic loss. The passive paraklēthēsontai ('will be comforted') is a divine passive: God himself will be the one who comforts. This echoes Isaiah 61:2-3, where the Messiah comes 'to comfort all who mourn.'
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 61:2-3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. This Beatitude quotes Psalm 37:11 almost verbatim. The Greek praeis ('meek, gentle, humble') does not mean weak but describes power under control — strength expressed with gentleness. Moses is called the meekest man on earth (Numbers 12:3), yet he was a formidable leader. The Greek gēn can mean 'earth' or 'land' — in the Psalm 37 context it referred to the promised land, but Jesus universalizes the promise.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 37:11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 12:3 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The Greek chortasthēsontai ('will be satisfied, filled') originally described the feeding of animals — it means filled to capacity, fully satiated. The metaphor of hunger and thirst for righteousness (dikaioσynēn) implies a desperate, survival-level craving, not casual interest. Matthew's 'righteousness' (dikaioσynē) encompasses both right relationship with God and just conduct — the Hebrew tsedeq/tsedaqah.
7. The Greek eleēmones ('merciful, compassionate') and eleēthēsontai ('will be shown mercy') share the same root (eleos), creating a wordplay: mercy given is mercy received. The principle of reciprocity runs throughout the Sermon (cf. 6:12, 6:14-15, 7:1-2). The divine passive again indicates God as the source of mercy.
8. The Greek katharoi tē kardia ('pure in heart') echoes Psalm 24:4 — 'the one with clean hands and a pure heart.' The heart (kardia) in biblical thought is the center of will, thought, and moral decision, not merely emotion. Purity here means undivided loyalty, sincerity, and integrity. The promise 'they will see God' (ton theon opsontai) is extraordinary — in the Old Testament, seeing God was considered fatal (Exodus 33:20).

8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 33:20 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The Greek eirēnopoioi ('peacemakers') is a compound word appearing only here in the New Testament. It describes those who actively create peace, not merely those who avoid conflict. The designation 'sons of God' (huiοi theou) means they share the character of God, who is the ultimate peacemaker. In the ancient world, the Roman emperor was called a 'peacemaker' — Jesus quietly reassigns the title.

10. The perfect participle dediōgmenoi ('those who have been persecuted') indicates an ongoing state resulting from past action — these are people who live under persecution as a condition of their lives. The return to 'kingdom of heaven' creates an inclusio with verse 3, framing the eight Beatitudes as a unified whole. Persecution for righteousness — not for foolishness or stubbornness — is the qualifying condition.
11. The shift from third person ('blessed are those') to second person ('blessed are you') makes this final Beatitude directly personal and marks the transition from the formal blessings to direct address. The three verbs — insult (oneidisōsin), persecute (diōxōsin), say evil (eipōsin pan ponēron) — escalate from verbal abuse to active pursuit to character assassination. The qualifying phrase pseudomenoi ('falsely, lying') is critical: the blessing applies only to false accusations.
12. The two imperatives chairete ('rejoice') and agalliasathe ('be overjoyed, leap for joy') intensify one another. The word misthos ('reward, wages') does not imply merit-based earning but God's generous response to faithfulness. By linking the disciples with the persecuted prophets, Jesus places them in the prophetic succession — they are heirs to the same tradition of faithful witness that was met with hostility.
13. The Greek mōranthē (from mōrainō, 'to become foolish, to become tasteless') creates a double meaning — salt that loses its taste has become 'foolish.' In the ancient world, salt preserved food from decay, flavored meals, and was used in covenant rituals (Leviticus 2:13, Numbers 18:19). If the preserving agent itself fails, nothing can restore it. The rhetorical question 'how can it be made salty again?' expects the answer 'it cannot.'

14. In the Old Testament, Israel was called to be 'a light to the nations' (Isaiah 42:6, 49:6). Jesus transfers this vocation to his disciples. The image of a city on a hill (polis epanō orous keimenē) may evoke Jerusalem, built on Mount Zion, visible from great distances. The claim is stunning — Jesus's followers are now assigned the role that Israel was given through the prophets.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 42:6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The Greek modion ('measuring basket,' about 8.75 liters) was a common household item. The lychnos ('oil lamp') was a small clay vessel with a wick — the primary source of indoor light in first-century homes. The lychnia ('lampstand') elevated the lamp to maximize its reach. The image is purely practical — hiding a light source defeats its purpose.
16. The purpose of visible good works is not self-promotion but theocentric: the goal is that observers glorify 'your Father in heaven' (ton patera hymōn ton en tois ouranois). This phrase — 'your Father in heaven' — is distinctive to Matthew and occurs repeatedly in the Sermon on the Mount. The Greek kala erga ('good works, beautiful deeds') denotes works that are both morally good and visibly attractive.
17. The Greek katalysai ('to destroy, demolish, abolish') is a strong term — literally 'to loosen down, dismantle.' Jesus denies any intent to dismantle the Torah. The verb plērōsai ('to fulfill, to fill up, to bring to completion') is debated: does it mean 'to obey perfectly,' 'to bring to its intended goal,' 'to fill with deeper meaning,' or 'to bring about what it prophesied'? The ambiguity may be intentional — Jesus fulfills the Law in all these senses. 'The Law and the Prophets' (ton nomon ē tous prophētas) is a standard designation for the entire Hebrew Scriptures.
18. The Greek amēn legō hymin ('truly I tell you') is Jesus's characteristic formula for solemn pronouncements — it is unprecedented in Jewish teaching, where amēn typically concludes a statement rather than introducing one. The iōta is the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet (corresponding to the Hebrew yod, the smallest Hebrew letter), and keraia ('horn, serif, stroke') refers to the tiny decorative strokes that distinguish similar Hebrew letters. The double negative ou mē ('not at all, by no means') is the strongest form of negation in Greek.
19. The Greek lysē ('loosens, sets aside, annuls') echoes the katalysai of verse 17 — whoever 'loosens' even the smallest commandment participates in the very abolition Jesus has rejected. The pairing of 'practices and teaches' (poiēsē kai didaxē) insists on integrity: teaching without practice is worthless. Being 'called least' may mean having the lowest status in the kingdom, not necessarily exclusion from it.
20. This verse functions as the thesis statement for the six antitheses that follow (5:21-48). The scribes and Pharisees were considered the most meticulous observers of the Law — to exceed their righteousness seemed impossible. The Greek perisseusē ('exceed, overflow, surpass') implies not more of the same kind but a different quality of righteousness — one that penetrates from external observance to internal transformation. The double negative ou mē ('never, by no means') makes the warning absolute.
21. This introduces the first antithesis. The formula 'You have heard that it was said' (ēkousate hoti errethē) refers to the synagogue reading of Torah. The commandment quotes the sixth commandment (Exodus 20:13, Deuteronomy 5:17). The Greek phoneuseis ('murder') is more specific than 'kill' — it refers to unlawful killing, not all forms of taking life. The addition 'whoever murders will be subject to judgment' reflects the established legal tradition surrounding the commandment.

21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 5:17. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. The emphatic egō de legō hymin ('but I say to you') claims an authority that transcends even Moses — Jesus does not cite another authority but speaks on his own. The three-step escalation moves from internal anger to verbal contempt (Raka, an Aramaic term of derision meaning 'empty-head' or 'worthless') to outright denunciation (Mōre, 'fool,' which in Hebrew carries the connotation of moral and spiritual bankruptcy — cf. Psalm 14:1, 'The fool says in his heart'). Gehenna (geennan) refers to the Valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem, associated with child sacrifice (2 Kings 23:10) and later used as a metaphor for divine judgment.

22. The SBLGNT does not include 'without a cause' (eikē), which appears in some later manuscripts. We follow the critical text.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 14:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Kings 23:10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. The scenario assumes a functioning temple with its sacrificial system — Jesus addresses people who actually bring offerings to the altar. The Greek thysiaστήριον ('altar') specifically refers to the temple altar in Jerusalem. The point is radical: reconciliation with a fellow human being takes priority over worship of God.
24. The command is startling in its priorities: leave the sacrifice mid-act to restore a broken relationship. The Greek diallagēthi ('be reconciled') is an aorist passive imperative — do whatever it takes to restore the relationship, taking responsibility for your part. The word prōton ('first') makes the sequence absolute: reconciliation before worship, not after.
25. The Greek antidikos ('adversary, accuser, opponent at law') is a legal term for the opposing party in a lawsuit. The illustration shifts from the temple to the courtroom, but the principle is the same: resolve conflicts urgently, before they escalate beyond your control. The chain of custody — accuser to judge to officer to prison — describes the inexorable progression of unresolved conflict.
26. The Greek kodrantēn (Latin quadrans) was the smallest Roman coin, worth about 1/64 of a denarius (a day's wage). The point is totality — every last fraction must be repaid. The shift to singular 'you' (soi) makes this personally direct. Whether the saying carries eschatological overtones (final judgment) or remains a practical warning about earthly litigation is debated; likely both dimensions are present.
27. The second antithesis addresses the seventh commandment (Exodus 20:14, Deuteronomy 5:18). The Greek moicheuseis ('commit adultery') refers specifically to sexual intercourse with another person's spouse, violating the marriage covenant.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 20:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 5:18. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. The Greek pros to epithymēsai ('with the purpose of desiring, for the purpose of lusting') indicates deliberate, intentional gazing — not an involuntary glance but a cultivated look aimed at arousal. The infinitive of purpose makes the intent central: this is about the will's direction, not mere biological response. The phrase 'in his heart' (en tē kardia autou) again locates the moral action in the internal sphere of will and desire.
29. The Greek skandalizei ('causes to stumble, causes to sin, entraps') gives us the English 'scandalize.' The language is deliberately hyperbolic — Jesus is not commanding literal self-mutilation but using shock rhetoric to convey the urgency of dealing with sin at its source. The right eye and right hand (v. 30) represent the most valued members. The logic is surgical: better partial loss now than total ruin later.
30. The repetition of the eye/hand pattern reinforces the seriousness of the demand. The right hand was the hand of power, skill, and oath-taking. The verb ekkopson ('cut off') is more violent than the eye's 'tear out' (exele), escalating the rhetoric. The parallel between apōlētai ('perish, be destroyed') for the limb and apelthē ('go away, depart') for the body into Gehenna highlights the choice: voluntary partial loss versus involuntary total destruction.
31. The third antithesis cites Deuteronomy 24:1-4, which regulated (but did not endorse) an existing practice of divorce. The Greek apostasion ('certificate of divorce, document of separation') was a legal document that freed the woman to remarry. In the first-century debate between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, the grounds for divorce were fiercely contested.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 24:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The exception clause parektos logou porneias ('except on the ground of porneia') appears only in Matthew (here and 19:9), not in Mark or Luke. The Greek porneia has a broad semantic range: sexual immorality, fornication, prostitution, incest, or any illicit sexual conduct. Whether it refers specifically to pre-marital unchastity, adultery, or sexual sin in general is debated. The logic assumes a patriarchal context where a divorced woman would need to remarry for economic survival — hence the divorced husband 'makes her' commit adultery by forcing her into a new marriage.
33. The fourth antithesis addresses oath-taking. The citation is a composite of Leviticus 19:12 ('You shall not swear falsely by my name'), Numbers 30:2, and Deuteronomy 23:21-23 (on fulfilling vows). The Greek epiorkēseis ('swear falsely, commit perjury') and the command to 'fulfill your oaths' (apodōseis tous horkous) together summarize the Torah's teaching: if you swear, do not lie; keep what you promise.
33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 19:12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Numbers 30:2 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 23:21-23 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
34. The prohibition mē omosai holōs ('do not swear at all') is absolute in form. The practice of swearing by things adjacent to God (heaven, earth, Jerusalem, one's own head) was a way of invoking solemnity without directly using God's name — a legalistic evasion that Jesus exposes. His argument is that everything is connected to God, so every oath implicitly involves God.
35. The phrases echo Isaiah 66:1 ('Heaven is my throne and the earth is my footstool') and Psalm 48:2 ('the city of the great King'). Jesus's reasoning reveals a theology of divine sovereignty: heaven, earth, and Jerusalem all belong to God, so swearing by any of them ultimately invokes God himself. The 'great King' (tou megalou basileōs) is God, not an earthly monarch.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 48:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
36. The climactic point: you cannot even swear by your own head because you do not have sovereignty over your own body. The inability to change the color of a hair demonstrates human limitations — even the self belongs to God. This strips away every possible basis for oath-making and drives the listener to the simple alternative of verse 37.
37. The doubled nai nai, ou ou ('yes yes, no no') emphasizes simplicity and reliability. The Greek ek tou ponērou can mean either 'from evil' (abstract) or 'from the evil one' (personal) — the ambiguity is present in the Greek and we follow the personal reading since Matthew elsewhere uses ho ponēros for Satan (13:19, 38). The principle is that truthful people do not need oaths — their word alone is sufficient.
38. The fifth antithesis cites the lex talionis ('law of retaliation') from Exodus 21:24, Leviticus 24:20, and Deuteronomy 19:21. In its original context, this law was a limitation on vengeance — it prevented disproportionate retaliation by requiring that punishment match the offense exactly. By the first century, the rabbis had already largely replaced literal application with monetary compensation.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 21:24 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 24:20 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 19:21 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
39. The Greek mē antistēnai tō ponērō ('do not resist the evil one/evildoer') sets up four illustrations of non-retaliation. A strike on the right cheek (rhapizeī eis tēn dexian siagona) with a right hand would be a backhanded slap — an insult, not an attack. This was a gesture of contempt in the ancient world. Turning the other cheek is not passive submission but a refusal to be defined by the insult, forcing the aggressor to either treat you as an equal or back down.
40. The Greek chitōna ('tunic, undergarment') was the inner garment; the himation ('cloak, outer garment') was the more valuable outer wrap that also served as a blanket at night. Under Exodus 22:26-27, a creditor could take a debtor's cloak as collateral but had to return it by nightfall. Jesus says to give it voluntarily — a radical generosity that exposes the absurdity of litigious greed.
40. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 22:26-27 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
41. The Greek angareusei ('to press into service, to requisition') is a Persian loanword for the power of a government official to compel a civilian to carry a load or provide labor. Roman soldiers had the legal right to conscript locals to carry equipment for one Roman mile (approximately 1,000 paces or 4,850 feet). The instruction to go a second mile transforms compelled service into voluntary generosity.
42. The two commands cover giving (dos, 'give') and lending (danisasthai, 'to borrow'). The Greek mē apostrophēs ('do not turn away') echoes Deuteronomy 15:7-8, which warns against hardening your heart or closing your hand against a poor brother. The instruction is not about financial naivety but about a disposition of open-handed generosity that refuses to calculate advantage.
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 15:7-8. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. The sixth and final antithesis. 'Love your neighbor' comes from Leviticus 19:18, but 'hate your enemy' is not a direct Torah quotation. It may reflect a popular interpretation, a Qumran-type ideology (the Dead Sea Scrolls' Rule of the Community mandates loving the sons of light and hating the sons of darkness), or a logical inference drawn from the limitation of 'neighbor' to fellow Israelites.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 19:18 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

44. The SBLGNT has the shorter reading without 'bless those who curse you, do good to those who hate you' — these expansions appear in later manuscripts under the influence of Luke 6:27-28. We follow the critical text. The Greek agapate ('love') is the present imperative, commanding a habitual pattern of life, not a single act. The love commanded (agapē) is not emotional affection but willed, active commitment to the well-being of the other — including those who actively harm you.
45. The logic is breathtaking: God's indiscriminate generosity with sun and rain becomes the model for human love. The Father does not withhold creation's blessings from evildoers — his goodness extends to all. To be 'sons of your Father' (huiioi tou patros hymōn) means to share his character. The pairing of 'evil and good' with 'righteous and unrighteous' (dikaious kai adikous) covers the entire moral spectrum — God's provision is universal.
46. The Greek telōnai ('tax collectors') were Jews who collected taxes or tolls on behalf of the Roman government. They were despised as collaborators and assumed to be corrupt (since they often charged above the required amount). Jesus's argument is comparative: if your love extends only to those who love you back, you are no different from the most despised members of society. Even they manage reciprocal affection.
47. The SBLGNT reads ethnikoi ('Gentiles, pagans') rather than telōnai ('tax collectors') found in some manuscripts. The greeting (aspasēsthe) in the ancient Near East was more than a casual hello — it involved a blessing, an inquiry about welfare, and could include an embrace or kiss. To limit greetings to 'brothers' (adelphous, meaning fellow community members) was tribal exclusivism. The rhetorical question 'what are you doing more than others?' (ti perisson poieite) challenges disciples to exceed the normal human pattern.
48. The Greek teleioi ('perfect, complete, mature, whole') does not mean sinless moral perfection in the modern sense. It comes from the root telos ('end, goal, completion') and means 'whole, complete, having reached the intended goal.' In context, it means loving completely — without the partial, self-serving limitations exposed in verses 46-47. Luke's parallel (6:36) has 'be merciful' (oiktirmones), which may illuminate Matthew's 'perfect': wholeness of love that embraces even enemies. The future indicative esesthe ('you will be') can function as an imperative in Greek.

Summary: Matthew 6 continues the Sermon on the Mount, shifting from the antitheses of chapter 5 to the practice of piety. Jesus addresses three pillars of Jewish devotion — giving to the needy (6:1-4), prayer (6:5-15), and fasting (6:16-18) — warning against performing them for human approval rather than for God. At the center stands the Lord's Prayer (6:9-13), the model prayer that encapsulates the entire Sermon's theology. The chapter then turns to the question of treasure and anxiety: where is your treasure? (6:19-24), and why do you worry? (6:25-34). The chapter culminates in the command to 'seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness,' with the promise that all material needs will be provided.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The Lord's Prayer functions as a structural and theological center for the entire Sermon on the Mount. Its petitions move from God's concerns (name, kingdom, will) to human needs (bread, forgiveness, deliverance) — modeling the priority order that the rest of the Sermon teaches. The 'do not worry' passage (6:25-34) draws on creation theology: birds, flowers, and grass serve as witnesses to God's providential care. The phrase 'you cannot serve God and money' (6:24) uses the Aramaic mamōnas, a personification of wealth as a rival deity. The teaching on prayer explicitly contrasts Jewish practice ('do not heap up empty phrases as the Gentiles do') with the intimacy of addressing God as 'Father.'*

Translation Friction: *The doxology at the end of the Lord's Prayer ('For yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever, Amen') does not appear in the earliest Greek manuscripts and is absent from the SBLGNT. We note this in the translator notes for verse 13. The phrase 'daily bread' (arton epiousion) contains a word (epiousios) that appears nowhere else in all of Greek literature — its precise meaning is debated. The relationship between 'debts' (opheilēmata, v. 12) and 'trespasses' (paraptōmata, vv. 14-15) involves a shift in vocabulary that we preserve and note.*

Connections: The Lord's Prayer connects to the broader prayer tradition of Israel (especially the Amidah/Shemoneh Esreh). The 'do not worry' teaching echoes Psalm 37 and Proverbs 3:5-6. The 'eye as the lamp of the body' saying (6:22-23) connects to the purity of heart in 5:8. The teaching on treasures prepares for the parables of chapter 13 (hidden treasure, pearl of great price).

1Be careful not to practice your righteousness before others in order to be seen by them. Otherwise, you have no reward with your Father in heaven. 2So when you give to the needy, do not sound a trumpet before you, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, so that they may be praised by others. Truly I tell you, they have received their reward in full. 3

But when you give to the needy, do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing, ⁴That your alms may be in secret — and your Father which sees in secret himself will reward you openly. ⁵And when you pray, do not be like the hypocrites, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and on the street corners so that they may be seen by others. Truly I tell you, they have received their reward in full. ⁶But when you pray, go into your room, shut the door, and pray to your Father who is in secret. And your Father who sees in secret will reward you. ⁷When you pray, do not heap up empty phrases as the Gentiles do, for they think that they will be heard because of their many words. ⁸Do not be like them, for your Father knows what you need before you ask him. ⁹Pray then like this: 'Our Father in heaven, let your name be held holy. ¹⁰Let your kingdom come. Let your will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. ¹¹Provide us today with the bread we need. ¹²And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors. ¹³And do not bring us into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one.' ¹⁴For if you pardon men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also pardon you. ¹⁵But if you do not forgive others, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses. ¹⁶When you fast, do not look gloomy like the hypocrites, for they disfigure their faces so that their fasting will be noticed by others. Truly I tell you, they have received their reward in full. ¹⁷But when you fast, put oil on your head and wash your face, ¹⁸That you appear not to men to fast, but to your Father which is in secret — and your Father, which sees in secret, will reward you openly. ¹⁹Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and decay destroy and where thieves break in and steal. ²⁰But store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor decay destroys and where thieves do not break in and steal. ²¹For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also. ²²The eye is the lamp of the body. So if your eye is healthy, your whole body will be full of light. ²³But if your eye is evil, your whole body will be full of darkness. If then the light in you is darkness, how great is that darkness! ²⁴No one can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and money. ²⁵Therefore I tell you, do not worry about your life — what you will eat or what you will drink — or about your body — what you will wear. Is not life more than food, and the body more than clothing? ²⁶Look at the birds of the sky — they do not sow or reap or gather into barns, and yet your heavenly Father feeds them. Are you not worth much more than they are? ²⁷And which of you by worrying can add a single hour to his life span? ²⁸And why do you worry about clothing? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow. They do not labor or spin, ²⁹Yet I tell you, that not even Solomon in all his splendor was never dressed as beautifully as even one of these flowers. ³⁰But if God so clothes the grass of the field, which is alive today and tomorrow is thrown into the oven, will he not much more clothe you — you of little faith? ³¹So do not worry, saying, 'What will we eat?' or 'What will we drink?' or 'What will we wear?' ³²For the Gentiles pursue all these things, and your heavenly Father knows that you need all of them. ³³But seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things will be provided for you as well. ³⁴So do not worry about tomorrow, for tomorrow will worry about itself. Each day has enough trouble of its own.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The SBLGNT reads dikaiosynēn ('righteousness') rather than eleēmosynēn ('alms, charitable giving') found in later manuscripts. 'Righteousness' serves as the umbrella term for the three practices that follow: giving, prayer, and fasting. The Greek pros to theathēnai ('in order to be seen, for the purpose of being noticed') uses the verb from which we get 'theater' — performing religion for an audience. The Father 'in heaven' (en tois ouranois) is contrasted with the earthly audience throughout this section.
2. The Greek hypokritai ('hypocrites') originally meant 'actors' — those who perform behind a mask on stage. Jesus repurposes the theatrical metaphor: religious performers are actors playing to a human audience rather than living before God. Whether the 'trumpet sounding' is literal (some form of public announcement) or figurative (drawing attention to one's generosity) is debated. The verb apechousin ('they have received in full') is a commercial term meaning 'paid in full, receipt given' — human praise is the only payment they will ever receive.
3. The idiom is vivid hyperbole: even your own body should not be aware of your generosity. The right hand (dexia) was the hand of action and blessing; the left hand (aristera) was considered secondary. The point is not literal concealment (impossible from oneself) but a disposition so thoroughly free from self-display that giving becomes second nature — unconscious, reflexive, unperformed.
4. The SBLGNT does not include en tō phanerō ('openly') after 'will reward you,' which appears in later manuscripts. The contrast is between the 'secret' (en tō kryptō) place where genuine piety occurs and the public stage where performative religion operates. The Father 'who sees in secret' (ho blepōn en tō kryptō) is the only audience that matters — God perceives what no human observer can.

5. Standing (hestōtes) was the normal Jewish posture for prayer — Jesus does not criticize the posture but the motive. The Greek philousin ('they love, they take pleasure in') exposes the deeper problem: they enjoy being seen praying more than they enjoy praying. The 'corners of the broad streets' (gōniais tōn plateiōn) were intersections where one would be visible from multiple directions — maximum exposure.
6. The Greek tameion ('inner room, storeroom, private chamber') refers to the most private space in a house — often a windowless storage room. Shutting the door (kleisas tēn thyran) physically removes the human audience. The point is not that all prayer must be private (Jesus prayed publicly) but that the essential dynamic of prayer is between the person and God alone. Again the SBLGNT omits en tō phanerō ('openly').
7. The Greek battalogēsēte is a rare word, possibly onomatopoeic (imitating the sound of babbling: 'ba-ba-ba'). It may mean 'to babble, to speak repetitiously and without meaning, to heap up empty phrases.' The Greek polylogia ('many words, wordiness') diagnoses the underlying error: the assumption that God must be nagged or informed by sheer volume of speech. The contrast is with the concise Lord's Prayer that follows.
8. The logic raises a question: if God already knows our needs, why pray at all? Jesus does not answer this directly, but the Lord's Prayer that follows answers implicitly — prayer is not informing God but aligning oneself with God's purposes. The verb oiden ('knows,' perfect tense of oida) indicates settled, complete knowledge, not something God must learn.
9. The address 'Our Father' (Pater hēmōn) is communal — not 'my Father' but 'our Father,' embedding the pray-er in community from the first word. 'In heaven' (ho en tois ouranois) distinguishes the divine Father from earthly fathers. The passive imperative hagiasthētō ('let it be sanctified, let it be treated as holy') is a divine passive — God himself will bring about the honoring of his name, but the pray-er asks for it and commits to participating in it. The 'name' (onoma) in Hebrew thought represents the entire character and reputation of God.
10. The aorist imperatives elthētō ('let it come') and genēthētō ('let it be done') express urgency — bring the kingdom now, accomplish your will now. 'Your kingdom' (hē basileia sou) is the same kingdom of heaven Jesus has been proclaiming since 4:17. The phrase 'on earth as in heaven' (hōs en ouranō kai epī gēs) may modify all three petitions — let your name be holy, your kingdom come, and your will be done, on earth as these things already are in heaven.
11. The Greek epiousios ('daily') is one of the rarest words in the entire Greek language — it appears nowhere else in all surviving Greek literature outside the Lord's Prayer and may have been coined for this purpose. Possible meanings: (1) 'for the coming day' (from epi + ienai, 'for the next day'), (2) 'for existence/sustenance' (from epi + ousia, 'for being'), or (3) 'necessary, essential.' The prayer echoes the manna provision in Exodus 16, where Israel was given bread for one day at a time — daily dependence on God rather than hoarding.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 16. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The Greek opheilēmata ('debts, what is owed') is a financial metaphor applied to moral and spiritual obligation. Matthew uses 'debts' where Luke (11:4) uses 'sins' (hamartias), revealing that both concepts overlap. The aorist aphēkamen ('we have forgiven,' completed action) is striking — the prayer presupposes that we have already forgiven before we ask God to forgive us. The 'as' (hōs) does not mean 'because' (earning forgiveness by forgiving) but establishes a pattern: those who have experienced God's forgiveness extend it to others.
13. The petition mē eisenegkēs ('do not bring into, do not lead into') has troubled interpreters: does God tempt people? James 1:13 says God tempts no one. The Greek peirasmos can mean 'testing' (from God) or 'temptation' (from evil) — the prayer asks to be spared the crisis of testing that could overwhelm faith. 'The evil one' (tou ponērou) can be masculine ('the evil one,' Satan) or neuter ('evil' in the abstract). Given Matthew's usage elsewhere (5:37, 13:19, 38), the personal reading is likely.
13. The doxology 'For yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever, Amen' does not appear in the earliest manuscripts (Sinaiticus, Vaticanus) and is absent from the SBLGNT critical text. It was likely added in liturgical usage, possibly drawn from 1 Chronicles 29:11. We follow the critical text but note the addition for readers accustomed to the traditional form.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Chronicles 29:11 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The Greek paraptōmata ('trespasses, transgressions, false steps') is a different word from the 'debts' (opheilēmata) of verse 12. A paraptōma is literally a 'falling aside' — a misstep, a deviation from the right path. Jesus expands on the forgiveness petition from the prayer, making explicit what was implicit: the connection between receiving and extending forgiveness is not optional.
15. The negative counterpart is stated with equal force — refusal to forgive blocks the reception of forgiveness. This is not a transactional formula (forgiving to earn forgiveness) but a statement about the nature of forgiveness itself: a heart that cannot extend mercy has not truly received it. The same principle drives the parable of the unforgiving servant in Matthew 18:21-35.
16. The Greek skythrōpoi ('gloomy, sullen, with a dark look') describes a deliberately mournful appearance. The verb aphanizousin ('they disfigure, make unrecognizable, obscure') may refer to putting ash on the face, not washing, or deliberately making oneself look haggard. The ironic wordplay in Greek is between aphanizousin ('they make invisible/disfigure') and phanōsin ('they may appear/be visible') — they destroy their appearance in order to create an appearance.
17. Anointing the head with olive oil (aleipsai sou tēn kephalēn) and washing the face were signs of normal grooming and celebration in Jewish culture. The instruction is to look normal — even festive — while fasting. The fast remains between you and God; others should not be able to detect it from your appearance.

18. The three-part pattern is now complete: giving (vv. 2-4), prayer (vv. 5-6), and fasting (vv. 16-18) each follow the same structure — negative example of hypocrites, positive instruction for disciples, and assurance that the Father who sees in secret will reward. The Greek kryphaios ('hidden, secret') is a variant of kryptos used in the giving and prayer sections. The SBLGNT again omits en tō phanerō ('openly').
19. The Greek thēsaurizete ('store up, treasure up') shares the same root as thēsauros ('treasures') — a deliberate play on words: 'do not treasure treasures.' The three threats to earthly wealth — moth (sēs, which destroys stored garments), decay (brōsis, literally 'eating, corrosion,' which ruins stored food or metal), and theft — cover the major categories of ancient wealth: clothing, provisions, and precious metals.
20. Heavenly treasure is defined by its indestructibility — it is beyond the reach of the forces that threaten earthly accumulation. The concept of 'treasures in heaven' was known in Jewish tradition (Tobit 4:9, 2 Baruch 24:1) and refers to the lasting value of righteous deeds, generosity, and faithfulness before God.
21. The singular 'your' (sou) makes this directly personal — it applies to each individual listener. The logic is not merely 'your heart follows your treasure' but 'what you treasure reveals and determines who you are.' The heart (kardia) in biblical thought is the center of will, desire, and allegiance. Treasure placement is not a financial decision but an identity decision.
22. The Greek haplous ('single, simple, healthy, generous') is the key interpretive challenge. In Greek it can mean physically healthy (a 'sound' eye), morally simple/sincere, or generous (as in the closely related noun haplotēs in 2 Corinthians 8:2, 9:11). In context — between the teaching on treasure (vv. 19-21) and the warning about mammon (v. 24) — the sense 'generous' is strong. A 'single' eye is one focused on God rather than divided between God and wealth.
23. The Greek ponēros ('evil, bad, sick') stands in direct contrast to haplous. In Jewish idiom, an 'evil eye' (ayin ra'ah in Hebrew) specifically meant stinginess, greed, and envy — the opposite of generosity. The final exclamation is devastating: if the very organ designed to receive light (the eye/heart) has itself become dark, there is no remaining capacity to perceive truth. The corruption of what should be the source of guidance is the ultimate disaster.
24. The Greek douleuein ('to serve as a slave') is not casual employment but total allegiance. A slave has one master — divided ownership was legally impossible. The Aramaic mamōnas ('money, wealth, material possessions') is transliterated directly into Greek. By placing mamōnas alongside theō (God) as potential masters, Jesus personifies wealth as a rival deity. The claim is absolute: dual allegiance is structurally impossible, not merely difficult.
25. The Greek mē merimnate ('do not worry, do not be anxious') does not prohibit planning or working but the corrosive anxiety that assumes God's provision is unreliable. The word merimnaō is from the root merizō ('to divide') — anxiety divides the mind and pulls it in opposing directions. The rhetorical question uses an a fortiori argument: if God gave you life (the greater gift), will he not also provide food and clothing (the lesser gifts)?
26. The imperative emblemsate ('look at, observe carefully') calls for attentive observation of creation as theological evidence. Birds do not engage in the agricultural cycle (sowing, reaping, storing), yet they are fed. The argument is from lesser to greater (qal wahomer in rabbinic terms): if God provides for creatures that cannot farm, how much more for humans made in his image? 'Heavenly Father' (ho patēr hymōn ho ouranios) reinforces the relational basis of trust.
27. The Greek hēlikian can mean either 'stature' (height) or 'life span' (age), and pēchyn ('cubit,' about 18 inches) can be literal or metaphorical. If 'stature,' the saying is absurd (a cubit is about 18 inches — no one can grow that much by worrying). If 'life span,' the saying is practical (worry cannot extend life; it may shorten it). Both readings work, but the life span reading fits the context of existential anxiety better.
28. The verb katamathete ('learn thoroughly, observe carefully, consider well') is stronger than a casual glance — it means to study the lilies as one would study a text. The Greek krina ('lilies') may refer to various wildflowers rather than cultivated lilies specifically. Like the birds, the flowers do not 'labor' (kopōsin, hard physical work) or 'spin' (nēthoustin, the work of making thread for fabric). Creation itself testifies to God's generous provision.
29. Solomon was proverbially the wealthiest and most magnificently dressed king in Israel's history (1 Kings 10:4-7, 23). The Greek doxē ('glory, splendor, magnificence') here refers to his outward splendor. The comparison is deliberately shocking: a wildflower that lives a single day surpasses the greatest human display of wealth. The implication: if God lavishes beauty on temporary flowers, how much more will he provide for his children?
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Kings 10:4-7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. The Greek oligopistoi ('of little faith') is a word characteristic of Matthew (6:30, 8:26, 14:31, 16:8) — it describes not unbelief but insufficient trust in a God one already acknowledges. The klibanon ('oven') was a clay baking oven fueled by dried grass and brush. The argument reaches its climax: the most ephemeral thing in creation (grass that exists one day and is fuel the next) receives extravagant beauty from God — how much more will God provide for beings created in his image?
31. The three anxious questions cover the basic necessities: food, drink, and clothing. The subjunctive mood (phagōmen, piōmen, peribalōmetha) expresses the anxious deliberation of someone who does not know where their next provision will come from. Jesus does not dismiss the reality of material need but challenges the anxious mindset that treats provision as uncertain.
32. The Greek ethnē ('nations, Gentiles') here refers to those who do not know God as Father. The verb epizētousin ('eagerly seek, strive after') implies an anxious, driven pursuit. The contrast is sharp: those who do not know God as Father must be anxious about material needs; those who do know him should not be, because he already knows (oiden, settled knowledge) their needs. The repetition of 'your heavenly Father' reinforces the relational basis of freedom from anxiety.

33. This verse functions as the climax of the entire 'do not worry' section and arguably of the Sermon on the Mount itself. The imperative zēteite ('seek') is present tense — seek continuously, as a way of life. The word prōton ('first') establishes priority, not sequence: God's kingdom and righteousness are not the first item on a list but the governing priority that orders everything else. The passive prostethēsetai ('will be added, will be provided') is again a divine passive — God will add material provision. Notably, Matthew here uses 'kingdom of God' (tēn basileian tou theou) rather than his usual 'kingdom of heaven,' perhaps for emphasis.
34. The personification of 'tomorrow' worrying about itself (hē aurion merimnēsei heautēs) adds a touch of wry humor to the teaching. The Greek kakia ('trouble, evil, hardship') here means the day's burden of difficulty — not moral evil but the ordinary weight of living. The concluding maxim is proverbial in form: confine your concern to today's challenges. This echoes the 'daily bread' petition of 6:11 — live in daily dependence, not projected anxiety.

Summary: Matthew 7 concludes the Sermon on the Mount with a series of sharply drawn contrasts. Jesus teaches on judging others (7:1-5), warns against giving holy things to those who will desecrate them (7:6), and offers the encouragement of ask/seek/knock (7:7-11). The Golden Rule (7:12) summarizes the entire Law and Prophets. The remainder of the chapter presents four pairs of contrasts — two gates (7:13-14), two kinds of prophets/trees (7:15-20), two kinds of disciples (7:21-23), and two builders (7:24-27). Each pair forces a choice between genuine and counterfeit responses to Jesus's teaching. The Sermon closes with the crowd's astonished reaction: he taught them 'as one having authority, and not as their scribes' (7:28-29).

What Makes This Remarkable: The Sermon on the Mount ends not with comfort but with urgency. The four final contrasts (two gates, two trees, two claims, two builders) all demand decision: hearing the words is not enough — doing them is the dividing line. The saying 'Lord, Lord' passage (7:21-23) is among the most sobering in the Gospels: people who prophesied, cast out demons, and performed miracles in Jesus's name are told 'I never knew you.' The criterion is not spectacular spiritual activity but doing the will of the Father. The Golden Rule (7:12) is presented as the summary of 'the Law and the Prophets' — a staggering claim that the entire Hebrew Scriptures can be distilled into a single principle of other-centered action.

Translation Friction: The instruction 'do not give what is holy to dogs' (7:6) is one of the most cryptic sayings in the Sermon, and its precise referent is debated. We render the Greek as given without imposing a specific interpretation. The relationship between 'judging' (7:1) and 'discernment' (7:6, 7:15-20) creates an apparent tension: do not judge, yet evaluate prophets by their fruit. The tension is real and intentional — Jesus prohibits censorious condemnation while requiring moral discernment.

Connections: *The Golden Rule connects to Leviticus 19:18 ('love your neighbor as yourself') and to Hillel's famous negative formulation. The wise and foolish builders echo Proverbs' contrast between wisdom and folly. The phrase 'I never knew you' connects to the Hebrew concept of knowing (yada) as intimate covenant relationship. The crowd's reaction to Jesus's authority (7:28-29) sets up the conflicts with religious authorities that dominate chapters 8-12.*

¹Do not judge, so that you will not be judged. ²For with the judgment you pronounce you will be judged, and with the measure you use it will be measured to you. ³Why do you see the speck in your brother's eye but do not notice the log in your own eye? ⁴Or how can you say to your brother, 'Let me take the speck out of your eye,' when there is a log in your own eye? ⁵You hypocrite! First take the log out of your own eye, and then you will see clearly to take the speck out of your brother's eye. ⁶Do not give what is holy to dogs, and do not throw your pearls before pigs, or they will trample them underfoot and turn and tear you to pieces. ⁷Ask, and it will be given to you. Seek, and you will find. Knock, and the door will be opened to you. ⁸For everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks the door will be opened. ⁹Which of you, if his son asks for bread, will give him a stone? ¹⁰Or if he asks for a fish, will give him a snake? ¹¹If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father in heaven give good things to those who ask him! ¹²So whatever you want others to do for you, do the same for them, for this is the Law and the Prophets. ¹³Enter through the narrow gate, for the gate is wide and the road is broad that leads to destruction, and many are those who enter through it. ¹⁴How narrow is the gate and difficult the road that leads to life, and few are those who find it! ¹⁵Watch out for false prophets who come to you in sheep's clothing but inwardly are ravenous wolves. ¹⁶You will recognize them by their fruit. Do people pick grapes from thornbushes, or figs from thistles? ¹⁷In the same way, every good tree produces good fruit, but a bad tree produces bad fruit. ¹⁸A good tree cannot produce bad fruit, nor can a bad tree produce good fruit. ¹⁹Every tree that does not produce good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire. ²⁰So then, you will recognize them by their fruit. ²¹Not everyone who says to me, 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the kingdom of heaven, but the one who does the will of my Father in heaven. ²²On that day many will say to me, 'Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and cast out demons in your name, and do many mighty works in your name?' ²³And then I will declare to them, 'I never knew you. Depart from me, you who practice lawlessness.' ²⁴Therefore everyone who hears these words of mine and acts on them will be like a wise man who built his house on rock. ²⁵The rain fell, the floods came, and the winds blew and beat against that house, but it did not fall, because it had been founded on rock. ²⁶And everyone who hears these words of mine and does not act on them will be like a foolish man who built his house on sand. ²⁷The rain fell, the floods came, and the winds blew and struck that house, and it fell — and great was its collapse. ²⁸When Jesus had finished these words, the crowds were astonished at his teaching, ²⁹Since he instructed them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.

1. The Greek krinete ('judge') covers a range from simple evaluation to legal condemnation. In context, Jesus prohibits the censorious, condemning judgment that appoints oneself as moral arbiter over others — not the moral discernment he commands in verses 6 and 15-20. The passive krithēte ('be judged') is a divine passive: God will judge you by the same standard you apply to others. The present imperative mē krinete suggests 'stop judging' or 'do not make a habit of judging.'
2. The principle of reciprocal measure was proverbial in Jewish thought (cf. Mishnah Sotah 1:7, 'By the measure with which a person measures, it is measured to him'). The Greek creates an emphatic sound pattern through the repetition of kri- and metr- roots. The 'measure' (metrō) image may come from the marketplace — the same measuring cup you use for others will be used for you.
3. The Greek karpōs ('speck, splinter, small piece of straw') versus dokos ('beam, log, large piece of timber') creates a comically exaggerated contrast — a person with a construction beam protruding from their eye is attempting delicate surgery on another's minor splinter. The humor carries a serious point: self-awareness must precede correction of others. The verb katanoeis ('notice, consider carefully, perceive') implies that the failure to see one's own faults is a willful blindness.
4. The rhetorical question exposes the absurdity of the situation. The Greek aphes ekbalō ('allow me to remove') sounds helpful and even caring, but the pretense of assistance while harboring a greater fault is itself a form of hypocrisy. The word idou ('look, see') calls attention to the obvious — everyone can see the log except the one carrying it.
5. The address hypokrita ('hypocrite, actor') is singular and direct — Jesus confronts the individual. Importantly, Jesus does not prohibit helping the brother with his speck — he insists on proper sequence: self-correction first (prōton), then assistance. The verb diaplesei ('see clearly, see through') implies that removing one's own log restores the clarity needed to genuinely help another. The passage thus teaches not the avoidance of moral evaluation but its proper practice.
6. This saying is among the most debated in the Sermon. 'Dogs' (kysin) and 'pigs' (choirōn) were both unclean animals in Jewish law and could function as derogatory terms. 'What is holy' (to hagion) may refer to sacred food (meat from the temple sacrifices) and 'pearls' (margaritas) to precious spiritual teaching. The saying recognizes that some truths, when offered to those who despise them, result not in gratitude but in violence against the giver. This qualifies the non-judgmental ethic of 7:1 — discernment about when and with whom to share is necessary.
7. The three imperatives — aiteite ('ask'), zēteite ('seek'), krouēte ('knock') — are all present tense, indicating continuous action: keep asking, keep seeking, keep knocking. The three verbs may suggest escalating intensity: asking is verbal, seeking involves movement and effort, knocking implies arriving at a specific threshold. Each promise uses a divine passive: it will be given (by God), you will find (because God reveals), it will be opened (by God).
8. The word pas ('everyone, all') universalizes the promise — it is not restricted to a spiritual elite. The present tense participles (aitōn, zētōn, krouonti) describe ongoing patterns of life, not isolated incidents. The assurance is grounded not in the intensity of human effort but in the character of the Giver, as verses 9-11 will make clear.
9. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'No one!' The comparison works because round flat bread loaves and certain round stones looked similar — the substitution would be a cruel trick. Jesus argues from common human decency to divine generosity: if even flawed human parents give good things to their children, how much more will God?
10. The parallel intensifies: a snake (ophin) could visually resemble certain eels or fish, but the substitution would be dangerous rather than merely disappointing. The fish/snake contrast may also carry symbolic weight — fish were a food staple from the Sea of Galilee, while snakes connote danger and deception (cf. Genesis 3).

11. The assumption 'you who are evil' (hymeis ponēroi ontes) is startling in its matter-of-fact assessment of human moral condition. Jesus does not soften it — even as sinful people, you manage to give good gifts. The a fortiori argument (posō mallon, 'how much more') reaches its conclusion: God's generosity infinitely surpasses the best of human parenting. Luke's parallel (11:13) specifies that the Father gives 'the Holy Spirit'; Matthew's broader 'good things' (agatha) encompasses all that the Father knows his children need.
12. The Golden Rule summarizes the Sermon and, according to Jesus, the entire Hebrew Scriptures ('the Law and the Prophets,' ho nomos kai hoi prophētai, the same phrase from 5:17). The positive formulation ('do for them') goes beyond the negative form attributed to Hillel ('What is hateful to you, do not do to your neighbor' — Shabbat 31a). The positive form requires active initiative, not merely restraint. The connective oun ('so, therefore') links this to the entire preceding discourse — the Golden Rule is not isolated wisdom but the practical application of everything Jesus has taught.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 30:15-19 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Proverbs 4:18-19 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 21:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The SBLGNT reads ti ('how!') as an exclamation rather than hoti ('because'). The Greek tethlimmenē ('compressed, constricted, pressed, afflicted') is the participle of thlibō, which also means 'to afflict, to oppress' — the narrow road is not merely inconvenient but involves genuine hardship. The destination is zōēn ('life') — not mere survival but the fullness of life in God's kingdom. The word 'find' (heuriskontes) implies that the narrow gate requires searching — it is not self-evident.
15. The Greek pseudoprophētōn ('false prophets') warns that not all who claim to speak for God actually do. The sheep/wolf image is vivid: the exterior is harmless and community-affirming (sheep among sheep), but the interior is predatory (harpages, 'ravenous, greedy, plundering'). The image assumes that false prophets are not easily identified by outward appearance — they blend in. The test for discernment follows in verses 16-20.
16. The Greek karpon ('fruit') is the consistent metaphor for the visible results of a person's character and teaching. The verb epignōsesthe ('you will recognize, you will know fully') is a strengthened form of ginōskō — full, clear recognition over time. The rhetorical questions about grapes from thorns (akanthōn) and figs from thistles (tribolōn) expect the answer 'Of course not!' — nature does not deceive; plants produce according to their kind.
17. The Greek sapron ('rotten, decayed, bad') describes a tree that is diseased at its core — not merely unproductive but fundamentally corrupt. The adjectives agathos ('good') and ponēros ('bad, evil') form a clear moral binary. The principle is straightforward: what you are determines what you produce. Character precedes conduct.
18. The word ou dynatai ('is not able, cannot') states an impossibility, not merely an improbability. This strengthens the diagnostic power of fruit-inspection: the fruit is a reliable indicator because it is an inevitable product of the tree's nature. The chiasmic structure (good tree/bad fruit, bad tree/good fruit) reinforces the point through rhetorical symmetry.
19. This echoes John the Baptist's warning in 3:10 almost verbatim, creating continuity between the forerunner's message and Jesus's teaching. The present tenses ekkoptetai ('is cut down') and balletai ('is thrown') describe a general, ongoing practice — this is how orchards work, and this is how judgment works. The fire (pyr) carries judgment overtones throughout Matthew.
20. The concluding ara ge ('so then, therefore indeed') draws the inference from the entire tree/fruit illustration. The repetition of verse 16a forms an inclusio around the teaching. The verb epignōsesthe ('you will fully recognize') promises that patient observation of results — not first impressions, not claims, not appearances — will reveal the truth about any prophet or teacher.
21. The doubled vocative Kyrie, Kyrie ('Lord, Lord') suggests urgent, fervent address — these are not casual believers but passionate confessors. Yet the criterion for entering the kingdom is not verbal profession but enacted obedience: ho poiōn to thelēma ('the one who does the will'). The phrase 'my Father' (tou patros mou) — Jesus claims a unique filial relationship that distinguishes him from the disciples' 'your Father.' This verse begins the most sobering passage in the Sermon.
22. The phrase 'on that day' (en ekeinē tē hēmera) refers to the day of final judgment. The three activities listed — prophesying, exorcism, and mighty works (dynameis, 'miracles, powerful deeds') — are among the most impressive spiritual accomplishments imaginable. All three are done 'in your name' (tō sō onomati), repeated three times for emphasis. The shock of the passage is that genuine supernatural activity can coexist with spiritual failure. Jesus here implicitly claims the role of final judge — a divine prerogative.

23. The verb homologēsō ('I will declare, confess, acknowledge publicly') is the same word used elsewhere for public confession of faith — here it is turned to public condemnation. 'I never knew you' (oudepote egnōn hymas) uses ginōskō in the relational sense — not 'I never had information about you' but 'I never had a covenant relationship with you.' This echoes the Hebrew yada, intimate knowing. The Greek anomian ('lawlessness') is literally 'without law' (a-nomia) — a devastating charge in a sermon that has affirmed the Law's permanent validity (5:17-19). The quotation echoes Psalm 6:8.
23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 6:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
24. The final parable draws the Sermon's decisive line: hearing (akouei) plus doing (poiei) defines wisdom. 'These words of mine' (mou tous logous toutous) refers to the entire Sermon on the Mount. The Greek phronimō ('wise, prudent, sensible') describes practical wisdom — the ability to make sound decisions. Building on rock (petran) provides a foundation that endures under stress. In the geography of Palestine, sudden flash floods in dry valleys (wadis) are a real and lethal danger.
25. The triple assault — rain (brochē), floods (potamoi, 'rivers, torrents'), and wind (anemoi) — represents comprehensive testing. Every direction of attack is covered: above (rain), below (floods), and sideways (wind). The pluperfect tethemeliōto ('it had been founded, its foundation had been laid') indicates that the foundation was already in place before the storm arrived — preparation precedes crisis. The storm tests what already exists; it does not create the foundation.
26. The Greek mōrō ('foolish, stupid') is the root of English 'moron' — but in biblical wisdom tradition, foolishness is not intellectual deficiency but moral failure, the refusal to live according to reality (cf. Psalm 14:1). The foolish builder hears the same words as the wise builder — the difference is not in access to truth but in response to it. Building on sand (ammon) is building on what shifts and gives way under pressure.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 14:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The storm is identical to verse 25 — both houses face the same test. The difference is entirely in the foundation. The Greek ptōsis ('fall, collapse, ruin') echoes the word used for the moral 'fall' of individuals in the Septuagint. The final phrase kai ēn hē ptōsis autēs megalē ('and great was its collapse') is emphatic in its placement — the sentence ends with the devastating result ringing in the listener's ears. The parable's force is eschatological: the storm represents the final judgment, when every life will be tested.
28. The formula kai egeneto hote etelesen ho Iēsous ('and it happened when Jesus had finished') is Matthew's standard transition at the end of each of his five major discourses (7:28, 11:1, 13:53, 19:1, 26:1). The Greek exeplēssonto ('were astonished, were struck with amazement') is a strong word — literally 'struck out of their senses.' The imperfect tense indicates a continued, lingering amazement rather than a momentary reaction.
29. The Greek exousian ('authority, power, right') distinguishes Jesus from the scribes (grammateis), who taught by citing earlier authorities ('Rabbi Hillel says... Rabbi Shammai says...'). Jesus cited no human authority — his recurring formula 'But I say to you' (5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44) placed his own word alongside and above the Torah itself. The periphrastic construction ēn didaskōn ('he was teaching,' literally 'he was, teaching') emphasizes the ongoing quality and manner of his instruction. The phrase 'their scribes' (hoi grammateis autōn) subtly distances the crowd from the religious establishment.

Summary: Matthew 8 opens a collection of miracle narratives that demonstrate Jesus's authority over disease, nature, and the demonic realm. After descending from the mountain where he delivered the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus heals a leper, a centurion's servant (at a distance), Peter's mother-in-law, and many others. He then calms a violent storm on the Sea of Galilee and casts out demons from two men in the region of the Gadarenes. Interspersed are two brief exchanges about the cost of discipleship.

What Makes This Remarkable: The centurion episode (vv. 5-13) is remarkable for Jesus's astonishment at a Gentile's faith — greater than any he found in Israel. This leads to the first explicit statement that Gentiles will share in the kingdom of heaven while some 'sons of the kingdom' will be cast out. The healing narratives fulfill Isaiah 53:4, which Matthew quotes in verse 17. The storm-calming episode uses language that echoes God's mastery over chaotic waters in the Old Testament (Psalm 89:9, 107:29). The Gadarene encounter presents Jesus confronting the demonic realm with sovereign authority.

Translation Friction: The geographic designation varies in manuscripts — 'Gadarenes,' 'Gergesenes,' or 'Gerasenes.' We follow the SBLGNT reading. Matthew has two demoniacs where Mark and Luke have one; we render Matthew's text as given without harmonizing. The phrase 'Son of Man' (huios tou anthropou) is a self-designation of Jesus drawn from Daniel 7:13-14 and rendered with both words capitalized.

Connections: The leper healing connects to Leviticus 14 (purification laws). The centurion narrative anticipates the Great Commission's universal scope (28:19). The Isaiah 53:4 quotation in verse 17 links Jesus's healing ministry to the Servant Songs. The storm scene echoes Jonah 1 (sleeping during a storm) and Psalm 107:23-30. The Gadarene episode anticipates the final confrontation language of Revelation.

¹When he came down from the mountain, large crowds followed him. ²Then a man with a skin disease came and knelt before him, saying, "Lord, if you are willing, you can make me clean." ³Jesus reached out his hand and touched him, saying, "I am willing. Be made clean." Immediately his skin disease was healed. ⁴Jesus said to him, "See that you tell no one, but go show yourself to the priest and offer the gift that Moses commanded, as a testimony to them." ⁵When Jesus entered Capernaum, a centurion came to him, pleading with him, ⁶"Lord, my servant is lying at home paralyzed, in terrible suffering." ⁷Jesus said to him, "I will come and heal him." ⁸The centurion answered, "Lord, I am not worthy for you to come under my roof. But just say the word, and my servant will be healed. ⁹For I too am a man under authority, with soldiers under me. I say to one, 'Go,' and he goes, and to another, 'Come,' and he comes, and to my servant, 'Do this,' and he does it." ¹⁰When Jesus heard this, he was amazed and said to those following him, "Truly I tell you, I have not found such great faith with anyone in Israel. ¹¹I tell you, many will come from east and west and recline at table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, ¹²However, true children of the reign will be driven out into the darkness outside — where there is sobbing and grinding of teeth. ¹³Then Jesus said to the centurion, "Go. Let it be done for you as you have believed." And his servant was healed at that very hour. ¹⁴When Jesus came into Peter's house, he saw Peter's mother-in-law lying sick with a fever. ¹⁵He touched her hand, and the fever left her. She got up and began serving him. ¹⁶When evening came, they brought to him many who were demon-possessed. He drove out the spirits with a word, and healed all who were sick, ¹⁷That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet and stated, Himself picked up our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses. ¹⁸When Jesus saw a crowd around him, he gave orders to cross over to the other side of the lake. ¹⁹A scribe came up and said to him, "Teacher, I will follow you wherever you go." ²⁰Jesus said to him, "Foxes have dens, and the birds of the sky have nests, but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head." ²¹Another of his disciples said to him, "Lord, let me first go and bury my father." ²²But Jesus declared to him, Come with me. And let the dead bury their dead. ²³When he got into the boat, his disciples followed him. ²⁴Suddenly a great storm arose on the sea, so violent that the boat was being swamped by the waves. But he was sleeping. ²⁵They came and woke him, saying, "Lord, save us! We are going to die!" ²⁶He said to them, "Why are you afraid, you of little faith?" Then he got up and rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm. ²⁷The men were amazed, saying, "What kind of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?" ²⁸When he came to the other side, to the region of the Gadarenes, two demon-possessed men met him, coming out of the tombs. They were so violent that no one could pass along that road. ²⁹Suddenly they cried out, "What do you want with us, Son of God? Have you come here to torment us before the appointed time?" ³⁰Now some distance away a large herd of pigs was feeding. ³¹The demons begged him, "If you drive us out, send us into the herd of pigs." ³²He said to them, "Go." They came out and went into the pigs, and the whole herd rushed down the steep bank into the sea and drowned in the water. ³³Those who had been tending the pigs fled. They went into the town and reported everything, including what had happened to the demon-possessed men. ³⁴Then the whole town came out to meet Jesus, and when they saw him, they begged him to leave their region.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The genitive absolute construction (katabavtos de autou) marks a transition from the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7) to the miracle narratives. 'The mountain' (tou orous) uses the definite article, referring to the specific mountain of the Sermon. The crowds that heard his teaching now witness his authority in action.
2. The Greek leprosy covers a range of skin conditions beyond modern leprosy (Hansen's disease); 'skin disease' captures the broader Greek meaning while 'leprosy' appears in the KJV. The verb prosekynei ('knelt before, worshipped') can indicate either reverence or worship — the ambiguity is significant. The leper's statement expresses total confidence in Jesus's power ('you can') while deferring to his will ('if you are willing').

3. Physical contact with a person suffering from a skin disease rendered one ritually unclean under Levitical law (Leviticus 13:45-46). Jesus's deliberate touch reverses the expected dynamic — instead of Jesus becoming unclean, the man becomes clean. The aorist passive katharistheē ('be made clean') is a divine passive, implying God as the agent. The word eutheōs ('immediately') emphasizes the instantaneous nature of the healing.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 13:45-46 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The command to show himself to the priest follows the purification procedure of Leviticus 14:1-32, which required priestly inspection and specific offerings. Jesus upholds the Mosaic law even while demonstrating authority that transcends it. The phrase eis martyrion autois ('as a testimony to them') is ambiguous — it could mean testimony to the priests that the man is healed, or testimony against them that the Messiah has come.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 14:1-32. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The hekatontarchos was a Roman military officer commanding approximately one hundred soldiers. His approach to a Jewish teacher would have been culturally unusual. The participle parakalōn ('pleading, urging') indicates earnest, persistent appeal rather than casual request.
6. The Greek pais can mean 'child,' 'servant,' or 'boy.' In this military context, 'servant' is most likely, though some scholars argue for 'son.' The participle basanizomenos ('being tormented') is a strong word — it denotes severe suffering, not mild illness. The perfect passive bebletai ('has been laid low') indicates an ongoing state of helplessness.
7. Some interpreters read this as a question — 'Shall I come and heal him?' — with emphasis on the pronoun egō ('I myself'), expressing surprise that a Jewish teacher would enter a Gentile's house. The declarative reading is more natural in context and is followed here.
8. The centurion's declaration ouk eimi hikanos ('I am not worthy/sufficient') goes beyond social humility — a Roman officer acknowledging unworthiness before a Jewish teacher inverts every expected power dynamic. His request that Jesus 'just say the word' (monon eipe logō) reveals an understanding of Jesus's authority as operative at a distance, not requiring physical presence. This phrase has entered Christian liturgy in many traditions.
9. The centurion's reasoning is remarkable: because he understands chains of command, he recognizes that Jesus operates under divine authority and can therefore command sickness to depart just as the centurion commands soldiers. The phrase hypo exousian ('under authority') is key — the centurion's power to command others derives from being under authority himself, and he perceives the same structure in Jesus's relationship to God.
10. The verb ethaumasēn ('was amazed, marveled') is striking — it is rarely used of Jesus and indicates genuine astonishment. That a Gentile soldier surpasses all of Israel in faith is a provocative claim that foreshadows the Gospel's movement toward Gentile inclusion. The solemn formula amēn legō hymin ('truly I tell you') marks what follows as a declaration of particular weight.
11. The image of reclining at table (anaklithēsontai) evokes the messianic banquet — an eschatological feast anticipated in Isaiah 25:6-8. 'From east and west' signifies Gentile nations streaming to participate in Israel's covenant blessings. The phrase 'kingdom of heaven' (basileia tōn ouranōn) is Matthew's characteristic expression, using 'heaven' as a reverential circumlocution for God.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 25:6-8. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The 'sons of the kingdom' (huiōi tēs basileias) refers to those who would expect to inherit it by birthright — Israelites as covenant heirs. The reversal is stark: insiders become outsiders while outsiders enter. 'Outer darkness' (skotos to exōteron) contrasts with the illuminated banquet hall. 'Weeping and gnashing of teeth' (klathmos kai brygmōs tōn odontōn) is a recurring Matthean phrase for eschatological judgment (13:42, 13:50, 22:13, 24:51, 25:30).
13. The imperative genēthētō ('let it be done') echoes the divine creative commands of Genesis 1 (genēthētō in the Septuagint). Jesus's word alone accomplishes the healing at a distance, exactly as the centurion had trusted it would. The phrase en tē hōra ekeinē ('at that very hour') confirms the instantaneous, remote healing.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The detail that Peter had a mother-in-law (pentheran) confirms he was married (cf. 1 Corinthians 9:5). The perfect participle beblēmenēn ('having been laid low') indicates she was bedridden. This domestic setting contrasts with the public healings that precede it.
15. The verb diēkonei ('was serving, ministering to') is from the same root as diakonos ('servant, deacon'). Her immediate service demonstrates complete restoration — not a gradual recovery but instant wholeness. Some manuscripts read autō ('him') while others read autois ('them'); the SBLGNT reads autō.
16. Evening (opsias genomenēs) marks the end of the Sabbath, after which people could travel and carry the sick. The phrase logō ('with a word') emphasizes that Jesus needed no rituals, incantations, or physical contact — his spoken command alone was sufficient. The word exebalen ('drove out, cast out') is forceful, depicting a violent expulsion.
17. Matthew quotes Isaiah 53:4, but applies it to physical healing rather than the vicarious suffering interpretation more common in later Christian theology. The Greek elaben ('took') and ebastasen ('carried, bore') suggest Jesus personally bore the weight of human illness. This is Matthew's fourth fulfillment formula, connecting Jesus's healing ministry to the Isaianic Servant.

17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53:4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. The verb ekeleusen ('commanded, ordered') is a military term indicating authoritative direction, not a casual suggestion. 'The other side' (to peran) refers to the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, predominantly Gentile territory. Jesus moves from Jewish to Gentile space.
19. The scribe addresses Jesus as didaskalos ('teacher'), not kyrios ('Lord') — a respectful but not confessional title. His pledge of unconditional loyalty is enthusiastic but untested. In Matthew's narrative, scribes are generally opponents; this one's offer stands out.
20. This is the first use of 'Son of Man' (ho huios tou anthrōpou) in Matthew. The title draws on Daniel 7:13-14, where 'one like a son of man' receives dominion, glory, and an everlasting kingdom. Jesus uses it to describe himself in radical vulnerability — the one destined for cosmic authority currently has less shelter than wild animals. The phrase ta peteina tou ouranou ('birds of the sky') uses ouranos, the same word translated 'heaven' elsewhere.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 7:13-14 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. Burying one's father was among the most sacred obligations in Jewish culture, taking precedence over virtually all other commandments. The request is not trivial — it invokes the deepest filial duty. Whether the father has just died or is elderly and the disciple is requesting a delayed commitment is debated; the urgency of Jesus's response suggests the latter.
22. Jesus's response is deliberately shocking. The phrase 'let the dead bury their own dead' uses 'dead' in two senses — the spiritually dead can attend to the physically dead. The demand places discipleship above the most fundamental family obligation, a radical claim that would have been deeply countercultural. The imperative akolouthei ('follow') is present tense, indicating ongoing commitment rather than a single act.
23. The verb akolouthēsān ('followed') is the same word used for discipleship throughout Matthew. Following Jesus into the boat is literal but also symbolic — the disciples follow him into danger and uncertainty.
24. Matthew uses seismos ('shaking, earthquake') rather than the expected lailaps ('storm, squall') that Mark uses. This word choice suggests cosmic upheaval, not merely bad weather — the same word is used for the earthquake at Jesus's death (27:54) and resurrection (28:2). Jesus sleeping through the chaos echoes Jonah 1:5 and contrasts with Psalm 121:4 ('he who keeps Israel will neither slumber nor sleep').
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Jonah 1:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 121:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The cry sōson ('save') is the verbal form related to the noun sōtēria ('salvation') and the name Iesous ('the LORD saves'). In context it is a desperate plea for physical rescue, but Matthew's reader would hear the deeper resonance. The present tense apollymetha ('we are perishing, being destroyed') conveys ongoing, immediate danger.
26. The word oligopistoi ('you of little faith') is distinctively Matthean (6:30, 8:26, 14:31, 16:8). It does not mean 'no faith' but insufficient, wavering faith. Jesus rebukes the disciples before calming the storm — the sequence is significant. The verb epetimēsen ('rebuked') is the same word used for commanding demons, treating the storm as a hostile force to be subdued. The phrase galēnē megalē ('great calm') mirrors seismos megas ('great storm'), creating a dramatic contrast.
27. The question potapos estin houtos ('what kind of man is this?') is left open — the narrative invites the reader to answer it. In the Old Testament, only God commands the sea (Psalm 89:9, 107:29; Job 38:8-11). The verb hypakouousin ('obey') is a compound of 'hear under' — the winds and sea submit to his authority as subordinates to a commander.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 89:9. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Job 38:8-11. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. The SBLGNT reads Gadarēnōn ('Gadarenes'), referring to the territory of Gadara, a city of the Decapolis about six miles southeast of the Sea of Galilee. Other manuscripts read 'Gergesenes' or 'Gerasenes.' Matthew has two demoniacs where Mark 5:2 and Luke 8:27 have one — this is not harmonized but rendered as Matthew presents it. The tombs (mnēmeiōn) were rock-cut burial caves, considered ritually unclean — the men inhabit a place of death and defilement.
29. The phrase ti hēmin kai soi ('what to us and to you') is a Semitic idiom meaning 'what business do we have with each other?' The demons address Jesus as 'Son of God' (huie tou theou) — the demonic realm recognizes his identity before most humans do. The phrase pro kairou ('before the time') reveals the demons' awareness of an appointed eschatological judgment, and their alarm that Jesus may be enacting it prematurely.
30. The presence of pigs confirms this is Gentile territory — pigs were unclean animals under Jewish law (Leviticus 11:7) and would not be kept in a Jewish region. The detail serves the narrative but also marks the cultural boundary Jesus has crossed.

30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 11:7 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
31. The conditional ei ekballeis ('if you cast us out') concedes Jesus's authority — the demons do not dispute his power to expel them but negotiate the terms. The verb parekaloun ('begged, urged') shows the complete reversal of power — the terrifying demonic forces that controlled two men and terrorized a region now beg for mercy from Jesus.
32. Jesus's single word hypagete ('go') is sufficient to command the entire demonic host — the same economy of speech demonstrated in the centurion episode. The verb hōrmēsen ('rushed, charged') describes a violent stampede. The destruction of the herd in the sea may echo the drowning of Pharaoh's army in the Red Sea (Exodus 14-15) — chaotic evil forces destroyed in water.
32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 14-15. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
33. The herdsmen's flight (ephygon) and subsequent report serve as witnesses to the event. The phrase ta tōn daimonizomenōn ('the things concerning the demon-possessed men') indicates they reported the men's liberation as well as the pigs' destruction.
34. The townspeople's response is the opposite of faith — rather than welcoming the one who freed two men from demonic torment, they ask him to leave. The verb parekalesen ('begged') is the same word the demons used in verse 31. The irony is pointed: both demons and townspeople want Jesus to go away. Fear of Jesus's disruptive power outweighs gratitude for his liberating power.

Summary: Matthew 9 continues the miracle cycle with the healing of a paralytic (whose sins Jesus forgives first, provoking the scribes), the calling of Matthew the tax collector, debates with the Pharisees over eating with sinners, a question about fasting, the healing of a woman with a hemorrhage, the raising of a ruler's daughter, the healing of two blind men and a mute demoniac, and Jesus's compassion for the crowds described as sheep without a shepherd. The chapter culminates in Jesus's call for laborers for the harvest.

What Makes This Remarkable: The paralytic narrative (vv. 1-8) is the first direct confrontation between Jesus and the religious authorities in Matthew. Jesus's claim to forgive sins provokes the charge of blasphemy — only God can forgive sins. Rather than retreating, Jesus escalates by using the visible miracle to validate the invisible one. The calling of Matthew (v. 9) is notable as the author's own call narrative. The 'new wine in old wineskins' saying (v. 17) signals that Jesus's ministry cannot be contained within existing religious structures.

Translation Friction: The ruler (archōn) in verse 18 is not named in Matthew, though Mark 5:22 identifies him as Jairus. We render Matthew's text without importing details from Mark. The interweaving of the hemorrhaging woman's healing within the Jairus narrative is a Markan sandwich that Matthew compresses significantly. The phrase 'Son of David' in verse 27 is a messianic title that the blind men use publicly.

Connections: The forgiveness of sins connects to the name 'Jesus' ('the LORD saves... from their sins,' 1:21). The call of Matthew connects to the theme of unexpected people entering the kingdom (8:11). The new wine/wineskins saying anticipates the new covenant theology. The harvest metaphor (vv. 37-38) sets up the mission discourse of chapter 10. The 'sheep without a shepherd' image echoes Numbers 27:17 and Ezekiel 34.

1He got into a boat, crossed over, and came to his own town. 2Some people brought to him a paralyzed man lying on a stretcher. When Jesus saw their faith, he said to the paralytic, "Take heart, child — your sins are forgiven." 3At this, some of the scribes said among themselves, "This man is blaspheming." 4Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said, "Why do you harbor evil in your hearts? 5For which is easier — to say, 'Your sins are forgiven,' or to say, 'Get up and walk'? 6But so that you may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins" — then he said to the paralytic — "Get up, pick up your stretcher, and go home." 7He got up and went home. 8When the crowds saw this, they were filled with awe and glorified God, who had given such authority to human beings. 9As Jesus went on from there, he saw a man named Matthew sitting at the tax booth. He said to him, "Follow me." And he got up and followed him. 10While Jesus was reclining at table in the house, many tax collectors and sinners came and were eating with him and his disciples. 11When the Pharisees saw this, they said to his disciples, "Why does your teacher eat with tax collectors and sinners?" 12When he heard this, he said, "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. 13Go and learn what this means: 'I desire mercy, not sacrifice.' For I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners." ¹⁴Then the disciples of John came to him, asking, "Why do we and the Pharisees fast often, but your disciples do not fast?" ¹⁵Jesus said to them, "Can the wedding guests mourn while the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come when the bridegroom is taken away from them, and then they will fast. ¹⁶No one sews a patch of unshrunk cloth on an old garment, for the patch pulls away from the garment, and the tear becomes worse. ¹⁷Nor do people pour new wine into old wineskins. If they do, the skins burst, the wine spills out, and the skins are ruined. Instead, they pour new wine into fresh wineskins, and both are preserved." ¹⁸While he was saying these things to them, a synagogue leader came and knelt before him, saying, "My daughter has just died. But come and place your hand on her, and she will live." ¹⁹Jesus got up and followed him, and so did his disciples. ²⁰Just then a woman who had suffered from bleeding for twelve years came up behind him and touched the fringe of his cloak. ²¹For she said to herself, "If I only touch his cloak, I will be healed." ²²Jesus turned and saw her. He said, "Take heart, daughter. Your faith has made you well." And the woman was healed from that moment. ²³When Jesus came to the leader's house and saw the flute players and the noisy crowd, ²⁴He stated to them, Give location — for the maid is not dead, but sleepeth. Then they laughed him to scorn. ²⁵After the crowd had been sent outside, he went in and took her by the hand, and the girl got up. ²⁶And the report of this spread throughout that entire region. ²⁷As Jesus went on from there, two blind men followed him, crying out, "Have mercy on us, Son of David!" ²⁸When he entered the house, the blind men came to him. Jesus said to them, "Do you believe that I am able to do this?" They said to him, "Yes, Lord." ²⁹Then he touched their eyes, saying, "Let it be done for you according to your faith." ³⁰Their eyes were opened. Jesus warned them sternly, "See that no one finds out about this." ³¹But they went out and spread the news about him throughout that entire region. ³²As they were leaving, a demon-possessed man who was mute was brought to Jesus. ³³After the demon was driven out, the man who had been mute spoke. The crowds were amazed, saying, "Nothing like this has ever been seen in Israel!" ³⁴But the Pharisees said, "He drives out demons by the ruler of the demons." ³⁵Jesus went through all the towns and villages, teaching in their synagogues, proclaiming the good news of the kingdom, and healing every disease and every sickness. ³⁶When he saw the crowds, he had compassion on them, because they were harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd. ³⁷Then he said to his disciples, "The harvest is plentiful, but the workers are few. ³⁸Therefore ask the Lord of the harvest to send out workers into his harvest."

1. Jesus's 'own town' (tên idian polin) is Capernaum, his base of operations in Galilee (cf. 4:13), not Nazareth where he grew up. The crossing refers to returning from the eastern (Gentile) shore to the western (Jewish) shore of the Sea of Galilee.
2. Jesus responds to 'their faith' (tên pistin autōn) — the faith of those carrying the man, not only the paralytic's own faith. The first words are not 'be healed' but 'your sins are forgiven' (aphientai sou hai hamartiai), establishing that forgiveness is the deeper need. The present tense aphientai ('are forgiven') indicates an accomplished reality, not a future hope. The address teknon ('child') is tender, not condescending.
3. The charge of blasphemy (blasphēmei) is technically accurate by their reasoning — forgiving sins is a divine prerogative (Isaiah 43:25, 'I, I am he who blots out your transgressions'). The scribes reason silently (en heautois, 'within themselves'), which sets up Jesus's demonstration of knowing their thoughts.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 43:25 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The verb eidōs ('knowing') implies direct perception, not deduction — Jesus discerns their unspoken thoughts. The word enthymēseis ('thoughts, deliberations') comes from en + thymos ('in the passion/spirit'), suggesting these are not idle thoughts but deeply held convictions. The adjective ponēra ('evil, wicked') is strong — Jesus characterizes their reasoning as morally corrupt, not merely mistaken.
5. The question is rhetorically brilliant. Saying 'your sins are forgiven' is easier because it cannot be visibly verified or disproven; saying 'get up and walk' is harder because failure would be immediately public. Jesus will do the verifiable miracle to validate the unverifiable one.
6. The sentence breaks mid-thought (an anacoluthon): Jesus shifts from addressing the scribes to addressing the paralytic. The claim is staggering — the Son of Man possesses authority (exousian) on earth to forgive sins, which is functionally a claim to exercise divine prerogative. The phrase epi tēs gēs ('on earth') may emphasize that this heavenly authority is now operative in the earthly realm.
7. The brevity is striking — no fanfare, no extended description. The man who was carried in walks out. The simplicity of the Greek mirrors the effortlessness of the miracle.

8. The verb ephobēthēsan ('were afraid, were awed') conveys reverential fear, not mere admiration. The crowds glorify God rather than Jesus directly, and attribute the authority 'to human beings' (tois anthrōpois, plural) — they see Jesus as a divinely empowered human, not yet grasping the full implications of what they have witnessed. Matthew may intend the plural as a hint toward the church's future authority to pronounce forgiveness (cf. 18:18).
9. The telōnion ('tax booth, toll station') was where customs duties were collected, likely on goods passing through Capernaum along trade routes. Tax collectors (telōnai) were despised as collaborators with Rome and assumed to be corrupt. Jesus's two-word call (akolouthei moi, 'follow me') and Matthew's instant response (anastas ēkolouthēsen, 'getting up, he followed') mirror the call of the first disciples (4:18-22). The author's identification of himself as a tax collector is remarkably self-deprecating.
10. Table fellowship in the ancient world was a powerful social act — eating with someone signified acceptance and solidarity. The pairing 'tax collectors and sinners' (telōnai kai hamartōloi) was a standard phrase for social outcasts. The verb synanekeinto ('were reclining together') indicates a formal meal where diners reclined on couches, not a casual gathering.
11. The Pharisees address the disciples rather than Jesus directly, perhaps intending to undermine their confidence in him. The address 'your teacher' (ho didaskalos hymōn) is distancing — they do not call him 'teacher' themselves. Their objection is about ritual purity: eating with sinners could render one ritually contaminated.
12. Jesus overhears the Pharisees and responds directly with a proverbial saying. The metaphor reframes the situation: the Pharisees see sinners as sources of contamination, but Jesus sees them as patients in need of a physician. The implication is that Jesus's presence among sinners is therapeutic, not compromising.
13. Jesus quotes Hosea 6:6, a text he will cite again in 12:7. The phrase 'go and learn' (poreuthentes mathete) was a standard rabbinic formula used when sending students to study a passage more carefully — Jesus turns the Pharisees' own pedagogical language back on them. The Greek eleos ('mercy') translates the Hebrew chesed in Hosea 6:6. The SBLGNT does not include 'to repentance' (eis metanoian) after 'sinners,' which appears in some later manuscripts; we follow the critical text.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Hosea 6:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The question comes from John the Baptist's disciples, not the Pharisees — an important distinction. John's followers practiced ascetic discipline and would have expected Jesus's movement to do the same. The word polla ('often, much') appears in brackets in the SBLGNT, indicating manuscript uncertainty; we include it as it fits the context.
15. The phrase huiioi tou nymphōnos ('sons of the bridal chamber') is a Semitic idiom for wedding guests or attendants. Jesus casts himself as the bridegroom — an image rich with Old Testament associations where God is the husband of Israel (Hosea 2:19-20, Isaiah 54:5). The passive aparthē ('is taken away') contains a hint of violent removal, foreshadowing Jesus's death. Matthew uses penthein ('to mourn') where Mark has nēsteuein ('to fast'), linking fasting to grief.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Hosea 2:19-20 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 54:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The Greek rhakous agnaphou ('unshrunk cloth, unprocessed fabric') refers to cloth that has not been fulled or treated. When washed, it would shrink and tear away from the older, already-shrunk fabric. The metaphor is about incompatibility — Jesus's ministry cannot simply be patched onto existing religious frameworks.
17. New wine still fermenting would expand and burst brittle old wineskins (askous), but fresh, supple skins could accommodate the expansion. The parallel with verse 16 reinforces the point: Jesus's ministry requires new structures. The word kainos ('new, fresh') denotes qualitative newness, not merely chronological newness (neos). Matthew adds the note that 'both are preserved' (amphoterōi syntērountai), perhaps suggesting that the old is not destroyed but simply cannot contain the new.
18. Matthew uses archōn ('ruler, leader') without specifying the type, though the context indicates a synagogue official (Mark 5:22 names him Jairus). Matthew compresses Mark's account dramatically — in Mark, the girl is initially dying and dies during the encounter; in Matthew, she is already dead when the father arrives. The verb prosekynei ('knelt before, worshipped') again carries the ambiguity of reverence or worship. The father's faith is remarkable: he believes Jesus can raise the dead.
19. The verb ēkolouthēsen ('followed') is notable when applied to Jesus — throughout Matthew, others follow Jesus. Here Jesus follows the father, indicating willingness to respond to faith-filled requests.
20. The participle haimorroousa ('suffering from a flow of blood') indicates a chronic hemorrhagic condition. Under Levitical law (Leviticus 15:25-30), this rendered her perpetually unclean and socially isolated — anyone she touched would also become unclean. The kraspedon ('fringe, tassel, border') likely refers to the tzitzit, the tassels worn on the corners of a garment in obedience to Numbers 15:38-39. Her approach from behind suggests both reverence and the social shame of her condition.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 15:25-30 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

- 20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 15:38-39 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 21. The verb sōthēsomai ('I will be saved/healed') is the same root as sōzō ('to save'), connecting physical healing to the broader salvation vocabulary. Her internal reasoning (en heautē) reveals faith: she believes that even indirect, unauthorized contact with Jesus's garment will be sufficient.
- 22. Jesus addresses her as thygatēr ('daughter') — a term of familial affection that publicly restores her to community after twelve years of isolation. The perfect tense sesōken ('has saved/healed') indicates a completed action with lasting results. Matthew compresses the account significantly compared to Mark 5:25-34, omitting the crowd dynamics and the woman's trembling confession. The phrase apo tēs hōras ekeinēs ('from that hour') echoes 8:13.
- 23. The aulētas ('flute players') were professional mourners hired for funerals. The Mishnah (Ketubot 4:4) specifies that even the poorest family should hire at least two flute players and one wailing woman for a funeral. Their presence confirms the girl is genuinely dead, not merely ill.
- 24. Jesus's statement that the girl 'is sleeping' (kathendei) has been interpreted either as a literal claim that she was unconscious (not dead), or as a metaphor for death in light of resurrection (cf. 1 Thessalonians 4:13-14, John 11:11). The mourners' derisive laughter (kategelōn) — they who had just been weeping — suggests they knew she was dead and found his statement absurd.
- 25. The passive exelēthē ('was put out') uses the same verb as casting out demons (ekballō), suggesting the mourners were forcibly removed. Matthew's account is remarkably compressed — Mark 5:41 includes Jesus's Aramaic words 'Talitha koum,' which Matthew omits. The verb ēgerthē ('she got up/was raised') is the same word used for resurrection throughout the New Testament.
- 26. The noun phēmē ('report, news, fame') indicates that despite Jesus's frequent commands to silence, word spread. The phrase holēn tēn gēn ekeinēn ('all that land/region') likely refers to the surrounding area of Galilee, not the entire country.
- 27. The title 'Son of David' (huios Dauid) is a messianic designation — the expected Davidic king was believed to have healing powers (based on traditions about Solomon as healer and exorcist). That blind men recognize Jesus as Messiah while the sighted religious leaders do not is deeply ironic. The verb eleēson ('have mercy') is an urgent plea that becomes the basis of the later Christian 'Kyrie eleison' prayer.
- 28. Jesus delays the healing until they reach the house, testing their persistence and faith. The question pisteuete ('do you believe?') makes explicit what was implicit in the centurion and hemorrhaging woman episodes — faith is the prerequisite. Their simple affirmation nai kyrie ('yes, Lord') combines belief in Jesus's ability with acknowledgment of his authority.
- 29. The phrase kata tēn pistin hymōn genēthētō hymin ('let it be done for you according to your faith') echoes the centurion episode (8:13). The imperative genēthētō again recalls the creative commands of Genesis. Jesus's healings are not arbitrary displays of power but responses to faith.
- 30. The verb enebrimēthē ('sternly warned, was deeply moved/angered') is an intense word — it conveys emotional force, perhaps even agitation. The command to secrecy (the 'messianic secret') appears throughout the Gospels. Jesus's reasons may include avoiding premature political messianic fervor and maintaining control over his public identity.
- 31. The verb diephēmisān ('spread the news, made widely known') is emphatic — they did precisely what Jesus told them not to do. Their disobedience is understandable (they can now see) but complicates Jesus's ministry by increasing crowds and public expectations.
- 32. The adjective kōphon can mean 'mute,' 'deaf,' or both. In this context, where the man speaks after the demon is expelled (v. 33), 'mute' is the primary meaning. The man is brought by others — his condition prevents him from seeking Jesus himself.
- 33. The crowd's declaration oudepote ephanē houtōs en tō Israēl ('never has such a thing appeared in Israel') is a superlative claim — not even the prophets or Moses performed such acts. This sets up the Pharisees' counter-interpretation in the next verse.
- 34. The Pharisees attribute Jesus's power to the archonti tōn daimoniōn ('the ruler of the demons') — later identified as Beelzebul (12:24). Unable to deny the miracles, they reinterpret their source. This accusation will receive a full rebuttal in chapter 12. The same evidence (exorcism) produces opposite conclusions depending on the observer's posture toward Jesus.
- 35. This summary verse nearly duplicates 4:23, creating an inclusio that frames the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7) and miracle cycle (chs. 8-9) as a unified demonstration of Jesus's ministry. The three activities — teaching, proclaiming, healing — represent the fullness of his work. The phrase to euangelion tēs basileias ('the good news of the kingdom') is distinctively Matthean.
- 36. The verb esplanchnisthē ('was moved with compassion') derives from splanchna ('entrails, inner organs') — it describes a visceral, gut-level emotional response, the deepest compassion possible. The participles eskulmenoi ('harassed, troubled, weary') and errimmenoi ('thrown down, helpless, cast aside') paint a picture of a people battered and abandoned. The shepherd image echoes Numbers 27:17, where Moses asks God to appoint a leader so Israel will not be 'like sheep without a shepherd,' and Ezekiel 34, where God condemns Israel's failed shepherds.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Numbers 27:17. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Ezekiel 34. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 37. The metaphor shifts from shepherding to harvesting. The harvest (therismos) is an eschatological image — the gathering of people into God's kingdom. The contrast between 'plentiful' (polys) and 'few' (oligoi) creates urgency. Jesus sees the crowds not as a burden but as a ripe harvest awaiting workers.

- 38. The verb ekbalē ('send out, thrust out') is surprisingly strong — the same word used for casting out demons. God does not gently invite workers; he thrusts them out into the harvest. The 'Lord of the harvest' (tou kyriou tou therismou) is God, who owns the harvest and dispatches the laborers. This prayer request immediately precedes chapter 10, where Jesus himself sends out the Twelve — the prayer is answered in the next scene.

Summary: Matthew 10 records Jesus's commissioning of the twelve apostles for their first mission. He names all twelve, instructs them to go only to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel,' grants them authority over demons and diseases, gives detailed instructions about provisions, hospitality, and persecution, warns that following him will bring division — even within families — and concludes with promises of reward for those who receive them. This is the second of Matthew's five major discourses.

What Makes This Remarkable: The discourse moves seamlessly from the immediate Galilean mission to language about persecution before governors and kings (v. 18), the coming of the Son of Man (v. 23), and being acknowledged before the Father in heaven (v. 32-33). This telescoping suggests Matthew compiled sayings from different occasions into a single discourse. The repeated command 'do not fear' (vv. 26, 28, 31) structures the middle section. The radical claim that Jesus brings 'not peace but a sword' (v. 34) and the demand to love him above family (v. 37) represent some of the most challenging statements in the Gospels.

Translation Friction: The restriction to Israel (vv. 5-6) stands in tension with the Great Commission's universal scope (28:19). We render the text as given, noting the narrative development. The list of apostles varies slightly across the Gospels in name order and in some cases name forms. We follow the SBLGNT text. The phrase 'Son of Man' is capitalized as a title throughout.

Connections: The mission charge echoes Moses commissioning Joshua and Elijah commissioning Elisha. The 'lost sheep of the house of Israel' language connects to Ezekiel 34 and Jesus's shepherd compassion in 9:36. The warnings about persecution anticipate the Olivet Discourse (ch. 24-25). The family division sayings echo Micah 7:6, which Jesus explicitly quotes. The promise about sparrows and numbered hairs (vv. 29-31) connects to God's providential care throughout the Old Testament.

¹He called his twelve disciples to him and gave them authority over unclean spirits, to drive them out and to heal every disease and every sickness. ²Now the names of the twelve messengers are these. The foremost, Simon, who is known as Peter, and Andrew his brother. James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother. ³Philip and Bartholomew; Thomas and Matthew the tax collector; James the son of Alphaeus, and Thaddaeus; ⁴Simon the Zealot, and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him. ⁵Jesus sent out these twelve, instructing them: "Do not go on the road to the Gentiles, and do not enter any town of the Samaritans, ⁶However, go rather to the lost sheep of the home of Israel. ⁷As you go, proclaim this message: 'The kingdom of heaven has come near.' ⁸Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse those with skin diseases, drive out demons. You received without payment; give without payment. ⁹Do not acquire gold or silver or copper for your money belts, ¹⁰Nor scrip since your journey, and not two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves — for the workman is worthy of his meat. ¹¹Whatever town or village you enter, find out who in it is worthy, and stay there until you leave. ¹²As you enter the house, greet it. ¹³If the house is worthy, let your peace rest on it. But if it is not worthy, let your peace return to you. ¹⁴If anyone does not receive you or listen to your words, shake the dust off your feet as you leave that house or town. ¹⁵Truly I tell you, it will be more bearable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah on the day of judgment than for that town. ¹⁶Look, I am sending you out like sheep among wolves. Therefore be shrewd as serpents and innocent as doves. ¹⁷Be on guard against people, for they will hand you over to courts and flog you in their synagogues. ¹⁸You will be brought before governors and kings because of me, as a testimony to them and to the Gentiles. ¹⁹When they hand you over, do not worry about how to speak or what to say, for what you are to say will be given to you at that time. ²⁰For it is not you who are speaking, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you. ²¹Brother will betray brother to death, and a father his child. Children will rise up against parents and have them put to death. ²²You will be hated by everyone because of my name. But the one who endures to the end will be saved. ²³When they persecute you in one town, flee to the next. For truly I tell you, you will not finish going through the towns of Israel before the Son of Man comes. ²⁴A disciple is not above the teacher, nor a servant above the master. ²⁵It is enough for the disciple to become like the teacher, and the servant like the master. If they have called the head of the house Beelzebul, how much more the members of his household! ²⁶So do not be afraid of them. For there is nothing covered that will not be uncovered, and nothing hidden that will not be made known. ²⁷What I tell you in the dark, speak in the light; and what you hear whispered, proclaim from the housetops. ²⁸Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather, fear the one who can destroy both soul and body in Gehenna. ²⁹Are not two sparrows sold for a penny? Yet not one of them will fall to the ground apart from your Father. ³⁰Even the hairs of your head are all counted. ³¹So do not be afraid. You are worth more than many sparrows. ³²Therefore everyone who acknowledges me before others, I will also acknowledge before my Father who is in heaven. ³³But whoever denies me before others, I will also deny before my Father who is in heaven. ³⁴Do not think that I came to bring peace to the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword. ³⁵For I came to turn a man against his father, a daughter against her mother, and a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. ³⁶A person's enemies will be members of his own household. ³⁷Whoever loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me, and whoever loves son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. ³⁸Whoever does not take up his cross and follow me is not worthy of me. ³⁹Whoever finds his life will lose it, and whoever loses his life for my sake will find it. ⁴⁰Whoever receives you receives me, and whoever receives me receives the one who sent me. ⁴¹Whoever receives a prophet because he is a prophet will receive a prophet's reward, and whoever receives a righteous person because he is righteous will receive a righteous person's reward. ⁴²And whoever gives even a cup of cold water to one of these little ones because he is a disciple — truly I tell you, that person will by no means lose his reward."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb proskalesamenos ('having summoned') indicates a formal calling together, not a casual gathering. The authority (exousia) Jesus delegates is the same authority he himself exercises in chapters 8-9. The phrase pneumatōn akathartōn ('unclean spirits') echoes the Old Testament purity language — these spirits make people ritually and morally defiled.
2. This is the only place Matthew uses the term apostolōn ('apostles,' literally 'sent ones'). The designation prōtos ('first') for Simon Peter indicates rank, not merely sequence — Peter consistently holds primacy in all apostolic lists. The pairs reflect the calling narratives of 4:18-22.
3. Matthew identifies himself as 'the tax collector' (ho telōnēs) — a self-deprecating label that no one else in the list receives. The SBLGNT reads Thaddaios where the KJV has 'Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus.' Luke's list has 'Judas the son of James' in this position, possibly the same person under a different name.
4. The term Kananaios is not 'Canaanite' (an ethnic designation) but an Aramaic equivalent of zēlōtēs ('zealot'), indicating either membership in the Zealot movement or zealous temperament. Rendering as 'the Zealot' follows Luke 6:15 and clarifies the meaning. Judas is listed last with the damning participle paradous ('the one who handed over, betrayed'). The name Iskariōtēs may derive from Hebrew ish-Kerioth ('man of Kerioth'), a town in Judea.
5. The restriction eis hodon ethnōn ('onto a road of Gentiles') limits the mission to Jewish territory. This is not ethnic prejudice but strategic priority — the message goes 'to the Jew first' (cf. Romans 1:16). The separate mention of Samaritans acknowledges their intermediate status, neither fully Jewish nor Gentile. This restriction is explicitly lifted in the Great Commission (28:19).
6. The phrase ta probata ta apolōlota ('the lost sheep') echoes Ezekiel 34:4-6, where God condemns Israel's leaders for failing to seek the lost, scattered sheep. Jesus sends his disciples to do what Israel's shepherds failed to do. The genitive oikou Israēl ('of the house of Israel') limits the scope but the compassion language is universal.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Ezekiel 34:4-6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The disciples' message is identical to John the Baptist's (3:2) and Jesus's own (4:17): ēggiken hē basileia tōn ouranōn. The perfect tense ēggiken indicates that the kingdom has drawn near and remains near — it is not merely approaching but arriving. The verb kēryssete ('proclaim') denotes public, authoritative announcement.
8. The four commands mirror Jesus's own miracle types from chapters 8-9. The phrase dōrean elabete, dōrean dote ('freely you received, freely give') establishes the principle of gratuitous ministry — the grace they have received must be passed on without charge. The word dōrean means 'as a gift, without cost,' from the same root as dōron ('gift').

9. The three metals — gold (chryson), silver (argyron), copper (chalkon) — represent a descending scale of value, emphasizing total financial dependence. The zōnas ('belts, girdles') had folds used as purses. The verb ktēsēsthe ('acquire, obtain') prohibits accumulating resources for the journey.
10. The pēran ('bag, knapsack') was a traveler's provision bag. The prohibition of extra clothing and a staff forces radical dependence on hospitality. The principle axios gar ho ergatēs tēs trophēs autou ('the worker deserves his food') is quoted by Paul in 1 Timothy 5:18. The logic: they should not stockpile because the communities they serve are obligated to support them.
11. The verb exetasate ('find out, inquire carefully') implies a deliberate search for a reputable host. 'Worthy' (axios) here means receptive to the message. The instruction to stay in one house (rather than moving to better accommodations) prevents the appearance of opportunism.
12. The greeting (aspasasthe) would have been the standard Jewish blessing of peace — 'Shalom aleichem' ('peace be upon you'). The command to greet 'the house' (tēn oikian) rather than 'the household' treats the home as a unit that receives or rejects the blessing.
13. The 'peace' (eirēnē, corresponding to Hebrew shalom) is treated as a substantial reality that can be bestowed, rest upon a place, or be recalled — not merely a polite wish. The concept of blessing as a tangible force that can be directed and returned reflects the Hebrew understanding of the power of spoken words.
14. Shaking dust from the feet (ektinaxate ton koniorton tōn podōn) was a gesture Jews performed when leaving Gentile territory, symbolically removing pagan contamination. Applied to Jewish towns that reject the message, it declares those towns equivalent to pagan lands — a shocking symbolic act.
15. Sodom and Gomorrah were the ultimate biblical symbols of divine judgment (Genesis 19). Jesus's comparison is deliberately extreme — towns that reject the gospel message face a more severe accounting than those cities destroyed by fire, because they have received a greater revelation and refused it.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 19 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The combination of animal metaphors is deliberately paradoxical — sheep (vulnerable), wolves (predatory), serpents (cunning), doves (gentle). The word phronimoi ('shrewd, wise, prudent') carries positive connotations of practical wisdom, not deception. The word akeraioi ('innocent, pure, unmixed') literally means 'unmixed' — without admixture of evil. The disciples need both qualities simultaneously.
17. The synedria ('councils, courts') refers to local Jewish judicial bodies. The verb mastigōsousin ('will flog') refers to the synagogue punishment of lashing (up to thirty-nine strokes, cf. 2 Corinthians 11:24). The phrase 'their synagogues' (tais synagōgais autōn) suggests a growing separation between Jesus's movement and the synagogue — language that may reflect Matthew's own community situation.
18. The scope expands beyond the immediate mission to encompass Roman governors (hēgemonas) and kings (basileis), anticipating Paul's trials and the broader post-resurrection mission. The phrase eis martyriōn ('as a testimony') could mean 'testimony to' (evangelistic opportunity) or 'testimony against' (judicial evidence). The ambiguity is preserved.
19. The verb merimnēsēte ('worry, be anxious') is the same word Jesus used in the Sermon on the Mount (6:25-34). The divine passive dothēsetai ('will be given') indicates God as the source of their words. This is not a promise about improvisation but about divine provision under pressure.
20. The phrase to pneuma tou patros hymōn ('the Spirit of your Father') is distinctively Matthean — Mark 13:11 has 'the Holy Spirit.' Matthew's formulation emphasizes the familial relationship: the Spirit who empowers their testimony belongs to the Father who cares for them.
21. The escalation from religious persecution (vv. 17-18) to family betrayal is jarring. The verb paradōsei ('will hand over, betray') is the same word used for Judas's betrayal of Jesus. The family breakdown described here echoes Micah 7:6, which Jesus will quote explicitly in verse 35-36.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Micah 7:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. The phrase dia to onoma mou ('because of my name') indicates that persecution comes specifically from identification with Jesus — his name is the cause. The promise ho de hypomeinas eis telos sōthēsetai ('the one who endures to the end will be saved') uses the verb hypomenō, which means to remain under pressure rather than flee from it. Salvation is promised not to those who escape suffering but to those who persist through it.
23. This is one of the most debated verses in Matthew. The statement ou mē telesēte tas poleis tou Israēl ('you will not finish the cities of Israel') before the Son of Man comes has been interpreted variously: as referring to the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70, to the transfiguration, to the resurrection, to the ongoing mission of the church, or to the second coming. The double negative ou mē with the subjunctive is the strongest form of negation in Greek. We render the text without imposing a specific interpretation.
24. This proverb establishes the principle that disciples should expect no better treatment than their teacher received. The parallel structure mathētēs/didaskalon and doulos/kyrion reinforces the point. If Jesus himself faces rejection and persecution, his followers cannot expect exemption.
25. The argument moves from principle to application: if they called Jesus 'Beelzebul' (the accusation noted in 9:34 and expanded in 12:24), his disciples will receive worse. The name Beelzeboul likely derives from Hebrew ba'al zevul ('lord of the dwelling') — a mocking name for the prince of demons. The wordplay is rich: the oikodespotēs ('master of the house') is called 'lord of the dwelling' (Beelzebul), and his oikiakoi ('household members') share his reputation.

- 26. The first of three 'do not fear' commands (vv. 26, 28, 31) that structure this section. The promise that all hidden things will be revealed (apokalyphthēsetai, from which 'apocalypse' derives) reassures persecuted disciples that the truth about their faithfulness and their persecutors' injustice will ultimately be exposed.
- 27. The contrast between private instruction ('in the dark,' 'whispered into the ear') and public proclamation ('in the light,' 'from the housetops') indicates that Jesus's private teaching to the disciples is meant for public dissemination. The flat rooftops of Palestinian houses served as gathering places and announcement platforms.
- 28. The second 'do not fear' command. The distinction between sōma ('body') and psychē ('soul') here reflects the belief that human identity has a dimension that persecutors cannot reach. Geenna (Gehenna) refers to the Valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem, which had associations with child sacrifice (2 Kings 23:10) and became a symbol of divine judgment. We transliterate 'Gehenna' rather than using the interpretive 'hell' to preserve the specific geographic and theological reference.
- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Kings 23:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 29. The assarion was a Roman copper coin worth about one-sixteenth of a denarius — the cheapest available currency. Sparrows (strouthia) were the least valuable birds sold in the market. The phrase aneu tou patros hymōn ('apart from your Father') is striking in its brevity — it does not say 'without your Father's knowledge' or 'permission' but simply 'apart from your Father,' implying total divine involvement in even the most insignificant events.
- 30. The perfect passive ēριθμήμεναι ('having been counted') indicates a completed action — God has already counted every hair. The argument moves from lesser to greater: if God attends to sparrows (nearly worthless) and to hairs (individually insignificant), how much more to the whole person.
- 31. The third and climactic 'do not fear' command. The verb διαφηρετε ('are worth more, surpass, differ from') establishes the basis for courage: the disciples' value to God exceeds that of the sparrows he already attends to.
- 32. The verb homologēsō ('will acknowledge, confess') means to publicly declare allegiance. The phrase ἐν ἐμοί ('in me') suggests more than verbal acknowledgment — it implies union with Jesus. Jesus claims to serve as advocate or witness before the Father, placing himself in a role of cosmic juridical authority.
- 33. The verb ἀρνήσεται ('denies, disowns') is the opposite of homologeō. The parallel structure creates a solemn either/or with no middle ground. This saying gains poignancy in light of Peter's later denial (26:69-75) and subsequent restoration.
- 34. The verb βάlein ('to throw, cast') is more forceful than 'send' — Jesus throws down a sword, not peace. The μαχαιράν ('sword') here is not literal military violence but a metaphor for the division his message creates. The statement is deliberately provocative, contradicting expectations of the Messiah as a prince of peace (Isaiah 9:6). Jesus describes the effect of his mission: allegiance to him will cut through existing social bonds.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 9:6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. The verb διχασαί ('to divide, to turn against') describes Jesus's purpose in terms that echo Micah 7:6. The list moves through three family pairs, each representing a generational division. These are the closest family bonds in ancient Near Eastern culture — their rupture represents the most radical possible social disruption.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Micah 7:6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. This is a direct quotation of Micah 7:6 (LXX). In Micah, the passage describes the social breakdown of Judah before divine restoration. Jesus applies it to the effect of his own mission — loyalty to him will create enmity within families. The word οἰκιακοί ('household members') connects to the οἰκodespotēs ('head of the house') language in verse 25.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Micah 7:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 37. The verb φιλῶν ('loving') here denotes natural family affection. Jesus does not prohibit loving family but demands that loyalty to him take precedence over the deepest human bonds. The repeated phrase οὐκ ἐστίν μου ἀξίος ('is not worthy of me') frames the demand as a question of worthiness for discipleship. Luke's parallel (14:26) uses the stronger 'hate' (miseō); Matthew's 'more than me' (hyper eme) may soften the expression.
- 38. This is the first mention of the cross (stauron) in Matthew's Gospel. For Jesus's original audience, crucifixion was a Roman method of executing slaves, rebels, and non-citizens — the most shameful death imaginable. The condemned person carried the crossbeam (patibulum) to the execution site. The metaphor means accepting suffering, shame, and potentially death as the cost of following Jesus.
- 39. The word psychē ('soul, life, self') means both physical life and one's total existence/identity. The paradox operates on both levels: clinging to self-preservation leads to ultimate loss, while surrendering life for Jesus's sake leads to ultimate gain. The phrase ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ ('for my sake') is the distinguishing factor — not all loss is redemptive, only loss incurred through loyalty to Jesus.
- 40. The chain of reception — disciples, Jesus, the Father — establishes the principle of agency: to receive the messenger is to receive the sender. This concept is rooted in the Jewish shaliah principle, where an authorized agent carries the full authority of the one who sends him. The verb δεχόμενος ('receives, welcomes') implies hospitality and acceptance of both person and message.

41. The phrase eis onoma prophētou ('in the name of a prophet') means 'because of his identity as a prophet' — the host shares in the reward because the hospitality is an act of faith in the prophet's mission. The principle extends to righteous people generally. Reward (misthon) in Matthew's Gospel is not wage-earning but gracious divine recompense.
42. The climax moves from prophets to righteous people to 'little ones' (mikrōn, the least and most vulnerable). The gift is reduced to its minimum — a cup of cold water (potērion psychrou) — yet even this smallest act of kindness to a disciple will be rewarded. The double negative ou mē ('by no means') provides emphatic assurance. The phrase 'these little ones' anticipates 18:6, 10, 14, where it becomes a major theme.

Summary: Matthew 11 marks a turning point in the Gospel. John the Baptist, now imprisoned, sends disciples to ask whether Jesus is 'the one who is to come.' Jesus responds by pointing to his deeds, then delivers a eulogy for John as the greatest born of women yet less than the least in the kingdom of heaven. He denounces the unrepentant cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, then delivers one of the most intimate prayers in the Gospels, thanking the Father for revealing truth to 'little children' rather than the wise. The chapter climaxes with the great invitation: 'Come to me, all who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest.'

What Makes This Remarkable: John's question from prison (v. 3) is striking — the one who declared Jesus the 'Lamb of God' now appears to doubt. Jesus's response does not rebuke but redirects: look at the evidence. The woe oracles against Galilean cities (vv. 20-24) are shocking because these are Jewish cities that witnessed Jesus's miracles firsthand. The mutual knowledge between Father and Son (v. 27) is one of the highest christological statements in the Synoptic Gospels, approaching Johannine theology. The invitation of vv. 28-30 uses the metaphor of a yoke — a rabbinic term for Torah obedience — and claims that Jesus's yoke is easy and his burden light.

Translation Friction: *The phrase 'the kingdom of heaven suffers violence' (v. 12) is notoriously difficult in Greek. The verb biazetai could be passive ('is being violently attacked') or middle ('is forcefully advancing'), and biastai ('violent ones') could be opponents who attack or passionate seekers who seize it. We render the ambiguity and note the options. The citation of Isaiah in vv. 4-5 is a composite from multiple passages.*

Connections: John's question connects to his announcement in 3:11-12. The works Jesus cites (vv. 4-5) echo Isaiah 35:5-6, 61:1. The judgment on cities connects to the Sodom and Gomorrah language of 10:15. The Father-Son revelation passage (v. 27) anticipates the Great Commission's 'all authority' (28:18). The yoke invitation echoes Sirach 51:23-27 and reinterprets the Wisdom tradition.

¹When Jesus had finished instructing his twelve disciples, he went on from there to teach and preach in their towns. ²When John heard in prison about the works of the Christ, he sent word through his disciples ³Stated to him, Art you he that should come, or do we look for another? ⁴Jesus answered them, "Go and report to John what you hear and see: ⁵The blind receive sight, the lame walk, those with skin diseases are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have good news proclaimed to them. ⁶And blessed is the one who is not offended by me." ⁷As they were leaving, Jesus began to speak to the crowds about John: "What did you go out into the wilderness to see? A reed swaying in the wind? ⁸What then did you go out to see? A man dressed in fine clothes? Look, those who wear fine clothes are found in royal palaces. ⁹What then did you go out to see? A prophet? Yes, I tell you — and more than a prophet. ¹⁰This is the one about whom it is written: 'Look, I am sending my messenger ahead of you, who will prepare your way before you.' ¹¹Truly I tell you, among those born of women no one greater than John the Baptist has appeared. Yet the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. ¹²From the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven has been subjected to violence, and violent people are seizing it. ¹³For every one of the prophets and the law prophesied until John. ¹⁴And if you are willing to accept it, he is Elijah who is to come. ¹⁵Whoever has ears, let them hear. ¹⁶To what should I compare this generation? It is like children sitting in the marketplaces and calling out to others: ¹⁷'We played the flute for you, and you did not dance; we sang a funeral song, and you did not mourn.' ¹⁸He has a devil, for John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say. ¹⁹The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, 'Look at him! A glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners!' But wisdom is vindicated by her deeds." ²⁰Then he began to denounce the towns where most of his miracles had been performed, because they did not repent: ²¹"Woe to you, Chorazin! Woe to you, Bethsaida! For if the miracles performed in you had been performed in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. ²²But I tell you, it will be more bearable for Tyre and Sidon on the day of judgment than for you. ²³And you, Capernaum — will you be exalted to heaven? You will be brought down to Hades. For if the miracles performed in you had been performed in Sodom, it would have remained to this day. ²⁴But I tell you, it will be more bearable for the land of Sodom on the day of judgment than for you." ²⁵At that time Jesus declared, "I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and intelligent and have revealed them to little children. ²⁶Yes, Father, for this was your gracious will. ²⁷All things have been handed over to me by my Father. No one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and anyone to whom the Son chooses to reveal him. ²⁸Come to me, all who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. ²⁹Take my yoke upon you and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. ³⁰My yoke is not heavy, and what I ask you to carry is light.

1. The formula kai egeneto hote etelesen ('and it happened when he finished') is one of Matthew's five discourse-ending formulas (7:28, 11:1, 13:53, 19:1, 26:1), structuring the Gospel around five major teaching blocks. The phrase en tais poleisin autōn ('in their towns') is ambiguous — 'their' could refer to the disciples' towns or the people's towns. We follow the more natural reading of the surrounding towns.
2. Matthew refers to ta erga tou Christou ('the works of the Christ'), using the title with the article — 'the Christ,' the Messiah. John is in prison (desmōtēriō) under Herod Antipas, as explained later in 14:3-12. That John hears about Jesus's works but sends to question him suggests a gap between what he expected of the Messiah and what Jesus is doing.
3. The title ho erchomenos ('the coming one') is a messianic designation drawn from Psalm 118:26 ('Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the LORD') and Malachi 3:1. The question is not necessarily about doubt in Jesus's identity but possibly about the nature of his messiahship — John expected a figure who would baptize 'with fire' and judgment (3:11-12), but Jesus's ministry has been characterized by compassion and healing.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 118:26 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Malachi 3:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. Jesus does not give a direct yes or no but points to evidence — his deeds speak for themselves. The verbs akouete kai blepete ('you hear and see') are present tense, directing them to what is happening right now around them.
5. This list combines Isaiah 35:5-6 (blind, deaf, lame) with Isaiah 61:1 (good news to the poor) and adds lepers and the dead. Each item corresponds to miracles already narrated in Matthew 8-9. The final item — ptōchoi euaggelizontai ('the poor are evangelized') — is climactic: the ultimate messianic sign is not spectacular power but that the marginalized receive God's message.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 35:5-6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 61:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The verb skandalisthē ('is caused to stumble, is offended') carries the sense of a trap or snare — something that causes one to trip and fall away from faith. The gentle warning is directed at John: blessed is the person who can accept a Messiah who does not match expectations. The beatitude form (makarios, 'blessed') echoes the Sermon on the Mount.
7. Jesus defends John's significance with three rhetorical questions (vv. 7-9). The 'reed shaken by the wind' (kalamon hypo anemou saleuomenon) may be a political reference — Herod Antipas used a reed as his symbol on coins minted at his capital Tiberias. If so, Jesus is asking: did you go to see someone who bends to Herod's authority? The answer is clearly no.
8. The contrast between John's rough desert existence and the luxury of royal courts is pointed. The word malakois ('soft things') refers to expensive, luxurious garments. The implicit comparison with Herod's court — where John is now imprisoned — carries ironic force.
9. The third question answers itself and escalates: John is not merely a prophet but perissoteron prophētou ('more than a prophet'). The comparative form sets John above the entire prophetic tradition. What makes him 'more' is explained in the next verse.
10. The quotation combines Exodus 23:20 and Malachi 3:1, with a significant modification: Malachi's 'before me' becomes 'before you,' making Jesus the one whose way is prepared. The word aggelon ('messenger') is the same word translated 'angel' in other contexts. John is God's messenger who prepares the way for the Lord's arrival — a role that exceeds ordinary prophetic function.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Malachi 3:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 23:20 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The phrase en gennētois gynaikōn ('among those born of women') encompasses all humanity. The paradox is sharp: John is the greatest human who ever lived, yet the least person in the kingdom of heaven surpasses him. This is not a diminishment of John but an elevation of the kingdom — the new era Jesus inaugurates transcends even the greatest achievements of the old. The comparative mikroteros ('lesser, least') could also be translated 'the younger one,' possibly referring to Jesus himself.
12. This is one of the most disputed verses in the New Testament. The verb biazetai can be middle voice ('is forcefully advancing') or passive ('is being violently attacked'). The biastai ('violent ones') can be positive (passionate seekers who forcefully lay hold of the kingdom) or negative (opponents who assault it). The passive/negative reading is adopted here because it fits the context of John's imprisonment and the opposition Jesus faces, but the alternative reading is well attested. Luke 16:16 has a clearly positive version: 'everyone forces their way into it.'
13. The unusual order 'the Prophets and the Law' (rather than the standard 'Law and Prophets') may emphasize the prophetic, forward-looking character of the entire Old Testament. The statement that prophecy extended 'until John' (heōs Iōannou) positions John at the hinge between the old era and the new — he is both the last of the old prophets and the first voice of the new age.
14. The identification of John with Elijah fulfills Malachi 4:5 ('I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and terrible day of the LORD'). The qualification ei thelete dexasthai ('if you are willing to accept it') acknowledges that this identification requires faith — it is not self-evident. Jesus does not mean that John is literally Elijah reincarnated but that he fulfills Elijah's prophetic role.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Malachi 4:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. This refrain (repeated in 13:9, 43) signals that what has just been said requires spiritual perception, not merely physical hearing. The distinction between hearing sound and understanding meaning runs throughout Jesus's teaching.
16. Jesus introduces a parable comparing 'this generation' (tēn genean tautēn) — a term of disapproval throughout Matthew — to petulant children in the marketplace. The agora was the town square where children would play. The image is of children who refuse to participate in any game their peers suggest.
17. The children's complaint describes two games refused: a wedding game (flute playing, dancing) and a funeral game (mourning songs, beating the breast). The point is that 'this generation' refuses to respond no matter what approach is used — they are determined not to participate.
18. John's ascetic lifestyle (fasting, desert living, restricted diet) is dismissed as demonic possession rather than recognized as prophetic discipline. The phrase mēte esthiōn mēte pinōn ('neither eating nor drinking') is hyperbolic — he ate and drank but not in normal social settings.
19. Jesus's social engagement at meals (eating and drinking) is dismissed as excess — the opposite accusation from that leveled at John. The terms phagos ('glutton') and oinopotēs ('drunkard') echo Deuteronomy 21:20, the charge against a rebellious son worthy of death. The closing proverb edikaiōthē hē sophia apo tōn ergōn autēs ('wisdom is vindicated by her deeds') personifies wisdom (as in Proverbs 8) and suggests that the results of both John's and Jesus's ministries will ultimately prove them right. The SBLGNT reads 'deeds' (ergōn) where Luke 7:35 has 'children' (teknōn).
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 21:20. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Proverbs 8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The verb oneidizein ('to reproach, denounce') is strong language — public shaming. The noun dynameis ('mighty works, miracles') refers to the healings and exorcisms of chapters 8-9. The cause of the denunciation is not that they rejected his miracles but that they failed to repent (metanoēsan) — the miracles were intended to produce a turning of heart and life.
21. The woe oracle (ouai) is a prophetic form of lament-judgment found throughout the Old Testament prophets. Chorazin and Bethsaida are Galilean towns near Capernaum. Tyre and Sidon were Phoenician coastal cities that the prophets condemned for pride and wickedness (Isaiah 23, Ezekiel 26-28). Jesus's comparison is devastating: pagan cities would have responded more faithfully than these Jewish towns.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Ezekiel 26-28. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. The comparative anektoteron ('more bearable, more tolerable') implies degrees of judgment — greater privilege brings greater accountability. The 'day of judgment' (hēmera kriseōs) is the eschatological reckoning.
23. Capernaum, Jesus's own base of operations, receives the harshest judgment. The language echoes Isaiah 14:13-15, originally addressed to the king of Babylon. The contrast between heaven (ouranon) and Hades (hadou) represents the extremes of exaltation and humiliation. Hades (hadēs) is the Greek equivalent of Hebrew Sheol, the realm of the dead — not 'hell' in the later Christian sense but the place of departed spirits. The claim about Sodom — the most judged city in biblical history — surpasses even the Tyre/Sidon comparison.
23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 14:13-15 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

24. The progression Tyre/Sidon (v. 22) to Sodom (v. 24) intensifies the judgment — each comparison city is more notorious than the last. Capernaum's judgment exceeds even Sodom's because its privilege was greater.
25. The verb exomologoumai ('I praise, I thank, I confess') introduces a prayer of startling intimacy after the preceding judgment oracles. Jesus addresses God as pater ('Father') and kyrie tou ouranou kai tēs gēs ('Lord of heaven and earth'). The paradox is that divine revelation bypasses the sophōn kai synetōn ('wise and intelligent') — those with religious expertise — and is given to nēpiois ('infants, little children') — those without status or credentials. This is not anti-intellectualism but a statement about the posture required to receive revelation.
26. The phrase eudokia egeneto emprosthen sou ('it was well-pleasing before you') is a Semitic construction meaning 'this was your deliberate, delighted purpose.' The word eudokia ('good pleasure, gracious will') indicates not arbitrary choice but purposeful delight. Jesus affirms the Father's sovereign decision as both right and good.
27. This verse is often called 'a bolt from the Johannine blue' because its mutual knowledge language (the Father knows the Son, the Son knows the Father) resembles the Fourth Gospel more than the Synoptics. The verb epiginōskei ('knows fully, recognizes deeply') indicates intimate, relational knowledge, not mere intellectual awareness. The claim that all things (panta) have been delivered to Jesus by the Father anticipates 28:18 ('all authority'). The Son's role as sole revealer of the Father places him in a position of unique mediatorial authority.
28. This invitation is one of the most beloved passages in the New Testament. The participle kopiōntes ('laboring, toiling to exhaustion') and the perfect participle pephortismenoi ('having been loaded down, burdened') describe people crushed under weight — likely the burden of religious obligation as enforced by the scribes and Pharisees (cf. 23:4). The promise anapausō hymas ('I will give you rest') echoes God's promise of rest in Exodus 33:14 and the Sabbath rest of creation. Jesus offers himself — not a system, not a set of rules — as the source of rest.
28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 33:14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
29. The 'yoke' (zygon) was a standard rabbinic metaphor for Torah obedience — students were said to 'take upon themselves the yoke of the kingdom of heaven' and 'the yoke of the commandments.' Jesus does not abolish the yoke but offers his own yoke as a replacement. The self-description praus eimi kai tapeinos tē kardia ('I am gentle and humble in heart') echoes the meekness beatitude (5:5) and the prophecy of the humble king in Zechariah 9:9 (quoted in 21:5). The phrase anapausin tais psychais hymōn ('rest for your souls') echoes Jeremiah 6:16.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Zechariah 9:9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Jeremiah 6:16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. The adjective chrēstos ('easy, pleasant, kind, good') is related to the word for 'Christ' (Christos) by sound (a wordplay early Christians noted). A well-fitted wooden yoke was 'easy' in the sense of fitting properly and not chafing — the metaphor is not that there is no yoke but that this one fits. The adjective elaphron ('light') contrasts with the heavy burdens of verse 28. Jesus does not promise freedom from all obligation but obligation that gives life rather than crushing it.

Summary: Matthew 12 intensifies the conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees. It opens with two Sabbath controversies — the disciples plucking grain and Jesus healing a man's withered hand — followed by the Pharisees' plot to destroy Jesus. Matthew inserts a lengthy Isaiah Servant quotation (vv. 18-21). The Beelzebul controversy erupts when Jesus heals a blind and mute demoniac, and the Pharisees attribute his power to the prince of demons. Jesus responds with the 'kingdom divided' argument, warns about blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, teaches that a tree is known by its fruit, and warns about idle words. The Pharisees demand a sign, and Jesus offers only the sign of Jonah. The chapter ends with a redefinition of family: whoever does the Father's will is Jesus's brother, sister, and mother.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Sabbath disputes (vv. 1-14) establish Jesus's authority over the Law's interpretation by invoking David, the priests, the temple, and the prophets — then claiming to be 'greater than the temple' (v. 6) and 'Lord of the Sabbath' (v. 8). The blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (v. 31-32) is Jesus's most severe warning in the Gospels — an 'unforgivable sin' that has generated centuries of pastoral anxiety. The sign of Jonah (vv. 39-41) links Jesus's death and resurrection to Jonah's three days in the fish. The redefinition of family (vv. 46-50) subordinates biological kinship to spiritual obedience.

Translation Friction: The Hosea 6:6 quotation appears for the second time (cf. 9:13). The phrase 'three days and three nights' (v. 40) does not correspond exactly to the timeline of Good Friday afternoon to Easter Sunday morning by modern counting, but Jewish reckoning counted partial days as full days. The 'unpardonable sin' passage requires careful rendering that preserves Jesus's actual words without either minimizing or exaggerating the warning.

Connections: The Sabbath grain episode echoes 1 Samuel 21:1-6 (David and the showbread). The Isaiah 42:1-4 quotation (vv. 18-21) is the longest Old Testament citation in Matthew. The Beelzebul controversy connects to the accusation in 9:34 and 10:25. The sign of Jonah points to the death and resurrection narratives. The family redefinition anticipates the church as a new community (ch. 18).

¹At that time Jesus went through the grain fields on the Sabbath. His disciples were hungry and began to pick heads of grain and eat them. ²When the Pharisees saw this, they said to him, "Look, your disciples are doing what is not lawful to do on the Sabbath." ³He said to them, "Have you not read what David did when he and his companions were hungry — ⁴How he went into the home of God, and did consume the shewbread, which was not permitted for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the priests? ⁵Or have you not read in the Law that on the Sabbath the priests in the temple break the Sabbath and yet are without guilt? ⁶But I tell you that something greater than the temple is here. ⁷If you had known what this means — 'I desire mercy, not sacrifice' — you would not have condemned the innocent. ⁸For the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath." ⁹Moving on from there, he went into their synagogue. ¹⁰A man was there with a withered hand. They asked Jesus, "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath?" — so that they could accuse him. ¹¹He said to them, "If any of you has a sheep and it falls into a pit on the Sabbath, will you not take hold of it and lift it out? ¹²How much more valuable then is a person than a sheep! Therefore it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath." ¹³Then he said to the man, "Stretch out your hand." He stretched it out, and it was restored, as healthy as the other. ¹⁴The Pharisees went out and conspired against him, plotting how to destroy him. ¹⁵Aware of this, Jesus withdrew from there. Large crowds followed him, and he healed all of them. ¹⁶Charged them that they should not render him recognized: ¹⁷That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet and stated, ¹⁸"Here is my servant whom I have chosen, my beloved in whom my soul delights. I will put my Spirit upon him, and he will proclaim justice to the nations. ¹⁹He will not quarrel or cry out, nor will anyone hear his voice in the streets. ²⁰A bruised reed he will not break, and a smoldering wick he will not snuff out, until he leads justice to victory. ²¹And in his name the nations will put their hope." ²²Then a demon-possessed man who was blind and mute was brought to him. Jesus healed him so that the man could both speak and see. ²³All the crowds were astonished and said, "Could this be the Son of David?" ²⁴But when the Pharisees heard this, they said, "This man drives out demons only by Beelzebul, the ruler of the demons." ²⁵Knowing their thoughts, he said to them, "Every kingdom divided against itself is laid waste, and no city or household divided against itself will stand. ²⁶If Satan drives out Satan, he is divided against himself. How then will his kingdom stand? ²⁷And if I drive out demons by Beelzebul, by whom do your people drive them out? So then, they will be your judges. ²⁸But if I drive out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you. ²⁹Or how can anyone enter a strong man's house and carry off his possessions unless he first ties up the strong man? Then he can plunder his house. ³⁰Whoever is not with me is against me, and whoever does not gather with me scatters. ³¹Therefore I tell you, every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven people, but blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven. ³²Whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven, but whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come. ³³Either make the tree good and its fruit good, or make the tree bad and its fruit bad, for the tree is known by its fruit. ³⁴You brood of vipers! How can you speak good things when you are evil? For out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaks. ³⁵The good person brings good things out of a good treasure, and the evil person brings evil things out of an evil treasure. ³⁶I tell you that on the day of judgment people will give an account for every careless word they have spoken. ³⁷For by your words you will be justified, and by your words you will be condemned." ³⁸Then some of the scribes and Pharisees said to him, "Teacher, we want to see a sign from you." ³⁹He answered them, "An evil and adulterous generation demands a sign, but no sign will be given to it except the sign of the prophet Jonah. ⁴⁰For just as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, so the Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. ⁴¹The people of Nineveh will stand up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, for they repented at the preaching of Jonah — and look, something greater than Jonah is here. ⁴²The queen of the South will rise at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon — and look, something greater than Solomon is here. ⁴³When an unclean spirit comes out of a person, it passes through waterless places seeking rest and does not find it. ⁴⁴Then it says, 'I will return to my house that I left.' When it arrives, it finds the house unoccupied, swept clean, and put in order. ⁴⁵Then it goes and brings along seven other spirits more evil than itself, and they enter and settle there. And the last condition of that person becomes worse than the first. So it will be with this evil generation." ⁴⁶While he was still speaking to the crowds, his mother and brothers stood outside, wanting to speak to him. ⁴⁷Someone told him, "Look, your mother and your brothers are standing outside, wanting to speak to you." ⁴⁸But he replied to the one who told him, "Who is my mother, and who are my brothers?" ⁴⁹Pointing to his disciples, he said, "Here are my mother and my brothers. ⁵⁰For whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek sporimōn ('sown fields, grain fields') refers to cultivated land with standing grain. The verb tillein ('to pluck, to pull off') describes pulling heads of grain by hand, which was permitted under Deuteronomy 23:25 but which the Pharisees considered 'reaping' — one of the thirty-nine categories of Sabbath-prohibited work in later rabbinic tradition. Matthew adds that the disciples 'were hungry' (epeinasan), providing a sympathetic motive absent in Mark.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 23:25. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The Pharisees' charge ouk exestin ('it is not lawful') frames the issue as a legal violation. The prohibition is not from the written Torah itself (which permits plucking by hand) but from their interpretive tradition about what constitutes 'work' on the Sabbath. They address Jesus rather than the disciples, holding the teacher responsible for his students' behavior.
3. Jesus's counter-argument begins with the rhetorically sharp ouk anegnōte ('have you not read?') — a challenge to the Pharisees' scriptural expertise. The appeal to David (1 Samuel 21:1-6) establishes a precedent where human need overrode ceremonial regulation, and where the kingdom's anointed exercised freedom within the law.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Samuel 21:1-6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The artous tēs protheseōs ('bread of the Presence,' literally 'bread of the setting forth') were twelve loaves placed on a table in the tabernacle and renewed weekly (Leviticus 24:5-9). Only priests could eat the old loaves. David's consumption of this bread (1 Samuel 21:1-6) was technically illegal yet not condemned by Scripture. Jesus's argument: if David's hunger justified breaking a ceremonial regulation, so does the disciples' hunger.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 24:5-9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Samuel 21:1-6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The second argument is even more pointed: priests perform 'work' on the Sabbath (slaughtering animals, maintaining the fire, preparing offerings) yet are anaitoi ('guiltless, without blame'). The verb bebēlousin ('profane, desecrate') is deliberately provocative — Jesus uses the Pharisees' own categories against them. Temple service overrides Sabbath restriction by the Law's own provisions.
6. The neuter meizon ('something greater') rather than the masculine meizōn ('someone greater') makes the claim even more sweeping — not merely a greater person but a greater reality. If temple service overrides the Sabbath, and something greater than the temple is present, then this greater reality certainly overrides Sabbath regulations. The claim would be shocking to any first-century Jew — the temple was the center of Jewish religious life and the place of God's dwelling presence.
7. Jesus quotes Hosea 6:6 for the second time (cf. 9:13). The pluperfect egnōkeite ('if you had known,' implying 'but you did not') is a rebuke: the Pharisees who pride themselves on scriptural knowledge have failed to understand a key prophetic text. The word anaitious ('innocent, guiltless') declares the disciples formally acquitted — the same word used of the Sabbath-working priests in verse 5.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Hosea 6:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The climactic claim: the Son of Man has sovereign authority (kyrios, 'Lord') over the Sabbath itself. Since the Sabbath was instituted by God at creation (Genesis 2:2-3), claiming lordship over it is implicitly claiming divine authority. The word order in Greek places kyrios ('Lord') first for emphasis.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 2:2-3 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The phrase tēn synagōgēn autōn ('their synagogue') again uses the distancing possessive, suggesting tension between Jesus's movement and the synagogue establishment. The second Sabbath controversy follows immediately.

10. The adjective xēran ('dry, withered, shriveled') describes a hand that has atrophied or become paralyzed. The question is a trap (hina katēgorēsōsin autou, 'in order that they might accuse him'). Later rabbinic tradition permitted Sabbath healing only when life was in immediate danger — a withered hand was not life-threatening, so by their standards, healing could wait until the next day.
11. Jesus uses a qal wahomer (lesser to greater) argument, common in rabbinic reasoning. Even the stricter Sabbath interpreters allowed rescuing an animal from a pit on the Sabbath (though the Damascus Document from Qumran prohibited even this). The specification 'one sheep' (probaton hen) heightens the analogy — this is someone's only animal, their livelihood.
12. The conclusion posō oun diapherei anthrōpos probatou ('how much more a person differs from a sheep') establishes that if Sabbath rescue of an animal is permitted, Sabbath healing of a person must be permitted all the more. Jesus reframes the Sabbath question from 'what is prohibited?' to 'what is good?' — the Sabbath is for doing good (kalōs poiein), not for withholding compassion.
13. Jesus heals with a command alone — no physical contact, no medicine, no action that could be classified as 'work.' The verb apekatestathē ('was restored') indicates return to a former healthy state. The healing is complete (hygiēs hōs hē allē, 'healthy as the other') — not partial or gradual.
14. The response to a healing is a death plot — the irony is devastating. The phrase symbolion elabon ('took counsel together, conspired') is a formal term for deliberative action. The verb apolesōsin ('might destroy') foreshadows the passion narrative. A Sabbath healing provokes the defenders of the Sabbath to violate the commandment against murder.
15. Jesus's withdrawal (anēchōrēsen) is strategic, not fearful — the same verb was used for the family's flight to Egypt (2:14). Despite the growing opposition from leaders, the crowds continue to follow, and Jesus continues to heal — his compassion is not deterred by the conspiracy against him.
16. The command to secrecy (the messianic secret motif) continues. Jesus does not seek public confrontation at this point — his hour has not yet come. The verb epetimēsen ('warned, rebuked') is the same strong word used for rebuking storms and demons.
17. This introduces the longest Old Testament quotation in Matthew's Gospel — Isaiah 42:1-4, the first Servant Song. Matthew sees Jesus's withdrawal, quiet ministry, and compassion for the weak as fulfillment of this prophetic portrait.
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 42:1-4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. The word pais ('servant, child') echoes the Hebrew eved of Isaiah 42:1. The language of choosing, beloved status, and Spirit-bestowal recalls the baptism scene (3:16-17). The term krisin ('justice, judgment') translates Hebrew mishpat — not punitive judgment but restorative justice, the right ordering of society. The scope extends to ta ethnē ('the nations, the Gentiles'), anticipating the universal mission.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 42:1-4 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The description of the Servant's quiet demeanor contrasts sharply with typical political or military messianic expectations. The verb erisei ('quarrel, wrangle') and kraugasei ('shout, cry out') describe the absence of aggressive self-promotion. This matches Jesus's repeated commands to silence and his withdrawal from public confrontation.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 42:1-4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The bruised reed (kalamon syntetrimmenon) and smoldering wick (linon typhomenon) are images of extreme fragility — things about to be discarded. The Servant refuses to crush what is already broken or extinguish what is barely alive. This describes Jesus's ministry to the weak, sick, and marginalized of chapters 8-9. The phrase eis nikos ('to victory') replaces the Hebrew 'in truth/faithfulness' (le'emet), interpreting justice as ultimately triumphant.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 42:1-4 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The quotation concludes with the universal hope: ethnē elpiousin ('the nations will hope'). The Hebrew original has 'the coastlands will wait for his instruction (torah).' Matthew's Greek version shifts from torah to 'name' (onomati) and from 'wait' to 'hope' (elpiousin), emphasizing personal trust in the Servant rather than obedience to a teaching.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 42:1-4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. This healing combines two conditions from the messianic signs of 11:5 (blind receive sight, mute speak), making it an unmistakable messianic indicator. The double restoration — speaking and seeing — provokes the two opposite responses that follow.
23. The verb existanto ('were amazed, astonished, beside themselves') indicates overwhelming wonder. The question mēti houtos estin ho huios David uses the particle mēti, which in Greek expects a negative answer but here expresses cautious hope — 'this couldn't be the Son of David, could it?' The crowds are tentatively arriving at the messianic conclusion.
24. The Pharisees' response directly counters the crowds' messianic question. Unable to deny the miracle, they attribute its source to Beelzeboul, archonti tōn daimoniōn ('the ruler of the demons'). The accusation is the same as in 9:34 but now stated publicly and explicitly. This is the charge Jesus will identify as approaching the unforgivable sin.

25. Jesus again perceives unspoken thoughts (eidōs tas enthymēseis autōn). The argument is logical: internal division destroys any entity — kingdoms, cities, households. The verb erēmoutai ('is made desolate, is laid waste') is strong, suggesting complete devastation. The principle is applied to Satan's kingdom in the next verse.
26. The name Satanias is a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew satan ('adversary, accuser'). Jesus's logic: if his exorcisms were powered by Satan, then Satan would be working against his own interests — destroying his own agents. This is self-evidently absurd.
27. The second argument: Jewish exorcists also existed (cf. Acts 19:13-14). If Jesus's exorcisms require a satanic explanation, consistency demands the same explanation for their own practitioners. The phrase hoi huiōi hymōn ('your sons/people') refers to Jewish exorcists associated with the Pharisees' own circles. Jesus turns their accusation into a self-indictment.
28. This is one of the rare places Matthew uses 'kingdom of God' (basileia tou theou) instead of his usual 'kingdom of heaven.' The verb ephthasen ('has arrived, has come upon') indicates that the kingdom is not merely approaching but has already arrived — present tense, operative now. Jesus's exorcisms are evidence of the kingdom's invasion of enemy territory. The conditional 'if' (ei) is a first-class condition in Greek, assuming the premise is true: 'since I drive out demons by God's Spirit...'
29. The parable of the strong man depicts the cosmic conflict behind exorcism. The 'strong man' (ischyros) is Satan; his 'house' is his domain over the demonized; his 'possessions' (skeuē) are the people he holds captive. Jesus is the one who has bound the strong man and is now plundering his domain. The verb dēsē ('bind') anticipates the binding authority Jesus gives to the church (16:19, 18:18).
30. This absolute either/or allows no neutrality toward Jesus. The agricultural metaphor — gathering (synagōn) versus scattering (skorpizein) — depicts the harvest of 9:37-38. Those who do not join Jesus in gathering people into God's kingdom are actively dispersing them. The saying stands in tension with Mark 9:40 ('whoever is not against us is for us'), but the different contexts address different situations.
31. The opening scope is extraordinarily generous — pasa hamartia kai blasphēmia aphethēsetai ('every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven'). The single exception stands out starkly: blasphemy against the Spirit (hē tou pneumatōs blasphēmia). In context, this refers specifically to attributing the Holy Spirit's work to Satan — seeing the evidence of God's kingdom and deliberately calling it demonic. It is not an isolated sinful word but a settled posture of willful misidentification of good as evil.
32. The distinction between speaking against the Son of Man (forgivable) and speaking against the Spirit (unforgivable) is significant. Rejecting the human Jesus out of ignorance can be forgiven — Peter's denial was forgiven. But deliberately attributing the Spirit's unmistakable work to Satan represents a hardening beyond recovery, because it rejects the very agent of conviction and repentance. The phrase oute en toutō tō aiōni oute en tō mellonti ('neither in this age nor in the coming age') uses eschatological language that covers all of time.
33. The imperative poiēsate ('make') is not a command to produce fruit but a demand for consistency — if the fruit (Jesus's deeds) is good, then the tree (Jesus's source of power) must be good. You cannot call the fruit good (acknowledging the healings) and the tree bad (attributing them to Satan). The principle ek tou karpou to dendron ginōsketai ('by the fruit the tree is known') echoes 7:16-20.
34. The insult gennēmata echidnōn ('offspring of vipers') repeats John the Baptist's words (3:7), linking the Pharisees to the serpent imagery of Genesis 3. The principle ek tou perisseumatōs tēs kardias to stoma lalei ('out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaks') grounds speech in character — words reveal the inner person. The Pharisees' blasphemous words expose a blasphemous heart.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
35. The word thēsauroi ('treasure, storehouse') depicts the heart as a repository from which words and deeds are drawn. The verb ekballei ('brings out, throws out') is the same word used for casting out demons — what is stored inside inevitably comes out. The parallelism is absolute: good in, good out; evil in, evil out.
36. The adjective argon ('idle, careless, useless') comes from a-ergon ('without work, unproductive'). In context, the 'careless word' is not merely thoughtless chatter but words like the Pharisees' blasphemous accusation — speech that seems offhand but reveals the heart's true orientation. The phrase apodōsousin logon ('will give an account, will render a word') uses the language of legal reckoning.
37. The passive verbs dikaiōthēsē ('will be justified, acquitted') and katadikasthēsē ('will be condemned') are divine passives — God is the implied judge. Words serve as evidence because they reveal character. This does not contradict justification by faith but affirms that genuine faith produces certain kinds of speech while its absence produces others.
38. The request for a sēmeion ('sign') comes immediately after Jesus has just healed a blind and mute demoniac — they have seen signs. The demand is for a spectacular, undeniable cosmic sign that would prove his authority beyond dispute. The address didaskalos ('teacher') is polite but uncommitted.
39. The labels ponēra ('evil') and moichalis ('adulterous') are severe. 'Adulterous' uses the Old Testament prophetic metaphor of Israel as God's unfaithful spouse (Hosea, Ezekiel 16). The sign of Jonah is the only sign Jesus will offer — and it requires faith to interpret, not the kind of overwhelming proof the Pharisees demand.
39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Ezekiel 16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
40. The Greek kētous ('sea creature, great fish') is more accurate than the KJV's 'whale' — the Hebrew in Jonah 1:17 uses dag gadol ('great fish') without specifying the species. The phrase en tē kardia tēs gēs ('in the heart of the earth') refers to the grave/death. The 'three days and three nights' follows Jewish inclusive reckoning where any part of a day counts as a full day — Friday afternoon, all of Saturday, and Sunday morning constitute 'three

40. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jonah 1:17 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
41. The Ninevites — pagans, Assyrians, Israel's enemies — repented at Jonah's reluctant, minimal preaching. 'This generation' has received far greater revelation and refuses to repent. The neuter pleion ('something greater,' not 'someone greater') makes the claim even more comprehensive — not just a greater prophet but a greater reality is present.
42. The 'queen of the South' is the Queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1-13), who traveled a great distance to hear Solomon's wisdom. Again a Gentile figure condemns 'this generation.' The parallel structure — Ninevites/Jonah, queen/Solomon — presents Jesus as greater than Israel's greatest prophet and wisest king. The neuter pleion ('something greater') is repeated.
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 10:1-13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. The anhydrōn topōn ('waterless, dry places') reflects the ancient Near Eastern belief that demons inhabit desolate wilderness regions (cf. Isaiah 13:21, 34:14; Baruch 4:35). The demon seeks anapausin ('rest') — ironically, the same word Jesus offers to the weary in 11:28. The passage functions as a parable about spiritual vacancy.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 13:21 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. The demon calls the person 'my house' (ton oikon mou), claiming ownership. The three participles — scholazonta ('empty, unoccupied, idle'), sesarōmenon ('swept clean'), kekosmēmenon ('put in order, decorated') — describe a person who has been cleaned up but not filled with anything positive. Moral reformation without spiritual filling leaves one vulnerable to worse occupation.
45. The number seven (hepta) symbolizes completeness — the reinfestation is total and overwhelming. The phrase ta eschata cheirona tōn prōtōn ('the last things worse than the first') warns that spiritual emptiness invites greater evil than the original condition. The application to 'this evil generation' (tē genea tautē tē ponēra) transforms the parable from individual exorcism to national warning — Israel has received temporary cleansing through John's ministry and Jesus's healings but refuses to be filled with the kingdom's reality.
46. The phrase heistēkeisan exō ('stood outside') creates a spatial metaphor — family members are on the outside while the listening crowd is on the inside. The mention of adelphoi ('brothers') indicates Jesus had siblings (see 13:55 for their names). Their desire to 'speak to him' may reflect concern about his safety given the growing opposition (cf. Mark 3:21).
47. This verse is bracketed in the SBLGNT, indicating uncertainty about whether it was in the original text — some important manuscripts omit it. Without it, verse 48 follows directly from verse 46 and still makes sense. We include it as it appears in the majority of manuscripts and provides the natural link to Jesus's response.
48. The question is rhetorically shocking — it appears to disown his biological family. Jesus is not rejecting his mother and brothers but redefining the category of family itself. The question demands a new answer that transcends biological kinship.
49. The physical gesture — ekteinas tēn cheira ('stretching out his hand') — makes the redefinition visible and public. The disciples are identified as Jesus's true family. This creates a new kinship community based not on blood but on shared commitment to God's will.
50. The criterion for belonging to Jesus's family is doing the will of the Father (to thelēma tou patros mou) — the same standard from the Sermon on the Mount (7:21). The threefold 'brother and sister and mother' (adelphos kaiadelphē kai mētēr) is inclusive of all — notably, 'father' is omitted because that role belongs exclusively to God. This redefinition of family becomes foundational for the church's self-understanding.

Summary: Matthew 13 is the third of Matthew's five major discourses — the Parable Discourse. Jesus teaches seven parables about the kingdom of heaven: the sower (with explanation), the wheat and tares (with explanation), the mustard seed, the leaven, the hidden treasure, the pearl of great price, and the dragnet. Interspersed is a discussion with the disciples about why Jesus speaks in parables, a citation of Isaiah 6:9-10 about hearing without understanding, and a quotation of Psalm 78:2. The chapter concludes with Jesus's rejection in his hometown of Nazareth.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter marks a decisive shift in Jesus's teaching method — from this point, parables become his primary public teaching vehicle. The purpose of parables is paradoxical: they both reveal and conceal. To those with receptive hearts, they illuminate the kingdom's nature; to those with hardened hearts, they confirm blindness (vv. 11-15). The parable of the wheat and tares is unique to Matthew and addresses the coexistence of good and evil within the kingdom community until the final judgment. The series of short parables (mustard seed, leaven, treasure, pearl, net) each capture a different facet of the kingdom's nature.

Translation Friction: The Isaiah 6:9-10 quotation (vv. 14-15) raises the question of whether parables are designed to prevent understanding. We render Jesus's words and Isaiah's text as given without resolving the tension. The Greek conjunction hina in verse 13 can mean 'in order that' (purpose) or 'so that' (result), and this ambiguity affects whether the concealment is intended or consequential. The identification of the 'field' as 'the world' (v. 38) rather than 'the church' has significant implications for interpreting the wheat and tares.

Connections: The sower parable connects to the harvest imagery of 9:37-38. The wheat and tares anticipates the separation at the final judgment (25:31-46). The mustard seed echoes Daniel 4's tree that shelters nations. The parables of treasure and pearl echo the wisdom tradition (Proverbs 2:4, 8:11). The Nazareth rejection connects to the broader theme of Israel's unresponsiveness (chs. 11-12). The scribe trained for the kingdom (v. 52) may be Matthew's self-description.

¹That same day Jesus went out of the house and sat beside the sea. ²Such large crowds gathered around him that he got into a boat and sat down, while the whole crowd stood on the shore. ³He told them many things in parables, saying: "A sower went out to sow. ⁴As he was sowing, some seed fell along the path, and the birds came and ate it up. ⁵Other seed fell on rocky ground where it did not have much soil. It sprang up quickly because the soil was shallow, ⁶When the sun was up, they were scorched. And on account of the fact that they had no root, they withered away. ⁷Other seed fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up and choked it. ⁸Still other seed fell on good soil and produced a crop — some a hundred times, some sixty, some thirty what was sown. ⁹Whoever has ears, let them hear." ¹⁰The disciples came and asked him, "Why do you speak to them in parables?" ¹¹He answered, "To you it has been given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it has not been given. ¹²For whoever has will be given more, and will have an abundance. But whoever does not have, even what he has will be taken away from him. ¹³This is why I speak to them in parables: because seeing they do not see, and hearing they do not hear or understand. ¹⁴In them the prophecy of Isaiah is fulfilled, which says: 'You will hear and hear but never understand; you will look and look but never perceive. ¹⁵For this people's heart has grown dull, and with their ears they barely hear, and they have shut their eyes, so that they might not see with their eyes and hear with their ears and understand with their heart and turn — and I would heal them.' ¹⁶But blessed are your eyes because they see, and your ears because they hear. ¹⁷For truly I tell you, many prophets and righteous people longed to see what you see but did not see it, and to hear what you hear but did not hear it. ¹⁸Listen then to the parable of the sower. ¹⁹When anyone hears the word of the kingdom and does not understand it, the evil one comes and snatches away what was sown in his heart. This is the seed sown along the path. ²⁰The seed sown on rocky ground is the person who hears the word and immediately receives it with joy, ²¹Indeed, yet has he not root in himself, but dureth for a while — for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the message, by and by he is offended. ²²The seed sown among the thorns is the person who hears the word, but the worries of this age and the deceitfulness of wealth choke the word, and it becomes unfruitful. ²³But the seed sown on good soil is the person who hears the word and understands it, who indeed bears fruit and produces — some a hundred, some sixty, some thirty times what was sown." ²⁴He put another parable before them: "The kingdom of heaven may be compared to a man who sowed good seed in his field. ²⁵But while everyone was sleeping, his enemy came and sowed weeds among the wheat, and went away. ²⁶When the plants sprouted and produced grain, then the weeds also appeared. ²⁷The owner's servants came and said to him, 'Master, didn't you sow good seed in your field? Where then did the weeds come from?' ²⁸He said to them, 'An enemy has done this.' The servants said to him, 'Then do you want us to go and pull them up?' ²⁹He said, 'No, because while gathering the weeds you might uproot the wheat along with them. ³⁰Let both grow together until the harvest. At harvest time I will tell the reapers: First collect the weeds and tie them in bundles to be burned, then gather the wheat into my barn.'" ³¹He put another parable before them: "The kingdom of heaven is like a mustard seed that a man took and planted in his field. ³²It is the smallest of all seeds, but when it has grown it is the largest of garden plants and becomes a tree, so that the birds of the sky come and nest in its branches." ³³He told them another parable: "The kingdom of heaven is like leaven that a woman took and mixed into three measures of flour until all of it was leavened." ³⁴Jesus spoke all these things to the crowds in parables. He did not say anything to them without a parable, ³⁵Indeed, that it could be fulfilled which had been spoken by the prophet of old and stated, I will open my mouth in parables. I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world. ³⁶Then he left the crowds and went into the house. His disciples came to him, saying, "Explain to us the parable of the weeds in the field." ³⁷He answered, "The one who sows the good seed is the Son of Man. ³⁸The field is the world. The good seed — these are the sons of the kingdom. The weeds are the sons of the evil one. ³⁹The enemy who sowed them is the devil. The harvest is the end of the age, and the reapers are angels. ⁴⁰Just as the weeds are gathered and burned in the fire, so it will be at the end of the age. ⁴¹The Son of Man will send his angels, and they will collect out of his kingdom everything that causes sin and all who practice lawlessness, ⁴²Will cast them into a furnace of fire — there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth. ⁴³Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Whoever has ears, let them hear. ⁴⁴"The kingdom of heaven is like treasure hidden in a field. When a man found it, he hid it again, and in his joy he went and sold everything he had and bought that field. ⁴⁵Again, the kingdom of heaven is like a merchant searching for fine pearls. ⁴⁶When he found one pearl of great value, he went and sold everything he had and bought it. ⁴⁷Again, heaven's kingdom is like to a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind. ⁴⁸When it was full, they pulled it up on the shore, sat down, and sorted the good fish into containers but threw the bad away. ⁴⁹So it will be at the end of the age. The angels will go out and separate the wicked from among the righteous ⁵⁰Will cast them into the furnace of fire — there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth. ⁵¹"Have you understood all these things?" They said to him, "Yes." ⁵²He said to them, "Therefore every scribe who has been trained for the kingdom of heaven is like the master of a household who brings out of his storeroom new things and old." ⁵³When Jesus had finished these parables, he left that place. ⁵⁴He came to his hometown and taught them in their synagogue, so that they were astonished and said, "Where did this man get this wisdom and these miraculous powers? ⁵⁵Isn't this the carpenter's son? Isn't his mother called Mary, and his brothers James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas? ⁵⁶And aren't all his sisters with us? Where then did this man get all these things?" ⁵⁷And they took offense at him. But Jesus said to them, "A prophet is not without honor except in his hometown and in his own household." ⁵⁸And he did not do many miracles there because of their unbelief.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase en tē hēmera ekeinē ('on that day') links this discourse to the events of chapter 12. The movement from house to seaside establishes the public setting for parabolic teaching. The Sea of Galilee serves as a natural amphitheater.
2. The sitting position (kathēsthai) was the standard posture for teaching in the ancient world. The boat creates natural distance and acoustics. The crowd standing (heistēkei) on the shore while Jesus sits in the boat reverses the typical rabbi-student arrangement and creates a visual tableau.
3. The noun parabolē ('parable,' from para + ballō, 'to throw alongside') refers to a comparison or illustration that places a familiar image alongside a spiritual truth. The sower parable is the foundational parable — its interpretation governs how all subsequent parables are read. The phrase ho speirōn ('the sower') uses the article, suggesting a representative or well-known figure.
4. Palestinian farmers sowed by broadcasting seed across a field. The path (para tēn hodon) was the hard-packed pathway through or alongside the field where seed could not penetrate the soil. The birds (ta peteina) are identified as representing 'the evil one' in verse 19.
5. The petrōdē ('rocky ground') refers not to ground with scattered stones but to thin soil over a limestone shelf — common in the Galilean landscape. The rapid growth (eutheōs exaneteilen, 'immediately it sprang up') is not a sign of health but of shallow rooting. Without depth (bathos gēs, 'depth of earth'), the growth is superficial.
6. The sun that nurtures deep-rooted plants destroys shallow-rooted ones — the same external pressure produces opposite outcomes depending on root depth. The verb exēranthē ('withered, dried up') describes complete death, not temporary wilting.
7. The akanthas ('thorns, thistles') represent competing plants that were already present in the soil. The verb epnixan ('choked, strangled') is violent — the thorns suffocated the grain by stealing light, water, and nutrients. This soil type has potential for growth but competing forces prevent fruitfulness.
8. The good soil (gēn tēn kalēn) is distinguished by its fruitfulness. The yields — hundredfold, sixtyfold, thirtyfold — range from extraordinary to very good. In ancient Palestine, a tenfold return was considered good; even the lowest yield here (thirtyfold) far exceeds normal expectations. The descending order (100, 60, 30) may suggest that any productive response to the word, whatever the degree, represents good soil.
9. The refrain from 11:15 returns, signaling that the parable demands more than surface hearing. The plural ōta ('ears') may suggest that physical hearing is not the issue — spiritual perception is required.
10. The disciples' question dia ti ('why?') indicates that parabolic teaching is a new method. The pronoun autois ('to them') distinguishes the crowds from the disciples — the disciples receive private explanation while the crowds receive parables.

11. The divine passive dedotai ('it has been given') indicates that understanding is a gift from God, not an achievement of intellect. The word mystēria ('mysteries') does not mean 'puzzles' but 'revealed secrets' — truths about God's kingdom that have been hidden and are now being disclosed to the initiated. The distinction between 'you' (the disciples) and 'them' (the crowds) reflects the growing division in response to Jesus.
12. This saying appears paradoxical and even harsh. The 'having' in question is receptivity to the kingdom message — those who respond to what they have received will receive more understanding, while those who refuse to engage will lose even the initial exposure they had. The principle is spiritual, not economic: responsiveness to truth generates more truth; indifference leads to loss.
13. Matthew uses hoti ('because') where Mark 4:12 has hina ('in order that'), softening the purpose clause into a causal explanation. The parables are given because the people have already demonstrated their inability to perceive — the parables respond to existing spiritual blindness rather than causing it. The paradox of seeing-without-seeing and hearing-without-hearing describes willful incomprehension.
14. The verb anaplēroutai ('is being fulfilled') is present tense — the fulfillment is happening now, in this moment. The quotation from Isaiah 6:9-10 was originally spoken to Isaiah at his commissioning, describing the stubborn unresponsiveness of Israel. Matthew sees the same pattern repeating. The emphatic doubling — akoē akousete ('hearing you will hear'), blepontes blepsete ('seeing you will see') — stresses the thoroughness of the incomprehension.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 6:9-10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The verb epachynthē ('has grown fat, has become dull') describes a heart that has become insensitive through accumulated resistance. The Isaiah passage attributes the closure to the people themselves (tous ophthalmous ekammysan, 'they have shut their eyes') — this is self-inflicted blindness. The sequence — see, hear, understand, turn, be healed — represents the progression that has been blocked. The conditional 'I would heal them' (iasomai autous) reveals God's desire to heal, frustrated by human refusal.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 6:9-10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. After the harsh words about the unresponsive crowds, Jesus turns to the disciples with a contrasting beatitude. Their seeing and hearing is a gift (cf. v. 11) — they are privileged witnesses to the kingdom's arrival.
17. The verb epethymēsan ('longed, desired earnestly') expresses intense, unfulfilled desire. The prophets and righteous people of Israel's history anticipated the messianic age but did not live to see it. The disciples are living in the era the entire Old Testament pointed toward — a privilege greater than they realize.
18. The imperative akousate ('listen, hear') is emphatic — you who have been given the gift of hearing, now use it. The phrase tēn parabolēn tou speirantos ('the parable of the one who sowed') identifies this as the interpretive key for the others.
19. The interpretation identifies the seed as ton logon tēs basileias ('the word of the kingdom') — the message about God's reign. The birds of verse 4 are identified as ho ponēros ('the evil one,' Satan). The failure is comprehension — mē synientos ('not understanding') — the word never takes root because it is never grasped. The verb harpazei ('snatches away') is violent, depicting active opposition.
20. The immediate, joyful response (euthys meta charas lambanōn, 'immediately with joy receiving') sounds positive but proves shallow. Quick enthusiasm without depth of commitment characterizes this soil type. The joy is genuine but superficial.
21. The phrase ouk echei rhizan en heautō ('has no root in himself') describes internal shallowness — the word has not penetrated deeply enough to sustain the person through difficulty. The word proskairos ('temporary, short-lived, lasting only for a season') contrasts with the enduring fruit of good soil. The verb skandalizetai ('is caused to stumble, falls away') — the stumbling block that trips this person is suffering, not temptation.
22. Two thorns are named: hē merimna tou aiōnos ('the worry/anxiety of this age') — the same worry Jesus addressed in 6:25-34 — and hē apatē tou ploutou ('the deceitfulness of wealth'). The word apatē ('deceit, seduction') treats wealth as an active deceiver, not a passive possession. The result is akarpōs ('unfruitful') — the word survives but produces nothing.
23. The distinguishing mark of good soil is synieis ('understanding') — the word that was absent from the path soil (v. 19). Hearing plus understanding equals fruitfulness. The verb karpophorei ('bears fruit') is the goal of the entire parable. The varying yields (100, 60, 30) allow for different degrees of fruitfulness without disqualifying any productive response.
24. The formula hōmoiōthē hē basileia tōn ouranōn ('the kingdom of heaven has become like') introduces the comparison. This parable is unique to Matthew. The 'good seed' (kalon sperma) and 'his field' (en tō agrō autou) establish the owner's rightful possession and proper action.
25. The zizania ('weeds') is commonly identified as darnel (Lolium temulentum), a weed that closely resembles wheat in its early growth stages and cannot be distinguished until the grain heads form. Deliberately sowing darnel in an enemy's field was a known act of sabotage in the ancient world, serious enough to be addressed in Roman law. The enemy acts secretly (en tō katheudein, 'while sleeping') and departs (apēlthen) — evil often works covertly.
26. The weeds become visible only when the grain appears — at the earlier stages, wheat and darnel are indistinguishable. The word ephanē ('appeared, became visible') marks the moment of revelation.
27. The servants' question addresses the problem of evil in miniature: if the owner sowed good seed, where did the weeds come from? The word pothen ('from where?') asks about origin — the question humanity has always asked about the presence of evil in God's good creation.

- 28. The master's answer echthros anthrōpos ('an enemy person, a hostile man') identifies the source simply and directly. The servants' eagerness to remove the weeds immediately (syllēxōmen, 'shall we gather/collect them?') represents the human impulse to purge evil from the community immediately and completely.
- 29. The master's refusal is practical — dandelion roots intertwine with wheat roots, making selective removal impossible without destroying good plants. The theological implication: premature judgment of the community risks destroying genuine believers. The verb ekrizōsēte ('might uproot') describes tearing out by the roots — total destruction.
- 30. The command aphete synauxanesthai ('let them grow together') requires patience — coexistence of good and evil within the kingdom community until God's appointed time. The therismos ('harvest') is the final judgment (v. 39). The order is significant: weeds are gathered first for burning, then wheat is gathered into the barn. The barn (apothēkēn) represents the final secure dwelling of the righteous.
- 31. The kokkō sinapeōs ('mustard seed,' from the plant Sinapis nigra or Brassica nigra) was proverbially the smallest seed known in Palestine. Jesus uses the smallest to illustrate the kingdom's beginnings. The kingdom starts imperceptibly small.
- 32. The contrast between mikroteron pantōn tōn spermatōn ('smallest of all seeds') and meizon tōn lachanōn ('largest of garden plants') captures the kingdom's trajectory from insignificant beginning to impressive result. The mustard plant can grow to 8-10 feet. The image of birds nesting in branches echoes Daniel 4:12 (Nebuchadnezzar's tree) and Ezekiel 17:23, 31:6, where a great tree sheltering birds symbolizes a kingdom that provides refuge for all nations.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 4:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ezekiel 17:23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. Leaven (zymē) is usually a negative symbol in Jewish tradition (cf. 16:6, 'leaven of the Pharisees'), making its positive use here surprising. The verb enekrypsen ('hid, concealed') emphasizes the invisible nature of the kingdom's working. Three measures (sata tria) of flour is an enormous quantity — approximately 50 pounds, enough to feed over 100 people. This echoes the amount Sarah prepared for the three visitors in Genesis 18:6 (three seahs). The point: a tiny amount of leaven transforms a massive quantity of dough.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 18:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The statement chōris parabolēs ouden elalei autois ('without a parable he said nothing to them') applies to this occasion and phase of ministry, not to Jesus's entire teaching career — he taught directly in the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7). The shift to exclusively parabolic public teaching marks a new phase.
- 35. The quotation is from Psalm 78:2, attributed to 'the prophet' (some manuscripts add 'Isaiah,' but the SBLGNT does not). The psalmist Asaph speaks of recounting Israel's history as parables. Matthew applies this to Jesus's parabolic teaching as revealing kekrymmena apo katabolēs kosmou ('things hidden since the foundation/creation of the world') — the kingdom truths that have been concealed in God's plan since creation itself.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalms 78:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. The shift from public seaside teaching to private house instruction mirrors the pattern of the sower parable. The verb diasaphēsōn ('explain clearly, make plain') indicates the disciples cannot interpret the wheat-and-weeds parable without help.
- 37. The allegorical interpretation begins with a series of identifications. The sower is the Son of Man — Jesus himself. This makes the parable autobiographical: Jesus is the one planting good seed in the world.
- 38. The identification ho agros estin ho kosmos ('the field is the world') is significant — the field is not the church but the world. This means the coexistence of wheat and weeds is a reality of the world at large, not merely a problem within the church community. The 'sons of the kingdom' (huiōi tēs basileias) and 'sons of the evil one' (huiōi tou ponērou) live intermixed in the same world until the harvest.
- 39. The enemy is identified as ho diabolos ('the devil,' literally 'the slanderer/accuser'). The harvest is the synteleia aiōnos ('completion/culmination of the age') — not the 'end of the world' (KJV) but the conclusion of the present age that gives way to the age to come. The reapers are angels, not humans — the final sorting is God's work through his heavenly agents.
- 40. The analogy moves from agricultural practice (burning weeds) to eschatological reality. The verb katakaietai ('is burned up') describes complete destruction. The phrase en tē synteleia tou aiōnos ('at the completion of the age') repeats from verse 39.
- 41. The Son of Man sends 'his angels' (tous aggelous autou) — a claim to authority over the heavenly host that belongs to God alone. They collect ta skandala ('stumbling blocks, things that cause sin') and tous poiountas tēn anomian ('those who practice lawlessness'). The word anomia ('lawlessness') is a key Matthean term (7:23, 23:28, 24:12) describing not ignorance of the law but willful disregard for God's will.
- 42. The kaminon tou pyros ('furnace of fire') echoes Daniel 3, where the three young men were thrown into a furnace. The phrase ho klauthmos kai ho brygmōs tōn odontōn ('weeping and gnashing of teeth') recurs from 8:12 and appears again in 13:50, 22:13, 24:51, 25:30.
- 42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

43. The promise eklamphousin hōs ho hēlios ('will shine forth like the sun') echoes Daniel 12:3 ('those who are wise will shine like the brightness of the sky'). The image of luminous glorification describes the final state of the righteous. The phrase tē basileia tou patros autōn ('the kingdom of their Father') is warm and familial. The 'ears to hear' refrain appears for the third time in this chapter.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 12:3 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. Burying valuables in fields was common in the ancient world as a form of protection (no banks existed for ordinary people). The man's response is driven by joy (apo tēs charas, 'from the joy'), not grim duty — discovering the kingdom is exhilarating. He sells panta hosa echei ('everything he has') — total investment. The ethics of concealing the treasure before purchasing the field troubled later interpreters, but the parable's point is the kingdom's incomparable worth, not the man's business practices.
45. The emporō ('merchant, wholesaler') is a professional dealer, not a casual buyer — he is actively seeking (zētounti) quality merchandise. This contrasts with the man in verse 44 who stumbled upon treasure. Both responses to the kingdom are valid: some encounter it unexpectedly, others find it through dedicated seeking.
46. The hena polytimon margaritēn ('one pearl of great value') is singular — one incomparable item that renders all other possessions secondary. Pearls were the most valuable commodity in the ancient world, sometimes worth more than their weight in gold. The merchant's response mirrors the treasure-finder's: total divestiture for a single incomparable possession. The kingdom is worth everything.
47. The sagēnē ('dragnet') was a large net drawn between two boats or pulled from shore, capturing everything in its path indiscriminately. The phrase ek pantos genous ('of every kind') emphasizes the indiscriminate character of the catch. This parable is thematically parallel to the wheat and tares — the kingdom community contains a mixture that will be sorted at the end.
48. The sorting process (kathisantes synelexan, 'sitting down they collected') is careful and deliberate, not hasty. The adjective sapra ('bad, rotten, worthless') is the same word used for 'bad' trees and fruit in 7:17-18. The good fish go into containers (aggē, 'vessels'); the bad are discarded. The scene would be familiar to the Galilean fishermen among Jesus's disciples.
49. The interpretation closely parallels the wheat-and-tares explanation. The verb aphorizontin ('will separate, set apart') is the same root as 'Pharisee' (pharisaioi, 'separated one') — an irony perhaps intentional. The final separation is done by angels (as in v. 41), not by humans.
50. This verse repeats verse 42 nearly verbatim, creating an inclusio around the kingdom parables. The repetition of the judgment warning frames the entire parable discourse with eschatological seriousness.
51. The verb synēkate ('have you understood?') echoes the key word from the sower parable — understanding (synieis) is what distinguishes good soil from the path. The disciples' affirmative nai ('yes') claims comprehension. Whether they truly understand remains to be tested. The SBLGNT does not include kyrie ('Lord') after 'Yes,' which appears in some manuscripts.
52. The grammateus mathēteutheis ('scribe made a disciple, scribe trained') is a striking image — a Torah expert who has become a student of the kingdom. Many scholars see this as Matthew's self-description — a Jewish scribe who has become a disciple of Jesus. The storeroom (thēsauroi) contains both kaina kai palaia ('new things and old'), suggesting that the kingdom-trained scribe values both the old Scriptures and the new revelation in Jesus, drawing on both treasuries.
53. The formula kai egeneto hote etelezen ('and it happened when he finished') marks the end of the third discourse, paralleling 7:28, 11:1, 19:1, and 26:1.
54. The patrida ('hometown, fatherland') is Nazareth (cf. 2:23). The verb eklētesthai ('to be astounded, struck with amazement') is strong but leads to rejection rather than faith. The question pothen toutō ('where did this man get...?') focuses on the source of his authority — they know his background and cannot reconcile it with his present power.
55. The designation ho tou tektonos huios ('the carpenter's son') identifies Jesus by his father's trade. The Greek tektōn ('builder, craftsman') could refer to a woodworker, stoneworker, or general builder. Matthew names four brothers — Iakōbos, Iōsēph, Simōn, Ioudas — and verse 56 mentions sisters. The people's familiarity with his family becomes the basis for their rejection: they think they know everything about him.
56. The repeated pothen ('where from?') frames their inability to reconcile Jesus's extraordinary authority with his ordinary origins. The word pasai ('all') and the phrase pros hēmas ('with us, among us') emphasize that Jesus's family is local, known, and unremarkable. Familiarity breeds contempt.
57. The verb eskandalizōnto ('were offended, were caused to stumble') echoes the blessed/offended contrast of 11:6. Jesus responds with a proverbial saying about prophetic rejection at home — a pattern seen in Elijah, Jeremiah, and most prophets. The word atimos ('without honor, dishonored') is the opposite of the honor-shame dynamic that governed ancient Near Eastern social life.
58. The statement that Jesus ouk epoiēsen dynameis pollas ('did not do many mighty works') is remarkable — it does not say he could not but that he did not. The reason is dia tēn apistia autōn ('because of their unbelief'). Faith is presented as the environment in which Jesus's power operates, and unbelief (apistia) creates an environment that restricts it. Mark 6:5 says more boldly 'he could not do any mighty work there'; Matthew softens slightly to 'did not do many.'

Summary: Matthew 14 opens with Herod Antipas hearing reports about Jesus and fearing that John the Baptist has risen from the dead. This triggers a flashback to John's execution: Herod had imprisoned John for condemning his marriage to Herodias, his brother's wife, and was manipulated into beheading John through Herodias's daughter's dance and request. Upon hearing the news, Jesus withdraws by boat to a deserted place, but crowds follow on foot. Moved by compassion, he heals their sick and feeds five thousand men (plus women and children) with five loaves and two fish. That night, Jesus walks on the sea to reach his disciples' storm-tossed boat. Peter attempts to walk on water but sinks when he becomes afraid. The chapter closes with healings in Gennesaret.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The feeding of the five thousand is the only miracle (besides the resurrection) recorded in all four Gospels, underscoring its centrality. The language of 'took, blessed, broke, gave' (v. 19) anticipates the Last Supper (26:26). Jesus walking on the sea echoes God's sovereignty over chaotic waters (Job 9:8, Psalm 77:19). Peter's water-walking attempt — unique to Matthew — dramatizes the relationship between faith and fear. Jesus's self-identification egō eimi ('it is I' / 'I AM') in verse 27 may carry the resonance of the divine name.*

Translation Friction: The feeding miracle raises questions about the nature of the multiplication — whether it was instantaneous or progressive, visible or hidden. We render the text as given without speculating on mechanism. The number 'five thousand men' (andres) plus 'women and children' (v. 21) could put the total crowd at 15,000-20,000. Herodias's daughter is not named in Matthew (Josephus identifies her as Salome). The chronological relationship between John's death and Jesus's withdrawal is compressed in the narrative.

Connections: The feeding echoes Elisha feeding a hundred with twenty loaves (2 Kings 4:42-44) and Moses providing manna in the wilderness (Exodus 16). The sea-walking echoes God's mastery over the sea in the exodus (Exodus 14) and the psalms (Psalm 77:19). Peter's cry 'Lord, save me' (v. 30) echoes the disciples' cry in the earlier storm (8:25). The twelve baskets of leftovers (v. 20) may symbolize the twelve tribes of Israel — God's provision is more than sufficient for his people.

¹At that time Herod the tetrarch heard the reports about Jesus ²Stated to his attendants, This is John the Baptist. He is returned to life from the no longer alive. And therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. ³For Herod had arrested John, bound him, and put him in prison because of Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, ⁴For John stated to him, It is not lawful for you to have her. ⁵Although Herod wanted to kill him, he feared the crowd because they regarded John as a prophet. ⁶But when Herod's birthday celebration came, the daughter of Herodias danced before the guests and pleased Herod, ⁷Whereupon he swore with an oath to provide her whatsoever she would ask. ⁸Prompted by her mother, she said, "Give me the head of John the Baptist here on a platter." ⁹The king was distressed, but because of his oaths and his dinner guests, he commanded it to be given to her. ¹⁰He sent and had John beheaded in the prison. ¹¹His head was brought on a platter and given to the girl, and she brought it to her mother. ¹²John's disciples came, took the body, and buried it. Then they went and told Jesus. ¹³When Jesus heard this, he withdrew from there by boat to a deserted place by himself. But when the crowds heard about it, they followed him on foot from the towns. ¹⁴When he went ashore, he saw a large crowd, and he had compassion on them and healed their sick. ¹⁵When evening came, the disciples approached him and said, "This is a remote place and the hour is already late. Send the crowds away so they can go to the villages and buy food for themselves." ¹⁶But Jesus said to them, "They do not need to go away. You give them something to eat." ¹⁷They said to him, "We have nothing here except five loaves and two fish." ¹⁸He said, "Bring them here to me." ¹⁹He directed the crowds to sit down on the grass. Then he took the five loaves and the two fish, and looking up to heaven, he blessed them and broke the loaves and gave them to the disciples, and the disciples gave them to the crowds. ²⁰They all ate and were satisfied. The disciples picked up twelve baskets full of broken pieces left over. ²¹Those who ate were about five thousand men, besides women and children. ²²Immediately Jesus made the disciples get into the boat and go ahead of him to the other side, while he dismissed the crowds. ²³After dismissing the crowds, he went up on the mountain by himself to pray. When evening came, he was there alone. ²⁴By this time the boat was many stadia from land, battered by the waves, because the wind was against them. ²⁵In the fourth watch of the night, he came to them, walking on the sea. ²⁶When the disciples saw him walking on the sea, they were terrified, saying, "It is a ghost!" And they cried out in fear. ²⁷But immediately Jesus spoke to them, saying, "Take courage! It is I. Do not be afraid." ²⁸Peter answered him, "Lord, if it is you, command me to come to you on the water." ²⁹He said, "Come." So Peter got out of the boat, walked on the water, and came toward Jesus. ³⁰But when he saw the strong wind, he was afraid, and beginning to sink, he cried out, "Lord, save me!" ³¹Immediately Jesus reached out his hand and caught him, saying to him, "You of little faith, why did you doubt?" ³²When they climbed into the boat, the wind stopped. ³³Those in the boat worshipped him, saying, "Truly you are the Son of God." ³⁴When they had crossed over, they came to land at Gennesaret. ³⁵When the people of that place recognized him, they sent word throughout the surrounding region. People brought to him all who were sick ³⁶Besought him that they might only touch the hem of his garment — and as numerous as touched were appointed perfectly whole.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Herod here is Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, who ruled Galilee and Perea as tetrarch (tetraarchēs, 'ruler of a fourth') from 4 BC to AD 39. He is not a king, though Mark 6:14 loosely calls him one. The noun akoēn ('report, what is heard, fame') indicates that Jesus's reputation has reached the political establishment.
2. Herod's conclusion reveals a guilty conscience — he leaps to the supernatural explanation that John has been raised (ēgerthē, the same verb used for Jesus's resurrection). The phrase hai dynamis energousin en autō ('the powers are at work in him') suggests Herod believes that death and resurrection have given John supernatural abilities he did not have before. The paidin autou ('his servants') are court attendants.
3. Matthew now explains Herod's guilt through a flashback. Herodias had been married to Herod's half-brother Philip (not the tetrarch Philip of Luke 3:1 but another son of Herod the Great). The sequence kratēsas... edēsen... apetheto ('having seized... bound... put away') describes a forcible, deliberate imprisonment. According to Josephus (Antiquities 18.5.2), John was imprisoned at the fortress of Machaerus east of the Dead Sea.
4. The imperfect tense elegen ('was saying, kept saying') indicates repeated confrontation — John did not make this accusation once but persistently. The prohibition is based on Leviticus 18:16 and 20:21, which forbid marriage to a brother's wife while the brother is alive. John spoke truth to power at the cost of his freedom and ultimately his life.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 18:16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. Herod's desire to kill (thelōn apokteinai) is restrained only by political calculation — fear of the crowd (ephobēthē ton ochlon), not moral scruple. The people's recognition of John as a prophet provides temporary protection. Mark 6:20 presents a more complex picture where Herod 'feared John' and 'heard him gladly'; Matthew simplifies the motivation to murderous intent.
6. The genesiois ('birthday celebration') was a banquet with court officials, military commanders, and leading citizens (cf. Mark 6:21). The daughter of Herodias (identified by Josephus as Salome) danced en tō mesō ('in the midst'), meaning before the assembled company. That a princess of the Herodian house would dance publicly before male banqueters was considered scandalous in Jewish culture. The verb ēresen ('pleased') has undertones left unstated.
7. The phrase meth' horkou hōmologēsen ('he promised with an oath') binds Herod with a vow — the same kind of rash oath that entrapped Jephthah (Judges 11:30-40). Jesus has just taught against swearing oaths in the Sermon on the Mount (5:33-37). Herod's oath creates the trap that Herodias will exploit.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Judges 11:30-40. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The participle probibistheisa ('having been prompted, coached, put forward') reveals that Herodias is the architect of the request — the daughter is her instrument. The demand for the head epi pinaki ('on a platter/dish') transforms the banquet setting into a scene of horror — a serving dish meant for food will carry a human head. The word hōde ('here') means immediately, at this banquet.
9. Matthew calls Herod basileus ('king') here, though technically he was only a tetrarch — the title may reflect popular usage or may be ironic. The verb lypētheis ('was grieved, distressed') suggests genuine discomfort, but Herod's concern for public face before his guests (tous synanakeimenous, 'those reclining at table with him') overrides his reluctance. The plural 'oaths' (horkous) may indicate he had repeated the promise.
10. The verb apekephalisen ('beheaded') is stark and without elaboration. The execution happens en tē phylakē ('in the prison'), away from the banquet — Herod does not watch. The brevity of the account contrasts with the elaborate setup, emphasizing the swiftness and finality of the act.
11. The passive ēnechthē ('was brought') maintains the impersonal horror. The chain of delivery — platter to girl, girl to mother — completes Herodias's plan. The word korasiō ('girl, young woman') emphasizes the daughter's youth, making the scene more disturbing. Herodias is the ultimate recipient, achieving through manipulation what Herod had been restrained from doing.

12. John's disciples perform the final act of devotion — burial of the ptōma ('corpse, body'). Their report to Jesus (apēggeilan tō Iēsou) connects the two movements: John's work is finished, and Jesus's intensifies. The narrative implies that John's fate foreshadows Jesus's own.
13. Jesus's withdrawal (anechōrēsen) upon hearing of John's death reflects grief and possibly a sense that his own time is drawing closer. The erēmōn topon ('deserted, isolated place') seeks solitude. The crowds' persistence (ēkolouthēsan... pezē, 'followed on foot') demonstrates their determination — they walked around the lake to reach him. Jesus's desire for solitude is overridden by the needs of the people.
14. The verb esplanchnisthē ('was moved with compassion') is the same visceral word used in 9:36 — a gut-level response to human need that overrides his own grief and desire for solitude. Despite the loss of John and the threat to his own life, Jesus's response to the crowd is not frustration but compassion. He heals tous arrōstous ('the sick, the infirm').
15. The disciples' concern is practical — a large crowd in an isolated area (erēmos topos) with no food as evening approaches. Their solution is dispersal — send them away (apolyson) to fend for themselves. The verb agorasōsin ('might buy') assumes normal economic mechanisms. Jesus will offer a different solution.
16. The emphatic pronoun hymeis ('you yourselves') shifts responsibility to the disciples. The command dote autois hymeis phagein ('you — give them to eat') echoes Elisha's instruction in 2 Kings 4:42-44. The impossibility of the task from a human perspective is the entire point — it requires divine intervention.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Kings 4:42-44. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The disciples' report emphasizes scarcity — ouk echomen ('we do not have') except five loaves (artous, flat bread rounds) and two fish (ichthyas). These were likely small barley loaves and dried fish, a common meal for the poor. The disparity between the tiny provision and the massive need is the setup for the miracle.
18. Jesus's request is simple — pherete moi ('bring them to me'). He does not dismiss the inadequacy of the provision but asks for what is available. The principle: offer what you have to Jesus, however insufficient it seems.
19. The four verbs — labōn ('took'), eulogēsēn ('blessed'), klasas ('broke'), edōken ('gave') — form a sequence that will be repeated at the Last Supper (26:26). This eucharistic pattern (take, bless, break, give) shapes early Christian understanding of both miracles and the Lord's Supper. Looking up to heaven (anablepsas eis ton ouranon) signals prayer and divine dependence. The disciples serve as intermediaries — Jesus gives to them, and they distribute to the crowds.
20. The verb echortasthēsan ('were satisfied, were filled') denotes complete satiation, not mere nibbling. The twelve baskets (dōdeka kophinous) of leftovers exceed the original provision — there is more remaining than there was at the start. The kophinos was a wicker basket particularly associated with Jewish travelers. The number twelve likely symbolizes the twelve tribes of Israel — God provides abundantly for his whole people.
21. The count of pentakischilioi andres ('five thousand men/males') follows ancient convention of counting adult males. The addition chōris gynaikōn kai paidiōn ('apart from women and children') indicates the total number was significantly larger. This specification is unique to Matthew among the Synoptics and emphasizes the magnitude of the miracle.
22. The verb ēnagkασen ('compelled, forced, constrained') is unusually strong — Jesus does not suggest but insists that the disciples leave immediately. The urgency may relate to John 6:15, which reports that the crowd wanted to make Jesus king by force after the feeding. Jesus separates the disciples from the politically charged crowd and sends them across the lake.
23. Jesus finally achieves the solitude he sought in verse 13 — but now for prayer rather than rest. The mountain (to oros) connects to the Old Testament pattern of encountering God on mountains (Sinai, Horeb, Carmel). The phrase monos ēn ekei ('he was alone there') creates the setting for the sea-walking miracle — Jesus is on the mountain, the disciples are on the sea, and both are in darkness.
24. The SBLGNT reads stadios pollous ('many stadia') where some manuscripts have 'in the middle of the sea.' A stadion was approximately 600 feet (185 meters). The participle basanizomenon ('being tortured, battered') is intense — the same word used for human torment (8:6, 29). The wind is enantios ('contrary, opposing'), creating a situation of exhausting, fruitless rowing through the night.
25. The fourth watch (tetartē phylakē) was the Roman time division for 3:00-6:00 AM — the darkest, most exhausting hour of the night. The disciples have been struggling since evening. The phrase peripatōn epi tēn thalassan ('walking on the sea') echoes Job 9:8 (LXX), where God alone 'walks on the waves of the sea.' Jesus does what only God does.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Job 9:8 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. The verb etarachthēsan ('were troubled, were agitated, were terrified') describes deep inner disturbance. The word phantasma ('ghost, apparition, phantom') reflects their inability to process what they are seeing — a human figure walking on water in the dark of night. Their cry (ekraxan) is a scream of terror, not a call for help.
27. Jesus responds euthys ('immediately') to their fear. The phrase egō eimi ('I am' / 'it is I') operates on two levels: a simple identification ('it's me, not a ghost') and a possible echo of God's self-revelation in Exodus 3:14 (egō eimi ho ōn, 'I AM WHO I AM') and Isaiah 43:10 ('I am he'). The command mē phobeisthe ('do not be afraid') is the characteristic divine greeting in theophanies throughout the Old Testament.

- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 3:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 43:10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. This exchange is unique to Matthew and reveals Peter's character — impulsive faith that acts on what Jesus says. The conditional ei sy ei ('if it is you') is not doubt but a test: if Jesus commands and Peter can do it, then the identification is confirmed. The verb keleuson ('command') recognizes that Peter cannot walk on water on his own initiative — it requires Jesus's authoritative word.
- 29. Jesus's one-word command elthe ('come') is sufficient. Peter obeys — he climbs out of the boat (katabas, 'having come down') and walks on the water (periepatēsen epi ta hydata). For a brief time, Peter does the impossible because Jesus commanded it and he obeyed. The phrase ēlthen pros ton Iēsoun ('came toward Jesus') shows that the miracle works as long as Peter's focus is on Jesus.
- 30. The shift is dramatic: blepōn ton anemon ('seeing the wind') — Peter's attention moves from Jesus to the storm. Fear replaces faith, and he immediately begins to sink (katapontizesthai, 'to be drowned, to sink into the deep'). His cry kyrie sōson me ('Lord, save me') is the shortest prayer in the Gospels and echoes the disciples' cry in 8:25. The word sōson ('save') again carries both physical and theological weight.
- 31. Jesus's response is immediate (eutheōs) — he does not let Peter drown. The verb epelabeto ('seized, caught hold of') describes a firm rescue grip. The address oligopiste ('you of little faith') — singular here, applied directly to Peter — is the same word used in 8:26 (plural, to all the disciples). The verb edistasas ('doubted, wavered') appears only here and in 28:17 in the New Testament. Peter's faith was real enough to get him out of the boat but insufficient to sustain him through the storm.
- 32. The wind ceases (ekopasen, 'died down, became weary') the moment Jesus and Peter enter the boat — the connection between his presence and the cessation of the storm is implicit. The verb kopazo means literally 'to grow weary, to abate,' as if the wind exhausted itself.
- 33. The verb prosekynēsan ('worshipped') here moves beyond the ambiguity of earlier uses (8:2, 9:18) — after witnessing Jesus walk on water and command the wind, the response is worship. The confession alēthōs theou huios ei ('truly you are God's Son') is the first time the disciples as a group make this declaration in Matthew. It anticipates Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (16:16). The absence of the article before theou huios could mean 'a son of God' or 'the Son of God'; in context, the definite reading is more appropriate.
- 34. Gennesaret (Gennēsaret) was a fertile plain on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, south of Capernaum. The name is related to Kinneret/Chinnereth (Numbers 34:11), the ancient name for the lake itself.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 34:11. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. The verb epignontes ('having recognized') suggests Jesus was already known in this area from previous visits. The rapid communication network (apesteilan eis holēn tēn perichōron, 'sent into the whole surrounding region') demonstrates the organized response that Jesus's reputation generated.
- 36. The request to touch tou kraspedou tou himatiou ('the fringe/tassel of his cloak') echoes the hemorrhaging woman's action in 9:20. Word of her healing has clearly spread, generating faith that even touching his garment is sufficient. The verb diesōthēsan ('were completely healed, were saved through') is a strengthened form of sōzō — total restoration, with no partial or failed healings. The chapter ends on a note of abundant, accessible healing power.

Summary: Matthew 15 opens with a confrontation between Jesus and the Pharisees over ritual purity and human tradition versus divine commandment. Jesus declares that defilement comes from within, not from unwashed hands. He then withdraws to the region of Tyre and Sidon, where a Canaanite woman persistently begs for her daughter's healing — a tense exchange that ends with Jesus commending her great faith. The chapter closes with Jesus healing many on a mountainside by the Sea of Galilee and feeding four thousand men (plus women and children) with seven loaves and a few fish.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Canaanite woman episode is one of the most theologically striking passages in Matthew. Jesus initially seems to refuse her, using the metaphor of children's bread and dogs — yet the woman's witty reply ('even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their masters' table') draws from Jesus one of his strongest commendations of faith in the entire Gospel. This Gentile woman succeeds where Israel's leaders have failed. The feeding of the four thousand parallels the feeding of the five thousand (chapter 14) but occurs in predominantly Gentile territory, suggesting the extension of Israel's blessings to the nations.

Translation Friction: Jesus's statement about being 'sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (v. 24) and the 'dogs' metaphor (v. 26) are difficult for modern readers. We render the Greek faithfully without softening the language. The word kynarion ('little dog, house dog') is a diminutive, but its force remains dismissive. The passage's resolution — healing given on the basis of faith — reframes the entire exchange. The discourse on defilement (vv. 10-20) contains a parenthetical observation that effectively abolishes kosher food laws, though Matthew is less explicit about this than Mark 7:19.

Connections: The handwashing controversy connects to Exodus 30:19-21 and the Pharisaic expansion of priestly purity rules to all Jews. Jesus quotes Isaiah 29:13 (lip-service vs. heart-worship) and cites the fifth commandment (Exodus 20:12) and its penalty (Exodus 21:17). The Canaanite woman evokes Old Testament encounters with Gentiles (1 Kings 17, Elijah and the widow of Zarephath). The feeding of four thousand parallels 2 Kings 4:42-44 (Elisha feeding one hundred) and the manna narrative of Exodus 16.

¹Then Pharisees and scribes came to Jesus from Jerusalem, saying, ²"Why do your disciples break the tradition of the elders? For they do not wash their hands when they eat." ³He answered them, "And why do you break the commandment of God for the sake of your tradition? ⁴For God said, 'Honor your father and mother,' and, 'Whoever speaks evil of father or mother must be put to death.' ⁵But you say, 'Whoever tells his father or mother, "Whatever you might have received from me is a gift to God" — ⁶Honour not his Parent or his parent, he will be free. Thus possess you fashioned the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition. ⁷Hypocrites! Isaiah prophesied rightly about you when he said: ⁸"This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. ⁹They worship me in vain, teaching as doctrines the commandments of people." ¹⁰Then he called the crowd to him and said, "Listen and understand: ¹¹It is not what goes into the mouth that defiles a person, but what comes out of the mouth — this defiles a person." ¹²Then the disciples came and said to him, "Do you know that the Pharisees took offense when they heard what you said?" ¹³He answered, "Every plant that my heavenly Father has not planted will be uprooted. ¹⁴Leave them alone. They are blind guides of the blind. And if a blind person guides a blind person, both will fall into a pit." ¹⁵Peter responded and said to him, "Explain this parable to us." ¹⁶Jesus said, "Are you still without understanding? ¹⁷Do you not understand that everything that enters the mouth passes into the stomach and is expelled into the latrine? ¹⁸But what comes out of the mouth proceeds from the heart, and that is what defiles a person. ¹⁹For out of the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery, sexual immorality, theft, false testimony, and slander. ²⁰These are the things that defile a person. But eating with unwashed hands does not defile a person." ²¹Jesus left that place and withdrew to the region of Tyre and Sidon. ²²And a Canaanite woman from that region came out and kept crying, "Have mercy on me, Lord, Son of David! My daughter is severely tormented by a demon." ²³But he did not answer her a word. His disciples came and urged him, "Send her away, because she keeps crying out after us." ²⁴He answered, "I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." ²⁵But she came and knelt before him, saying, "Lord, help me." ²⁶He answered, "It is not right to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs." ²⁷She said, "Yes, Lord, yet even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their masters' table." ²⁸Then Jesus answered her, "Woman, your faith is great! Let it be done for you as you desire." And her daughter was healed from that moment. ²⁹Jesus moved on from there and went along the Sea of Galilee. He went up on the mountain and sat down there. ³⁰Large crowds came to him, bringing with them the lame, blind, crippled, mute, and many others, and they placed them at his feet, and he healed them. ³¹The crowd was amazed when they saw the mute speaking, the crippled made whole, the lame walking, and the blind seeing. And they glorified the God of Israel. ³²Jesus called his disciples to him and said, "I have compassion on the crowd, because they have been staying with me for three days now and have nothing to eat. I do not want to send them away hungry; they might collapse on the way." ³³The disciples said to him, "Where could we get enough bread in this desolate place to feed such a large crowd?" ³⁴Jesus asked them, "How many loaves do you have?" They said, "Seven, and a few small fish." ³⁵He directed the crowd to sit down on the ground. ³⁶He took the seven loaves and the fish, and after giving thanks, he broke them and gave them to the disciples, and the disciples gave them to the crowds. ³⁷They all ate and were satisfied, and they picked up seven large baskets full of the leftover pieces. ³⁸Those who ate were four thousand men, not counting women and children. ³⁹After sending the crowds away, he got into the boat and went to the region of Magadan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The detail 'from Jerusalem' (apo Hierosolymon) signals that this is an official delegation, not local Galilean opponents. Jerusalem was the center of religious authority, and their journey north to confront Jesus implies a deliberate investigation.
2. The 'tradition of the elders' (paradosis ton presbyteron) refers to the oral Torah — interpretive traditions transmitted alongside the written law. Ritual handwashing before meals was not commanded in the Mosaic law but was a Pharisaic extension of priestly purity practices to ordinary Jews. The verb parabainousin ('transgress, cross over') is deliberately strong — they accuse the disciples of violation, not mere oversight.
3. Jesus turns their accusation back on them using the same verb parabainete ('you break'). The contrast is sharp: they charge his disciples with violating human tradition; he charges them with violating God's commandment (entole tou theou). The phrase 'your tradition' (teen paradosin hymon) pointedly shifts ownership — it is their tradition, not God's.
4. Jesus cites two Old Testament texts: Exodus 20:12 (the fifth commandment) and Exodus 21:17 (its judicial penalty). The verb kakologon ('speaks evil of, reviles') is broader than 'curses' — it includes any verbal dishonoring. The death penalty (thanato teleutato) underscores the seriousness with which the Torah treats parental honor.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 20:12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The Greek doron ('gift') refers to the practice of qorban — dedicating property or funds to the temple so they cannot be used for other purposes. The irony is that the dedication could be nominal; the person retained the use of the assets while declaring them unavailable for parental support. Jesus is exposing a legal fiction that allows financial self-interest to masquerade as piety.
6. The verb ekyrosate ('you have nullified, voided, made invalid') is a legal term — their tradition has rendered God's commandment legally void. Matthew uses 'word of God' (ton logon tou theou) rather than 'commandment,' broadening the indictment: it is not merely a single rule they have circumvented but God's expressed will.
7. The term hypokritai ('hypocrites') derives from Greek theater, meaning 'actors' — those who perform a role that does not reflect their true character. Jesus applies the term to religious leaders whose outward piety masks disobedience to God's actual commands. The adverb kalos ('rightly, well, fittingly') adds rhetorical force.
8. Jesus quotes Isaiah 29:13 following the Septuagint text. The contrast between lips and heart is the core of the hypocrisy charge — external religious performance without internal devotion. The SBLGNT text omits 'draws near to me with their mouth' (found in the KJV, following the fuller Septuagint tradition and some later manuscripts).
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 29:13 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The adverb maten ('in vain, to no purpose') renders their entire worship project futile. The phrase entalmata anthropon ('commandments of people') directly contrasts with 'commandment of God' in verse 3, completing the rhetorical frame: human tradition has displaced divine command, and the resulting worship is empty.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 29:13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. Jesus shifts from the Pharisees to the crowd, broadening his audience for a public teaching. The double imperative akouete kai syniete ('listen and understand') demands not just hearing but comprehension — the same call that appears in the parable discourse (13:13-15).
11. The verb koinoi ('makes common, defiles') is a purity term — to make ritually unclean. Jesus reverses the direction of defilement: contamination flows outward from the heart, not inward from food. This principle, if followed to its logical conclusion, dismantles the entire system of dietary purity laws, though Matthew does not make this implication as explicit as Mark 7:19.
12. The verb eskandalisthesan ('were scandalized, took offense') carries the sense of being tripped up, stumbling over something. The disciples' question reveals their concern about the political consequences of offending Jerusalem's delegation.
13. The agricultural metaphor of planting and uprooting echoes Isaiah 5:1-7 (God's vineyard) and Jeremiah 1:10 (prophetic commission to uproot and plant). Jesus declares that the Pharisees' traditions, not having originated with God, will not endure. The phrase 'my heavenly Father' (ho pater mou ho ouranios) asserts Jesus's unique filial relationship.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 5:1-7 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 1:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The proverbial saying about blind guides (typhloi hodegoi typhlon) is a devastating dismissal of the Pharisees' claim to spiritual authority. The word hodegos ('guide, leader') implies someone who shows the way — their blindness is not physical but spiritual. The 'pit' (bothnon) represents disaster or ruin.

15. Peter's request treats Jesus's statement in verse 11 as a parable (parabole) — an opaque saying requiring explanation. The verb phrasō ('explain, make clear') indicates the disciples did not grasp the revolutionary implications of Jesus's teaching on defilement.
16. The adverb akmen ('still, even now') conveys frustration — after all this time with Jesus, they remain asynetoi ('without understanding, lacking comprehension'). The 'also' (kai) links the disciples' incomprehension to that of the Pharisees and the crowds.
17. Jesus makes his argument crudely physical: food follows a digestive path and exits the body. The word aphedrona ('latrine, toilet') is earthy and deliberate — Jesus is demystifying the Pharisees' elaborate purity system by pointing to basic biology. The implication is that food cannot reach or contaminate the heart.
18. The heart (kardia) in biblical anthropology is the seat of will, thought, and intention — not merely emotion. Jesus locates the source of defilement in the human interior, the center of moral agency. Words reveal the heart's true condition.
19. The vice list moves from internal (dialogismoi ponerōi, 'evil thoughts/reasonings') to external acts. Several of the items echo the Ten Commandments: murder (sixth), adultery (seventh), theft (eighth), false testimony (ninth). The Greek porneiai ('sexual immorality') is broader than 'fornication' and covers any sexual conduct outside God's design. Blasphemiai here likely means 'slander' against others rather than blasphemy against God, given the context of interpersonal sins.
20. Jesus circles back to the Pharisees' original complaint about handwashing (v. 2), now reframing it within his radical redefinition of defilement. The contrast is complete: moral corruption from the heart defiles; ritual omission does not. The adjective anipto ('unwashed') appears only here and in Mark 7:2 in the New Testament.
21. The verb anechō ('withdrew') suggests deliberate retreat, used previously for Jesus withdrawing from conflict (2:14, 12:15, 14:13). Tyre and Sidon were Gentile coastal cities in Phoenicia (modern Lebanon), outside Jewish territory. This is the only time in Matthew's Gospel that Jesus enters explicitly Gentile land.
22. Matthew calls her 'Canaanite' (Chananaia) — an archaic term evoking Israel's ancient enemies, while Mark 7:26 calls her 'Syrophoenician.' Matthew's choice emphasizes the ethnic and religious gulf between her and Jesus. The imperfect ekrazen ('kept crying') indicates persistent, repeated calling. Her address 'Lord, Son of David' uses the Davidic messianic title — remarkable for a Gentile woman, suggesting she has heard of Jesus's identity.
23. Jesus's silence (ouk apekrithe autē logon, literally 'he did not answer her a word') is striking and deliberate. The disciples' request apolyson autēn ('send her away, dismiss her') is ambiguous — it could mean 'grant her request so she'll leave' or 'drive her away.' Their motivation is annoyance, not compassion.
24. The passive apostalein ('I was sent') points to the Father as the sender, and the restriction 'only' (ei me, 'except') to Israel echoes the mission charge of 10:5-6. This statement reflects Jesus's understanding of his earthly mission's scope within Matthew's Gospel. The universal commission does not come until 28:19. The metaphor of 'lost sheep' (ta probata ta apolota) recalls Ezekiel 34, where God condemns Israel's shepherds and promises to shepherd the flock himself.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Ezekiel 34. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The verb prosekynei ('worshipped, knelt before, prostrated') can indicate full worship or respectful supplication. The imperfect tense suggests ongoing action — she kept prostrating herself. Her plea is reduced to three words in Greek (kyrie, boethei moi) — stripped of all argument, pure appeal to mercy.
26. The diminutive kynariois ('little dogs, household dogs') is slightly softer than the full kyon ('dog'), which was a standard Jewish epithet for Gentiles. But the force is still dismissive — the 'children' (tekna) are Israel, and the Gentiles are compared to household pets. The word artos ('bread') anticipates the feeding miracle later in this chapter. Whether Jesus is testing her faith, teaching the disciples, or expressing genuine reluctance is debated; the narrative resolution suggests the exchange serves to display her extraordinary faith.
27. Her reply is a masterpiece of rhetorical persistence. She accepts the metaphor ('Yes, Lord') but turns it: even within the hierarchy Jesus has described, the dogs receive something. The word psichion ('crumb, small piece') suggests that what she asks for is not the full portion but the overflow — Israel's blessings are so abundant that even the surplus is enough to heal her daughter. She does not challenge Jesus's priority of Israel; she simply claims the excess.
28. The exclamation O gynai ('O woman') with megale sou he pistis ('great is your faith') is one of only two times Jesus explicitly praises someone's faith as 'great' — the other is the centurion, also a Gentile (8:10). The pattern is remarkable: Gentiles display the faith that Israel's leaders lack. The passive genetheto ('let it be done') mirrors the divine creative language of Genesis 1 in the Septuagint. The healing is instantaneous and at a distance, emphasizing the power of the word alone.
28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
29. The definite article to oros ('the mountain') may indicate a specific well-known location or may simply reflect Semitic narrative style. Jesus sitting (ekatheto) is the posture of a teacher in Jewish tradition. The setting — a mountain by the sea — creates a tableau of authority reminiscent of Moses.
30. The verb erripsan ('threw, cast down') is vivid — the sick were deposited urgently at Jesus's feet. The list of afflictions (lame, blind, crippled, mute) echoes the messianic promises of Isaiah 35:5-6, where the coming of God brings healing to the blind, deaf, lame, and mute. The location in predominantly Gentile territory gives this healing ministry a universal scope.

30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 35:5-6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
31. The phrase 'the God of Israel' (ton theon Israel) is significant — if this crowd were Jewish, the phrase would be redundant. Its presence suggests that Matthew understands the crowd as at least partly Gentile, glorifying Israel's God in response to Jesus's miracles. This echoes the prophetic vision of Gentiles coming to worship Israel's God (Isaiah 2:2-4, 60:1-6).
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 2:2-4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The verb splanchnizomai ('I have compassion') derives from splanchna ('intestines, gut') — it describes a visceral, gut-level response, not a mild sentiment. The three-day stay indicates the crowd's persistence in remaining with Jesus despite having no provisions. Jesus takes the initiative here, unlike the feeding of the five thousand where the disciples raised the problem (14:15).
33. Despite having witnessed the feeding of the five thousand (14:13-21), the disciples express the same helplessness. The word eremia ('desolate place, wilderness') echoes the wilderness feeding traditions of Exodus 16 (manna) and Numbers 11 (quail). Matthew does not comment on the disciples' apparent failure to remember the previous miracle.
33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 16 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Numbers 11 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
34. The diminutive ichthydia ('small fish') indicates these are not large catches but modest provisions. The number seven often symbolizes completeness in biblical numerology, contrasting with the five loaves of the earlier feeding.
35. The verb parangeelas ('commanded, directed') carries authority. The verb anapesein ('to recline, sit down') is the standard term for taking a meal position. Unlike the five thousand fed on grass (14:19), this crowd sits on bare ground (teen gen), consistent with a more desolate location.
36. The sequence — took, gave thanks (eucharistesas), broke, gave — follows the same pattern as the feeding of the five thousand (14:19) and anticipates the Last Supper (26:26). The verb eucharisteo ('to give thanks') is the root of 'Eucharist,' though Matthew does not draw explicit sacramental connections here. The disciples serve as intermediaries, distributing what Jesus provides.
37. The verb echortasthesan ('were satisfied, were filled to satisfaction') indicates not mere survival but abundance. The word spyridas ('large baskets') differs from the kophinous ('small baskets') of the five thousand feeding (14:20). The spyris was a large rope basket, possibly big enough to hold a person (cf. Acts 9:25, where Paul is lowered in a spyris). Seven full large baskets of surplus from seven loaves declares overwhelming abundance.
38. As with the feeding of the five thousand (14:21), only men (andres) are counted; the total number including women and children would have been significantly larger. The number four thousand, combined with the predominantly Gentile setting, may carry symbolic weight — four often represents universality (four corners of the earth, four winds).
39. The SBLGNT reads 'Magadan' (Magadan) rather than 'Magdala' (as in some manuscripts and the KJV). The location is uncertain — it may be the same as Magdala (home of Mary Magdalene) on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, or a variant name for the same area. Mark's parallel (8:10) reads 'Dalmanutha,' another otherwise unknown location. Jesus returns from Gentile territory to the Jewish side of the lake.

Summary: Matthew 16 opens with the Pharisees and Sadducees testing Jesus by demanding a sign from heaven. Jesus refuses, offering only 'the sign of Jonah,' and warns the disciples about the 'leaven' of the Pharisees and Sadducees. The chapter reaches its climax at Caesarea Philippi, where Peter confesses Jesus as 'the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Jesus responds with the famous declaration about building his church on 'this rock' and giving Peter the 'keys of the kingdom of heaven.' Immediately after this high point, Jesus makes his first explicit prediction of his suffering, death, and resurrection — and when Peter objects, Jesus rebukes him with the stunning words, 'Get behind me, Satan.' The chapter concludes with the cost of discipleship: 'Whoever wants to save his life will lose it.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Caesarea Philippi was a deliberately chosen setting — a Gentile city at the foot of a cliff face with a cave shrine to Pan, near temples to Augustus Caesar. Against this backdrop of pagan worship and imperial power, Peter's confession that Jesus is 'the Christ, the Son of the living God' is a political and theological declaration. The rapid reversal from Peter as recipient of divine revelation (v. 17) to Peter as mouthpiece of Satan (v. 23) is one of the most dramatic character moments in the Gospels. The 'keys' saying and the 'binding and loosing' language have generated centuries of ecclesiastical debate between traditions claiming Petrine authority and those reading the passage differently.

Translation Friction: The identity of 'this rock' (v. 18) — whether it refers to Peter himself, his confession, or Christ — is one of the most debated questions in New Testament interpretation. We translate the Greek without resolving the ambiguity. The wordplay between Petros (Peter's name) and petra (rock) is evident in Greek but involves a grammatical gender shift. 'Gates of Hades' (v. 18) is rendered literally; it refers to the power of death, not to a geographic location. Jesus's command to silence about his messiahship (v. 20) reflects what scholars call the 'messianic secret.'

Connections: The sign of Jonah connects to Jonah 1:17 and Matthew 12:39-40. Peter's confession echoes Psalm 2:7 and 2 Samuel 7:14 (Davidic sonship). The 'keys' imagery draws on Isaiah 22:22 (the key of the house of David given to Eliakim). 'Binding and loosing' was rabbinic language for authoritative legal rulings. The first passion prediction introduces the pattern of prediction-misunderstanding-teaching that structures chapters 16-20. The cross-bearing language (v. 24) anticipates the crucifixion narrative of chapters 26-27.

¹The Pharisees and Sadducees came and tested Jesus by asking him to show them a sign from heaven. ²He answered them, "When evening comes you say, 'It will be fair weather, for the sky is red.' ³And in the morning, 'There will be a storm today, for the sky is red and threatening.' You know how to read the appearance of the sky, but you cannot read the signs of the times." ⁴An evil and adulterous generation demands a sign, but no sign will be given to it except the sign of Jonah." Then he left them and went away. ⁵When the disciples reached the other side, they had forgotten to bring bread. ⁶Jesus said to them, "Watch out, and guard yourselves against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees." ⁷They discussed this among themselves, saying, "It is because we did not bring any bread." ⁸Aware of this, Jesus said, "You of little faith, why are you discussing among yourselves the fact that you have no bread? ⁹Do you still not understand? Do you not remember the five loaves for the five thousand, and how many baskets you collected? ¹⁰Or the seven loaves for the four thousand, and how many large baskets you collected? ¹¹How do you not understand that I was not speaking to you about bread? Guard yourselves against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees." ¹²Then they understood that he had not told them to guard against the leaven of bread, but against the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees. ¹³When Jesus came to the region of Caesarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, "Who do people say the Son of Man is?" ¹⁴They said, "Some say John the Baptist, others Elijah, and others Jeremiah or one of the prophets." ¹⁵He said to them, "But who do you say that I am?" ¹⁶Simon Peter answered, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." ¹⁷Jesus answered him, "Blessed are you, Simon son of Jonah, for flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. ¹⁸And I tell you, you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of Hades will not overpower it. ¹⁹I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven." ²⁰Then he strictly ordered the disciples to tell no one that he was the Christ. ²¹From that time, Jesus began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things from the elders, chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and on the third day be raised. ²²Peter took him aside and began to rebuke him, saying, "God forbid, Lord! This must never happen to you." ²³But he turned and said to Peter, "Get behind me, Satan! You are a stumbling block to me, for you are not thinking the things of God but the things of people." ²⁴Then Jesus said to his disciples, "If anyone wants to come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. ²⁵For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for my sake will find it. ²⁶For what will it profit a person to gain the whole world but forfeit his soul? Or what will a person give in exchange for his soul? ²⁷For the Son of Man is going to come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he will repay each person according to what they have done. ²⁸Truly I tell you, there are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The unusual alliance of Pharisees and Sadducees — normally theological opponents — united against Jesus signals the depth of opposition. The participle peirazontes ('testing') indicates hostile intent, not genuine inquiry. The phrase 'sign from heaven' (semeion ek tou ouranou) demands a cosmic spectacle beyond earthly miracles, implying their dissatisfaction with the healings and feedings they already knew about.

2. Verses 2b-3 are enclosed in brackets in the SBLGNT, indicating textual uncertainty — they are absent from important early manuscripts including Sinaiticus and Vaticanus. However, they are widely attested in other traditions. We include the text following the SBLGNT's bracketed reading. The weather proverb about red sky at evening is a folk observation still proverbial today.
3. The contrast is devastating: they can interpret weather patterns but are blind to the eschatological moment (ta semeia ton kairon, 'the signs of the times'). The word kairos ('appointed time, season') differs from chronos ('chronological time') — it refers to the decisive moment in God's plan. The SBLGNT does not include 'hypocrites' (hypokritai), which appears in some manuscripts and the KJV tradition.
4. The phrase 'adulterous generation' (genea moichalis) uses the Old Testament prophetic metaphor of Israel as an unfaithful spouse (Hosea 1-3, Ezekiel 16). Their sign-seeking is spiritual infidelity. The 'sign of Jonah' was explained in 12:40 as the Son of Man's three days in the earth, pointing to death and resurrection. Jesus's abrupt departure (katalipan autous apeelthen) is a dramatic rejection of their demand.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Hosea 1-3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Ezekiel 16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The detail about forgetting bread sets up Jesus's teaching about 'leaven.' The irony is thick — they have just witnessed two miraculous feedings and are worried about bread supplies.
6. The double imperative horate kai prosechete ('watch out and guard') indicates urgent warning. Leaven (zyme) in Jewish tradition often symbolizes corruption — a small amount permeates the whole batch (cf. 1 Corinthians 5:6-8). Mark's parallel (8:15) includes 'the leaven of Herod' instead of the Sadducees.
7. The verb dielozigonto ('they were reasoning, discussing') shows the disciples taking Jesus's metaphorical warning literally. Their fixation on physical bread after two miraculous feedings demonstrates the obtuseness that Jesus will address in the following verses.
8. The term oligopistoi ('you of little faith') is distinctive to Matthew (6:30, 8:26, 14:31, 16:8) and describes not the absence of faith but its inadequacy. The participle gnous ('having known, perceiving') suggests either supernatural knowledge or simply overhearing their conversation.
9. Jesus appeals to their own experience. The word kophinous ('baskets') specifies the smaller Jewish provision baskets used at the feeding of the five thousand (14:20), distinct from the larger spyridas of 15:37. The parallel structure of the questions builds a rhetorical case against their forgetfulness.
10. The distinction between kophinous (v. 9, smaller baskets) and spyridas (larger baskets) is maintained precisely, confirming that Jesus and Matthew distinguish between the two feeding events. The rhetorical question expects the answer: 'We collected twelve baskets and seven baskets — so provision is obviously not the issue.'
11. The exasperated pos ou noeite ('how do you not understand') brings the rebuke to its peak. Jesus repeats the warning, now clarifying that 'leaven' is metaphorical. The disciples' confusion illustrates a recurring theme in Matthew: proximity to Jesus does not automatically produce comprehension.
12. Matthew, unlike Mark (8:21), resolves the disciples' confusion — they finally understand. The word didache ('teaching, doctrine') identifies the 'leaven' as the Pharisees' and Sadducees' interpretive tradition that, like yeast, invisibly permeates and corrupts. Mark 8:15 identifies the leaven as that of Herod rather than the Sadducees.
13. Caesarea Philippi (modern Banias) was located at the base of Mount Hermon, rebuilt by Philip the tetrarch and named for Caesar Augustus. It contained a grotto sacred to Pan and various pagan temples. The setting for the climactic identity question is deliberately Gentile. Jesus uses the third person 'Son of Man' (ton huion tou anthropou) — a title drawn from Daniel 7:13-14 that was his preferred self-designation.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7:13-14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The popular identifications are all prophetic figures, indicating that the crowds recognize Jesus as a prophet but not as the Messiah. The mention of Jeremiah is unique to Matthew — Jeremiah was the weeping prophet who predicted the destruction of the temple and the new covenant (Jeremiah 31:31-34), themes central to Matthew's portrayal of Jesus. Elijah's appearance reflects Malachi 4:5's promise of Elijah's return before the day of the LORD.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Jeremiah 31:31-34. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Malachi 4:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The emphatic pronoun hymeis ('you yourselves') draws a sharp contrast between public opinion and the disciples' own conviction. This is the hinge question of the entire Gospel — everything that follows depends on the answer. The present tense legete ('do you say') demands a current, personal declaration.
16. Peter's confession combines two titles: 'the Christ' (ho Christos, the Messiah/Anointed One) and 'the Son of the living God' (ho huios tou theou tou zontos). The latter goes beyond messianic expectation to assert a unique divine relationship. The qualifier 'living' (tou zontos) distinguishes the true God from the dead idols of the surrounding pagan temples at Caesarea Philippi — a pointed contrast in this setting. Matthew's version is fuller than Mark's simple 'You are the Christ' (Mark 8:29).
17. The patronymic Bariona ('son of Jonah') uses the Aramaic bar ('son') — one of the few Aramaic forms preserved in Matthew. 'Flesh and blood' (sarx kai haima) is a Semitic idiom for human beings in their natural capacity. The point is that Peter's confession came not from human reasoning but from divine revelation (apokalypsis). This makes Peter both uniquely blessed and uniquely responsible.

- 18. The wordplay between Petros (Peter's name, masculine) and petra ('rock,' feminine) is central but debated. In Aramaic, the underlying word kepha would be identical in both cases, making the connection tighter than in Greek. Whether 'this rock' refers to Peter, his confession, or Christ himself has been disputed since the patristic era. The Greek ekklesia ('assembly, church') appears in the Gospels only here and in 18:17 — it translates the Hebrew qahal, the assembly of God's people. 'Gates of Hades' (pylai hadou) refers to the power of death, not to a place of punishment. The image is of a fortress: death itself cannot breach the community Jesus builds.
- 19. The 'keys' (kleidas) image draws on Isaiah 22:22, where the key of the house of David is placed on the shoulder of Eliakim the steward — authority to open and shut, admit and exclude. 'Binding and loosing' (deo and lyo) was standard rabbinic terminology for declaring something forbidden or permitted. The authority given to Peter here is extended to the whole community in 18:18. The periphrastic future perfect construction (estai dedemenon, 'will have been bound') may indicate that earthly decisions ratify what heaven has already determined, rather than heaven following earth's lead.
- 19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 22:22. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 20. The verb diesteilato ('he strictly ordered, charged') is emphatic. The command to secrecy about his messianic identity — the so-called 'messianic secret' — reflects Jesus's concern that the title 'Christ' carried political and military expectations he did not intend to fulfill. The immediately following passion prediction (v. 21) redefines what messiahship means.
- 21. The phrase apo tote ('from that time') marks a major structural transition in Matthew (cf. 4:17). The verb dei ('it is necessary, must') indicates divine necessity, not mere fate — this is God's plan. The triad 'elders, chief priests, and scribes' represents the three components of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council. The passive egerthenai ('be raised') implies God as the agent of resurrection. This is the first of three passion predictions (16:21, 17:22-23, 20:17-19), each becoming progressively more detailed.
- 22. The verb proslabomenos ('took aside, drew to himself') suggests Peter pulled Jesus aside privately. The audacity of a disciple rebuking (epitiman) his teacher is remarkable. The phrase hileos soi is an idiomatic expression meaning 'may God be merciful to you' or 'God forbid' — a strong rejection of what Jesus has just said. Peter's confession of Jesus as Messiah (v. 16) has not yet accommodated a suffering Messiah.
- 23. The address 'Satan' (Satana) does not identify Peter as literally the devil but recognizes that Peter's words echo the tempter's offer of glory without suffering (4:8-10). The word skandalon ('stumbling block, snare, offense') means something that causes someone to fall — Peter, who was just called the rock of the church, is now called a stumbling stone. The verb phroneis ('you are thinking, you are minded') indicates that Peter's entire orientation is wrong — he is operating from a human framework, not a divine one.
- 24. The three imperatives — deny (aparnesastho), take up (arato), and follow (akoloutheito) — form a sequence of escalating commitment. 'Deny himself' (aparnesastho heautou) means to renounce one's own claims, rights, and self-interest. The cross (stauros) was an instrument of Roman execution — for Jesus's original audience, this was not a metaphor for mild inconvenience but for lethal suffering and public shame. The present imperative akoloutheito ('keep following') indicates continuous, ongoing discipleship.
- 25. The word psyche means both 'life' and 'soul' — the ambiguity is intentional. On one level, clinging to physical survival leads to spiritual death; on another, grasping at self-preservation in any form leads to ultimate loss. The paradox is sharpened by the phrase 'for my sake' (heneken emou) — Jesus makes himself the criterion that determines whether loss becomes gain.
- 26. Here psyche is rendered 'soul' rather than 'life' because the context shifts to eternal valuation — what is the self ultimately worth? The verb zemiothee ('to suffer loss, to forfeit') is a commercial term: it frames the soul as an asset that can be lost in a transaction. The word antallagma ('exchange price, ransom') asks what could possibly serve as currency to buy back a forfeited soul. The answer is: nothing. The whole world is insufficient.
- 27. The Son of Man who has just predicted his suffering and death now claims future glory, angelic retinue, and judicial authority. The phrase 'in the glory of his Father' (en tee doxe tou patros autou) claims a share in the Father's own divine splendor. The language of repaying 'according to their deeds' (kata teen praxin autou) echoes Psalm 62:12 and Proverbs 24:12. The combination of suffering-then-glory is the pattern Jesus has been establishing since verse 21.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 62:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Proverbs 24:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. The solemn amen lego hymin ('truly I tell you') introduces a saying that has challenged interpreters for centuries. 'Taste death' (geusontai thanatou) is a Semitic idiom for experiencing death. What event Jesus refers to is debated: the Transfiguration (which immediately follows in chapter 17), the resurrection, Pentecost, the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70, or the ongoing expansion of God's kingdom. The placement immediately before the Transfiguration narrative suggests Matthew understood at least a partial fulfillment in that event.

Summary: Matthew 17 opens with the Transfiguration, where Jesus takes Peter, James, and John up a high mountain and is transformed before them — his face shining like the sun, his clothes becoming brilliant white. Moses and Elijah appear alongside him, and a voice from the cloud declares, 'This is my beloved Son; listen to him.' After descending, Jesus heals a demon-possessed boy the disciples could not cure, rebuking their lack of faith. He makes his second passion prediction, and the chapter closes with the unusual incident of the temple tax, where Jesus instructs Peter to find a coin in a fish's mouth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Transfiguration is the most overtly theophanic scene in the Synoptic Gospels. Every element is loaded with Old Testament resonance: the high mountain (Sinai), the bright cloud (the shekinah glory), the voice from the cloud (the divine voice at Sinai), Moses (the law), and Elijah (the prophets). The scene reveals Jesus's true nature momentarily unveiled — what the disciples glimpse on the mountain is the glory that was hidden beneath the ordinary human appearance. Peter's offer to build three tabernacles (skenas) evokes the Feast of Tabernacles and the desire to prolong the experience of divine presence. The command 'Listen to him' echoes Deuteronomy 18:15, the promise of the prophet like Moses.

Translation Friction: The identity of the 'high mountain' is unspecified — traditionally Mount Tabor, but Mount Hermon (near Caesarea Philippi) is geographically more likely given the preceding narrative. The phrase 'if you have faith as small as a mustard seed' (v. 20) appears in some manuscripts but is bracketed or absent in others; we follow the SBLGNT. Verse 21 is absent from the earliest manuscripts and is not included in the SBLGNT. The temple tax episode (vv. 24-27) raises questions about Jesus's relationship to the temple establishment and whether the miracle actually occurred — Matthew narrates the instruction but not the execution.

Connections: The Transfiguration connects to Exodus 24:15-18 and 34:29-35 (Moses on Sinai, his face shining), 1 Kings 19:8-18 (Elijah on Horeb), and Daniel 7:9 (the Ancient of Days with white garments). The divine voice combines Psalm 2:7, Isaiah 42:1, and Deuteronomy 18:15. The failed exorcism connects to the disciples' authority given in 10:1. The second passion prediction advances the pattern from 16:21. The temple tax discussion connects to Exodus 30:11-16 (the half-shekel tax for the tabernacle).

¹After six days, Jesus took Peter, James, and John his brother and led them up a high mountain by themselves. ²He was transfigured before them. His face shone like the sun, and his clothes became white as light. ³And there appeared to them Moses and Elijah, talking with him. ⁴Peter responded and said to Jesus, "Lord, it is good for us to be here. If you wish, I will make three shelters here — one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elijah." ⁵While he was still speaking, a bright cloud overshadowed them, and a voice from the cloud said, "This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well pleased. Listen to him!" ⁶When the disciples heard this, they fell facedown and were terrified. ⁷Jesus came and touched them, saying, "Get up, and do not be afraid." ⁸When they looked up, they saw no one except Jesus himself, alone. ⁹As they were coming down the mountain, Jesus commanded them, "Tell no one about the vision until the Son of Man has been raised from the dead." ¹⁰The disciples asked him, "Why then do the scribes say that Elijah must come first?" ¹¹He answered, "Elijah is indeed coming and will restore all things. ¹²But I tell you that Elijah has already come, and they did not recognize him but did to him whatever they pleased. In the same way, the Son of Man is also going to suffer at their hands." ¹³Then the disciples understood that he was speaking to them about John the Baptist. ¹⁴When they came to the crowd, a man came up to him, kneeling before him ¹⁵Indeed, declaring, Lord, have mercy on my son — since he is lunatick, and sore vexed: for oftentimes he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water. ¹⁶I brought him to your disciples, but they could not heal him." ¹⁷Jesus answered, "O faithless and twisted generation, how long will I be with you? How long must I put up with you? Bring him here to me." ¹⁸Jesus rebuked the demon, and it came out of him, and the boy was healed from that moment. ¹⁹Then the disciples came to Jesus privately and asked, "Why could we not cast it out?" ²⁰He said to them, "Because of your little faith. For truly I tell you, if you have faith as small as a mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move, and nothing will be impossible for you." ²²While they were gathering together in Galilee, Jesus said to them, "The Son of Man is going to be delivered into the hands of people, ²³They will kill him, and the third day he will be raised again. Then they were exceedingly sorry. ²⁴When they came to Capernaum, the collectors of the two-drachma tax came to Peter and said, "Does your teacher not pay the temple tax?" ²⁵He said, "Yes." When he came into the house, Jesus spoke to him first, saying, "What do you think, Simon? From whom do the kings of the earth collect tolls or taxes — from their own sons or from others?" ²⁶When he said, "From others," Jesus said to him, "Then the sons are free. ²⁷But so that we do not cause them to stumble, go to the sea, cast a hook, and take the first fish that comes up. When you open its mouth, you will find a four-drachma coin. Take that and give it to them for me and for you."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The 'six days' may echo Exodus 24:16, where the cloud covered Mount Sinai for six days before God spoke to Moses on the seventh. Peter, James, and John form an inner circle who witness events hidden from the other disciples (cf. the raising of Jairus's daughter, Mark 5:37, and the agony in Gethsemane, 26:37). The phrase kat' idian ('by themselves, privately') emphasizes the exclusive, revelatory nature of the experience.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 24:16. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The verb metemorphothe ('was transfigured, was transformed') describes a change of form (morphe), not merely appearance. The passive voice implies divine agency — God transforms Jesus. The shining face echoes Moses descending from Sinai with radiant skin (Exodus 34:29-35), but here the glory is Jesus's own, not reflected. The similes — face like the sun, clothes like light — push human language to its limits describing divine splendor.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 34:29-35. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. Moses represents the Torah (the Law) and Elijah represents the Prophets — together they embody the entirety of Old Testament revelation. Both experienced theophanies on mountains (Sinai/Horeb). Both had unusual departures from earthly life (Moses's hidden burial, Deuteronomy 34:5-6; Elijah's ascent in a chariot of fire, 2 Kings 2:11). The verb syllalountes ('conversing with') indicates an active exchange, not mere presence. Luke 9:31 specifies they discussed Jesus's 'departure' (exodus) in Jerusalem.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 34:5-6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Kings 2:11 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The word skenas ('tents, shelters, tabernacles') evokes the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot), when Israel dwelt in temporary shelters commemorating the wilderness wandering and God's presence among them. Peter's instinct to build three shelters may reflect a desire to prolong the moment of divine encounter, or an attempt to honor all three figures equally — a misunderstanding the divine voice will correct. Matthew's 'if you wish' (ei theleis) is more deferential than Mark's account, which notes Peter did not know what to say (Mark 9:6).
5. The bright cloud (nephele photeina) is the shekinah — the visible manifestation of God's presence that led Israel through the wilderness (Exodus 13:21-22) and filled the tabernacle and temple (Exodus 40:34-35, 1 Kings 8:10-11). The verb epeskiasen ('overshadowed') is the same word used of the Spirit overshadowing Mary in Luke 1:35. The divine voice repeats the baptismal declaration (3:17) with the crucial addition akouete autou ('listen to him'), echoing Deuteronomy 18:15 — the promise that God would raise up a prophet like Moses whom the people must heed. This command elevates Jesus above Moses and Elijah.

6. Falling facedown (epesan epi prosopon auton) is the standard Old Testament response to a theophany — encountering the unmediated presence of God (cf. Genesis 17:3, Ezekiel 1:28, Daniel 8:17). The adverb sphodra ('extremely, greatly') intensifies their fear. This is not reverent awe but overwhelming terror in the presence of the divine.

6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Ezekiel 1:28. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Daniel 8:17. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The physical touch (hapsamenos auton) bridges the gap between divine encounter and human comfort. The command 'do not be afraid' (me phobeisthe) echoes the angelic reassurance given throughout Scripture when humans encounter the divine (Genesis 15:1, Daniel 10:12, Luke 1:30). Jesus mediates between the overwhelming divine presence and his terrified friends.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 15:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 10:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The phrase 'Jesus himself, alone' (auton Iesoun monon) is theologically precise — Moses and Elijah have departed, and only Jesus remains. The Law and the Prophets have borne their witness and yielded the stage to the one they pointed toward. The disciples' gaze is redirected to Jesus alone, fulfilling the command 'Listen to him.'
9. The word horama ('vision') is Matthew's term for what they witnessed — it classifies the Transfiguration as a revelatory experience. The command to silence is tied to the resurrection: only after the cross and empty tomb will the Transfiguration be properly understood. Before the resurrection, glory without suffering would feed exactly the wrong kind of messianic expectation.
10. The disciples' question arises naturally from what they have just seen: if Elijah has appeared on the mountain, what about the scribal teaching (based on Malachi 4:5) that Elijah must return before the messianic age? The word proton ('first') reflects the expectation that Elijah's return would precede and prepare for the Messiah's arrival.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Malachi 4:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. Jesus affirms the scribal expectation: Elijah will come and 'restore all things' (apokatastisei panta). The verb apokathistemi ('to restore, to reestablish') implies returning something to its original state. In the Malachi context, Elijah's mission is to turn the hearts of fathers to children and children to fathers before the great day of the LORD.
12. Jesus identifies John the Baptist as the Elijah who was to come — a typological, not literal, fulfillment. The phrase 'they did not recognize him' (ouk epegnosan auton) parallels Israel's historic failure to recognize its prophets. The ominous parallel 'in the same way the Son of Man is also going to suffer' links John's fate (beheading by Herod, 14:1-12) to Jesus's approaching passion. The pattern is clear: Israel rejects its prophets, and it will reject its Messiah.
13. Matthew, characteristically, resolves the disciples' confusion (cf. 16:12). The verb synekan ('they understood') indicates genuine comprehension. The identification of John with Elijah is not reincarnation but prophetic typology — John came 'in the spirit and power of Elijah' (Luke 1:17).
14. The descent from the mountain to the crowd creates a sharp narrative contrast — from divine glory to human suffering. The participle gonypeton ('kneeling') indicates a posture of urgent supplication. The scene parallels the descent of Moses from Sinai to find Israel's failure below (Exodus 32).
15. The verb seleniazetai (literally 'is moon-struck') was associated with epileptic-like seizures, believed in the ancient world to be influenced by the moon. We render it 'has seizures' since modern English 'lunatic' carries different connotations. Matthew retains both the medical description (seizures) and the spiritual diagnosis (demon-possession, v. 18), without reducing one to the other. The dangerous symptoms — falling into fire and water — indicate the severity and life-threatening nature of the condition.
16. The disciples' failure is significant because Jesus had explicitly given them authority over unclean spirits (10:1). The verb edyneethesan ('they were able') with the negation ouk indicates inability, not unwillingness. The father's turning from the disciples to Jesus underscores the gap between delegated authority and its source.
17. The exclamation echoes Moses's frustration with Israel in the wilderness (Deuteronomy 32:5, 20). The adjective diastrammene ('twisted, perverted, distorted') describes a generation that has bent away from its proper orientation toward God. The double 'how long' (heos pote) expresses both exhaustion and anticipation of departure. The rebuke is directed broadly — at the disciples, the crowd, the entire generation — not just the father.
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 32:5. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. The verb epetimesen ('rebuked') is a word of authoritative command, the same term used for rebuking the wind and sea (8:26). The healing is instantaneous — 'from that very hour' (apo tes horas ekeines) — and requires no ritual, no incantation, only Jesus's word of command. The contrast with the disciples' failure is total.

19. The private setting (kat' idian) suggests the disciples are embarrassed by their public failure. Their question is honest: they had been given authority (10:1) and had exercised it successfully (cf. Luke 10:17), so what went wrong? The answer in the next verse will locate the problem in their faith, not their authority.
20. The word oligopistian ('littleness of faith') is the noun form of the adjective oligopistos used throughout Matthew. The mustard seed was proverbially the smallest seed in Palestinian agriculture. The paradox is deliberate: their faith does not need to be large — even the smallest genuine faith can accomplish the impossible. 'This mountain' (to orei touto) may gesture toward the mountain they have just descended, or may simply be a proverbial expression for any insurmountable obstacle.
21. Verse 21 is absent from the earliest and most reliable Greek manuscripts, including Sinaiticus and Vaticanus, and is not included in the SBLGNT critical text. It appears to have been added from Mark 9:29 in later manuscripts. The KJV includes it because it follows the Textus Receptus tradition. We omit it following the SBLGNT.
22. The verb systrefomenon ('gathering, assembling') suggests the disciples came together, possibly after dispersal. The verb paradidosthai ('to be delivered, to be handed over, to be betrayed') is a key passion term — the same word used for Judas's betrayal (26:15-16) and for God 'handing over' Jesus (Romans 8:32). The wordplay between 'Son of Man' (huios tou anthropou) and 'hands of people' (cheiras anthropou) creates a bitter irony: the quintessential human will be killed by humans.
23. This second passion prediction (cf. 16:21) is briefer and more blunt than the first — no specification of who will kill him, just the stark 'they will kill him.' The passive 'will be raised' (egertheesetai) again implies God as agent. The disciples' response — deep grief (elypeethesan sphodra) rather than Peter's rebuke of 16:22 — suggests they are beginning to accept what Jesus is saying, even if they do not fully understand it.
24. The didrachma was a two-drachma coin equivalent to the half-shekel temple tax required annually of every Jewish male aged twenty and above (Exodus 30:11-16). The tax supported the daily operations of the Jerusalem temple. The collectors' question implies uncertainty about whether Jesus would comply — his stance toward the temple was already controversial.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 30:11-16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. Peter answers affirmatively without consulting Jesus. The verb proephthasen ('anticipated, spoke first') indicates Jesus raised the topic before Peter could report the conversation, displaying supernatural awareness. The analogy is straightforward: kings tax their subjects, not their own family. The implication — that Jesus as God's Son is exempt from a tax paid to God's temple — is a subtle Christological claim.
26. The conclusion is logical: if kings tax outsiders, not their children, then the Son of God is exempt from the tax levied for God's house. The adjective eleutheroi ('free, exempt') carries both legal (exempt from tax) and theological (free as sons) force. This is one of the subtlest Christological declarations in Matthew — Jesus claims the status of God's Son through an analogy rather than a direct statement.
27. Despite being exempt, Jesus pays the tax 'so that we do not cause them to stumble' (hina me skandalisomen autous) — the same concern for others' conscience that Paul will later develop (Romans 14, 1 Corinthians 8). The stater (stateera) was a four-drachma coin — exactly enough for two persons' temple tax. The miraculous provision of the coin in the fish's mouth is unique to Matthew and has no parallel elsewhere in the Gospels. Notably, Matthew does not narrate the execution of the miracle — only the instruction. Peter's inclusion ('for me and for you') underscores his special role as Jesus's representative.

Summary: Matthew 18 is the fourth major discourse in Matthew's Gospel, focused on relationships within the community of disciples. It opens with the question 'Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' and Jesus's answer: a child. The chapter addresses the seriousness of causing others to stumble, the parable of the lost sheep, procedures for resolving conflict within the community, the authority of binding and loosing given to the assembled church, the promise of Jesus's presence wherever two or three gather, and Peter's question about the limits of forgiveness. The discourse climaxes with the parable of the unforgiving servant, whose enormous debt is forgiven by his master only for him to refuse mercy to a fellow servant who owes him a trivial sum.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains Matthew's only other use of ekklesia ('church,' also in 16:18), here referring not to a universal institution but to a local assembly with authority to adjudicate disputes. The forgiveness teaching is radical — Peter's suggestion of 'seven times' already exceeds normal rabbinic expectations, but Jesus's 'seventy-seven times' (or 'seventy times seven') demolishes all counting. The parable of the unforgiving servant makes the theological logic explicit: those who have received immeasurable forgiveness from God are obligated to extend proportional forgiveness to others. The chapter's movement from the greatness of children to the mechanics of community discipline to unlimited forgiveness creates a coherent vision of kingdom community.

Translation Friction: The 'stumbling block' passage (vv. 6-9) uses hyperbolic language about millstones, cutting off hands, and plucking out eyes that must be read as deliberate exaggeration for rhetorical force, not literal instruction. The church discipline procedure (vv. 15-17) ending in treating someone 'as a Gentile and a tax collector' is ironic in a Gospel where Jesus befriends precisely those people. The debt figures in the parable are deliberately extreme — ten thousand talents is an astronomically impossible sum, making the contrast with one hundred denarii all the more devastating.

Connections: The child as model of greatness inverts the disciples' question and connects to 19:13-15. The lost sheep parable parallels Luke 15:3-7 but is applied differently — in Luke it is about seeking sinners, in Matthew about caring for vulnerable community members. The binding and loosing authority (v. 18) extends what was given to Peter in 16:19 to the whole community. 'Seventy-seven times' (v. 22) may echo Genesis 4:24, where Lamech boasts of seventy-sevenfold vengeance — Jesus inverts the principle from vengeance to forgiveness. The unforgiving servant parable connects to the Lord's Prayer petition 'forgive us our debts as we also have forgiven our debtors' (6:12).

¹At that time the disciples came to Jesus and asked, "Who then is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?" ²He called a child over and placed him in the middle of them ³Said, truly I tell you, Except you be converted, and become as little children, you will not enter into heaven's kingdom. ⁴Whoever humbles himself like this child is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. ⁵And whoever welcomes one such child in my name welcomes me. ⁶But whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to stumble — it would be better for that person to have a large millstone hung around his neck and to be drowned in the open sea. ⁷Woe to the world because of stumbling blocks! It is inevitable that stumbling blocks will come, but woe to the person through whom the stumbling block comes. ⁸If your hand or your foot causes you to stumble, cut it off and throw it away. It is better for you to enter life crippled or lame than to have two hands or two feet and be thrown into the eternal fire. ⁹And if your eye causes you to stumble, tear it out and throw it away. It is better for you to enter life with one eye than to have two eyes and be thrown into the fire of Gehenna. ¹⁰"See that you do not despise one of these little ones. For I tell you that in heaven their angels continually see the face of my Father who is in heaven. ¹²What do you think? If a man has a hundred sheep and one of them wanders off, will he not leave the ninety-nine on the hills and go search for the one that wandered away? ¹³And if he finds it, truly I tell you, he rejoices over it more than over the ninety-nine that did not wander off. ¹⁴In the same way, it is not the will of your Father in heaven that one of these little ones should be lost. ¹⁵"If your brother sins against you, go and point out the fault to him privately, between you and him alone. If he listens to you, you have won your brother back. ¹⁶But if he does not listen, take one or two others with you, so that every matter may be confirmed by the testimony of two or three witnesses. ¹⁷If he refuses to listen to them, tell it to the church. And if he refuses to listen even to the church, let him be to you as a Gentile and a tax collector. ¹⁸Truly I tell you, whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven. ¹⁹Again, truly I tell you, if two of you agree on earth about anything they ask, it will be done for them by my Father in heaven. ²⁰For where two or three are gathered in my name, there I am among them." ²¹Then Peter came up and said to him, "Lord, how many times will my brother sin against me and I forgive him? Up to seven times?" ²²Jesus said to him, "I do not say to you seven times, but seventy-seven times. ²³"For this reason the kingdom of heaven may be compared to a king who wanted to settle accounts with his servants. ²⁴When he began to settle them, one was brought to him who owed ten thousand talents. ²⁵Since he could not repay, his master ordered him to be sold, along with his wife and children and everything he had, in order to make payment. ²⁶So the servant fell down and prostrated himself before him, saying, 'Be patient with me, and I will repay you everything.' ²⁷Moved with compassion, the master of that servant released him and forgave him the loan. ²⁸But when that servant went out, he found one of his fellow servants who owed him a hundred denarii. He seized him and began to choke him, saying, 'Pay back what you owe!' ²⁹So his fellow servant fell down and pleaded with him, 'Be patient with me, and I will repay you.' ³⁰But he refused and went and threw him into prison until he should pay back what was owed. ³¹When his fellow servants saw what had happened, they were deeply distressed and went and reported to their master everything that had taken place. ³²Then his master summoned him and said to him, 'You wicked servant! I forgave you all that debt because you pleaded with me. ³³Should you not also have had mercy on your fellow servant, as I had mercy on you?' ³⁴And in anger his master handed him over to the jailers to be tortured until he should repay all that was owed. ³⁵So also my heavenly Father will do to every one of you, if you do not forgive your brother from your heart."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The question about rank (tis ara meizon, 'who then is greatest') reveals the disciples' persistent misunderstanding of kingdom values. The particle ara ('then') connects this to the preceding events — perhaps Peter's special role in chapter 16 or the inner circle's experience on the mountain in chapter 17 has provoked a status competition. This question provides the occasion for the entire discourse.
2. The word paidion ('child, little child') refers to a young child, not an infant. Jesus uses a visual object lesson — the child stands before the disciples as a living illustration. In the ancient world, children had no social status, no legal standing, and no claim to honor. Setting a child in the center of a discussion about greatness is a deliberate inversion.
3. The verb straphete ('turn, turn around') implies a fundamental reorientation — not merely adding humility to existing ambition but reversing direction entirely. The double negative ou me ('never, absolutely not') is the strongest negation possible in Greek. Jesus does not answer the question 'Who is the greatest?' but instead challenges the premise: without becoming like children, they will not even enter the kingdom, let alone rank within it.
4. The verb tapeinosei ('will humble') is active, not passive — it requires deliberate self-lowering. The child models not innocence or simplicity (neither is the point) but lack of status. The child has no accomplishments, no rank, no claim. Whoever voluntarily occupies that position — expecting nothing, claiming nothing — is, paradoxically, the greatest.
5. The verb dexetai ('welcomes, receives') means to accept someone into one's care and fellowship. The phrase 'in my name' (epi to onomati mou) means on the basis of allegiance to Jesus. Jesus identifies himself with the lowest-status members of the community — to welcome a child (or anyone without social power) is to welcome Christ himself. This principle is expanded in 25:31-46.
6. The 'little ones' (ton mikron touton) shifts from literal children to vulnerable believers within the community. The verb skandalise ('to cause to stumble, to lead into sin') is the same root as 'stumbling block' in 16:23. The mylos onikos ('donkey millstone') is the large stone turned by a donkey, as opposed to the smaller hand-mill — large enough to ensure drowning. The image is deliberately gruesome: causing a vulnerable believer to fall away from faith is worse than a violent death.
7. The exclamation ouai ('woe') is a prophetic warning of judgment, not merely an expression of sorrow. The word ananke ('necessity, inevitability') acknowledges that in a fallen world, stumbling blocks are unavoidable — but this inevitability does not excuse the individual who serves as the instrument of harm. The tension between divine sovereignty (it must happen) and human responsibility (woe to the person) is maintained without resolution.
8. This saying parallels 5:29-30 but extends from eye and hand to include the foot. The language is hyperbolic — Jesus is not commanding literal self-mutilation but emphasizing the radical seriousness of anything that leads to sin. 'Eternal fire' (to pyr to aionion) uses aionios, which corresponds to the Hebrew olam — a duration whose end is beyond sight. The contrast between 'life' (zoe) and 'eternal fire' frames the ultimate stakes.
9. Here Matthew uses geenna ('Gehenna') rather than 'eternal fire' — Gehenna refers to the Valley of Hinnom (ge-hinnom) south of Jerusalem, associated with child sacrifice (2 Kings 23:10, Jeremiah 7:31) and later with divine judgment. By Jesus's time it had become a metaphor for the place of final punishment. We preserve 'Gehenna' rather than using 'hell,' which carries accumulated English connotations beyond the original term.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Kings 23:10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Jeremiah 7:31. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The verb kataphronesete ('despise, look down on') literally means to 'think down upon' — to regard as insignificant. The reference to 'their angels' (hoi angeloi auton) is the clearest New Testament basis for the concept of guardian angels. The phrase 'continually see the face of my Father' (dia pantos blepousin to prosopon tou patros mou) indicates these angels have direct, uninterrupted access to God — the highest court privilege, reserved for those with immediate access to the king. The little ones have powerful advocates.
11. Verse 11 is absent from the earliest manuscripts (Sinaiticus, Vaticanus) and is not included in the SBLGNT critical text. It appears to have been imported from Luke 19:10 by later scribes. We omit it following the SBLGNT.
12. The opening question 'What do you think?' (ti hymin dokei) draws the audience into the parable as participants. The verb planetee ('wanders off, goes astray') can refer to both physical wandering and spiritual error (the English 'planet' derives from the same root — 'wanderer'). Unlike Luke's version (15:3-7), which addresses Pharisees about seeking sinners, Matthew's context applies the parable to the care of vulnerable community members ('these little ones').
13. The conditional 'if he finds it' (ean genetai heurein auto) introduces a note of realism — finding is not guaranteed. But the joy when it happens is disproportionate to the arithmetic: one sheep out of a hundred. This disproportion reveals the heart of God toward the vulnerable and lost. The solemn 'truly I tell you' (amen lego hymin) elevates the parable's conclusion to authoritative teaching.
14. The phrase 'the will of your Father' (thelema emprosthen tou patros hymon) uses the Semitic idiom 'will before' — literally 'it is not will before your Father,' meaning 'it is not your Father's desire.' The verb apoletai ('be lost, perish, be destroyed') carries both temporal (wandering from the community) and eternal (final destruction) connotations. The application is clear: the community must pursue its wandering members because God does not want any of them lost.

15. The phrase 'against you' (eis se) is in brackets in the SBLGNT, indicating textual uncertainty — some manuscripts omit it, making the passage about any sin rather than personal offense. The verb elegxon ('point out, reprove, convict') implies direct, honest confrontation — not gossip, not avoidance, not public shaming. The verb ekerdesas ('you have won, gained') treats the restoration of the relationship as a profit or gain. The procedure begins with the smallest possible circle: one on one.
16. The escalation from private to semi-private follows the legal principle of Deuteronomy 19:15, where two or three witnesses are required to establish a charge. The phrase epi stomatos ('by the mouth of') is a Septuagint quotation. The witnesses serve a dual purpose: to verify the original confrontation was fair and to add weight to the appeal for repentance.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 19:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The verb parakouse ('refuses to listen, disregards') is stronger than mere failure to hear — it implies deliberate rejection. This is the only use of ekklesia ('church, assembly') in the Gospels outside of 16:18. The final status — 'as a Gentile and a tax collector' (hosper ho ethnikos kai ho telones) — places the unrepentant person outside the covenant community. The irony is profound: in Matthew's Gospel, Jesus is known precisely for welcoming Gentiles and tax collectors (9:10-11, 15:21-28). This may imply not permanent rejection but a new starting point — they become objects of mission rather than members of the community.
18. This repeats the binding and loosing authority given to Peter in 16:19 but now extends it to the community as a whole (the verbs are second person plural). In rabbinic usage, 'binding' (deo) meant declaring something forbidden, and 'loosing' (lyo) meant declaring it permitted. The periphrastic future perfect (estai dedemena, 'will have been bound') may indicate that the community's decisions ratify what heaven has already determined. The community acts with divine backing, not ahead of it.
19. The verb symphonesousin ('agree, harmonize') is the root of 'symphony' — it implies not mere verbal agreement but genuine harmony of purpose. In context, this refers to the community's prayers in connection with the discipline process just described, not a blank check for any request. The word pragmatos ('matter, thing, case') has legal overtones, supporting the judicial context.
20. This promise echoes the Jewish rabbinic saying that when two or three study Torah together, the Shekinah (divine presence) is among them. Jesus replaces Torah with himself ('in my name,' eis to emon onoma) as the gathering point that guarantees divine presence. The phrase 'there I am' (ekei eimi) may echo the divine self-disclosure formula of the Old Testament. In context, this assures the community that their discipline decisions are made in Jesus's presence, not by human authority alone.
21. Peter's suggestion of seven times is already generous — some rabbinic traditions limited the obligation to forgive the same person to three times (based on Amos 1:3, 'for three transgressions'). Peter doubles it and adds one for good measure. The number seven also carries symbolic weight as the number of completeness. Peter assumes forgiveness must have a reasonable upper limit.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Amos 1:3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. The Greek hebdomekontakis hepta is ambiguous — it can mean either 'seventy-seven times' or 'seventy times seven' (490). Either way, the point is the same: Jesus is not setting a higher limit but abolishing limits altogether. The number may deliberately invert Genesis 4:24, where Lamech boasts of seventy-sevenfold vengeance. Where Lamech's vengeance was boundless, Jesus's forgiveness must be equally boundless.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 4:24. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. The introductory formula homoiothe he basileia ton ouranon ('the kingdom of heaven may be compared to') introduces one of Matthew's most powerful parables. The phrase synarai logon ('settle accounts, take a reckoning') is a financial term — the king is auditing his servants' management of royal funds. The 'servants' (douloi) in a royal context are high-ranking officials entrusted with significant resources.
24. Ten thousand talents (myrion talanton) is a deliberately absurd sum. A talent was the largest unit of currency, and ten thousand (myrioi) was the largest named number in Greek. The total would be roughly equivalent to 200,000 years of a laborer's wages — an unpayable debt, the entire annual tax revenue of a major province several times over. The exaggeration is the point: this is how large human sin-debt is before God.
25. The sale of a debtor and his family into slavery was legally practiced in the ancient Near East (cf. 2 Kings 4:1, Nehemiah 5:5). Even this drastic measure would raise only a tiny fraction of ten thousand talents — the gesture is more punitive than practical. The inclusion of 'wife and children and everything he had' underscores the totality of the ruin.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Kings 4:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Nehemiah 5:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. The verb prosekynei ('prostrated himself, worshipped') indicates complete submission. The verb makrothymeson ('be patient, be long-suffering') literally means 'be long-tempered' — the opposite of short-tempered. The servant's promise to 'repay everything' (panta apodoso soi) is transparently absurd given the size of the debt — but desperation makes impossible promises. The irony is that the master does something far better than patience: he forgives the debt entirely.

27. The verb splanchnistheis ('moved with compassion') is the same visceral term used of Jesus in 15:32 — gut-level mercy. The verb apheeken ('forgave, released, let go') is the standard term for forgiveness in the New Testament. The master does not merely defer payment or reduce the amount — he cancels the entire astronomical debt. This is the parable's image of God's forgiveness: total, unmerited, beyond all reasonable expectation.
28. The contrast is devastating. A hundred denarii was about four months' wages for a day laborer — a real debt, but roughly one six-hundred-thousandth of ten thousand talents. The physical violence (kratesas auton epnigen, 'seized him and began to choke him') is shocking after the mercy just received. The verb pnigo ('to choke, to strangle') is graphic. The demand 'Pay back what you owe' (apodos ei ti opheileis) uses the same language the servant used in his own plea (v. 26) — he has learned nothing from his own experience of mercy.
29. The fellow servant's plea is virtually identical to the first servant's plea in verse 26 — the same posture (falling down), the same words (makrothymeson, 'be patient'), the same promise to repay. The parallel is deliberately precise so that the first servant's refusal in the next verse is maximally damning. The difference is that this promise is actually keepable — a hundred denarii could be repaid.
30. The blunt 'he refused' (ouk eethelen, literally 'he was not willing') stands in stark contrast to the master's compassion. Imprisonment for debt was common in the ancient world, though it paradoxically made repayment harder since the prisoner could not earn. The verb ebalen ('threw') conveys harsh treatment.
31. The fellow servants' distress (elypethesan sphodra) and their report to the master serve as witnesses within the parable. The verb diesaphesan ('reported clearly, explained in detail') implies they gave a thorough account. The community of servants functions as a moral check — they recognize the injustice and bring it to the authority who can act.
32. The address doule ponere ('wicked servant') is a judgment — the servant's wickedness is not the original debt but his refusal to extend the mercy he received. The master's words make the logic explicit: 'I forgave you... because you pleaded' — the forgiveness was real, complete, and generous. What follows reveals the condition that was always implicit.
33. The verb edei ('it was necessary, you ought to have') expresses moral obligation — receiving mercy creates the duty to show mercy. The verb eleesai ('to show mercy, to have compassion') echoes the prayer of 'Lord, have mercy' (kyrie, eleeson) that runs through the Gospel. The question is rhetorical: the answer is obvious, and the servant's failure is inexcusable.
34. The verb paredoken ('handed over') is the same verb used for Jesus being 'handed over' to death (17:22, 26:15). The basanistais ('torturers, jailers who torture') indicates not merely imprisonment but active punishment. Since the debt of ten thousand talents can never be repaid, the punishment is effectively permanent. The parable's ending is deliberately harsh — unforgiveness brings devastating consequences.
35. The application is direct and severe: 'my heavenly Father will do the same to you.' The qualifier 'from your heart' (apo ton kardion hymon) rules out mere formal or verbal forgiveness — the forgiveness must be genuine, internal, and complete. This connects to 6:14-15 (the Lord's Prayer commentary) and 5:23-24 (reconciliation before worship). The entire discourse that began with a question about greatness ends with a warning about the necessity of heartfelt forgiveness.

Summary: Matthew 19 marks Jesus's departure from Galilee toward Judea and his final journey to Jerusalem. The chapter addresses marriage, divorce, and celibacy in response to Pharisaic testing; Jesus blesses children who are brought to him; and a rich young man asks what he must do to inherit eternal life, only to depart in sorrow when told to sell everything. Jesus's declaration that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the kingdom provokes the disciples' astonished question, 'Who then can be saved?' The chapter closes with Peter's question about the disciples' reward and Jesus's promise of the twelve thrones and the hundredfold return.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Jesus's teaching on divorce is one of his most direct engagements with Mosaic law. He distinguishes between what Moses permitted (divorce certificate, Deuteronomy 24:1) and what God intended from the beginning (permanent one-flesh union, Genesis 1:27, 2:24). The 'exception clause' (porneia, v. 9) is unique to Matthew and has generated centuries of interpretation. The rich young man episode reveals the radical economic demands of discipleship — the man is not condemned for immorality but for attachment to wealth. The disciples' shock ('Who then can be saved?') shows that wealth was commonly understood as a sign of divine favor, making Jesus's teaching genuinely disorienting.*

Translation Friction: *The exception clause 'except for sexual immorality' (me epi porneia) in verse 9 is unique to Matthew (absent from Mark 10:11, Luke 16:18). The meaning of porneia is debated — it could refer to adultery, incest, premarital unfaithfulness during betrothal, or sexual immorality broadly. We render the Greek term and note the debate. The disciples' reaction in verse 10 ('it is better not to marry') suggests they found*

Jesus's teaching restrictive. Jesus's response about 'eunuchs for the kingdom' (v. 12) is unusual language that has been interpreted variously. The 'eye of a needle' saying (v. 24) is clearly hyperbolic; attempts to identify it as a small gate in Jerusalem are medieval inventions without ancient support.

Connections: The divorce teaching connects to Genesis 1:27 and 2:24 (creation ordinance), Deuteronomy 24:1-4 (Mosaic concession), and Malachi 2:13-16 ('God hates divorce'). The blessing of children connects back to 18:1-5. The rich young man's question echoes Deuteronomy 30:15-20 (choose life). Jesus's promise of twelve thrones (v. 28) connects to Daniel 7:9 (thrones set up) and Luke 22:28-30. The 'regeneration' (palingenesia, v. 28) is a term used in Stoic philosophy for cosmic renewal and here refers to the eschatological new creation.

¹When Jesus had finished these words, he left Galilee and went to the region of Judea beyond the Jordan. ²Large crowds followed him, and he healed them there. ³Some Pharisees came to him to test him and asked, "Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife for any reason?" ⁴He answered, "Have you not read that the one who created them from the beginning made them male and female, ⁵Stated, For this cause will a man leave Father and mother, and will cleave to his wife — then they twain will be one flesh? ⁶So they are no longer two but one flesh. Therefore what God has joined together, let no person separate." ⁷They said to him, "Why then did Moses command a certificate of divorce to be given, and to send her away?" ⁸He said to them, "Moses permitted you to divorce your wives because of your hardness of heart, but from the beginning it was not this way. ⁹I tell you that whoever divorces his wife, except for sexual immorality, and marries another woman commits adultery." ¹⁰The disciples said to him, "If such is the case of a man with his wife, it is better not to marry." ¹¹He said to them, "Not everyone can accept this word, but only those to whom it has been given. ¹²For there are eunuchs who were born that way from their mother's womb, there are eunuchs who were made eunuchs by others, and there are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven. Let the one who is able to accept this accept it." ¹³Then children were brought to him so that he might lay his hands on them and pray. The disciples rebuked them. ¹⁴But Jesus said, "Let the children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these." ¹⁵After laying his hands on them, he went on from there. ¹⁶And someone came up to him and said, "Teacher, what good thing must I do to have eternal life?" ¹⁷He said to him, "Why do you ask me about what is good? There is only one who is good. But if you want to enter into life, keep the commandments." ¹⁸He said to him, "Which ones?" Jesus said, "You shall not murder, you shall not commit adultery, you shall not steal, you shall not bear false witness, ¹⁹Honour your Father and your mother — and, you shalt love your neighbour as thyself. ²⁰The young man said to him, "I have kept all these. What do I still lack?" ²¹Jesus said to him, "If you want to be complete, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me." ²²When the young man heard this, he went away grieving, for he had many possessions. ²³Jesus said to his disciples, "Truly I tell you, it will be hard for a rich person to enter the kingdom of heaven. ²⁴Again I tell you, it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the kingdom of God." ²⁵When the disciples heard this, they were utterly astonished and asked, "Who then can be saved?" ²⁶Jesus looked at them and said, "With people this is impossible, but with God all things are possible." ²⁷Then Peter answered him, "See, we have left everything and followed you. What then will there be for us?" ²⁸Jesus said to them, "Truly I tell you, in the renewal of all things, when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. ²⁹And everyone who has left houses or brothers or sisters or father or mother or children or fields for the sake of my name will receive a hundred times as much and will inherit eternal life. ³⁰But many who are first will be last, and the last first."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The formula 'when Jesus had finished these words' (hote etelesen ho Iesous tous logous toutous) marks the end of the fourth discourse (chapter 18), paralleling the formula at the end of each major discourse in Matthew (7:28, 11:1, 13:53, 19:1, 26:1). The phrase 'beyond the Jordan' (peran tou Iordanou) refers to Perea, the region east of the Jordan. This marks the beginning of Jesus's final journey toward Jerusalem.
2. The summary statement of healing serves as a transition, indicating that Jesus's ministry continues even as the narrative shifts geographically toward Jerusalem. The crowds' following (ekoloutheesan) uses the verb that regularly describes discipleship.
3. The participle peirazontes ('testing') marks hostile intent. The phrase kata pasan aitian ('for any reason') reflects the debate between the rabbinic schools of Hillel and Shammai. Hillel's school allowed divorce for virtually any cause (including a burnt meal); Shammai's school restricted it to sexual immorality. The Pharisees are asking Jesus to take a side in a live controversy.

4. The phrase 'have you not read' (ouk anegnote) is a pointed challenge to biblical scholars — of course they have read it, but they have not understood it. Jesus appeals past the Mosaic legislation to the creation narrative (Genesis 1:27), establishing God's original design as the authoritative standard. The phrase ap' arches ('from the beginning') grounds the argument in the creation order.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 1:27. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. Jesus now quotes Genesis 2:24. The verb kollethesetai ('will be joined, will be united, will cling to') is a strong term suggesting permanent adhesion. The phrase 'one flesh' (sarka mian) describes a union that creates a new entity — not merely a legal arrangement but an ontological change. The logic builds toward the conclusion in verse 6.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 2:24 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The verb synezeyxen ('joined together, yoked together') is a strong term — the same root as 'yoke' (zeugos). God himself is identified as the agent of the union, not merely the officiant. The prohibition 'let no person separate' (anthropos me chorizeto) places the onus on human beings: divorce is a human act that undoes what God has done. Jesus transcends the Hillel-Shammai debate by returning to creation theology.
7. The Pharisees cite Deuteronomy 24:1-4 as a counterargument. Note their verb: they say Moses 'commanded' (eneteilato) divorce. Jesus will correct this in verse 8 — Moses did not command divorce; he permitted it. The biblion apostasiou ('certificate of divorce, document of separation') was a legal document that freed the woman to remarry. The Pharisees treat the Mosaic provision as normative; Jesus will treat it as a concession.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 24:1-4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. Jesus makes two crucial corrections. First, Moses 'permitted' (epetrepsen), not 'commanded' — divorce is a concession, not an ideal. Second, the reason for the concession is 'hardness of heart' (sklerokardia, literally 'hard-heartedness'), a term used in the Old Testament for Israel's stubborn resistance to God's will (cf. Deuteronomy 10:16, Jeremiah 4:4). Jesus's phrase 'from the beginning' (ap' arches) reasserts the creation ideal as the standard by which all subsequent legislation must be measured.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 10:16 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 4:4 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The 'exception clause' (me epi porneia, 'except for sexual immorality') is unique to Matthew (cf. 5:32). The Greek porneia is broader than moicheia ('adultery') and can encompass any serious sexual transgression — its exact scope here is heavily debated. Some scholars argue it refers specifically to incestuous marriages (as in Acts 15:20, 29), others to adultery, others to premarital unfaithfulness. The SBLGNT text does not include the final clause about marrying a divorced woman, which appears in some manuscripts and the KJV tradition (Textus Receptus).
10. The disciples' reaction reveals how radical Jesus's teaching is — they conclude that if divorce is so restricted, marriage itself becomes too risky. The phrase ou sympherei gamesai ('it is not advantageous to marry') uses the language of practical calculation. Their response shows they understood Jesus to be significantly restricting the prevailing norms.
11. The phrase ton logon touton ('this word') is ambiguous — does 'this word' refer to the disciples' suggestion about not marrying, or to Jesus's teaching about divorce? The context suggests the former: not everyone has the gift of celibacy. The passive 'it has been given' (dedotai) implies God as the giver — celibacy, like marriage, is a divine calling.
12. Jesus identifies three categories of celibacy: congenital (born eunuchs), imposed (castrated by others, as was common for court officials), and voluntary (those who renounce marriage for the kingdom). The third category is metaphorical — Jesus is not advocating self-mutilation but describing those who voluntarily forgo marriage to devote themselves entirely to God's purposes. The closing invitation 'let the one who is able to accept this accept it' (ho dynamenos chorein choreito) acknowledges this is an extraordinary calling, not a universal requirement.
13. The passive prosenechthesan ('were brought') indicates parents bringing their children. The purpose — laying on of hands and prayer — is a request for blessing, not healing. The disciples' rebuke (epetimesan) suggests they thought Jesus's time was too valuable for children. This echoes their misunderstanding of 'the greatest in the kingdom' from 18:1-5 — they still have not grasped the lesson.
14. The double command — 'let' (aphete) and 'do not hinder' (me koluete) — corrects the disciples forcefully. The phrase ton toiouton ('of such as these') means 'people who are like these children' — those who come with the humility, dependence, and lack of status that characterize children. This reiterates the teaching of 18:3-4.
15. Jesus does exactly what was requested — he lays hands on the children. The simple narrative detail contrasts with the disciples' attempted barrier. Matthew's account is briefer than Mark's (10:16), which adds that Jesus embraced the children.
16. Matthew's version differs from Mark's ('Good Teacher'). Here the man asks 'what good thing' (ti agathon) rather than addressing Jesus as 'Good Teacher.' The question assumes that eternal life (zoe aionios) can be secured by performing a specific act. The man's approach is sincere — he is not testing Jesus — but his framework is transactional: what must I do to earn this?
17. Matthew's version redirects the question: 'Why do you ask me about the good?' rather than Mark's 'Why do you call me good?' (Mark 10:18). The statement 'there is only one who is good' (heis estin ho agathos) points to God as the sole source of goodness. Jesus's answer — 'keep the commandments' (tereson tas entolas) — meets the man where he is: if you want to approach this through doing, then the commandments are the starting point.

18. The man's follow-up question 'Which ones?' (poias) may reflect genuine uncertainty or a desire for a specific checklist. Jesus cites commandments from the second table of the Decalogue — those governing human relationships (sixth through ninth commandments). The absence of the first four commandments (duties toward God) is notable and may be deliberate, as the man's real deficiency involves his relationship with God, not his ethical conduct.
19. Jesus adds the fifth commandment (honor parents) and Leviticus 19:18 ('love your neighbor as yourself'). The addition of the love command is significant — it summarizes the ethical intent of all the commandments Jesus has listed and signals that mere prohibition is insufficient; positive love is required.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 19:18. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. Matthew identifies the man as neaniskos ('young man'), providing a detail the other Synoptics convey differently (Mark says Jesus loved him, Luke calls him a ruler). His claim to have kept all the commandments (panta tauta ephylaxa) is presented sincerely, not arrogantly. His question 'What do I still lack?' (ti eti hystero) reveals an awareness that commandment-keeping has not brought the assurance of eternal life he seeks.
21. The adjective teleios ('perfect, complete, mature') does not mean sinless perfection but wholeness — the young man's lack is not moral failure but incomplete devotion. The sequence of commands — go, sell, give, come, follow — dismantles the barrier between the man and full discipleship. 'Treasure in heaven' (thesauron en ouranois) contrasts with earthly treasure (cf. 6:19-21). The final imperative 'follow me' (akolouthei moi) is the definitive invitation to discipleship.
22. The participle lypoumenos ('grieving, sorrowing') indicates that the departure was not callous but painful. He understood what Jesus was asking and could not bring himself to do it. The phrase 'many possessions' (ktemata polla) explains his grief — his wealth owned him more than he owned it. He is the only person in the Gospels who is explicitly called to follow Jesus and walks away.
23. The adverb dyskolos ('with difficulty, hardly') indicates not impossibility but severe difficulty. The solemn introduction 'Truly I tell you' elevates this to authoritative teaching. In Jewish tradition, wealth was often viewed as a sign of divine blessing (cf. Deuteronomy 28:1-14), making Jesus's warning deeply counterintuitive.
23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 28:1-14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
24. The image is deliberately absurd — a camel (kamelon), the largest animal in Palestine, through the eye of a needle (trypematos raphidos), the smallest opening imaginable. Medieval interpreters invented a small gate called 'the eye of the needle' in Jerusalem, but no such gate is historically attested. The hyperbole is the point: this is humanly impossible. Matthew uses 'kingdom of God' (basileia tou theou) here rather than his usual 'kingdom of heaven,' perhaps following his source.
25. The verb exeplessonto ('were utterly astonished, were struck with amazement') is one of the strongest terms for shock in Greek. Their reasoning is clear: if even the rich — those who appear most blessed by God — cannot enter the kingdom, then who can? The question tis ara dynatai sotheenai ('Who then can be saved?') assumes what many first-century Jews assumed: wealth indicates divine favor. If God's favorites cannot be saved, salvation is impossible for everyone.
26. The verb emblepsas ('looked directly at, fixed his gaze on') indicates an intentional, significant look. Jesus does not soften his teaching about wealth — he confirms it is humanly impossible. But he adds the decisive qualifier: para theo panta dynata ('with God all things are possible'), echoing Genesis 18:14 ('Is anything too hard for the LORD?'). Salvation is God's work, not a human achievement. This reframes the entire conversation from 'What must I do?' (v. 16) to 'What can God do?'
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 18:14. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. Peter's statement is factual — the disciples have left occupations, homes, and families (4:18-22). His question ti ara estai hemin ('What then will there be for us?') is characteristically blunt. It raises the issue of reward for sacrifice, which Jesus answers without rebuke, suggesting the question is legitimate even if the framing is self-interested.
28. The word palingenesia ('regeneration, renewal, rebirth') appears only here and in Titus 3:5 in the New Testament. In Stoic philosophy it referred to the cosmic renewal after periodic destruction. Here it refers to the eschatological restoration of all things — the new creation. 'His glorious throne' (thronou doxes autou) alludes to Daniel 7:9-14. The twelve thrones for the twelve apostles judging twelve tribes presents the reconstituted Israel under the authority of Jesus and his chosen leaders.
28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7:9-14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
29. The promise extends beyond the twelve to 'everyone' (pas hostis) who sacrifices for Jesus. The list covers property (houses, fields) and family relationships — the full range of human attachment. The 'hundredfold' (hekatontaplasia) return and 'eternal life' (zoen aionion) represent both present-age blessings (new community, new family in the church) and future-age consummation. The SBLGNT omits 'wife' (gynaika), which appears in some manuscripts.

30. This saying reverses human expectations of status and reward — a theme running throughout this chapter (children over adults, poor over rich, servants over rulers). The reversal formula 'first/last, last/first' frames the parable of the workers in the vineyard that immediately follows (20:1-16), which also ends with this saying. The word 'many' (polloi) suggests the reversal is not absolute but widespread.

Summary: Matthew 20 opens with the parable of the workers in the vineyard, where laborers hired at different hours all receive the same pay — a denarius — provoking complaint from those who worked longest. Jesus uses this to illustrate that God's generosity transcends human calculations of merit. The chapter then contains the third and most detailed passion prediction, the ambitious request of James and John's mother for her sons to sit at Jesus's right and left in his kingdom, Jesus's teaching that greatness means servanthood, and the healing of two blind men near Jericho.

What Makes This Remarkable: The vineyard parable is unique to Matthew and is one of the most provocative stories Jesus tells. It offends our sense of fairness — the workers who labored all day in the heat receive the same wage as those who worked one hour. The landowner's response ('Am I not allowed to do what I choose with what belongs to me? Or are you envious because I am generous?') reframes the issue from justice to generosity. The third passion prediction (vv. 17-19) is the most specific yet, adding details about being handed to Gentiles, mocking, flogging, and crucifixion. The request for honored seats and Jesus's response introduce the cup metaphor for suffering and culminate in the definitive statement of his mission: 'The Son of Man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many.'

Translation Friction: *The parable's apparent unfairness is the point — God's grace does not operate by the merit-based system humans expect. We render the landowner's question in verse 15 as closely as possible to preserve the challenge. The SBLGNT places James and John's mother as the one making the request (v. 20), while Mark 10:35 has the brothers themselves asking — Matthew may be softening the brothers' image. The word lytron ('ransom,' v. 28) has significant theological weight and has been central to atonement theology; we render it directly without interpretive expansion.*

Connections: The vineyard parable connects to Isaiah 5:1-7 (God's vineyard = Israel) and echoes the 'first shall be last' saying from 19:30. The third passion prediction fulfills the pattern established in 16:21 and 17:22-23. The 'cup' metaphor (v. 22) anticipates Gethsemane (26:39). The 'ransom' saying (v. 28) connects to Isaiah 53:10-12 (the servant who bears others' sins) and the Passover redemption theology. The Jericho healing marks the last stop before Jerusalem.

¹"For the kingdom of heaven is like a landowner who went out early in the morning to hire workers for his vineyard. ²After agreeing with the workers on a denarius for the day, he sent them into his vineyard. ³Going out about the third hour, he saw others standing idle in the marketplace ⁴Stated to them. Go you also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give you. Then they traveled their way. ⁵So they went. He went out again about the sixth hour and the ninth hour and did the same thing. ⁶About the eleventh hour he went out and found others standing around, and he said to them, 'Why have you been standing here idle all day?' ⁷They said to him, 'Because no one has hired us.' He said to them, 'You go into the vineyard too.' ⁸When evening came, the owner of the vineyard said to his manager, 'Call the workers and pay them their wages, beginning with the last and ending with the first.' ⁹When those hired about the eleventh hour came, each received a denarius. ¹⁰When the first came, they expected to receive more, but each of them also received a denarius. ¹¹When they received it, they grumbled against the landowner, ¹²Indeed, declaring, These last have wrought but one hour, and you have created them as equal to us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day. ¹³But he answered one of them, 'Friend, I am not being unfair to you. Did you not agree with me for a denarius? ¹⁴Take what is yours and go. I choose to give to this last worker the same as I gave to you. ¹⁵Am I not allowed to do what I want with what belongs to me? Or is your eye envious because I am generous?' ¹⁶So the last will be first, and the first last." ¹⁷As Jesus was going up to Jerusalem, he took the twelve disciples aside privately and said to them on the way, ¹⁸"See, we are going up to Jerusalem, and the Son of Man will be handed over to the chief priests and scribes. They will condemn him to death ¹⁹Indeed, will deliver him to the Gentiles to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him — and the third day he will come back to life. ²⁰Then the mother of the sons of Zebedee came to him with her sons, kneeling before him and making a request. ²¹He said to her, "What do you want?" She said to him, "Say that these two sons of mine will sit, one at your right hand and one at your left, in your kingdom." ²²Jesus answered, "You do not know what you are asking. Are you able to drink the cup that I am about to drink?" They said to him, "We are able." ²³He said to them, "You will drink my cup, but to sit at my right and at my left is not mine to grant. That is for those for whom it has been prepared by my Father." ²⁴When the ten heard about this, they were indignant with the two brothers. ²⁵But Jesus called them together and said, "You know that the rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them. ²⁶It must not be this way among you. Instead, whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant, ²⁷Whosoever will be chief in the midst of you, let him be your servant:. ²⁸Even as the Son of Man arrived not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for numerous. ²⁹As they were leaving Jericho, a large crowd followed him. ³⁰And two blind men sitting beside the road, hearing that Jesus was passing by, cried out, "Lord, have mercy on us, Son of David!" ³¹The crowd rebuked them, telling them to be silent, but they cried out all the louder, "Lord, have mercy on us, Son of David!" ³²Jesus stopped and called them, saying, "What do you want me to do for you?" ³³They said to him, "Lord, let our eyes be opened." ³⁴Moved with compassion, Jesus touched their eyes, and immediately they received their sight and followed him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The parable is introduced with 'For' (gar), connecting it to the 'first shall be last' saying of 19:30. The oikodespotes ('master of the house, landowner') represents God. The vineyard (ampelon) is a traditional Old Testament symbol for Israel (Isaiah 5:1-7). Going out 'early in the morning' (hama proi) indicates the start of the workday at approximately 6:00 AM.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 5:1-7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The verb symphonesas ('having agreed') indicates a mutual contract. A denarius (denarion) was the standard daily wage for a laborer. The KJV's 'penny' is misleading in modern English; we retain 'denarius' as the specific coin. The agreement establishes a just wage — the later controversy is not about underpayment but about equal payment for unequal work.
3. The 'third hour' (triten horan) is approximately 9:00 AM by Jewish reckoning (counting from sunrise). The marketplace (agora) was where day laborers gathered hoping for employment. The word argous ('idle, unemployed') does not necessarily imply laziness — these workers had no one to hire them.
4. Unlike the first group, these workers receive no specific wage agreement — only the promise of 'whatever is right' (ho ean e dikaion). The word dikaion ('right, just, fair') sets up the parable's central question about what constitutes fairness. These workers must trust the landowner's character.
5. The sixth hour is approximately noon, the ninth hour approximately 3:00 PM. The repeated hiring — at 6 AM, 9 AM, noon, and 3 PM — creates a pattern that makes the final hiring at the eleventh hour (v. 6) the climactic surprise. Each group works progressively less time.
6. The eleventh hour is approximately 5:00 PM — one hour before the workday ends at sundown. These workers have waited all day without employment. The landowner's question is not accusatory but inquisitive, and their answer (v. 7) reveals that unemployment, not laziness, is the cause.
7. Their explanation — 'no one hired us' (oudeis hemas emisthosato) — evokes sympathy. The SBLGNT does not include the additional phrase 'and whatever is right you will receive,' which appears in some manuscripts and the KJV tradition. The landowner simply sends them to work with no stated wage.
8. The instruction to pay 'from the last to the first' (arxamenos apo ton eschaton heos ton proton) is a deliberate narrative device — the first-hired must watch the last-hired receive their pay, which creates the expectation and subsequent outrage that drives the parable's point. The epitropos ('manager, steward') handles the actual payment. The evening payment complies with Leviticus 19:13 and Deuteronomy 24:15, which require same-day wages.

9. The eleventh-hour workers receive a full denarius for one hour of work. The phrase ana denarion ('a denarius each') emphasizes that every worker in this group received the same amount as was contracted with the first group. This is the parable's surprise — and it sets up the complaint.
10. The verb enomisan ('they supposed, expected') reveals their reasoning: if the last received a full denarius, proportional justice would give the first much more. The phrase kai autoi ('they also') emphasizes the equal treatment that the first group finds unjust. Their expectation is entirely logical by human standards — which is precisely the point.

11. The verb egongyzon ('grumbled, murmured') echoes Israel's murmuring against God in the wilderness (Exodus 16:7-8, Numbers 14:2). The allusion is probably deliberate: those who have been provided for complain that others have received undeserved generosity.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 16:7-8. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Numbers 14:2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The complaint is vivid and visceral: 'the burden of the day and the scorching heat' (to baros tes hemeras kai ton kausona) evokes twelve hours of physical labor under the Palestinian sun. The word isous ('equal') is the crux — they object not to the last group's payment but to the equality. They want hierarchical reward, not equal generosity. Their grievance feels entirely reasonable, which makes the landowner's response all the more challenging.
13. The address hetaire ('friend, companion') is polite but formal — Matthew uses it in contexts of gentle correction or warning (22:12, 26:50). The verb adiko ('I wrong, I am unjust to') directly addresses the complaint: no injustice has occurred. The contracted wage has been paid in full. The landowner's defense rests on two pillars: contractual integrity (v. 13) and sovereign generosity (v. 15).
14. The imperatives aron ('take') and hype ('go') are firm dismissals. The verb thelo ('I choose, I wish, I want') is the key — the landowner asserts his sovereign right to be generous beyond contractual obligation. The phrase touto to eschato ('to this last one') pointedly identifies the recipient of the generosity.
15. Two rhetorical questions drive the parable's theology home. The first asserts the owner's sovereign freedom over his own possessions. The second — literally 'Is your eye evil?' (ho ophthalmos sou poneros estin) — uses the Semitic idiom where an 'evil eye' denotes envy or stinginess (cf. 6:23). We render it 'envious' to capture the meaning. The word agathos ('good, generous') is the same word the young man used in his question to Jesus (19:16-17). The parable's God-figure claims the attribute of goodness that belongs to God alone.
16. The saying that opened this section (19:30) now closes it, forming an inclusio. The parable has illustrated the principle: God's generosity does not follow human hierarchies of merit. The SBLGNT does not include 'for many are called but few are chosen,' which appears in some manuscripts and the KJV tradition — that saying appears authentically at 22:14.
17. The verb anabainon ('going up') is geographically accurate — Jerusalem sits at approximately 2,500 feet elevation, and travelers from Jericho ascend significantly. But 'going up to Jerusalem' also carries theological weight as pilgrimage language. The private setting (kat' idian) indicates that the passion prediction is for the inner circle, not the crowds.
18. This third passion prediction (cf. 16:21, 17:22-23) is the most detailed. The verb paradothesetai ('will be handed over') adds the theme of betrayal/delivery. For the first time, the role of the Jewish leadership (chief priests and scribes) in condemning Jesus is specified alongside the role of the Gentiles (v. 19). The phrase katakrinousin auton thanato ('they will condemn him to death') indicates a formal legal sentence.
19. The Gentiles (ethnesin) are the Romans, who alone had the authority to execute by crucifixion. The three infinitives — empaizai ('to mock'), mastigosai ('to flog'), staurosai ('to crucify') — describe the precise sequence of the passion narrative as it will unfold in chapters 26-27. This is the first time Jesus explicitly names crucifixion (staurosai) as the method of his death. The passive 'will be raised' (egertheesetai) affirms God's final action beyond the human violence.
20. Matthew places the mother as the spokesperson, while Mark 10:35 has James and John making the request directly. This may reflect Matthew's tendency to soften the portrayal of the apostles. The sons of Zebedee are James and John (4:21). The participle proskynousa ('kneeling, worshipping') indicates the seriousness of the approach.
21. The request for seats at the right and left (ek dexion and ex euonymon) of the king was a request for the two highest positions of honor and authority in the coming kingdom. The mother has heard the promise of twelve thrones (19:28) and wants the best seats for her sons. The irony — visible only in retrospect — is that the positions at Jesus's right and left at his 'enthronement' will be occupied by two crucified criminals (27:38).
22. Jesus shifts from the mother to the sons (the verb oidate and aisteisthe are second person plural). The 'cup' (poterion) is a well-established Old Testament metaphor for suffering and divine judgment (Psalm 75:8, Isaiah 51:17, Jeremiah 25:15). The SBLGNT does not include the reference to baptism, which appears in Mark 10:38 and some Matthew manuscripts. The brothers' confident 'We are able' (dynametha) is sincere but uninformed — they do not yet know what the cup contains.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 75:8. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 51:17. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Jeremiah 25:15. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. Jesus confirms their future suffering (James was martyred, Acts 12:2; John, according to tradition, endured exile) but refuses to grant the seating request, deferring to the Father's sovereign arrangement. The passive hetoimastai ('it has been prepared') indicates prior divine planning. Jesus's refusal reveals something about his self-understanding: he operates within the Father's authority, not independently of it.

- 24. The verb eganaktesan ('were indignant, were angry') reveals that the other ten disciples share the same ambition — they are not offended by the desire for status but by the attempt to secure it first. Their anger provides the occasion for Jesus's teaching on servant leadership.
- 25. The verbs katakryieousin ('lord it over, dominate') and katexousiazousin ('exercise authority over, tyrannize') both use the prefix kata- ('down upon'), indicating oppressive, top-down power. Jesus describes the standard model of leadership in the Roman world — and then explicitly rejects it for his community.
- 26. The prohibition ouch houtos estai en hymin ('it must not be this way among you') is categorical. The word diakonos ('servant, minister, one who serves at table') was not a prestigious role — it denoted someone who waited on others at meals. Jesus redefines greatness as service, inverting the power structure he has just described.
- 27. The escalation from diakonos ('servant,' v. 26) to doulos ('slave') intensifies the demand. A doulos had no rights, no autonomy, no personal agenda — only the master's will. The word 'first' (protos) echoes the parable's concern with first and last (vv. 8, 16) and the disciples' desire for preeminence.
- 28. This is one of the most theologically dense sentences in the Gospels. Jesus defines his entire mission in terms of service and self-sacrifice. The word lytron ('ransom') appears only here and in Mark 10:45 in the Gospels. It refers to the price paid to free a slave or prisoner. The preposition anti ('in place of, instead of') indicates substitution — Jesus's life given in exchange for 'many' (pollon). The language echoes Isaiah 53:10-12, where the Servant of the LORD bears the sin of many. 'Many' (polloi) is a Semitic inclusive term that often means 'all' (cf. Romans 5:15-19).
- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 53:10-12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 29. Jericho, about fifteen miles northeast of Jerusalem, was the last major stop on the pilgrim route to Jerusalem. The 'large crowd' (ochlos polys) suggests the growing numbers of Passover pilgrims joining Jesus as he approaches the capital.
- 30. Matthew has two blind men where Mark 10:46 names one (Bartimaeus). This is consistent with Matthew's tendency to double figures (cf. two demoniacs in 8:28 where Mark has one). The address 'Son of David' (huios Daud) is a messianic title acknowledging Jesus as the expected Davidic king. The plea 'have mercy' (eleeson) echoes the Canaanite woman's cry (15:22) — the same faith-filled appeal from those on society's margins.
- 31. The crowd's attempt to silence the blind men parallels the disciples' attempt to send away the children (19:13) and the Canaanite woman (15:23). The pattern is consistent: human gatekeepers try to prevent the marginal from reaching Jesus, and the desperate refuse to be silenced. The comparative meizon ('louder, more urgently') shows their persistence increasing under pressure.
- 32. Jesus's stopping (stas) is significant — he is on his way to Jerusalem, to his death, yet he stops for two blind beggars. The question 'What do you want me to do for you?' (ti thelete poieso hymin) is the same question he effectively asked the mother of James and John (v. 21). The contrast is pointed: she wanted status; they want sight.
- 33. Their request is simple and direct: 'that our eyes may be opened' (hina anoigosin hoi ophthalmoi hemon). The opening of blind eyes is a messianic sign (Isaiah 35:5, 42:7), so their request implicitly affirms the 'Son of David' title they have used. The passive anoigosin ('may be opened') acknowledges that they cannot heal themselves.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 35:5 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The verb splanchnistheis ('moved with compassion') again denotes the visceral, gut-level mercy characteristic of Jesus (cf. 9:36, 14:14, 15:32). The physical touch (hepsato ton ommaton, 'touched their eyes') is not strictly necessary for healing — Jesus has healed at a distance — but adds personal, intimate contact. The immediate result (eutheos) and their following (ekoloutheesan) indicate both physical healing and discipleship. As Jesus enters Jerusalem for the final time, he does so accompanied by those whose eyes he has opened — a fitting symbolic conclusion to the journey.

Summary: Matthew 21 marks the beginning of Jesus's final week in Jerusalem. He enters the city riding on a donkey in fulfillment of Zechariah 9:9, acclaimed by crowds shouting 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' He then drives the merchants and money changers from the temple, declaring it should be a house of prayer. After cursing a barren fig tree -- which withers immediately -- Jesus teaches about faith and prayer. The chief priests and elders challenge his authority, and Jesus responds with three confrontational parables: the two sons, the wicked tenants, and (beginning in chapter 22) the wedding feast. The chapter escalates the conflict between Jesus and the Jerusalem religious establishment that will culminate in his arrest and crucifixion.

What Makes This Remarkable: Matthew's account of the entry uniquely mentions two animals -- a donkey and a colt -- following the parallelism of the Zechariah quotation literally. The temple action is presented not merely as reform but as prophetic judgment: Jesus quotes both Isaiah 56:7 and Jeremiah 7:11, framing the temple establishment as having betrayed its purpose. The fig tree episode functions as an enacted parable of Israel's spiritual barrenness. The parable of the wicked tenants is an allegory transparent enough that the chief priests recognize themselves in it (v. 45), yet its Old Testament foundation in Isaiah 5 gives it prophetic weight beyond mere polemic.

Translation Friction: The two-donkey detail in verses 2-7 has puzzled interpreters. Matthew appears to read Zechariah 9:9's Hebrew parallelism ('a donkey, even a colt, the foal of a donkey') as referring to two separate animals, while Mark and Luke mention only one. We render Matthew's text as written. The immediate withering of the fig tree (v. 19) differs from Mark's two-day sequence. Matthew has compressed the timeline, presenting the miracle and its lesson as a single dramatic unit. The stone quotation in verse 42 (Psalm 118:22-23) was a key text in early Christian apologetics and appears across multiple New Testament books.

Connections: The triumphal entry fulfills Zechariah 9:9 and echoes Solomon's royal procession on David's mule (1 Kings 1:33-40). 'Hosanna' comes from Psalm 118:25-26, a Hallel psalm sung at Passover and Tabernacles. The temple cleansing connects to Malachi 3:1-3 ('the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple'). The fig tree echoes Jeremiah 8:13 and Hosea 9:10. The parable of the wicked tenants draws on Isaiah 5:1-7 (the Song of the Vineyard). The rejected cornerstone (Psalm 118:22-23) ties the entry psalm to the passion narrative.

¹When they drew near to Jerusalem and came to Bethphage, to the Mount of Olives, Jesus sent two disciples, ²Declaring to them, Go into the village over opposed to you, and right away you will find an ass tied, and a colt with her — loose them, and bring them to me. ³If anyone says anything to you, say, 'The Lord needs them,' and he will send them at once." ⁴This took place to fulfill what was spoken through the prophet: ⁵"Say to the daughter of Zion, 'Look, your king is coming to you, humble and mounted on a donkey, and on a colt, the foal of a donkey.'" ⁶The disciples went and did as Jesus had directed them. ⁷They brought the donkey and the colt and placed their cloaks on them, and he sat on them. ⁸A very large crowd spread their cloaks on the road, and others cut branches from the trees and spread them on the road. ⁹The crowds going ahead of him and those following were shouting, "Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!" ¹⁰When he entered Jerusalem, the whole city was stirred up, saying, "Who is this?" ¹¹The crowds said, "This is the prophet Jesus, from Nazareth of Galilee." ¹²Jesus entered the temple and drove out all who were selling and buying in the temple, and he overturned the tables of the money changers and the seats of those selling doves. ¹³He said to them, "It is written, 'My house will be called a house of prayer,' but you are making it a den of robbers." ¹⁴The blind and the lame went to him in the temple. And he healed them. ¹⁵But when the chief priests and the scribes saw the remarkable things he did, and the children shouting in the temple, "Hosanna to the Son of David!" they became indignant ¹⁶Stated to him, Hearst you what these say? And Jesus says to them, Yea. Have you never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings you have perfected praise? ¹⁷And leaving them, he went out of the city to Bethany and spent the night there. ¹⁸In the morning, as he was returning to the city, he was hungry. ¹⁹Seeing a fig tree by the road, he went to it and found nothing on it except leaves only. He said to it, "May no fruit ever come from you again." And the fig tree withered at once. ²⁰When the disciples saw it, they marveled, saying, "How did the fig tree wither so quickly?" ²¹Jesus answered them, "Truly I say to you, if you have faith and do not doubt, you will not only do what was done to the fig tree, but even if you say to this mountain, 'Be lifted up and thrown into the sea,' it will happen. ²²And whatever you ask in prayer with faith, you will receive." ²³When he entered the temple, the chief priests and the elders of the people came up to him as he was teaching and said, "By what authority are you doing these things, and who gave you this authority?" ²⁴Jesus answered them, "I also will ask you one question, and if you answer me, I will tell you by what authority I do these things. ²⁵The baptism of John -- where was it from? From heaven or from men?" They discussed it among themselves, saying, "If we say, 'From heaven,' he will say to us, 'Why then did you not believe him?' ²⁶But if we say, 'From men,' we are afraid of the crowd, for they all regard John as a prophet." ²⁷So they answered Jesus, "We do not know." He said to them, "Neither will I tell you by what authority I do these things. ²⁸"What do you think? A man had two sons. He went to the first and said, 'Son, go and work in the vineyard today.' ²⁹He answered, 'I will not,' but afterward he changed his mind and went. ³⁰He went to the other and said the same thing. He answered, 'I will, sir,' but did not go. ³¹Which of the two did the will of his father?" They said, "The first." Jesus said to them, "Truly I say to you, the tax collectors and the prostitutes are entering the kingdom of God ahead of you. ³²For John came to you in the way of righteousness, and you did not believe him, but the tax collectors and the prostitutes believed him.

And even when you saw this, you did not afterward change your minds and believe him. ³³"Listen to another parable. There was a landowner who planted a vineyard and put a fence around it, dug a winepress in it, and built a watchtower. Then he leased it to tenants and went to another country. ³⁴When the season of fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the tenants to collect his produce. ³⁵But the tenants seized his servants, beat one, killed another, and stoned another. ³⁶Again he sent other servants, more than the first, and they treated them the same way. ³⁷Finally he sent his son to them, saying, 'They will respect my son.' ³⁸But when the tenants saw the son, they said to one another, 'This is the heir. Come, let us kill him and take his inheritance.' ³⁹They seized him, threw him out of the vineyard, and killed him. ⁴⁰When the owner of the vineyard comes, what will he do to those tenants?" ⁴¹They said to him, "He will bring those wretches to a wretched end and lease the vineyard to other tenants who will give him the fruits in their seasons." ⁴²Jesus said to them, "Have you never read in the Scriptures: 'The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone; this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes'? ⁴³Therefore I tell you, the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people producing its fruits. ⁴⁴The one who falls on this stone will be broken to pieces, and it will crush anyone on whom it falls." ⁴⁵When the chief priests and the Pharisees heard his parables, they knew he was speaking about them. ⁴⁶Although they wanted to arrest him, they feared the crowds, because they regarded him as a prophet.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Bethphage ('house of unripe figs') was a village on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, near Bethany. The Mount of Olives carried eschatological significance from Zechariah 14:4, where the LORD would stand on it in the day of final deliverance. Jesus's approach from the east mirrors Ezekiel's vision of God's glory returning to the temple from the east (Ezekiel 43:1-4).

1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Ezekiel 43:1-4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. Matthew uniquely mentions both the mother donkey (onon) and the colt (polon), reading Zechariah 9:9 as referring to two animals. Jesus's foreknowledge of the donkeys' exact location demonstrates prophetic authority. The untying of a tethered animal without the owner's prior consent required the explanation given in the next verse.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Zechariah 9:9. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The title ho kyrios ('the Lord') here may function as either 'the master/owner' or with the fuller theological sense of 'the Lord.' The ambiguity may be deliberate -- Jesus claims sovereign right over the animals while the owner hears a reasonable request. The immediate compliance anticipated suggests prior arrangement or divine authority recognized.
4. This is Matthew's characteristic fulfillment formula (cf. 1:22, 2:15, 4:14, 8:17, 12:17, 13:35). The prophet is Zechariah, though Matthew does not name him. The passive plerothē ('might be fulfilled') indicates divine intentionality -- these events were orchestrated by God, not coincidence.
5. The quotation combines Isaiah 62:11 ('Say to the daughter of Zion') with Zechariah 9:9. The key word praus ('humble, gentle, meek') is the same word Jesus used of himself in 11:29 ('I am gentle and humble in heart'). In Zechariah's context, this king comes in peace, not on a warhorse. The Hebrew parallelism in Zechariah ('a donkey / a colt, the foal of a donkey') describes one animal in two ways, but Matthew's narrative presents two animals.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Zechariah 9:9 -- see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 62:11 -- see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The verb synetaxen ('directed, instructed, commanded') emphasizes the deliberate nature of the entry -- this was not spontaneous but a planned prophetic enactment. The disciples' obedience mirrors the pattern seen throughout Matthew.
7. The pronoun auton ('them') in 'he sat on them' most naturally refers to the cloaks, not both animals. The cloaks serve as an improvised saddle -- a mark of honor. The act of spreading garments echoes Jehu's anointing as king (2 Kings 9:13).
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Kings 9:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. Spreading garments on the road was a gesture of royal homage (cf. 2 Kings 9:13). The cutting of branches recalls the Feast of Tabernacles (Leviticus 23:40) and the rededication of the temple under Judas Maccabeus (1 Maccabees 13:51, 2 Maccabees 10:7). The crowd instinctively treats Jesus's entry as a royal and liturgical event.

9. The acclamation quotes Psalm 118:25-26, a Hallel psalm sung during Passover. 'Hosanna' (from Hebrew hoshi'a na, 'save now, please') had evolved from a plea into a shout of praise. 'Son of David' is an explicitly messianic title. 'The one who comes' (ho erchomenos) may echo Malachi 3:1 and the messianic expectation of 'the coming one' (cf. 11:3). 'In the highest' (en tois hypsistois) directs the praise heavenward.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalms 118:26. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Malachi 3:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The verb eseisthe ('was shaken, stirred') is related to seismos ('earthquake') -- the same root used for the earthquake at Jesus's death (27:51) and resurrection (28:2). Matthew uses seismic language for moments of divine disruption. The city's question 'Who is this?' sets up the christological tension that dominates the rest of the Gospel.
11. The crowd identifies Jesus as 'the prophet' (ho prophetēs), possibly the eschatological prophet like Moses promised in Deuteronomy 18:15. The geographical identification 'from Nazareth of Galilee' is both factual and slightly deflating -- Galilee was considered peripheral, and Nazareth insignificant (cf. John 1:46). The crowd's answer falls short of the full confession 'Son of David' from verse 9.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 18:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The Greek hieron refers to the broader temple complex, specifically the Court of the Gentiles where commercial activity took place. Money changers (kollybiston) converted Roman and Greek currency into the Tyrian shekel required for the temple tax. Doves were the offering prescribed for the poor (Leviticus 5:7, 12:8). Jesus's action targets a system that profited from worship and excluded Gentiles from their designated prayer space.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 5:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. Jesus combines Isaiah 56:7 ('my house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations') with Jeremiah 7:11 ('has this house become a den of robbers in your eyes?'). The Jeremiah reference is especially pointed: in Jeremiah 7, God threatens to destroy the temple because the people treat it as a safe hideout while practicing injustice. The Greek leston ('robbers, bandits') is stronger than 'thieves' -- these are violent exploiters, not petty criminals.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 7:11 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. This detail is unique to Matthew. The blind and lame were traditionally excluded from the temple (cf. 2 Samuel 5:8, though the interpretation of that passage is debated). By healing them in the temple, Jesus enacts the restoration and inclusion that the prophets envisioned. The temple becomes what it was meant to be -- a place of divine healing and access.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Samuel 5:8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The word thaumasia ('remarkable things, wonders') is used only here in the New Testament. The chief priests and scribes are angered not by the healings alone but by the children's messianic acclamation -- 'Hosanna to the Son of David' -- spoken in the temple itself. The Davidic title in the temple carries political and theological weight they cannot ignore.
16. Jesus quotes Psalm 8:2 (LXX), where God ordains praise from the youngest and most vulnerable. The quotation implies that the children perceive what the religious experts cannot -- or will not -- acknowledge. The verb katertiso ('you have prepared, perfected, established') suggests that God has deliberately arranged for this praise.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 8:2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. Bethany ('house of affliction' or 'house of dates') was a village about two miles east of Jerusalem on the southeastern slope of the Mount of Olives. It was the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus (John 11:1). Jesus's nightly withdrawal from Jerusalem during Passion Week was both practical (avoiding arrest) and symbolic (departing from the city that rejects its prophets).
18. Jesus's hunger is a reminder of his full humanity. The detail also sets up the fig tree episode as a prophetic sign-act rather than a fit of frustration -- the hunger provides the occasion, but the meaning goes far deeper.
19. The fig tree is a well-established prophetic symbol for Israel (Jeremiah 8:13, Hosea 9:10, Micah 7:1). A tree with leaves but no fruit advertises productivity it cannot deliver -- like a temple full of commerce but empty of justice. In Matthew's compressed timeline, the tree withers parachrema ('at once, immediately'), making the prophetic point unmistakable. Mark's account spreads this over two days.

- 19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Micah 7:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 20. The disciples focus on the speed of the miracle rather than its symbolic meaning. Their amazement (ethaumasán) opens the door for Jesus's teaching on faith and prayer in the following verses.
- 21. The phrase amen lego hymin ('truly I say to you') is Jesus's characteristic formula for solemn pronouncement. 'This mountain' (to orei touto) likely refers to the Mount of Olives, visible from where they stood. Moving mountains was a Jewish metaphor for accomplishing the seemingly impossible. The verb diakritete ('doubt, waver') is related to the word used for Peter's doubt on the water (14:31).
- 22. This promise is conditioned by two factors: prayer (en te proseuche) and faith (pisteuontes). It is not a blank check for material desires but a statement about the power of God channeled through trusting prayer. The present participle pisteuontes ('believing, having faith') indicates an ongoing disposition, not momentary confidence.
- 23. The double question about authority (exousia) targets both the nature and the source of Jesus's power. 'These things' (tauta) refers to the temple cleansing, the healings, and the teaching -- all of which bypass the established religious hierarchy. The chief priests and elders represent the Sanhedrin, the recognized governing body. Their challenge is both theological and jurisdictional.
- 24. Jesus's counter-question is a standard rabbinic debate technique -- not evasion but a method of exposing the real issue. By linking his answer to their answer, he forces them to confront the very authority they are trying to deny.
- 25. The question 'from heaven or from men' (ex ouranou e ex anthronon) presents the only two options: divine origin or human origin. 'Heaven' is a Jewish circumlocution for God. The leaders' private calculation reveals that their concern is not truth but political advantage -- they reason from consequences rather than convictions.
- 26. The leaders' fear of the crowd (phoboumetha ton ochlon) mirrors Herod's fear of the people regarding John (14:5). In both cases, political calculation overrides honest engagement with prophetic authority. Their inability to answer exposes their bad faith.
- 27. Their answer 'We do not know' (ouk oidamen) is technically a lie -- they have a private opinion but refuse to state it. Jesus's refusal to answer is not evasion but justice: those who will not engage honestly with the evidence they already have do not deserve further revelation. The implicit answer is clear -- Jesus's authority, like John's, comes from heaven.
- 28. The parable of the two sons is unique to Matthew. The opening 'What do you think?' (ti hymin dokei) draws the leaders into rendering judgment on themselves -- the same technique Nathan used against David (2 Samuel 12:1-7). The vineyard (ampelon) is a standard Old Testament symbol for Israel (Isaiah 5:1-7).
- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Samuel 12:1-7 -- the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 5:1-7 -- the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 29. The verb metameleteis ('changed his mind, felt regret') is distinct from metanoeo ('repent' in the fuller sense). This son's initial refusal followed by obedience represents those who initially rejected God's call but later responded -- the tax collectors and prostitutes mentioned in verse 31.
- 30. The second son addresses his father with the respectful kyrie ('sir, lord') and gives immediate verbal assent, but his actions contradict his words. He represents the religious leaders who profess obedience to God but fail to respond to John's (and now Jesus's) message. Words without corresponding action is a theme throughout Matthew (cf. 7:21-23).
- 31. The leaders pronounce their own verdict. Jesus's application is devastating: the social outcasts (telonai, 'tax collectors'; pornai, 'prostitutes') who initially lived in rebellion but responded to John's call are entering the kingdom ahead of the religious establishment. The present tense proagousin ('are going ahead, are entering') indicates this is happening now, not merely in the future.
- 32. The phrase 'in the way of righteousness' (en hodo dikaiosynes) may mean John came living righteously, or came teaching the way of righteousness, or both. The double indictment is severe: they rejected John's message, and even after seeing others respond, they refused to reconsider. The verb metemelete ('change your minds') echoes the first son's change of heart in verse 29.
- 33. The parable's opening deliberately echoes Isaiah 5:1-2, the Song of the Vineyard, where God plants and cares for Israel as his vineyard. Every detail -- the fence, the winepress, the tower -- comes from Isaiah's text. The oikodespotes ('master of the house, landowner') represents God. The georgoi ('tenant farmers') represent Israel's leaders. The audience would have recognized the allusion immediately.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 5:1-2 -- the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The servants (doulous, 'slaves') represent the prophets sent to Israel throughout its history. The 'season of fruit' (kairos ton karpon) indicates the time when God expected a return on his investment in Israel -- justice, righteousness, and faithfulness.

35. The three-fold violence -- beating, killing, stoning -- summarizes Israel's treatment of the prophets, a theme running through the Old Testament (cf. 2 Chronicles 24:21, Jeremiah 26:20-23, Nehemiah 9:26) and explicit in Jesus's lament over Jerusalem (23:37). Stoning (elithobolisan) was the traditional punishment for blasphemy and false prophecy, ironically used against true prophets.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Chronicles 24:21 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jeremiah 26:20-23 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Nehemiah 9:26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
36. The landowner's persistence in sending more servants (pleionas ton proton, 'more than the first group') reflects God's patience and repeated appeals through successive generations of prophets. The tenants' unchanging response reveals the depth of their rebellion.
37. The shift from 'servants' to 'his son' (ton huion autou) marks the climax of the parable and its transparent christological claim. The sending of the son is qualitatively different from the sending of servants -- this is the final appeal, the last and greatest envoy. The verb entrapesontai ('will respect, will be put to shame before') expresses the owner's reasonable expectation.
38. The tenants recognize the son as the heir (kleronomos) -- their crime is not ignorance but deliberate rebellion. They calculate that killing the heir will give them ownership of the vineyard, a legal assumption in certain ancient property arrangements. The parallel to the Jerusalem leaders' conspiracy against Jesus is unmistakable.
39. The detail that they threw him 'out of the vineyard' before killing him prefigures Jesus's crucifixion outside the walls of Jerusalem (cf. Hebrews 13:12). The sequence -- seizure, expulsion, death -- will be enacted literally in chapters 26-27.
40. Jesus forces the leaders to pronounce judgment again -- the same technique used in the parable of the two sons (v. 31). The question assumes the owner's return is certain; only the timing is unknown. The phrase kyrios tou ampelonos ('lord/owner of the vineyard') carries both literal and theological weight.
41. The Greek kakous kakos ('wretches wretchedly' or 'evil ones evilly') is a wordplay -- the punishment fits the crime. The leaders unwittingly pronounce their own doom. The transfer of the vineyard to 'other tenants' (allois georgois) foreshadows the inclusion of the Gentiles and the reconstitution of God's people around Jesus.
42. Jesus quotes Psalm 118:22-23, the same Hallel psalm from which the crowds shouted 'Hosanna' at the entry (v. 9). The rejected stone becoming the cornerstone (kephalen gonias, literally 'head of the corner') was a key early Christian testimony text (cf. Acts 4:11, 1 Peter 2:7). The 'builders' who reject the stone are the leaders standing before Jesus.
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalms 118:22-23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. This is one of the rare instances where Matthew uses 'kingdom of God' (basileia tou theou) rather than his preferred 'kingdom of heaven.' The word ethnei ('nation, people') is singular and does not necessarily mean 'Gentiles' (though that reading is possible); it may refer to a reconstituted people of God that includes both Jews and Gentiles who bear fruit. The emphasis is on fruit-bearing (karpos), connecting back to the fig tree (v. 19) and the vineyard's expected produce.
44. This verse draws on Isaiah 8:14-15 (the stone of stumbling) and Daniel 2:34-35, 44-45 (the stone that crushes the statue). The two scenarios -- falling on the stone and the stone falling on someone -- represent two ways of encountering Jesus: stumbling over him in offense, or being crushed by his judgment. Some scholars question this verse's originality, but it is present in the SBLGNT.
44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 8:14-15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 2:34-35. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
45. The verb egnoson ('knew, recognized, understood') confirms that the parables were not obscure -- the leaders understood them clearly. They are now named specifically: 'chief priests and Pharisees,' the two groups who will drive the passion narrative. Their comprehension without repentance fulfills the pattern of the second son in verse 30.
46. The chapter ends with the same dynamic that opened the John the Baptist flashback (14:5) -- the leaders want to act against God's messenger but fear the people. The crowd's recognition of Jesus as a prophet, while falling short of the full messianic confession, nevertheless provides temporary protection. The arrest is deferred but not abandoned; it will come in 26:47-56.

Summary: Matthew 22 opens with the parable of the wedding banquet, in which a king's invited guests refuse to come and are replaced by strangers from the streets. The chapter then records three challenge questions posed to Jesus by various groups: the Pharisees and Herodians ask about paying taxes to Caesar, the Sadducees pose a hypothetical about resurrection and marriage, and a Pharisee lawyer asks which commandment is the greatest. Jesus answers each decisively, then poses his own question about the Messiah's identity as David's Lord — silencing all challengers.

What Makes This Remarkable: The three challenge questions represent the major theological factions of first-century Judaism converging against Jesus: Pharisees (political trap about taxes), Sadducees (theological trap about resurrection), and a lawyer from among the Pharisees (legal trap about the commandments). Jesus not only escapes each trap but turns the final exchange into an offensive question about Psalm 110:1 that none of them can answer. The wedding banquet parable contains Matthew's distinctive addition of the guest without wedding garments (vv. 11-14), raising the stakes beyond mere invitation to proper response.

Translation Friction: The parable's violent imagery — the king destroying the murderous invitees and burning their city (v. 7) — has been read as a reference to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 AD. We render the Greek as given without imposing a specific historical identification. The phrase 'many are called but few are chosen' (v. 14) has generated centuries of theological debate about election; we render the Greek straightforwardly. Jesus's answer about the greatest commandment combines Deuteronomy 6:5 and Leviticus 19:18, a combination not found elsewhere in Jewish literature of this period.

Connections: The wedding banquet parable echoes Isaiah 25:6-8 (the eschatological feast). The tax question connects to the broader theme of God's kingdom versus earthly kingdoms. The resurrection debate anticipates Matthew 28. Jesus's citation of Psalm 110:1 becomes foundational for early Christian Christology (Acts 2:34-35, Hebrews 1:13). The double love commandment becomes the hermeneutical key for the entire law (cf. Romans 13:8-10, Galatians 5:14).

1Jesus spoke to them again in parables, saying: 2"The kingdom of heaven may be compared to a king who prepared a wedding feast for his son. 3He sent his servants to call those who had been invited to the feast, but they refused to come. 4Again he sent other servants, saying, 'Tell those who have been invited: Look, I have prepared my banquet — my oxen and fattened cattle have been slaughtered, and everything is ready. Come to the wedding feast.' 5But they paid no attention and went away — one to his field, another to his business. 6The rest seized his servants, mistreated them, and killed them. 7The king was enraged. He sent his armies, destroyed those murderers, and burned their city. 8Then he said to his servants, 'The wedding feast is ready, but those who were invited were not worthy. 9Go therefore to the main roads, and invite to the feast as many as you find.' 10Those servants went out into the roads and gathered everyone they found, both evil and good, and the wedding hall was filled with guests. 11But when the king came in to see the guests, he noticed a man there who was not wearing wedding clothes. 12He said to him, 'Friend, how did you get in here without wedding clothes?' And the man was speechless. 13Then the king said to the attendants, 'Bind his hands and feet and throw him into the outer darkness. In that place there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth.' 14For numerous are called, but few are chosen. 15Then the Pharisees went and plotted how to trap him with his own words. 16They sent their disciples to him along with the Herodians, saying, 'Teacher, we know that you are truthful and teach the way of God honestly. You do not defer to anyone, for you show no partiality. 17So tell us what you think: is it lawful to pay the tax to Caesar, or not?' 18But Jesus, aware of their malice, said, 'Why are you testing me, you hypocrites? 19Show me the coin used for the tax.' They brought him a denarius. 20He said to them, 'Whose image and inscription is this?' 21They said, 'Caesar's.' Then he said to them, 'Give back to Caesar what belongs to Caesar, and to God what belongs to God.' 22When they heard this, they were amazed. And they left him and went away. 23That same day Sadducees came to him — those who say there is no resurrection — and they asked him, 24'Teacher, Moses said, 'If a man dies without children, his brother is to marry his wife and raise up offspring for his brother.' 25Now there were seven brothers among us. The first married and died, and having no offspring, left his wife to his brother. ²⁶The same thing happened with the second, the third, and on through all seven. ²⁷Last of all, the woman died. ²⁸So in the resurrection, whose wife of the seven will she be? For they all had her as wife." ²⁹Jesus answered them, "You are mistaken, because you know neither the Scriptures nor the power of God. ³⁰For in the resurrection people neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like the angels in heaven. ³¹And concerning the resurrection of the dead, have you not read what was spoken to you by God: ³²'I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob'? He is not God of the dead but of the living." ³³When the crowds heard this, they were astonished at his teaching. ³⁴When the Pharisees heard that he had silenced the Sadducees, they gathered together. ³⁵Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a challenge, tempting him, ³⁶"Teacher, which commandment in the law is the greatest?" ³⁷He said to him, "'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind.' ³⁸This is the great and first commandment. ³⁹And a second is like it: 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' ⁴⁰On these two commandments hang every one of the law and the prophets. ⁴¹While the Pharisees were assembled, Jesus asked them, ⁴²"What do you think about the Christ? Whose son is he?" They said to him, "David's." ⁴³He said to them, "How then does David, speaking by the Spirit, call him Lord? ⁴⁴"The Lord said to my Lord, "Sit at my right hand, until I put your enemies under your feet"? ⁴⁵How is he his son?, and if David then call him Lord. ⁴⁶No one was able to answer him a word, and from that day on no one dared to ask him any more questions.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek apokritheis ('answering') does not imply a question was asked — it is a Semitic idiom meaning 'responded to the situation.' The plural parabolais ('parables') may indicate that Matthew groups this with the preceding parables of chapter 21, though only one parable follows here.
2. The Greek gamous (plural 'wedding festivities') encompasses the entire multi-day celebration, not just the ceremony. 'Wedding feast' captures the communal banquet dimension better than 'marriage.' The aorist homiothee ('was compared') frames the parable as a completed analogy.
3. The double invitation — first a prior invitation (keklemenous, perfect participle, 'those having been invited'), then the servants sent to summon them — reflects ancient Near Eastern banquet protocol. The refusal is deliberate: ouk ethelon ('they were not willing') emphasizes willful rejection, not inability.
4. The Greek ariston can mean 'breakfast' or 'midday meal' but here refers to a grand banquet. The detail of slaughtered oxen (tauroi) and fattened cattle (sitista) emphasizes lavish provision and the urgency of the invitation — the food is prepared and will not keep. The king's patience in sending a second delegation heightens the gravity of the refusal.
5. The verb amelesantes ('having disregarded, having been careless about') conveys not hostility but indifference — the most common form of rejection. The mundane alternatives (field, business) make the point: ordinary concerns displaced the king's extraordinary invitation.
6. The parable escalates sharply from indifference (v. 5) to violence. The verb hybrisan ('mistreated, insulted') denotes outrageous abuse. This mirrors the prophetic tradition of Israel killing God's messengers (cf. 2 Chronicles 36:15-16, Matthew 23:37).
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Chronicles 36:15-16. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The burning of 'their city' (teen polin auton) has been widely read as an allusion to the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in 70 AD. Whether this reflects a post-70 addition or Jesus's prophetic foresight is debated. The Greek eneprēsen ('burned') is vivid and specific.
8. The adjective axioi ('worthy, deserving') introduces a key theme: the invitation was free, but the invitees rendered themselves unworthy by their response. Worthiness here is defined by willingness to come, not by prior qualification.
9. The Greek diexodous ton hodon ('exits of the roads,' i.e., crossroads, intersections, or where roads leave the city) suggests the boundary between the city and the surrounding countryside — places where anyone might be found. The invitation becomes indiscriminate and universal.
10. The pairing ponērous te kai agathous ('both evil and good') is striking — the replacement guests are a mixed company, not a moral elite. This reflects Matthew's consistent picture of the kingdom as a mixed community (cf. the wheat and weeds, 13:24-30; the net, 13:47-50). The Greek anakeimenōn ('reclining ones') indicates the Greco-Roman dining posture.
11. The 'wedding garment' (endyma gamou) has generated much discussion. Some scholars suggest hosts provided garments; others see this as symbolic of righteousness or repentance. The man was gathered from the streets (v. 10), so the expectation of proper attire implies provision was made. The singular man among many guests suggests this is not about social class but about response — even among those who come, proper preparation is required.
12. The address hetaire ('friend, companion') appears only three times in Matthew (here, 20:13, 26:50) and always carries an ominous edge — it is used when someone has overstepped. The man's silence (ephimōthē, 'was muzzled, was silenced') indicates he has no defense; the passive voice may suggest divine silencing rather than mere embarrassment.

13. The attendants here are diakonoi ('servants, ministers') — different from the douloi ('slaves') sent to invite guests. 'Outer darkness' (skotos to exōteron) is a Matthean phrase (cf. 8:12, 25:30) depicting exclusion from the lit banquet hall into the night. 'Weeping and gnashing of teeth' is a formulaic expression in Matthew for eschatological judgment (8:12, 13:42, 13:50, 24:51, 25:30).
14. This summarizing statement distinguishes klētoi ('called, invited') from eklektoi ('chosen, selected'). The parable illustrates both categories of failure: those who refuse the call entirely (vv. 3-7) and those who come without proper response (vv. 11-13). The saying's theological weight — particularly regarding divine election versus human response — has been debated throughout church history. The Greek is rendered straightforwardly without resolving that tension.
15. The verb pagideusōsin ('to ensnare, to trap') is from pagis ('a snare, a trap') — hunting imagery. The Pharisees are now deliberately setting a verbal trap. The phrase en logō ('in a word/statement') means they want Jesus to say something that can be used against him.
16. The coalition of Pharisee disciples and Herodians is politically improbable — Pharisees resented Roman rule while Herodians supported the Herod dynasty and Roman accommodation. Their alliance against Jesus is itself revealing. The flattery is calculated: 'you show no partiality' (ou blepeis eis prosōpon anthrōpōn, literally 'you do not look at the face of people') is designed to pressure Jesus into giving a direct answer regardless of political consequences.
17. The Greek kēnsōn is a loanword from the Latin census, referring specifically to the Roman poll tax (tributum capitis). This was the most hated tax because it symbolized subjugation — every payment acknowledged Roman sovereignty. The trap is elegant: a 'yes' alienates the Jewish populace; a 'no' constitutes sedition against Rome.
18. The word ponērian ('wickedness, malice') is stronger than mere trickery — it ascribes evil intent. The verb peirazete ('you are testing') is the same word used for Satan's temptation of Jesus in chapter 4. Hypokritai ('hypocrites') originally meant 'stage actors' — people playing a role. Jesus exposes the flattery of verse 16 as performance.
19. The denarius (dēnariōn) was a Roman silver coin, a day's wage for a laborer (cf. 20:2). That they could produce one immediately in the temple precincts is itself telling — they carried the very coin bearing Caesar's image into sacred space. The KJV's 'penny' is a misleading anachronism.
20. The word eikōn ('image, likeness') carries theological resonance — humans are made in God's eikōn (Genesis 1:26-27 LXX). Jesus's question sets up a contrast between what bears Caesar's image and what bears God's image. The epigraphē ('inscription') on a Tiberian denarius would read 'Tiberius Caesar, son of the divine Augustus.'
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 1:26-27 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The verb apodote ('give back, return, render') is crucial — it implies returning what already belongs to someone, not making a gift. Caesar's coin bears Caesar's image; give it back. But since humans bear God's image, the unstated implication is far more sweeping: give your whole self back to God. The answer transcends the political trap entirely by reframing the question from taxation to total allegiance.
22. The verb ethaumasan ('they marveled, were astonished') indicates that Jesus's answer genuinely surprised them — it was not the binary response they had prepared for. Their departure signals that the trap failed completely.
23. Matthew's parenthetical note about Sadducean theology (legontes mē einai anastasin, 'saying there is no resurrection') orients the reader to the nature of the coming trap. The Sadducees accepted only the Torah (Genesis-Deuteronomy) as authoritative and found no explicit resurrection teaching there. Their question is designed to make resurrection belief look absurd.
24. The Sadducees cite the levirate marriage law from Deuteronomy 25:5-6 (with echoes of Genesis 38). The Greek epigambreusei ('shall marry as next-of-kin') is a technical term for levirate marriage. By grounding their question in Moses — the one authority they accept — they believe they have framed an unanswerable challenge to resurrection belief.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 25:5-6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 38. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The scenario is likely hypothetical, perhaps a stock riddle used in Sadducean-Pharisee debates. Seven brothers creates the maximum absurdity for a resurrection scenario. The phrase par' hēmin ('among us') may be a fictional framing device rather than a claim about real people.
26. Matthew compresses the narrative — Mark 12:21-22 provides slightly more detail. The repetition through all seven brothers drives home the point: whose wife would she be in the resurrection?
27. The phrase hysteron pantōn ('last of all') completes the hypothetical with finality — all eight parties are now dead, setting up the resurrection question.
28. The Greek pantes gar eschon autēn ('for they all had her') could be read crudely, but in context it means all seven were legally married to her in succession. The Sadducees believe they have created a logical impossibility that disproves resurrection — one woman cannot simultaneously be wife to seven men.
29. The verb planasthe ('you are led astray, you wander') implies not just intellectual error but spiritual disorientation. Jesus identifies two sources of their mistake: ignorance of Scripture (tas graphas, the very Torah they claim to champion) and ignorance of God's power (tēn dynamin tou theou) — they have limited God to what their theology permits.

- 30. Jesus does not deny resurrection but redefines its nature. The distinction between gamousin ('they marry,' active, typically of men) and gamizontai ('they are given in marriage,' passive, typically of women being given by their father) reflects first-century marriage customs. The comparison to angels does not mean people become angels but that the resurrected state transcends the social structures of mortal life, including marriage. This directly dissolves the Sadducees' riddle.
- 31. Jesus now turns to Scripture — specifically the Torah, the only authority the Sadducees accept. The phrase to rhēthen hymin ('what was spoken to you') is pointed: this was not spoken to ancient Israelites only but to you, the Sadducees, who claim to live by Moses.
- 32. Jesus quotes Exodus 3:6, from the burning bush narrative — firmly within the Torah. His argument turns on the present tense 'I am' (egō eimi): God does not say 'I was' their God but 'I am,' implying that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are alive to God. This is an argument the Sadducees cannot dismiss as coming from the Prophets or Writings, which they considered less authoritative.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 3:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The verb exeplessonto ('were struck out of their senses, were astonished') is stronger than mere surprise — it connotes being overwhelmed. The same verb describes the crowd's reaction to the Sermon on the Mount (7:28). 'Teaching' (didachē) is preferred over the KJV's 'doctrine,' which in modern English implies systematic theology.
- 34. The verb ephimōsen ('silenced, muzzled') is the same word used for the speechless guest in verse 12 — a verbal link suggesting divine authority that stops mouths. The Pharisees, having failed through their proxies (v. 16), now regroup for a direct challenge. The irony is that the Pharisees would have agreed with Jesus about resurrection — yet they still oppose him.
- 35. The nomikos ('lawyer, legal expert') is someone skilled in the Torah and its interpretation. The participle peirazōn ('testing') again uses the temptation vocabulary (cf. v. 18, 4:1). Whether this lawyer has hostile or genuinely curious intent is ambiguous — Mark's parallel (12:28) presents the scribe more positively. Matthew's peirazōn tilts toward a hostile reading.
- 36. The question poia entolē megalē ('which commandment is great?') reflects a real rabbinic debate. The rabbis identified 613 commandments in the Torah (248 positive, 365 negative) and debated which were 'heavy' (important) and which were 'light.' Asking Jesus to prioritize forces him to potentially diminish some commandments in favor of others.
- 37. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 6:5, the centerpiece of the Shema — the daily Jewish confession of faith. The Greek follows the Septuagint with three terms: kardia ('heart,' the seat of will and thought in Semitic usage), psychē ('soul/life'), and dianoia ('mind, understanding'). The Hebrew original has 'heart, soul, and strength' (me'od); Matthew's 'mind' may represent an interpretive rendering of the Hebrew or follow a variant Septuagint tradition. The threefold 'all' (holē) demands totality — no compartment of the self is exempt.
- 37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 6:5. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 38. Jesus identifies the Shema command as both megalē ('great' in importance) and prōtē ('first' in rank). By citing Deuteronomy 6:5, Jesus answers from the Torah itself — the ground shared by Pharisees, Sadducees, and all Jewish groups.
- 38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 6:5 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 39. Jesus volunteers a second commandment from Leviticus 19:18 that was not asked for. The word homoia ('like, similar') does not mean identical but says the second shares the same essential character as the first — love of God and love of neighbor are inseparable. The combination of Deuteronomy 6:5 and Leviticus 19:18 into a unified ethical framework appears to be original to Jesus, though Rabbi Hillel's 'Golden Rule' (b. Shabbat 31a) expresses a similar instinct.
- 39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 19:18. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 6:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 40. The verb krematai ('hangs, depends') is vivid — the entire Torah and prophetic corpus is suspended from these two commands like a door on its hinges. Jesus does not replace the 613 commandments but provides their organizing center. 'The Law and the Prophets' (ho nomos kai hoi prophētai) is the standard Jewish designation for Scripture (cf. 5:17, 7:12).
- 41. The initiative now shifts — Jesus moves from defense to offense. Having answered three challenges, he poses his own question. The genitive absolute synēgmenōn ('while being gathered') recalls their gathering in verse 34, making Jesus's counter-question an immediate response to their collective challenge.
- 42. The question peri tou Christou ('about the Christ/Messiah') is about the expected Messiah, not about Jesus himself — at least not explicitly. The Pharisees' answer 'David's son' is theologically correct but incomplete, as Jesus will demonstrate. This was the standard messianic expectation drawn from 2 Samuel 7 and Isaiah 11.
- 42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Samuel 7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 11. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. The phrase en pneumati ('in/by the Spirit') attributes Davidic authorship of Psalm 110 to divine inspiration. Jesus's argument depends on two premises: (1) David wrote Psalm 110, and (2) he wrote it under the Spirit's guidance. Both were uncontested assumptions in first-century Judaism.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 110 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. Jesus quotes Psalm 110:1 from the Septuagint. The Hebrew original distinguishes two figures: YHWH (the LORD) speaks to adoni ('my lord,' David's superior). In the Greek, both are kyrios ('Lord'), but the first represents God and the second the Messiah. The right hand is the position of co-regency and supreme honor. This psalm was the most frequently cited Old Testament text in the early church (Acts 2:34-35, 1 Corinthians 15:25, Hebrews 1:13).
45. Jesus's argument is not that the Messiah is not David's son — the genealogy in chapter 1 affirms that he is. Rather, the Messiah must be more than David's son: he must also be David's Lord. A father does not call his descendant 'my Lord.' The Messiah must therefore transcend mere Davidic descent. Jesus leaves the implication unspoken, forcing the Pharisees to grapple with it.
46. The double negative — no one could answer (edynato apokrithēnai) and no one dared ask (etolmēsen eperōtēsai) — creates a comprehensive silencing. The verb tolmaō ('to dare, to have courage') indicates that questions stopped not from satisfaction but from fear. This verse closes the series of public debates that began in 21:23 and transitions to Jesus's initiative in chapter 23.

Summary: Matthew 23 records Jesus's most sustained public denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees. After warning the crowds and his disciples about their hypocrisy, Jesus delivers seven 'woe' pronouncements, each targeting a specific form of religious pretense: blocking others from the kingdom, exploiting converts, manipulating oaths, obsessing over minor rules while ignoring justice and mercy, maintaining outward purity while harboring inward corruption, and honoring dead prophets while persecuting living ones. The chapter closes with Jesus's lament over Jerusalem, expressing anguish at the city's refusal to receive God's messengers.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The seven woes form a carefully structured prophetic oracle in the tradition of Isaiah and Amos. Each 'woe' (ouai) is addressed directly to the scribes and Pharisees as 'hypocrites' (hypokritai), creating a relentless rhetorical rhythm. The chapter stands in sharp tension with Jesus's instruction in 23:2-3 to respect the teaching authority of the scribes — the critique is not of the Torah but of those who teach it without practicing it. The lament over Jerusalem (vv. 37-39) shifts from prophetic anger to maternal grief, using the image of a hen gathering her chicks. This is one of the most emotionally raw passages attributed to Jesus in the Gospels.*

Translation Friction: This chapter has a difficult history in Jewish-Christian relations. The language of condemnation has been weaponized against Jewish people as a whole, which is a misreading — Jesus himself is Jewish, his audience is Jewish, and this is an intra-Jewish prophetic critique in the tradition of Jeremiah and Amos. We render the Greek faithfully while noting that 'scribes and Pharisees' designates specific religious leaders, not the Jewish people. The relationship between Matthew's community and the synagogue likely shaped the intensity of this rhetoric.

Connections: The woe oracles echo Isaiah 5:8-23 and Habakkuk 2:6-20. The imagery of whitewashed tombs recalls Ezekiel 13:10-16. Jesus's lament over Jerusalem draws on the maternal imagery of Isaiah 66:13 and the prophetic grief of Jeremiah 8-9. The reference to Abel and Zechariah (v. 35) spans the entire Hebrew Bible from Genesis 4 to 2 Chronicles 24. The closing quotation from Psalm 118:26 connects to the triumphal entry (21:9) and will be fulfilled at the Parousia.

1Then Jesus spoke to the crowds and to his disciples: 2"The scribes and the Pharisees sit on Moses's seat. 3So do and observe everything they tell you, but do not follow their example, for they preach but do not practice. 4They tie up heavy burdens and lay them on people's shoulders, but they themselves are not willing to lift a finger to move them. 5Everything they do is done to be seen by others. They widen their phylacteries and lengthen their tassels. 6They love the place of honor at banquets and the best seats in the synagogues, 7Greetings in the markets, and to be known as of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. 8But you are not to be called 'Rabbi,' for you have one teacher, and you are all brothers and sisters. ⁹And do not call anyone on earth your father, for you have one Father — the heavenly one. ¹⁰Nor are you to be called instructors, for you have one instructor — the Christ. ¹¹The greatest among you will be your servant. ¹²Whoever exalts himself will be humbled, and whoever humbles himself will be exalted. ¹³But woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! You shut the kingdom of heaven in people's faces. You yourselves do not enter, nor do you allow those who are trying to enter to go in. ¹⁵Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! You cross sea and land to make a single convert, and when he becomes one, you make him twice as much a child of hell as yourselves. ¹⁶Woe to you, blind guides, who say, 'Whoever swears by the temple, it means nothing; but whoever swears by the gold of the temple is bound by the oath.' ¹⁷You blind fools! Which is greater: the gold, or the temple that makes the gold sacred? ¹⁸And you say, 'Whoever swears by the altar, it means nothing; but whoever swears by the gift on it is bound by the oath.' ¹⁹You blind ones! Which is greater: the gift, or the altar that makes the gift sacred? ²⁰So whoever swears by the altar swears by it and by everything on it. ²¹And whoever swears by the temple swears by it and by the one who dwells in it. ²²And whoever swears by heaven swears by the throne of God and by the one who sits on it. ²³Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! You tithe mint, dill, and cumin, but you have neglected the weightier matters of the law: justice, mercy, and faithfulness. These you should have practiced without neglecting the others. ²⁴Blind guides! You strain out a gnat but swallow a camel. ²⁵Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! You clean the outside of the cup and dish, but inside they are full of greed and self-indulgence. ²⁶Blind Pharisee! First clean the inside of the cup, so that the outside may become clean as well. ²⁷Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! You are like whitewashed tombs that appear beautiful on the outside but inside are full of dead people's bones and every kind of impurity. ²⁸In the same way, you appear righteous to people on the outside, but inside you are full of hypocrisy and lawlessness. ²⁹Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! You build the tombs of the prophets and decorate the monuments of the righteous, ³⁰Say, If we had been in the period of our fathers, we would not possess been partakers with them in the lifeblood of the God's spokespersons. ³¹So you testify against yourselves that you are the descendants of those who murdered the prophets. ³²Then fill up the measure of your ancestors! ³³You snakes, you brood of vipers! How will you escape the judgment of hell? ³⁴Therefore, I am sending you prophets and wise men and scribes, some of whom you will kill and crucify, and some you will flog in your synagogues and pursue from city to city, ³⁵Indeed, that upon you may come every one of the righteous blood shed upon the world, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom you slew between the temple and the altar. ³⁶Truly I tell you, all these things will come upon this generation. ³⁷"Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you — how often I wanted to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing! ³⁸Look, your house is left to you desolate. ³⁹For I tell you, you will not see me again until you say, 'Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord.'"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The dual audience — crowds (ochlois) and disciples (mathētais) — is significant. The warnings that follow are not private instruction but public proclamation. This positions Jesus as a prophet addressing the entire people, not just his inner circle.
2. The 'seat of Moses' (Mōyseōs kathedras) refers to the teaching authority inherited from Moses — the right to interpret and apply the Torah. Archaeological evidence confirms that synagogues had a literal stone seat from which the Torah was taught. Jesus acknowledges the legitimacy of the office even as he critiques its occupants.
3. This verse is striking: Jesus validates the scribes' and Pharisees' teaching authority (panta hosa ean eipōsin, 'everything they say') while completely rejecting their behavior (kata ta erga autōn mē poieite, 'do not do according to their works'). The critique is hypocrisy — the gap between word and deed — not the content of their teaching itself.
4. The imagery of phortia barea ('heavy loads') contrasts sharply with Jesus's own invitation in 11:30 ('my burden is light'). The verb desmeuousin ('they bind') suggests legal obligations tied tightly. The phrase tō daktylō autōn ou thelousin kinēsai ('they are not willing to move with their finger') exposes the asymmetry: they impose rules they do not share the burden of keeping.
5. Phylacteries (phylaktēria) are small leather boxes containing Scripture passages (Deuteronomy 6:8, 11:18), worn on the forehead and arm during prayer. Making them wider makes one's piety more visible. The tassels (kraspeda) are the fringed borders of the prayer shawl commanded in Numbers 15:38-39. Jesus does not condemn phylacteries or tassels — he himself wore tassels (9:20, 14:36) — but the ostentatious enlargement of them for public display.

5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 6:8 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 15:38-39 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The prōtoklisian ('first reclining place') at a banquet was the seat nearest the host, denoting highest status. The prōtokathedrias ('first seats') in the synagogue were those facing the congregation, reserved for distinguished persons. Both represent social capital — visible markers of religious rank.
7. The title Rabbi (Rhabbi, from the Hebrew rav, 'great one') means 'my master' or 'my teacher.' In the first century it was transitioning from a general honorific to a formal title for Torah scholars. The desire to be called Rabbi reflects the pursuit of status through religious authority.
8. The Greek adelphoi ('brothers') is rendered inclusively as 'brothers and sisters' since the audience includes the crowds (v. 1), not just male disciples. The SBLGNT reads ho didaskalos ('the teacher') without the addition 'even Christ' found in some manuscripts and reflected in the KJV. Jesus establishes a radically egalitarian community ethic — no hierarchy of religious titles.
9. The prohibition against calling anyone 'father' (patera) as a religious title parallels the Rabbi prohibition. 'Father' (abba, pater) was used as a title of respect for esteemed teachers. Jesus does not prohibit the biological use of the word but the use of parental titles to establish religious hierarchy — all authority derives from the heavenly Father alone.
10. The Greek kathēgētai ('guides, instructors, leaders') is distinct from didaskalos ('teacher,' v. 8). Jesus covers three titles — Rabbi, Father, Instructor — to prohibit any title that creates a spiritual hierarchy between believers. The Christ (ho Christos) is identified as the sole legitimate instructor, a significant Christological claim.
11. The word diakonos ('servant, one who serves') is the root of 'deacon.' Jesus redefines greatness not as authority over others but as service to others — a consistent theme (20:26-27). This inverts the entire religious hierarchy just described.
12. The passive verbs tapeinōthēsetai ('will be humbled') and hypsōthēsetai ('will be exalted') are divine passives — God is the unspoken agent who brings down the proud and lifts up the humble. This saying echoes Proverbs 29:23, Ezekiel 21:26, and appears elsewhere in Jesus's teaching (Luke 14:11, 18:14).
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Proverbs 29:23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ezekiel 21:26. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The first woe. The Greek ouai ('woe') is not a curse but a prophetic lament — it expresses grief as much as judgment (cf. Isaiah 5:8-23). The verb kleiete ('you shut, you lock') pictures the kingdom as a door being barred. The participle eiserchomous ('those entering, those in the process of entering') suggests people who were on their way into the kingdom but were blocked by the religious leaders' obstruction.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 5:8-23 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. Verse 14 is not present in the SBLGNT critical text. It appears in the KJV based on later manuscripts that likely imported it from Mark 12:40 or Luke 20:47. Modern critical editions omit it. The verse numbering jumps from 13 to 15 in the SBLGNT.
15. The second woe. The Greek prosēluton ('proselyte, convert') refers to a Gentile who fully converts to Judaism, including circumcision and Torah observance. The verb periatege ('you go around, you traverse') with 'sea and land' conveys exhaustive effort. The phrase huion geennēs ('son of Gehenna') uses the Semitic idiom 'son of X' meaning 'one characterized by X.' Geenna refers to the Valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem, associated with child sacrifice (Jeremiah 7:31) and later with eschatological punishment.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jeremiah 7:31 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The third woe. The address shifts from 'hypocrites' to 'blind guides' (hodēgoi typhloi), emphasizing not just their insincerity but their inability to lead others. The casuistry Jesus describes — distinguishing binding from non-binding oaths based on what one swears by — is a form of oath manipulation that allows deception while maintaining technical innocence. The verb opheilei ('is obligated, is bound') is a financial term applied to moral obligation.
17. The epithet mōroi ('fools') is the same word Jesus warned against using in 5:22 — its use here, in prophetic denunciation from the one with authority to judge, is deliberate. The participle hāgiasas ('having sanctified, having made holy') establishes the theological point: the temple consecrates the gold, not the reverse. Valuing the gold over the temple inverts the sacred order.
18. The same casuistry is now applied to the altar (thysiaστήριον) and the gift (δῶρον) placed upon it. The parallel with verses 16-17 exposes the systematic nature of the deception — it is not a single error but an entire system of oath manipulation.
19. The SBLGNT reads typhloi ('blind ones') without mōroi ('fools'), differing from some manuscripts reflected in the KJV. The argument parallels verse 17 exactly: the altar consecrates the offering, not the reverse.

- 20. Jesus dismantles the casuistry: swearing by a sacred object includes everything associated with it. You cannot separate the container from the contents. This verse begins the logical conclusion (vv. 20-22) that makes all oaths equally binding.
- 21. The participle katoikounti ('the one dwelling') refers to God's presence in the temple. The argument escalates: swearing by the temple invokes not just a building but God himself, who inhabits it. This connects to the Shekhinah tradition — God's dwelling presence in the sanctuary.
- 22. The argument reaches its pinnacle: heaven is God's throne (cf. 5:34, Isaiah 66:1), so every oath invoking heaven invokes God. The conclusion is inescapable — no oath can be made 'non-binding' because all sacred things ultimately point to God, before whom all oaths are binding.
- 22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 66:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 23. The fourth woe. Mint (hēdyosmon), dill (anēthon), and cumin (kyminon) are small garden herbs — tithing them represents extreme scrupulousness about minor regulations. The 'weightier matters' (ta barytera) — justice (krisin), mercy (eleos), and faithfulness (pistin) — echo Micah 6:8. Crucially, Jesus does not say they should stop tithing herbs; he says they should do both (tauta edei poiēsai kakeina mē afienai). The issue is proportion and priority, not abolition of the lesser commands.
- 23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Micah 6:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 24. This vivid hyperbole may contain a wordplay in Aramaic: qalma ('gnat') and gamla ('camel') are near-homophones. The image of straining wine to remove a tiny insect (for ritual purity) while somehow ingesting an entire camel (the largest animal in Palestine, also unclean per Leviticus 11:4) is deliberately absurd. It captures the inverted priorities of verse 23 in a single memorable image.
- 24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 11:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 25. The fifth woe. The cup and dish metaphor addresses ritual purity laws about vessels (cf. Mark 7:1-4). The Greek harpagēs ('robbery, plunder, greed') and akrasias ('lack of self-control, self-indulgence') describe the moral contents behind the ritually clean exterior. The contrast between exōthen ('outside') and esōthen ('inside') is the essence of hypocrisy.
- 26. The singular address Pharisaie typhle ('Blind Pharisee') suddenly personalizes the critique. The logic is simple: if you clean the inside, the outside will follow naturally. Internal transformation produces external purity, not the reverse. This principle underlies Jesus's entire ethical teaching.
- 27. The sixth woe. Tombs were whitewashed before Passover so that pilgrims could avoid accidental contact with them, which would cause ritual defilement (Numbers 19:16). The irony is devastating: the whitewash exists to warn people away from contamination, but here it becomes a metaphor for deliberate concealment. The word akatharsias ('impurity, uncleanness') is the ritual opposite of the purity the Pharisees obsessively cultivate.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Numbers 19:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. The application makes the metaphor explicit. The word anomias ('lawlessness') is striking — these are the very people who claim to be the Torah's guardians, yet Jesus accuses them of anomia, the negation of law (a-nomia, 'without law'). Their meticulous rule-keeping paradoxically constitutes a deeper form of lawlessness because it violates the law's true intent.
- 29. The seventh woe. Archaeological evidence confirms that elaborate tomb monuments were being built around Jerusalem in this period. The verb oikodomeite ('you build') and kosmeite ('you adorn, you decorate') describe acts of memorial piety — honoring prophets of the past. The hypocrisy lies in what follows.
- 30. The Greek koinōnoi ('partners, participants, sharers') implies active complicity, not just passive agreement. The claim to moral superiority over their ancestors is the setup for Jesus's devastating reversal in the next verse — by identifying their ancestors as prophet-killers, they unwittingly confess the family lineage.
- 31. The verb martyreite ('you testify, you bear witness') is legal language — they have given testimony that convicts them. The word huiōi ('sons') means both biological descendants and spiritual heirs. Jesus's logic: by acknowledging that your fathers killed the prophets, you admit kinship with prophet-killers — and your current actions prove the family resemblance.
- 32. The imperative plērōsate ('fill up!') is darkly ironic — possibly a command, possibly a sarcastic permission, possibly a prophetic declaration of inevitability. The 'measure' (metron) of sin is an image from Genesis 15:16, where God tells Abraham that the iniquity of the Amorites 'is not yet complete.' Jesus implies that his generation will bring the accumulated guilt to its fullness.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 15:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The epithets opheis ('snakes') and gennēmata echidnōn ('offspring of vipers') echo John the Baptist's language in 3:7. The rhetorical question pōs phygēte ('how will you flee?') implies no escape is possible. The word geennēs ('Gehenna/hell') refers to the Valley of Hinnom, the image of final divine judgment (cf. 5:22, 29-30, 10:28).
- 34. The remarkable claim egō apostellō ('I am sending') places Jesus in the role of God himself, who in the Old Testament sends prophets. Jesus predicts the persecution of his own future messengers using four escalating verbs: kill (apokteneite), crucify (staurōsete), flog (mastigōsete), and pursue (diōxete). The prediction of crucifixion is specifically Roman punishment, suggesting Jesus foresees the Roman context of early Christian persecution.

- 35. Abel (Genesis 4) is the first murder victim in the Hebrew Bible; Zechariah son of Jehoiada (2 Chronicles 24:20-22) is the last, since Chronicles is the final book in the Hebrew canon. Together they span the entire scriptural record of innocent blood. The identification 'son of Barachiah' creates a difficulty — the Zechariah killed in the temple was the son of Jehoiada (2 Chronicles 24:20), not Barachiah. This may reflect confusion with the prophet Zechariah son of Berechiah (Zechariah 1:1), or it may represent a tradition otherwise lost to us. We render the Greek as given.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 4 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Chronicles 24:20-22 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Zechariah 1:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. The solemn amēn legō hymin ('truly I say to you') marks this as an authoritative prophetic declaration. The phrase tēn genean tautēn ('this generation') most naturally refers to Jesus's contemporaries, placing the prophesied judgment within a generation — a timeframe consistent with the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 AD.
- 37. The tone shifts dramatically from prophetic denunciation to lament. The double vocative Ierousalēm Ierousalēm expresses deep grief (cf. 'Absalom, Absalom!' in 2 Samuel 19:4). The maternal image of a hen (ornis) gathering chicks (nossia) under her wings (pterygas) is extraordinary — Jesus uses a feminine, nurturing metaphor for his own desire to protect Jerusalem. The divine wing as shelter echoes Psalm 91:4 and Ruth 2:12. The verb ēthelēsate ('you were willing') places the blame squarely on Jerusalem's refusal.
- 37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Samuel 19:4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 91:4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ruth 2:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 38. The word oikos ('house') likely refers to the temple, though it could mean Jerusalem or the nation. The adjective erēmos ('deserted, desolate') echoes Jeremiah 22:5 ('this house will become a desolation'). The verb aphietai ('is left, is abandoned') suggests divine departure — God is vacating the premises. The passive voice is a divine passive: God is the one leaving.
- 38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 22:5 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 39. Jesus quotes Psalm 118:26, the same psalm the crowds sang at his triumphal entry (21:9). The phrase ap' arti ('from now') marks a turning point — Jesus's public ministry in Jerusalem is ending. The 'until' (heōs an) implies a future moment of recognition, whether at the Parousia or at a future national repentance. The quotation frames Jesus's departure as a withdrawal of divine presence that will end only when Jerusalem welcomes him as the one coming in the LORD's name.
- 39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalms 118:26. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.

Summary: Matthew 24 contains the Olivet Discourse — Jesus's extended teaching on the destruction of the temple, the signs of his coming, and the end of the age. Prompted by the disciples' question about when the temple will be destroyed and what signs will signal his return, Jesus describes a sequence of tribulations: false messiahs, wars, famines, earthquakes, persecution, the 'abomination of desolation,' cosmic disturbances, and finally the coming of the Son of Man. The chapter closes with parables and warnings about readiness, emphasizing that no one knows the day or hour.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Olivet Discourse is one of the most debated passages in the New Testament. The disciples' question in verse 3 may conflate two events (the temple's destruction and the end of the age) that Jesus addresses separately, or Jesus may see them as typologically connected. The phrase 'abomination of desolation' (v. 15) draws from Daniel 9:27, 11:31, and 12:11, originally referring to Antiochus Epiphanes' desecration of the temple in 167 BC, here reapplied to a future event. The discourse weaves together language of historical catastrophe (consistent with 70 AD) and cosmic apocalyptic imagery (suggesting an event beyond history).

Translation Friction: The central interpretive challenge is distinguishing which predictions refer to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 AD and which refer to the final return of Christ — or whether such a distinction is even intended. We render the Greek as given without imposing a particular eschatological framework. The phrase 'this generation will not pass away until all these things take place' (v. 34) has been interpreted as referring to the generation alive in Jesus's day, the generation alive when the signs begin, or 'generation' in the sense of 'race/people.' We render genea straightforwardly as 'generation' and note the interpretive range.

Connections: The discourse draws heavily on Daniel 7 (Son of Man coming on clouds), Daniel 9 (abomination of desolation), Isaiah 13 and 34 (cosmic upheaval language), Zechariah 12-14 (mourning and judgment), and Joel 2 (signs in sun and moon). The 'days of Noah' comparison (vv. 37-39) connects to Genesis 6-8. The discourse serves as the foundation for much of Revelation's imagery and for Paul's eschatological teaching in 1 Thessalonians 4-5 and 2 Thessalonians 2.

¹Jesus left the temple and was walking away when his disciples came to him to point out the buildings of the temple. ²He answered them, "Do you see all these things? Truly I tell you, not one stone here will be left on another — every one will be thrown down." ³As he sat on the Mount of Olives, the disciples came to him privately, saying, "Tell us, when will these things happen? And what will be the sign of your coming and of the end of the age?" ⁴Jesus answered them, "Watch out that no one deceives you. ⁵For many will come in my name, saying, 'I am the Christ,' and they will deceive many. ⁶You will hear of wars and rumors of wars. See that you are not alarmed, for this must take place, but the end is not yet. ⁷For nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, and there will be famines and earthquakes in various places. ⁸All these things are the beginning of birth pains. ⁹Then they will hand you over to tribulation and kill you, and you will be hated by all nations because of my name. ¹⁰At that time many will fall away, betray one another, and hate one another. ¹¹And many false prophets will arise and deceive many. ¹²And because lawlessness will increase, the love of many will grow cold. ¹³But the one who endures to the end will be saved. ¹⁴And this gospel of the kingdom will be proclaimed throughout the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come. ¹⁵"So when you see the abomination of desolation, spoken of through the prophet Daniel, standing in the holy place" — let the reader understand — ¹⁶Then let them which be in Judaea escape into the hills. ¹⁷The one on the housetop must not go down to get things out of his house, ¹⁸And do not allow him that is in the field return back to take his clothes. ¹⁹How terrible it will be for pregnant women and nursing mothers in those days! ²⁰Pray that your flight will not take place in winter or on a Sabbath. ²¹For at that time there will be great tribulation, such as has not occurred since the beginning of the world until now, and never will again. ²²If those days had not been cut short, no one would survive. But for the sake of the elect, those days will be cut short. ²³Then if anyone says to you, 'Look, here is the Christ!' or 'There he is!' — do not believe it. ²⁴For false messiahs and false prophets will arise and perform great signs and wonders, so as to deceive, if possible, even the elect. ²⁵See, I have told you in advance. ²⁶So if they say to you, 'Look, he is in the wilderness!' — do not go out. Or, 'Look, he is in the inner rooms!' — do not believe it. ²⁷For as lightning comes from the east and flashes to the west, so will be the coming of the Son of Man. ²⁸Wherever the carcass is, there the vultures will gather. ²⁹"Immediately after the tribulation of those days, the sun will be darkened, the moon will not give its light, the stars will fall from the sky, and the powers of the heavens will be shaken. ³⁰Then the sign of the Son of Man will appear in heaven, and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. ³¹He will send out his angels with a loud trumpet call, and they will gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of the heavens to the other. ³²Now learn this lesson from the fig tree: when its branch becomes tender and puts out leaves, you know that summer is near. ³³In the same way, when you see all these things, you know that it is near — right at the door. ³⁴Truly I tell you, this generation will not pass away until all these things take place. ³⁵Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will never pass away. ³⁶But concerning that day and hour, no one knows — not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son — but the Father alone. ³⁷For as were the days of Noah, so will be the coming of the Son of Man. ³⁸Until the day that noe entered into the ark,, for as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. ³⁹Recognized not until the flood arrived, and picked up them all away. So will also the coming of the Son of Man be. ⁴⁰Then two men will be in the field: one will be taken and one left. ⁴¹Two women will be grinding at the mill: one will be taken and one left. ⁴²Therefore stay alert, for you do not know on what day your Lord is coming. ⁴³But understand this: if the homeowner had known at what time of night the thief was coming, he would have stayed awake and would not have let his house be broken into. ⁴⁴For this reason, you also must be ready, because the Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not expect. ⁴⁵"Who then is the faithful and wise servant, whom his master has put in charge of his household, to give them their food at the proper time? ⁴⁶Blessed is that servant whom his master finds doing so when he arrives. ⁴⁷Truly I tell you, he will put him in charge of all his possessions. ⁴⁸But if that wicked servant says in his heart, 'My master is delayed,' ⁴⁹Will start to smite his fellowservants, and to eat and drink with the drunken. ⁵⁰The lord of that attendant will arrive in a time when he looketh not for him, and in an moment that he is not aware of,. ⁵¹Will cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites — where there is sobbing and grinding of teeth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb eporeueto ('was going, was walking away') is imperfect, suggesting Jesus was in the process of departing — a symbolic act following the 'desolate house' pronouncement of 23:38. The disciples' impulse to show him the temple buildings (oikodomas tou hierou) reflects pride in Herod's temple, one of the architectural wonders of the ancient world. Josephus describes its massive stones and gold ornamentation.
2. The double negative ou mē ('absolutely not') with the subjunctive aphethē expresses the strongest possible negation in Greek — this will certainly happen. The prophecy was fulfilled literally in 70 AD when the Romans under Titus destroyed the temple. Josephus records that soldiers pried apart the stones to recover gold that had melted between them during the fire (Jewish War 7.1.1).
3. The disciples' question contains two or possibly three parts: (1) when will the temple be destroyed? (2) what is the sign of your coming (parousia)? (3) what signals the end of the age (synteleias tou aiōnos)? The Greek parousia means 'arrival, presence, coming' and became the technical term for Christ's return. The phrase synteleias tou aiōnos means 'completion of the age,' not 'end of the world' as in the KJV — aiōn is 'age,' not 'world' (kosmos). The Mount of Olives, east of the temple, is associated with eschatological events in Zechariah 14:4.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Zechariah 14:4 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. Jesus begins not with a timeline but with a warning. The verb planēsē ('leads astray, deceives') is from the same root as 'planet' (wandering star) — it suggests being led off course. The imperative blepete ('watch, be alert') sets the tone for the entire discourse: vigilance, not speculation, is the proper response to eschatological questions.
5. The phrase epi tō onomati mou ('on the basis of my name') means they will invoke Jesus's authority or claim to be his successor. The claim egō eimi ho Christos ('I am the Christ') predicts messianic pretenders. Josephus records several such figures in the decades before 70 AD (Theudas, the Egyptian, Bar Kokhba later in 132 AD).
6. The verb throeisthe ('be alarmed, be disturbed') suggests panic or anxiety. Jesus distinguishes between preliminary signs and the end itself (to telos). The word dei ('it is necessary, it must') indicates divine necessity — these events are part of the plan, not signs that the plan has failed. The phrase oupō estin to telos ('the end is not yet') prevents premature eschatological calculation.
7. The phrase ethnos epi ethnos ('nation against nation') echoes Isaiah 19:2 and 2 Chronicles 15:6. The SBLGNT does not include 'pestilences' (loimoi), which appears in some manuscripts reflected in the KJV. The catalog — wars, famines, earthquakes — represents the standard prophetic signs of divine judgment (cf. Isaiah 13, Ezekiel 38, Joel 2).

8. The Greek ōdinōn ('birth pains, labor contractions') is more specific than the KJV's 'sorrows.' The metaphor is significant: birth pains are not pointless suffering but purposeful agony that leads to new life. The image comes from the prophetic tradition (Isaiah 26:17, 66:7-9, Jeremiah 4:31, Micah 4:9-10) where Israel's suffering is compared to labor preceding deliverance.

8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Micah 4:9-10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The verb paradōsousin ('they will hand over, deliver up') is the same word used for Judas's betrayal of Jesus (26:15) and for Jesus being handed over to Pilate (27:2). The term thlipsin ('affliction, distress, tribulation') denotes severe pressure and suffering. The phrase dia to onoma mou ('because of my name') identifies the cause: association with Jesus himself.
10. The verb skandalisthēsontai ('will be caused to stumble, will fall away') describes apostasy under pressure — faith collapsing when the cost becomes too high. The triple repetition of allēlous ('one another') paints a picture of community disintegration: mutual betrayal and mutual hatred replacing mutual love.
11. The pseudoprophētai ('false prophets') are distinct from the false messiahs of verse 5. The term echoes Deuteronomy 13:1-5 and Jeremiah 23:9-40 — Israel's perennial problem of prophets who speak without divine commission. The repetition of pollous ('many') in both subject and object emphasizes the scale of the deception.

11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Jeremiah 23:9-40. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The word anomian ('lawlessness') — the same term used in 23:28 — here describes societal moral collapse. The verb psygēsetai ('will be cooled, will grow cold') uses a temperature metaphor for love (agapē) — the opposite of the fervent love commanded in 22:37-39. The connection between rampant lawlessness and the cooling of love suggests that moral chaos erodes the capacity for genuine community.
13. The participle hypomeinas ('having endured, having persevered') is from hypomenō ('to remain under, to bear up under') — it pictures standing firm under pressure rather than escaping it. 'The end' (telos) may refer to the end of one's life, the end of the tribulation, or the consummation of the age. 'Will be saved' (sōthēsetai) encompasses both spiritual salvation and physical deliverance, depending on context.
14. The Greek oikoumenē ('inhabited world') referred to the known world of the Roman Empire, though its scope may extend beyond that. The phrase eis martyron ('as a testimony/witness') indicates that the proclamation itself constitutes a witness — whether people accept or reject it. This verse makes worldwide gospel proclamation a precondition for 'the end' (to telos), providing a missionary mandate embedded in eschatological prophecy.
15. The 'abomination of desolation' (to bdelygma tēs erēmōseōs) comes from Daniel 9:27, 11:31, and 12:11. In Daniel it referred to Antiochus IV Epiphanes setting up a pagan altar in the temple in 167 BC. Jesus reapplies it to a future desecration. The parenthetical 'let the reader understand' (ho anaginōskōn noeitō) may be Matthew's editorial note to his readers rather than Jesus's words, alerting them that this prophecy requires careful discernment. The 'holy place' (topō hagiō) is the temple area.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 9:27 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The imperative pheugetōsan ('let them flee') conveys urgency — immediate flight, no delay. The instruction to flee to the mountains is practical advice for a military siege: the Judean wilderness and hills east of Jerusalem provided natural refuge. The early church historian Eusebius records that Christians in Jerusalem fled to Pella in Transjordan before the Roman siege of 70 AD.
17. The flat roof (dōmatos) of a Palestinian house was used for daily activities and could be accessed by an external staircase. The instruction is to flee via the rooftops without even entering one's own home — the urgency is that extreme. Every moment spent collecting possessions risks death.
18. The himation ('cloak, outer garment') was an essential item — it served as both clothing and bedding (cf. Exodus 22:26-27). Even this necessity must be abandoned. The verb epistrepstō ('let him turn back') echoes Lot's wife (Genesis 19:26) — looking back is dangerous.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 22:26-27 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 19:26 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The ouai ('woe, alas') here expresses compassion, not condemnation — grief for those whose physical condition makes flight nearly impossible. The phrase en gastri echousais ('having in the womb') and thēlāzousais ('nursing') depict the most vulnerable members of society in a crisis.
20. Winter (cheimōnos) makes travel through the Judean wilderness dangerous — cold, rain, swollen wadis. A Sabbath flight would face two obstacles: restricted travel distances (a 'Sabbath day's journey' was about 2,000 cubits or three-quarters of a mile) and city gates that might be shut. The mention of Sabbath assumes a Jewish-observant audience and reflects Matthew's Jewish-Christian community context.
21. The phrase thlipsis megalē ('great tribulation') has become a technical eschatological term in many traditions. The language of unprecedented suffering echoes Daniel 12:1. The superlative — nothing like it before or after — may be hyperbolic prophetic language (cf. Exodus 10:14 about the locusts, Joel 2:2) or may describe a truly singular event. Josephus's account of the siege of Jerusalem describes starvation, cannibalism, and mass crucifixion that corroborates extreme suffering.

- 22. The verb ekolobōthēsan ('were cut short, were curtailed') implies divine intervention to limit the duration of suffering. The term pasa sarx ('all flesh') means all living people, not just believers. The eklektous ('elect, chosen ones') are the reason for God's mercy in shortening the tribulation — divine compassion for his people sets a boundary on catastrophe.
- 23. Jesus returns to the warning against false messiahs (cf. v. 5). The construction ean tis ('if anyone') is deliberately indefinite — the source of deception could be anyone. The imperative mē pisteusēte ('do not believe') is decisive and unqualified.
- 24. The compound pseudochristoi ('false messiahs/false christs') appears only here and in Mark 13:22 in the entire New Testament. The phrase sēmeia megala kai terata ('great signs and wonders') uses the same language used positively for God's miraculous acts in the Old Testament (Deuteronomy 6:22) — the deception is sophisticated enough to mimic divine authentication. The clause ei dynaton ('if possible') leaves ambiguous whether the elect can actually be deceived — the conditional suggests it may approach but not achieve that.
- 24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 6:22. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 25. The verb proieirēka ('I have foretold') emphasizes that the warning comes before the events, removing any excuse for being caught off guard. The brevity of the statement gives it the force of a prophetic seal — 'You have been warned.'
- 26. Two contrasting locations are named: the wilderness (erēmō), where prophetic and messianic movements typically gathered (cf. the Qumran community, various revolutionary movements), and the inner rooms (tameiois), suggesting secret, esoteric knowledge. Both are rejected — the true coming of the Son of Man will not be hidden or localized.
- 27. The lightning metaphor (astrapē) establishes three qualities of the Parousia: it will be sudden, visible everywhere simultaneously, and unmistakable. No one needs to be told lightning has struck — you simply see it. This eliminates the possibility of a secret or localized return. The title 'Son of Man' (huios tou anthrōpou) draws from Daniel 7:13-14.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 7:13-14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. This proverb-like saying is enigmatic. The Greek aetoi can mean 'eagles' or 'vultures' — vultures is more contextually appropriate since eagles do not typically feed on carrion (ptōma, 'fallen body, corpse'). The saying may mean that judgment naturally finds its target, just as vultures inevitably find a carcass. Some interpreters see a reference to Roman eagles (legionary standards). The exact application is deliberately obscure.
- 29. The adverb eutheōs ('immediately') creates an interpretive challenge — if the tribulation of 'those days' refers to 70 AD, what follows 'immediately' after? The cosmic imagery draws heavily from Isaiah 13:10 (judgment on Babylon) and Isaiah 34:4 (judgment on Edom), where darkened sun and falling stars are prophetic language for political upheaval and divine judgment, not necessarily literal astronomical events. Whether Jesus uses this language literally or figuratively (as the prophets often did) remains debated. The 'powers of the heavens' (dynameis tōn ouranōn) may refer to celestial bodies or to spiritual forces.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 13:10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 34:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. The 'sign' (sēmeion) of the Son of Man is not identified — it may be the Son of Man himself, a banner, a light, or something else entirely. The mourning of 'all the tribes of the earth' (pasai hai phylai tēs gēs) echoes Zechariah 12:10-12, where Israel mourns one whom they have pierced. The coming 'on the clouds' (epi tōn nephelōn) directly fulfills Daniel 7:13-14, where the Son of Man receives universal dominion from the Ancient of Days. The combination of dynamis ('power') and doxa ('glory') contrasts with Jesus's first coming in humility.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 7:13 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Zechariah 12:10-12 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 31. The trumpet (salpingos) echoes the great trumpet of Isaiah 27:13, which summons the scattered Israelites home. The gathering of the elect (eklektous) from the four winds (tessarōn anemōn) fulfills the ingathering prophecies of Deuteronomy 30:4, Isaiah 11:11-12, and Zechariah 2:6. The phrase ap' akrōn ouranōn heōs tōn akrōn autōn ('from the extremities of the heavens to their extremities') means from one horizon to the other — a universal gathering.

- 31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Zechariah 2:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 32. The fig tree (sykēs) parable is an analogy from nature, not an allegory (the fig tree does not represent Israel here, despite some interpretive traditions). In Palestine, the fig tree's visible budding is a reliable harbinger of summer. The Greek hapalos ('tender, soft') describes the supple new growth. Jesus applies this to the preceding signs: when you see them, know that the fulfillment is near.
- 33. The pronoun 'it' (implied by the verb estin) is ambiguous — 'it' could be the Son of Man, the kingdom, or the predicted destruction. The phrase epi thyras ('at the doors') is a vivid spatial metaphor: whatever is coming has arrived at the threshold and is about to enter.
- 34. This is one of the most debated verses in the New Testament. The word genea ('generation') most naturally means the people alive at a given time (roughly 30-40 years). If taken at face value, Jesus predicts that everything described in vv. 4-31 will occur within the lifetime of his contemporaries. This fits the destruction of Jerusalem (70 AD, about 40 years after Jesus's ministry) but creates tension with the cosmic-scale events of vv. 29-31. Alternative readings take genea as 'race' (the Jewish people will not cease to exist) or 'type of people' (evil generation). We render the word in its primary sense and note the interpretive range.
- 35. The contrast between the temporary (heaven and earth) and the permanent (Jesus's words) is a staggering claim. The verb parelusetai ('will pass away, will come to an end') applied to heaven and earth echoes Isaiah 51:6 and Psalm 102:26. The double negative ou mē parelthōsin ('absolutely will not pass away') applied to Jesus's words places them above creation itself in permanence — a claim of divine authority.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 51:6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 102:26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. The SBLGNT includes oude ho huioi ('nor the Son'), which some manuscripts omit (the KJV follows manuscripts that omit it). The inclusion is generally considered original and theologically significant: Jesus acknowledges a limitation on his own knowledge regarding the timing of the end. The three-tiered exclusion (no human, no angel, not even the Son) concentrates all knowledge of the timing in the Father alone. This verse fundamentally undercuts all attempts to calculate the date of Christ's return.
- 37. The Noah comparison (hai hēmerai tou Nōe) establishes an analogy not about wickedness but about normalcy — people will be going about ordinary life when the end comes. The Greek Nōe is the Septuagint form of the Hebrew Noah.
- 38. The activities listed — eating (trōgontes), drinking (pinontes), marrying (gamountes), and giving in marriage (gamizontes) — are not sinful but ordinary. The point is not that they were doing evil things but that they were oblivious. The kataklysmos ('flood, deluge') is the Greek term used in the Septuagint for Noah's flood (Genesis 6-8).
- 38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 6-8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 39. The verb ouk egnōsan ('they did not know, they did not realize') is the key: the catastrophe was not unannounced (Noah was building the ark in plain sight) but unrecognized. The verb ēren ('took away, swept away') pictures sudden, total removal. The parousia will similarly overtake those who are not alert.
- 40. The verb paralambanetai ('is taken, is received') and aphietai ('is left, is released') have been interpreted in opposite ways: 'taken' as gathered for salvation (cf. v. 31) or 'taken' in judgment (as the flood 'took' in v. 39). The Noah context suggests 'taken' means taken in judgment and 'left' means spared, though the reverse interpretation (taken to be with the Lord) is also defended. We render the Greek without interpretive addition.
- 41. Grinding grain at a hand mill (mylō) was a common daily task for women in first-century Palestine. The parallel with verse 40 extends the point: the separation will occur during the most routine activities, without warning, in both men's and women's domains of daily life.
- 42. The imperative grēgoreite ('stay awake, be watchful, be alert') becomes the dominant theme from here through chapter 25. The SBLGNT reads hēmera ('day') rather than hōra ('hour') found in some manuscripts. The practical application of the preceding prophecy is not calculation but constant readiness.
- 43. The Greek oikodespotēs ('master of the house, homeowner') becomes the subject of a brief parable. The phylakē ('watch') refers to the Roman system dividing the night into four watches. The verb diorychthenai ('to be dug through') reflects Palestinian construction: mud-brick walls could literally be tunneled through by a thief. The analogy is startling — the Son of Man's coming is compared to a thief's break-in (cf. 1 Thessalonians 5:2, Revelation 3:3).
- 44. The imperative ginesthe hetoimoi ('be ready, become prepared') calls for ongoing readiness, not a one-time preparation. The phrase hē ou dokeite hōra ('the hour you do not think/expect') adds an ironic twist: the one thing you can be sure of is that it will not be when you expect it.

45. The parable shifts to a household manager. The Greek pistos ('faithful, trustworthy') and phronimos ('wise, prudent') describe the ideal servant. The oiketeia ('household, household servants') represents those under the servant's care. The question 'who then is...?' invites the listener to identify with or aspire to this role.
46. The word makarios ('blessed, fortunate, happy') is the same word that opens the Beatitudes (5:3-11). The key phrase is houtōs poiounta ('doing thus') — blessedness is found in faithful action at the moment of the master's return, not in speculation about when the return will occur.
47. The reward for faithfulness is expanded responsibility — the servant who managed the household well is given authority over all the master's possessions (pasin tois hyparchousin). This principle — faithfulness in small things leading to authority over greater things — recurs in the parable of the talents (25:21, 23).
48. The phrase en tē kardia autou ('in his heart') indicates private calculation, not public rebellion. The verb chronizei ('delays, takes a long time') reveals the servant's reasoning: he assumes the master's absence will continue, so he can act with impunity. The adjective kakos ('wicked, evil') characterizes the servant by his response to the delay, not by a separate category of person.
49. The wicked servant's behavior manifests in two ways: abuse of those under his authority (typtein tous syndoulous, 'beating his fellow servants') and self-indulgence (eating and drinking with drunkards). The combination of oppression and excess characterizes unfaithful leadership — using one's position for personal gain while harming those one is supposed to serve.
50. The double expression — a day he does not expect (ou prosdoka) and an hour he does not know (ou ginōskei) — echoes verse 36. The servant's calculation that the master is delayed proves fatally wrong. The surprise element reinforces the discourse's central theme: readiness, not prediction.
51. The verb dichotomēsei ('will cut in two, will cut to pieces') is shockingly graphic — whether literal dismemberment or a metaphor for severe punishment is debated. The phrase meta tōn hypokritōn ('with the hypocrites') is distinctly Matthean (Luke's parallel has 'with the unfaithful'). The unfaithful servant is classified with the hypocrites of chapter 23 — those who had a role in God's household but served themselves instead. The formula 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' appears for the sixth and final time in Matthew.

Summary: Matthew 25 continues the Olivet Discourse with three parables about readiness and accountability. The parable of the ten virgins warns against being unprepared for the bridegroom's delayed arrival. The parable of the talents teaches that faithful stewardship of what has been entrusted will be rewarded, while fearful inaction will be judged. The chapter culminates in the parable of the sheep and goats — a vision of the Son of Man judging all nations based on how they treated 'the least of these,' identifying care for the hungry, thirsty, stranger, naked, sick, and imprisoned as care for Christ himself.

What Makes This Remarkable: The sheep and goats passage (vv. 31-46) is unique to Matthew and is one of the most ethically demanding texts in the Gospels. The criterion of judgment is not doctrinal correctness or religious observance but practical compassion for the vulnerable. Both the righteous and the unrighteous are surprised by the identification of Jesus with 'the least of these' — neither group knew they were serving or neglecting Christ himself. This radical identification of the exalted Son of Man with the suffering poor has shaped Christian ethics for two millennia.

Translation Friction: *The identity of 'the least of these my brothers' (v. 40) is debated: does it refer to all suffering people, to persecuted Christians specifically, or to Christian missionaries? The Greek adelphōn mou ('my brothers') could support any of these. We render the text straightforwardly. The parable of the talents has been misused to justify economic exploitation; the original context is eschatological accountability, not capitalist productivity. The 'outer darkness' language (v. 30) and 'eternal punishment' (v. 46) raise questions about the nature and duration of divine judgment that we note without resolving.*

Connections: The ten virgins echoes Song of Solomon 3:1-4 (seeking the beloved at night) and connects to the wedding feast imagery of 22:1-14. The talents parable develops the faithful/wicked servant contrast of 24:45-51. The sheep and goats scene draws on Daniel 7:9-14 (the Son of Man's tribunal), Ezekiel 34 (God judging between sheep), and Joel 3:1-3 (judgment of the nations). The six acts of mercy listed in vv. 35-36 became foundational for Christian charitable practice.

ut at midnight a shout rang out: 'Here is the bridegroom! Come out to meet him!' ⁷Then all those virgins got up and trimmed their lamps. ⁸The foolish said to the wise, 'Give us some of your oil, for our lamps are going out.' ⁹But the wise answered, 'There may not be enough for both us and you. Go instead to the dealers and buy some for yourselves.' ¹⁰While they were going away to buy oil, the bridegroom came, and those who were ready went in with him to the wedding feast. And the door was shut. ¹¹Later the other virgins came and said, 'Lord, lord, open the door for us!' ¹²But he answered, 'Truly I tell you, I do not know you.' ¹³Therefore stay alert, for you know neither the day nor the hour. ¹⁴"For it is like a man going on a journey who called his servants and entrusted his property to them. ¹⁵To one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one — each according to his own ability. Then he went away. ¹⁶The one who had received the five talents went at once and traded with them, and made five more. ¹⁷In the same way, the one with two talents gained two more. ¹⁸But the one who had received one talent went off, dug a hole in the ground, and hid his master's money. ¹⁹After a long time, the master of those servants returned and settled accounts with them. ²⁰The one who had received five talents came forward and brought five more, saying, 'Master, you entrusted me with five talents. See, I have gained five more.' ²¹His master said to him, 'Well done, good and faithful servant! You have been faithful with a few things; I will put you in charge of many things. Enter into the joy of your master.' ²²The one with two talents also came forward and said, 'Master, you entrusted me with two talents. See, I have gained two more.' ²³His master said to him, 'Well done, good and faithful servant! You have been faithful with a few things; I will put you in charge of many things. Enter into the joy of your master.' ²⁴Then the one who had received one talent came forward and said, 'Master, I knew you to be a hard man, reaping where you did not sow and gathering where you did not scatter seed. ²⁵So I was afraid and went and hid your talent in the ground. Here — you have what is yours.' ²⁶His master answered him, 'You wicked and lazy servant! You knew that I reap where I did not sow and gather where I did not scatter? ²⁷Then you should have deposited my money with the bankers, and on my return I would have received it back with interest. ²⁸So take the talent from him and give it to the one who has ten talents. ²⁹For to everyone who has, more will be given, and he will have an abundance. But from the one who does not have, even what he has will be taken from him. ³⁰And throw the worthless servant into the outer darkness. In that place there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth.' ³¹"When the Son of Man comes in his glory, and all the angels with him, then he will sit on his glorious throne. ³²All the nations will be gathered before him, and he will separate people from one another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats. ³³He will place the sheep on his right and the goats on his left. ³⁴Then the King will say to those on his right, 'Come, you who are blessed by my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. ³⁵For I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me drink, I was a stranger and you welcomed me, ³⁶I was naked and you clothed me, I was sick and you visited me, I was in prison and you came to me.' ³⁷Then the righteous will answer him, 'Lord, when did we see you hungry and feed you, or thirsty and give you drink? ³⁸When did we see you a stranger and welcome you, or naked and clothe you? ³⁹When did we see you sick or in prison and come to you?' ⁴⁰And the King will answer them, 'Truly I tell you, whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers and sisters of mine, you did for me.' ⁴¹Then he will say to those on his left, 'Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. ⁴²For I was hungry and you gave me no food, I was thirsty and you gave me no drink, ⁴³I was a stranger and you did not welcome me, naked and you did not clothe me, sick and in prison and you did not visit me.' ⁴⁴Then they also will answer, 'Lord, when did we see you hungry or thirsty or a stranger or naked or sick or in prison, and did not serve you?' ⁴⁵Then he will answer them, 'Truly I tell you, whatever you did not do for one of the least of these, you did not do for me.' ⁴⁶And these will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek parthenois ('virgins, unmarried young women') refers to the bridal attendants, not the bride herself. The lampadas ('torches, lamps') were likely torchlike lamps — oil-soaked cloths wrapped around sticks — used in wedding processions. The scene depicts a nighttime bridal procession, a common feature of Jewish weddings where the bridegroom came to collect the bride and bring her to his home.
2. Matthew reverses the typical order and names the foolish (mōrai) first, emphasizing their failure. The adjectives mōrai ('foolish') and phronimoi ('wise, prudent') are the same terms used for the builders on sand and rock in 7:24-26 — folly and wisdom are defined by preparedness for what is coming.

3. The Greek elaion ('olive oil') was the standard lamp fuel. Taking lamps without extra oil reveals short-term thinking — they prepared for the event but not for a delay. The folly is not malice but negligence.
4. The ageiois ('vessels, containers, flasks') represent reserve supply. The wise virgins' preparation was not extraordinary — they simply anticipated that the bridegroom might be delayed. Wisdom, in this parable, is realistic expectation combined with adequate preparation.
5. The participle chronizontos ('delaying, being late') uses the same root as 24:48 where the wicked servant said 'my master is delayed.' Crucially, all ten — wise and foolish — fell asleep. Sleep is not the failing; lack of oil is. The distinction between the two groups is not greater vigilance but better preparation.
6. The timing — mesēs nyktos ('middle of the night') — fulfills the theme of unexpected arrival (24:44, 50). The kraugē ('shout, cry') pierces the sleeping darkness. The imperative exerchesthe ('come out!') demands immediate action. The verb apantēsin ('meeting, encounter') was used technically for the welcoming delegation that went out to meet a visiting dignitary.
7. The verb ekosmēsan ('trimmed, arranged, put in order') involves adjusting the wicks and refueling — standard lamp maintenance. All ten perform the same action, but only now does the difference in preparation become apparent.
8. The present tense sbennyntai ('are being extinguished, are going out') describes the lamps flickering and dying — there is still a brief window, but it is closing. The request dote hēmin ('give us') reveals the crisis: preparation cannot be borrowed at the last moment.
9. The refusal is not selfishness but realism — mēpote ou mē arkesē ('perhaps there will certainly not be enough') acknowledges that sharing would leave all ten without adequate oil. The parable's point is that some things cannot be shared or transferred at the last moment: personal spiritual preparedness is not a communal resource.
10. The timing is cruel in its precision: the bridegroom arrives during the foolish virgins' absence. The word hetoimoi ('ready, prepared') is the same term from 24:44 ('you also must be ready'). The passive ekeleisthē ('was shut') has the finality of divine decision — the door, once closed, will not reopen. The shut door is the parable's climactic image.
11. The doubled vocative kyrie kyrie ('Lord, lord!') echoes 7:21-23, where Jesus warned that saying 'Lord, Lord' would not be enough without corresponding obedience. The frantic repetition conveys desperation. The request anoixon hēmin ('open for us!') meets the closed door of verse 10.
12. The bridegroom's response ouk oida hymas ('I do not know you') is not a factual claim of unfamiliarity but a legal-relational declaration of non-recognition — equivalent to disowning. This parallels 7:23 ('I never knew you'). In Semitic idiom, 'to know' implies relationship; 'not to know' means the relationship does not exist.
13. The SBLGNT does not include 'wherein the Son of man comes' (en hē ho huioi tou anthrōpou erchetai), which appears in later manuscripts and the KJV. The imperative grēgoreite ('stay alert, keep watch') provides the moral of the parable, linking back to 24:42. The emphasis is on the double ignorance: neither the day (hēmeran) nor the hour (hōran) is knowable.
14. The Greek apodēmōn ('going abroad, traveling away') indicates an extended absence — the master's return is indefinite. The verb paredōken ('handed over, entrusted') implies both trust and accountability. The master's property (ta hyparchonta autou) represents whatever God entrusts to his people. The SBLGNT does not include 'the kingdom of heaven is as' explicitly, but the meaning is implied by the connecting gar ('for').
15. A talanton ('talent') was a unit of weight (about 75 pounds / 34 kg), and when applied to money, represented approximately 6,000 denarii — about 20 years' wages for a laborer. Even one talent was an enormous sum. The phrase kata tēn idian dynamin ('according to his own ability') indicates that the distribution was personalized, not arbitrary — the master knew each servant's capacity.
16. The adverb eutheōs ('immediately, at once') indicates prompt action. The verb ērgasato ('worked, traded, did business') implies active investment. The verb ekerdēsen ('gained, profited') is from kerdos ('gain, profit'). The 100% return represents exceptional stewardship, not a specific investment strategy.
17. The word hōsautōs ('in the same way, likewise') establishes that the proportional return, not the absolute amount, is what matters. Both the five-talent and two-talent servants achieved 100% return — identical faithfulness despite different scales.
18. Burying money (ōryxen gēn, 'dug the earth') was a common method of safeguarding valuables in the ancient world and was considered a reasonable precaution in rabbinic law (b. Baba Metzia 42a). The servant did not lose the money or steal it — he preserved it. His failure was in doing nothing more than preserving it.
19. The phrase meta polyn chronon ('after much time') reinforces the theme of delayed return from 24:48 and 25:5. The expression synairei logon ('settles accounts,' literally 'takes up a reckoning together') is a commercial term for auditing — the time of accountability has come.
20. The servant's report is straightforward and factual: he acknowledges what was given (paredōkas, 'you entrusted') and presents the result (ekerdēsa, 'I gained'). There is no boasting — the credit structure of the sentence places the master's entrustment before the servant's achievement.
21. The exclamation eu ('well done!') is a single Greek word conveying approval. The adjectives agathe ('good') and piste ('faithful, trustworthy') describe character, not just performance. The phrase epi oligā ('over a few things') is remarkable — five talents was an enormous sum, yet the master calls it 'a few things' compared to what is coming. The invitation eiselthe eis tēn charan ('enter into the joy') transcends mere reward — it is admission to participation in the master's own celebration.

- 22. The two-talent servant's report mirrors the five-talent servant's almost verbatim. The parallel structure emphasizes that the proportion of faithfulness, not the absolute amount, is what the master evaluates.
- 23. The master's response is word-for-word identical to verse 21. The two-talent servant receives exactly the same commendation, the same reward, and the same invitation to joy as the five-talent servant. This is the parable's most important structural feature: God's approval is based on faithfulness relative to what was given, not on absolute output.
- 24. The one-talent servant does not report results but offers an accusation: egnōn se ('I knew you') becomes a character indictment. The adjective sklēros ('hard, harsh, demanding') frames the master as exploitative. The agricultural metaphor — reaping where you did not sow (therizōn hopou ouk espeiras), gathering where you did not scatter (synagōn hothēn ou dieskorpisas) — accuses the master of profiting from others' labor. Whether this is an accurate description of the master or the servant's self-justifying distortion is the interpretive question.
- 25. The participle phobētheis ('being afraid, having feared') reveals the servant's motivation: fear, not laziness. The phrase ide echeis to son ('look, you have what is yours') is simultaneously a return of property and a rejection of relationship. The servant treats the talent as a liability to be preserved, not a gift to be invested.
- 26. The master's reply uses the servant's own words against him. The adjectives ponēre ('wicked') and oknēre ('lazy, slothful, hesitant') provide the master's counter-assessment. The word oknēros implies not just idleness but timid shrinking back. The master's question ēdeis hoti ('you knew that...?') can be read as accepting the servant's premise for argument's sake: 'Even if that were true, it should have motivated you to act, not to freeze.'
- 27. The trapezitais ('bankers, money-changers,' literally 'table-men' from trapeza, 'table') operated exchange tables in the marketplace. The word tokō ('interest,' literally 'offspring' — money begetting money) refers to the return on a deposit. The master's argument is devastating: even the minimum effort — simply depositing the money — would have been acceptable. The servant did not even do that. The prohibition against charging interest to fellow Israelites (Deuteronomy 23:19-20) did not apply to banking deposits.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 23:19-20. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. The command to redistribute the talent to the most productive servant (not divided equally) follows the principle stated in verse 29. The one talent is not returned to the master's treasury but given to another servant — unfaithfulness results in the loss of what was entrusted.
- 29. This paradoxical principle appears four times in the Gospels (Matthew 13:12, 25:29; Mark 4:25; Luke 19:26). In context, 'having' means having produced results through faithful stewardship. The one who uses what is given receives more; the one who does not use it loses even the original gift. This is a spiritual principle about faithfulness, not an economic observation about wealth concentration.
- 30. The adjective achreion ('useless, worthless, unprofitable') describes the servant's net contribution: nothing. The phrase to skotos to exōteron ('the outer darkness') and the formula 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' appear for the final time in Matthew (cf. 8:12, 22:13, 24:51). The severity of the punishment — identical to the hypocrites' fate — indicates that inactive preservation of what God gives is as culpable as active rebellion.
- 31. The scene shifts from parable to apocalyptic vision. The Son of Man arrives en tē doxē autou ('in his glory') — the same glory foretold in 24:30. The phrase thronos doxēs ('throne of glory') echoes the divine throne room of Daniel 7:9-10 and 1 Enoch 62:5. Jesus claims the judicial authority that in the Old Testament belongs exclusively to God.
- 31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Daniel 7:9-10. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 32. The phrase panta ta ethnē ('all the nations/peoples') is universal in scope. The verb aphorisei ('will separate, will set apart') uses the same root as 'Pharisee' (pharisaïos, 'separated one'). The pastoral imagery of a shepherd (poimēn) dividing sheep from goats echoes Ezekiel 34:17-22, where God himself judges between sheep. In Palestine, sheep and goats often grazed together but were separated at night.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ezekiel 34:17-22. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The right side (dexiōn) is the position of honor and favor throughout Scripture and the ancient world (cf. Psalm 110:1). The left (euōnymōn, literally 'well-named' — a euphemism, since the left was considered unlucky) is the position of disfavor. The spatial arrangement visualizes the coming verdict.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 110:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The title basileus ('King') replaces 'Son of Man' — the judge is also the king. The passive eulogēmenoi ('blessed ones') is a divine passive: blessed by God. The verb klēronomēsate ('inherit') frames the kingdom as an inheritance, not an earned wage — it was prepared (hētoimasmenēn, 'made ready') before the beneficiaries existed, from the foundation of the world (apo katabolēs kosmou). The kingdom is God's gift, even though the criterion of entry involves human action.
- 35. The six acts of mercy begin. The first-person statements are extraordinary — the King identifies himself with the recipients of care. The word xenos ('stranger, foreigner') denotes someone outside the community, without local connections or legal protections. The verb synēgagete ('you gathered together, you took in') implies hospitality — bringing the outsider into community.

- 36. The final three acts: clothing the naked (gymnos, which can mean 'poorly clothed' as well as completely unclothed), visiting the sick (epeskepsasthe, from episkopeō, 'to look upon, to visit, to care for' — the root of 'bishop/overseer'), and visiting prisoners (en phylakē, 'in custody/prison'). Ancient prisons provided no food or care — prisoners depended entirely on outside visitors for survival. These six acts (feeding, giving drink, hospitality, clothing, caring for the sick, visiting prisoners) became the traditional 'corporal works of mercy' in Christian ethics.
- 37. The righteous (dikaioi) are genuinely surprised — their compassion was not calculated to earn a reward. The question pote se eidomen ('when did we see you?') reveals that they were unaware they were serving Christ. This unconscious righteousness is precisely the point: authentic compassion does not perform for an audience.
- 38. The questions continue through the same six categories, emphasizing the righteous ones' complete lack of awareness that their acts of mercy had any connection to Christ. The repetition creates a liturgical rhythm.
- 39. The final pair — sick and imprisoned — represents the most marginalized members of society. Visiting the sick and imprisoned carried social stigma and personal risk. The righteous ones' question implies they would have done more had they known.
- 40. This is the theological center of the passage. The phrase eph' hoson ('inasmuch as, to the extent that, whatever') creates a comprehensive equivalence. The superlative elachistōn ('least, smallest, most insignificant') identifies Christ with society's most overlooked members. The phrase tōn adelphōn mou ('my brothers') has been interpreted as referring to all suffering people, to fellow Christians, or to Christian missionaries. The Greek adelphōn is rendered 'brothers and sisters' as the context addresses all nations. The identification emoi epoiēsate ('you did it to me') makes compassion for the vulnerable a direct encounter with Christ.
- 41. The contrast with verse 34 is sharp: 'Come' versus 'Depart' (poreuesthe ap' emou); 'blessed by my Father' versus 'cursed' (katēramenoi); 'inherit the kingdom prepared for you' versus 'into the eternal fire prepared for the devil.' Note that the kingdom was prepared 'for you' while the fire was prepared 'for the devil and his angels' (tō diabolō kai tois angelois autou) — the fire's intended occupants are demonic, not human. Humans who end up there are in a place not designed for them. The adjective aiōnion ('eternal, age-long') is from aiōn ('age'); its precise meaning — unending or age-long — is debated.
- 42. The accusation mirrors verses 35-36 point by point, with the devastating addition of ouk ('not') before each verb. The judgment is not for active harm but for passive neglect — sins of omission rather than commission.
- 43. The six categories are compressed slightly here — 'sick and in prison' are combined into one clause — but the same acts of neglect are catalogued. The passive construction makes the failing clear: they saw need and did nothing.
- 44. The goats' question mirrors the sheep's (vv. 37-39) — they too are surprised. They did not realize that neglecting the vulnerable was neglecting Christ. The verb diēkonēsamen ('we served, we ministered to') is from diakoneō, the root of 'deacon/servant.' Their defense is ignorance, but ignorance of Christ's identification with the suffering is not accepted as an excuse.
- 45. The negative counterpart to verse 40. The word adelphōn ('brothers') is absent from the SBLGNT here (present in v. 40 but not v. 45), which may broaden the identification beyond 'my brothers' to 'the least' in general. The principle works in both directions: service to the least is service to Christ; neglect of the least is neglect of Christ.
- 46. The parallel structure places kolasin aiōnion ('eternal punishment') and zōēn aiōnion ('eternal life') in direct opposition, both modified by the same adjective aiōnion. The word kolasin ('punishment, correction') comes from kolazō ('to prune, to cut short, to punish'). Whether aiōnion means 'everlasting' (without end) or 'of the age to come' (pertaining to the coming age) is debated; the same adjective modifies both destinies, so consistency requires reading them the same way. This verse concludes the Olivet Discourse and Jesus's public teaching in Matthew.

Summary: Matthew 26 narrates the events leading to Jesus's arrest and trial. The chapter opens with the plot to kill Jesus, the anointing at Bethany, and Judas's agreement to betray him. Jesus then shares the Passover meal with his disciples, institutes the Lord's Supper, predicts Peter's denial, agonizes in prayer at Gethsemane, and is arrested. The chapter concludes with Jesus's trial before the high priest Caiaphas, Peter's three denials, and Peter's bitter weeping.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is dense with irony and theological significance. The woman who anoints Jesus performs a prophetic act that the disciples cannot understand — she is anointing him for burial while they debate the waste. Judas's betrayal price of thirty silver coins echoes Zechariah 11:12-13. The Last Supper reinterprets the Passover in terms of Jesus's own body and blood, establishing a 'new covenant.' Jesus's prayer in Gethsemane — 'not as I will, but as you will' — is the ultimate expression of submission to the Father. The arrest scene includes Jesus's enigmatic statement that he could summon twelve legions of angels but chooses not to, placing his suffering squarely within divine purpose.

Translation Friction: The institution narrative (vv. 26-29) is among the most theologically disputed texts in Christianity — different traditions interpret 'this is my body' and 'this is my blood' in radically different ways (transubstantiation, consubstantiation, memorial, spiritual presence). We render the Greek without theological interpretation. The phrase 'blood of the covenant poured out for many' (v. 28) echoes both Exodus 24:8 (covenant blood) and Isaiah 53:12 (poured out for many). Jesus's statement 'the one who dipped his hand in the bowl with me' (v. 23) does not identify Judas publicly — in the reclining posture, multiple people shared the same dish.

Connections: The Passover setting connects to Exodus 12. The anointing echoes the anointing of priests and kings (Exodus 29, 1 Samuel 16). The thirty silver coins fulfill Zechariah 11:12. The cup language draws on Isaiah 51:17 and Jeremiah 25:15 (cup of God's wrath). Gethsemane ('oil press') connects to the Mount of Olives and the crushing imagery of Isaiah 53. Peter's denial fulfills Jesus's prediction and echoes the scattering of the sheep (Zechariah 13:7, quoted in v. 31). The trial before Caiaphas involves the Son of Man language of Daniel 7:13 and the right-hand imagery of Psalm 110:1.

¹When Jesus had finished all these words, he said to his disciples, ²"You know that after two days the Passover is coming, and the Son of Man will be handed over to be crucified." ³Then the chief priests and the elders of the people gathered in the courtyard of the high priest, whose name was Caiaphas, ⁴Plotted that they might take Jesus by subtility, and kill him. ⁵But they said, "Not during the festival, or there may be a riot among the people." ⁶In the house of Simon the leper,, and now after Jesus was in Bethany. ⁷There arrived to him a lady having an alabaster box of very costly ointment, and poured it on his head, as he sat at meat. ⁸When the disciples saw this, they were indignant. "Why this waste?" they asked. ⁹"This could have been sold for a large sum and the money given to the poor." ¹⁰Aware of this, Jesus said to them, "Why are you troubling this woman? She has done a beautiful thing for me. ¹¹For you will always have the poor with you, but you will not always have me. ¹²By pouring this perfume on my body, she has done it to prepare me for burial. ¹³Truly I tell you, wherever this gospel is proclaimed in the whole world, what she has done will also be told in memory of her." ¹⁴Went to the chief priests,, then one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot. ¹⁵Stated to them, What will you give me, and I will deliver him to you? then they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. ¹⁶From that time on, he looked for an opportunity to hand Jesus over. ¹⁷On the first day of Unleavened Bread, the disciples came to Jesus and asked, "Where do you want us to prepare for you to eat the Passover?" ¹⁸He said, "Go into the city to a certain man and tell him, 'The Teacher says: My time is near. I will observe the Passover at your house with my disciples.'" ¹⁹The disciples did as Jesus directed them and prepared the Passover. ²⁰When evening came, he reclined at the table with the Twelve. ²¹While they were eating, he said, "Truly I tell you, one of you will betray me." ²²Deeply distressed, they began to say to him one after another, "Surely not I, Lord?" ²³He answered, "The one who has dipped his hand into the bowl with me — he will betray me. ²⁴The Son of Man goes as it is written about him, but woe to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! It would have been better for that man if he had not been born." ²⁵Judas, who was betraying him, answered, "Surely not I, Rabbi?" Jesus said to him, "You have said it yourself." ²⁶While they were eating, Jesus took bread, blessed it, broke it, and gave it to the disciples, saying, "Take, eat. This is my body." ²⁷Then he took a cup, gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, "Drink from it, all of you. ²⁸For this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins. ²⁹I tell you, from now on I will not drink of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." ³⁰After singing a hymn, they went out to the Mount of Olives. ³¹Then Jesus said to them, "You will all fall away because of me this night, for it is written: 'I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock will be scattered.'" ³²But after I am raised up, I will go ahead of you to Galilee." ³³Peter answered him, "Even if everyone else falls away because of you, I will never fall away." ³⁴Jesus said to him, "Truly I tell you, this very night, before the rooster crows, you will deny me three times." ³⁵Peter said to him, "Even if I must die with you, I will never deny you." And all the disciples said the same thing. ³⁶Then Jesus came with them to a place called Gethsemane, and he said to the disciples, "Sit here while I go over there and pray." ³⁷Taking Peter and the two sons of Zebedee with him, he began to be sorrowful and deeply troubled. ³⁸Then he said to them, "My soul is overwhelmed with sorrow to the point of death. Stay here and keep watch with me." ³⁹Going a little farther, he fell face down and prayed, "My Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me. Yet not as I will, but as you will." ⁴⁰Then he came to the disciples and found them sleeping, and he said to Peter,

"So, could you not keep watch with me for one hour? ⁴¹Stay awake and pray that you may not enter into temptation. The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." ⁴²Again, a second time, he went away and prayed, "My Father, if this cannot pass unless I drink it, your will be done." ⁴³Again he came and found them sleeping, for their eyes were heavy. ⁴⁴So he left them and went away once more, praying a third time, saying the same thing again. ⁴⁵Then he came to the disciples and said to them, "Are you still sleeping and resting? See, the hour is at hand, and the Son of Man is being betrayed into the hands of sinners. ⁴⁶Get up, let us go. See, my betrayer is near." ⁴⁷While he was still speaking, suddenly Judas, one of the Twelve, arrived, and with him a large crowd armed with swords and clubs, sent from the chief priests and elders of the people. ⁴⁸Now the betrayer had given them a sign, saying, "The one I kiss — that is the man. Seize him." ⁴⁹Immediately he went up to Jesus and said, "Greetings, Rabbi!" and kissed him. ⁵⁰Jesus said to him, "Friend, do what you came to do." Then they came forward, seized Jesus, and arrested him. ⁵¹Suddenly, one of those with Jesus reached for his sword, drew it, and struck the servant of the high priest, cutting off his ear. ⁵²Then Jesus said to him, "Put your sword back in its place, for all who draw the sword will die by the sword. ⁵³Do you think that I cannot appeal to my Father, and he will at once send me more than twelve legions of angels? ⁵⁴But then how would the Scriptures be fulfilled that say it must happen this way?" ⁵⁵At that hour Jesus said to the crowds, "Have you come out as if against a rebel, with swords and clubs to arrest me? Day after day I sat in the temple teaching, and you did not arrest me. ⁵⁶But all this has happened so that the writings of the prophets would be fulfilled." Then all the disciples abandoned him and fled. ⁵⁷Those who had arrested Jesus led him away to Caiaphas the high priest, where the scribes and elders had gathered. ⁵⁸But Peter followed him at a distance, right up to the courtyard of the high priest. He went inside and sat down with the guards to see the outcome. ⁵⁹The chief priests and the whole council were seeking false testimony against Jesus in order to put him to death, ⁶⁰But discovered none — yea, though numerous false witnesses arrived, yet discovered they none. At the last arrived two false witnesses, ⁶¹Stated, This fellow stated, I am able to destroy the sanctuary of God, and to build it in three period. ⁶²The high priest stood up and said to him, "Have you no answer? What is it that these men are testifying against you?" ⁶³But Jesus remained silent. The high priest said to him, "I put you under oath by the living God: tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God." ⁶⁴Jesus said to him, "You have said so. But I tell you, from now on you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power and coming on the clouds of heaven." ⁶⁵Then the high priest tore his robes and said, "He has blasphemed! Why do we still need witnesses? You have just heard the blasphemy. ⁶⁶What is your verdict?" They answered, "He deserves death." ⁶⁷Then they spat in his face and struck him with their fists, and some slapped him, ⁶⁸Declaring, Prophecy to us, you Christ, Who is he that smote you? ⁶⁹Now Peter was sitting outside in the courtyard, and a servant girl came up to him, saying, "You also were with Jesus the Galilean." ⁷⁰But he denied it before them all, saying, "I do not know what you are talking about." ⁷¹When he went out to the gateway, another servant girl saw him and said to the people there, "This man was with Jesus of Nazareth." ⁷²Again he denied it, with an oath: "I do not know the man." ⁷³After a little while, the bystanders came up and said to Peter, "Certainly you are one of them too — your accent gives you away." ⁷⁴Then he began to invoke curses on himself and to swear, "I do not know the man!" And immediately a rooster crowed. ⁷⁵And Peter remembered what Jesus had said: "Before the rooster crows, you will deny me three times." And he went outside and wept bitterly.

1. The formula kai egeneto hote etelesen ('and it happened when he finished') marks the conclusion of each of Jesus's five major discourses in Matthew (7:28, 11:1, 13:53, 19:1, 26:1). This is the fifth and final occurrence, signaling the end of Jesus's teaching ministry. The verb etelesen ('finished, completed') shares its root with tetelestai ('it is finished,' John 19:30).
2. Jesus yokes the Passover (to pascha) to his own crucifixion — the Passover lamb and the Son of Man converge. The present tense paradidotai ('is being handed over') suggests the process is already underway. The verb staurōthēnai ('to be crucified') is the first explicit prediction of crucifixion as the method of death in Matthew's passion narrative.
3. The Greek aulēn ('courtyard, palace') refers to the enclosed court of the high priest's residence. Caiaphas (Joseph bar Caiaphas) served as high priest from approximately 18-36 AD — an unusually long tenure that suggests political skill. The SBLGNT does not include 'scribes' (grammateis), which appears in some manuscripts reflected in the KJV.

4. The verb synebouleusanto ('they counseled together, they plotted') indicates a formal conspiracy. The word dolō ('by guile, by stealth, by treachery') reveals that even the authorities recognized they could not act openly — Jesus's popularity required covert action.
5. The word heortē ('festival, feast') refers to Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, when Jerusalem's population swelled with pilgrims. The fear of thorybos ('uproar, riot, tumult') reflects the political volatility of Passover — a celebration of liberation from oppression — under Roman occupation. Ironically, events will force them to act during the festival after all.
6. Bethany was a village about two miles east of Jerusalem on the Mount of Olives. Simon 'the leper' (tou leproū) was presumably healed — he would not host a dinner while ritually unclean. The designation likely preserves his former identity. This Simon is otherwise unknown.
7. Matthew does not name the woman (John 12:3 identifies her as Mary of Bethany). The alabastron ('alabaster flask') was a stone container with a sealed neck, broken open for use — a one-time expenditure. The myron barytimou ('very expensive ointment/perfume') was likely spikenard. Pouring it on Jesus's head (epi tēs kephalēs) evokes priestly and royal anointing (Exodus 29:7, 1 Samuel 16:13).
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 29:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Samuel 16:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. Matthew attributes the indignation (ēganaktēsan) to the disciples generally, not to Judas specifically (as in John 12:4-5). The word apōleia ('waste, destruction, loss') is ironic — the same word is used for perdition and damnation elsewhere. What the disciples see as waste, Jesus will interpret as prophetic worship.
9. The Greek pollou ('for much') is vague where Mark 14:5 specifies 'more than 300 denarii' (nearly a year's wages). The argument — resources should go to the poor (ptōchois) rather than to extravagant gestures — sounds reasonable, which is what makes Jesus's response surprising.
10. The Greek ergon kalon ('good/beautiful work/deed') uses kalon, which means both 'good' and 'beautiful' — the act is morally good and aesthetically fitting. Jesus reframes the anointing from 'waste' to 'beauty,' countering the disciples' utilitarian calculus with a different set of values.
11. Jesus echoes Deuteronomy 15:11 ('the poor will never cease from the land'). This is not a dismissal of poverty relief but a recognition of the unique moment: Jesus's death is imminent, and the window for this act is closing. The contrast between pantote ('always') for the poor and ou pantote ('not always') for Jesus underscores the urgency.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 15:11. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The verb entaphiasai ('to prepare for burial, to anoint for burial') reveals the prophetic dimension of her act. Whether the woman intended this meaning or not, Jesus interprets her anointing as anticipating his death — she has done what the disciples will not have the opportunity to do properly after the crucifixion.
13. The phrase eis mnēmosynon autēs ('as a memorial of her') uses liturgical language — mnēmosynon is the word for a memorial offering. Jesus guarantees that this unnamed woman's act will be remembered worldwide and perpetually — a remarkable promise for a single spontaneous gesture. The prophecy itself fulfills itself: the story is being told.
14. The placement of Judas's betrayal immediately after the anointing story creates a devastating juxtaposition: extravagant devotion versus calculated treachery. Matthew emphasizes Judas's identity — heis tōn dōdeka ('one of the Twelve') — the betrayer comes from the innermost circle. 'Iscaiot' (Iskariōtēs) may derive from Hebrew 'ish Qeriyot' ('man of Kerioth'), indicating his hometown.
15. Judas's question ti thelete moi dounai ('what are you willing to give me?') reduces betrayal to a transaction. The thirty silver coins (triakonta argyria) echoes Zechariah 11:12, where thirty pieces of silver is the contemptuous price for the shepherd of Israel — the price of a slave (Exodus 21:32). The verb estēsan ('they set, they weighed out, they paid') may indicate payment in advance.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Zechariah 11:12 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 21:32 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The imperfect ezētei ('he was seeking, he kept looking for') indicates ongoing, deliberate effort. The word eukairian ('a good opportunity, a favorable moment') implies calculated patience — Judas needed a time when Jesus was away from the protective crowds.
17. The 'first day of Unleavened Bread' (prōtē tōn azymōn) technically refers to 15 Nisan, but colloquially included the preparation day (14 Nisan) when the Passover lamb was slaughtered. The question about preparation reflects the practical logistics: a room must be secured, a lamb purchased and sacrificed at the temple, and the meal prepared according to Passover regulations.
18. The phrase ton deina ('a certain man, such-and-such a person') is deliberately vague in Matthew — Mark and Luke provide more detail about how to identify the host. The statement ho kairos mou engys estin ('my time is near') has a double meaning: the time for the Passover meal, and the time of his death. The word kairos ('appointed time, critical moment') is more theologically loaded than chronos ('sequential time').

19. The verb synetaxen ('directed, instructed, arranged') implies detailed instructions. The verb hētoimasan ('prepared') encompasses the full Passover preparation: procuring and roasting the lamb, preparing unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and wine, and setting the table according to tradition.
20. The Passover meal began after sunset (the start of 15 Nisan in Jewish reckoning). The verb anekeito ('reclined') reflects the Hellenistic custom adopted for Passover — reclining on couches around a low table, a posture symbolizing freedom (slaves ate standing). 'The Twelve' (tōn dōdeka) includes Judas.
21. The announcement comes during the meal itself — the betrayer is eating the Passover with the one he will betray. The phrase heis ex hymōn ('one of you') is devastating: the threat comes from within, not from outside. The verb paradōsei ('will hand over') is the same word used throughout the passion narrative.
22. The particle mēti expects a negative answer ('it's not me, is it?') but betrays uncertainty — each disciple fears it might be possible. The adverb sphodra ('exceedingly, greatly') and the verb lypoumenoi ('being grieved, being distressed') capture the emotional shock. That each one asks individually (heis hekastos, 'each one') rather than pointing fingers reveals genuine self-doubt.
23. The phrase ho embapsas ('the one having dipped') refers to the shared dish used during the Passover meal for dipping bread or bitter herbs. Since multiple people shared the same dish at a communal meal, this does not necessarily single out Judas to the other disciples. The poignancy is in the intimacy — sharing food was a bond of friendship and trust in ancient culture (cf. Psalm 41:9, 'Even my close friend who ate my bread has lifted his heel against me').
24. Jesus holds divine sovereignty and human responsibility in tension: the Son of Man goes 'as it is written' (kathōs gegraptai) — his death fulfills Scripture — but the betrayer is still held accountable. The phrase kalon ēn autō ei ouk egennēthē ('it would have been good for him if he had not been born') is the most severe personal condemnation Jesus utters in the Gospels. The divine plan does not excuse the human agent.
25. Judas asks the same question as the other disciples (mēti egō eimi, 'it isn't me, is it?') but addresses Jesus as 'Rabbi' (rhabbi) rather than 'Lord' (kyrie) as the others did (v. 22) — a subtle but possibly significant distinction in Matthew. Jesus's response sy eipas ('you have said it' or 'you yourself have said') is an affirmative that places the confession in Judas's own mouth. This exchange may have been quiet enough that the other disciples did not hear it clearly.
26. The four actions — took (labōn), blessed (eulogēsas), broke (eklasen), gave (dous) — become the liturgical pattern for the Eucharist/Lord's Supper across all Christian traditions. The blessing (eulogēsas) is the standard Jewish berakah ('Blessed are you, LORD our God, King of the universe, who brings forth bread from the earth'). The declaration touto estin to sōma mou ('this is my body') is rendered without interpretive addition — whether 'is' (estin) means 'is identical with,' 'represents,' or 'becomes' is the central question of eucharistic theology, and the Greek does not resolve it.
27. The verb eucharistēsas ('having given thanks') is the source of the word 'Eucharist.' For the bread Jesus 'blessed' (eulogēsas); for the cup he 'gave thanks' (eucharistēsas) — the two verbs are essentially synonymous in this context. The command piete ex autou pantes ('drink from it, all of you') emphasizes universal participation — the cup is for everyone, not just select members.
28. The phrase to haima mou tēs diathēkēs ('my blood of the covenant') echoes Exodus 24:8, where Moses sprinkled 'the blood of the covenant' on the people at Sinai. Jesus reinterprets the covenant blood as his own. The SBLGNT does not include 'new' (kainēs) before 'covenant,' though some manuscripts include it (cf. Luke 22:20, 'the new covenant in my blood'). The participle ekchynnomenon ('being poured out') uses sacrificial language. The phrase peri pollōn ('for many') echoes Isaiah 53:12. The phrase eis aphesin hamartiōn ('for the forgiveness of sins') is unique to Matthew's institution narrative.
28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 24:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 53:12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
29. The vow of abstinence (ou mē piō, 'I will certainly not drink') transforms the meal into both a farewell and a promise. The phrase genēmatos tēs ampelou ('fruit of the vine') is the standard Jewish blessing formula for wine. The adverb kainon ('new') may modify the wine (new wine in the kingdom) or the drinking (drink it in a new way). The promise meth' hymōn ('with you') assures reunion — this is not a final farewell but a temporary separation.
30. The hymn (hymnēsantes) is almost certainly the Hallel — Psalms 113-118, traditionally sung at the conclusion of the Passover meal. Psalms 115-118 would have been the final portion. The group leaves the upper room and walks east across the Kidron Valley to the Mount of Olives, about a fifteen-minute walk.
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalms 113-118 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

31. The verb skandalisthēsēsthe ('you will be caused to stumble, you will fall away') predicts total abandonment by all the disciples. Jesus quotes Zechariah 13:7, but with a significant change: the original has 'Strike the shepherd' (imperative), while Matthew has 'I will strike the shepherd' (pataxō, first person) — God himself is the agent who strikes. The scattering of the sheep (diaskorpisthēsontai) will be fulfilled in verse 56.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Zechariah 13:7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The passive egerthēnai ('to be raised') is a divine passive — God will raise Jesus. The promise proaxō hymas ('I will go before you') uses shepherd imagery: the shepherd goes ahead and the sheep follow (cf. John 10:4). This promise anticipates the resurrection appearances in Galilee (28:7, 10, 16).
33. Peter's emphatic egō oudepote ('I — never!') places himself above the other disciples. The contrast between pantes ('all') and egō ('I') reveals Peter's self-confidence. The adverb oudepote ('never, at no time') is absolute — Peter makes a claim Jesus will prove false within hours.
34. Jesus counters Peter's 'never' with a precise timeframe: en tautē tē nykti ('on this very night'). The rooster's crow (alektora phonēsai) typically occurs in the early morning hours, around 3:00 AM (the Roman 'cockcrow' watch). The triple denial (tris aparnēsē, 'three times you will deny') will be fulfilled in verses 69-75.
35. Peter doubles down with the strongest possible claim: willingness to die (kan deē me syn soi apothanēin, 'even if it is necessary for me to die with you'). The double negative ou mē ('absolutely not') matches Jesus's own emphatic formulations. The phrase homoiōs kai pantes ('likewise also all') indicates unanimous agreement — every disciple makes the same pledge, and every one will fail to keep it.
36. The name Gethsēmani (Γεθσημανί) comes from the Aramaic gat shemanim ('oil press'), a fitting name for a place on the Mount of Olives and grimly appropriate for what will happen there — Jesus is about to be pressed to the point of anguish. The chōrion ('place, piece of land') was apparently a garden or estate they had visited before (cf. John 18:2, 'Jesus often met there with his disciples').
37. The inner circle — Peter, James, and John (the two sons of Zebedee) — are the same three who witnessed the Transfiguration (17:1-8). They have seen his glory; now they will see his agony. The verb lypeisthai ('to be grieved, to be sorrowful') and adēmonein ('to be distressed, to be in anguish') together describe intense emotional suffering. The word adēmonein may derive from a root meaning 'away from home' — a profound disorientation and alienation.
38. The phrase perilypos estin hē psychē mou heōs thanatou ('my soul is sorrowful to the point of death') echoes Psalm 42:5-6 and Jonah 4:9. The preposition heōs ('unto, as far as, to the point of') suggests grief so intense it approaches death — emotional suffering that threatens to be fatal. The request grēgoreite met' emou ('keep watch with me') uses the same verb from the parables of readiness (24:42, 25:13) — now applied to personal accompaniment in suffering.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 42:5-6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jonah 4:9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
39. The posture — epesen epi prosōpon ('fell on his face') — expresses total prostration before God. The 'cup' (potērion) is a well-established Old Testament metaphor for suffering and divine judgment (Psalm 75:8, Isaiah 51:17, Jeremiah 25:15). Jesus asks for the cup to 'pass' (parelthato) — the same verb used for heaven and earth passing away in 24:35. The concluding clause ouch hōs egō thelō all' hōs sy ('not as I will but as you [will]') is the supreme expression of human will yielding to divine will. Jesus's humanity is fully engaged — his will must actively submit.
39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 75:8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 51:17. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Jeremiah 25:15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
40. Jesus addresses Peter specifically — the one who had pledged to die with him (v. 35) cannot even stay awake. The question carries more grief than anger. The plural ischysate ('could you [all] not?') extends the rebuke beyond Peter to all three. The 'one hour' (mian hōran) is a small ask compared to the death Peter had promised to face.
41. The imperative pair grēgoreite kai proseuchesthe ('stay awake and pray') links vigilance with prayer — one without the other is insufficient. The peirasmon ('testing, trial, temptation') refers to the coming crisis that will test their loyalty. The maxim to men pneuma prothymon hē de sarx asthenēs ('the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak') acknowledges the gap between intention and capacity — precisely the gap Peter will experience. This is not a philosophical dualism but a pastoral observation.
42. The second prayer shifts from conditional ('if it is possible') to acceptance ('if this cannot pass unless I drink it'). The closing genēthētō to thelēma sou ('your will be done') echoes the Lord's Prayer (6:10) — Jesus practices what he taught. The movement from first to second prayer shows the process of submission: not instantaneous capitulation but a wrestling that arrives at obedience.
43. The participle bebarēmenoi ('weighed down, heavy') describes exhaustion that overcomes willpower. The repeated discovery of sleeping disciples intensifies Jesus's isolation — he faces the crisis alone. There is no recorded rebuke this time.

44. The threefold prayer (ek tritou, 'for the third time') parallels the threefold denial that Peter will soon make (vv. 69-75). Where Jesus prays three times and submits to God's will, Peter will deny three times and fail. The phrase ton auton logon ('the same word/statement') indicates that the prayer did not change — the repetition is not rote but persistence.
45. The Greek katheudete to loipon kai anapauesthe can be read as a command ('sleep on and rest' — resigned permission), a question ('are you still sleeping?'), or ironic ('go ahead and sleep, if you can — it's too late'). We render it as a question, following the likely tone given the urgency of what follows. The phrase hē hōra ('the hour') is the decisive moment Jesus has been anticipating. The present tense paradidotai ('is being handed over') indicates the betrayal is happening now.
46. The imperatives egeisthe ('rise, get up') and agōmen ('let us go') are not flight but advance — Jesus walks toward his betrayer, not away from him. The participle ho paradidous ('the one handing over, the betrayer') identifies Judas without naming him. The verb ēggiken ('has drawn near, is at hand') is the same verb used for the kingdom of heaven being near (4:17) — an ironic echo.
47. The phrase eti autou lalountos ('while he was still speaking') emphasizes the immediacy — Jesus barely finishes speaking before Judas appears. The repeated identification heis tōn dōdeka ('one of the Twelve') drives home the betrayal's origin. The ochlos polys ('large crowd') with swords (machairōn) and clubs (xylōn) suggests a mixed force: temple police with swords and perhaps hired assistants with wooden clubs.
48. The pre-arranged signal (sēmeion, 'sign') uses the act of friendship — a kiss (philēsō, from phileō, 'to love, to show affection') — as the instrument of betrayal. The cruel inversion of an intimate gesture into a marker for arrest is universally recognized as one of history's most treacherous acts. The imperative kratēsate ('seize him, arrest him') reveals Judas directing the arrest operation.
49. The greeting chaire ('greetings, hail, rejoice') and the address rhabbi ('Rabbi') maintain the pretense of respect. The verb katephilēsen ('kissed') is intensified with the prefix kata-, suggesting an emphatic or prolonged kiss — making certain the crowd identifies the right person. Once again Judas addresses Jesus as 'Rabbi' rather than 'Lord' (cf. v. 25).
50. The address hetaire ('friend, companion') is the same ominous word used in 20:13 and 22:12 — a term of address that acknowledges the relationship while confronting the violation. The phrase eph' ho parei is notoriously difficult to translate: it could be a question ('why have you come?'), a command ('do what you came for'), or a statement ('this is why you have come'). We follow the imperative reading, which fits the context of Jesus actively accepting his fate. The arrest (ekratēsān, 'they seized') follows immediately.
51. Matthew does not identify the swordsman (John 18:10 names him as Peter). The action is impulsive: ekteineas ('stretching out his hand'), apespasen ('drew'), pataxas ('struck'). The doulos tou archierōs ('servant of the high priest') is named Malchus in John's account. The ōtion ('ear') could mean the entire ear or the earlobe. The act of violence represents the disciples' instinct to fight — the very response Jesus will reject.
52. The command apostrepson ('put back, return') rejects armed resistance. The proverbial statement pantes hoi labontes machairan en machairē apolountai ('all who take up the sword will perish by the sword') functions as a principle of reciprocal violence — those who initiate violence will meet violence. Jesus refuses to be defended by force even when his life is at stake.
53. A Roman legion (legiōn) consisted of approximately 6,000 soldiers, so twelve legions would be over 72,000 angels. The number twelve may correspond to the twelve disciples — one legion for each. Jesus's point is not military calculation but the voluntary nature of his suffering: he has access to overwhelming supernatural force but chooses not to use it. The verb parakalesai ('to call alongside, to appeal to, to ask') indicates that help is available for the asking.
54. The rhetorical question reveals Jesus's interpretive framework: the Scriptures (hai graphai) require (dei, 'it is necessary') that events unfold this way. Jesus's submission to arrest is not weakness but obedience to the scriptural plan. The verb plērōthōsin ('be fulfilled') connects to Matthew's fulfillment theology throughout the Gospel.
55. The word lēstēs ('bandit, rebel, insurrectionist') is the same word used for the men crucified alongside Jesus (27:38) and for those who made the temple a 'den of bandits' (21:13). Jesus points out the absurdity: he was publicly available every day in the temple, but they come at night with weapons as if he were a dangerous revolutionary. The contrast between his public teaching and their covert arrest exposes the injustice of the proceedings.
56. The fulfillment formula (hina plērōthōsin) appears here for the last time in the passion narrative. The statement hoi mathētai pantes aphen tes auton ephygon ('the disciples all, having left him, fled') fulfills both Jesus's prediction (v. 31) and Zechariah's prophecy (13:7). The word pantes ('all') is emphatic — no exceptions, despite the pledges of verses 33-35.
57. The verb apēgagon ('led away') implies forcible removal. Caiaphas the high priest is the same figure from verse 3 — the plot has reached its execution. The scribes (grammateis) and elders (presbyteroi) assembled at night suggests a hastily convened council, likely not a full formal Sanhedrin session but an irregular hearing.
58. The phrase apo makrothen ('from afar, at a distance') captures Peter's conflicted state — close enough to follow, too afraid to stand with Jesus. The word hypēretōn ('attendants, guards, officers') refers to the temple police. The phrase idein to telos ('to see the end/outcome') is poignant — Peter wants to know what will happen but is powerless to affect it.
59. The word synedrion ('council, Sanhedrin') refers to the Jewish ruling body. Matthew's description — they sought pseudomartyrian ('false testimony') — characterizes the trial as predetermined: they are not seeking truth but seeking a basis for execution. The verb thanatōsōsin ('they might put to death') reveals the goal from the outset.

60. The failure to find consistent testimony (ouch heuron, 'they did not find') despite many volunteers indicates that the witnesses contradicted each other — Deuteronomy 19:15 required at least two agreeing witnesses. The word hysteron ('finally, at last') suggests a prolonged and frustrating process for the council.
60. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 19:15 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
61. The accusation distorts something Jesus apparently said (cf. John 2:19, 'Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up'). The shift from 'destroy this temple' (a challenge to others) to 'I am able to destroy' (a threat by Jesus) is the crucial distortion. The verb katalysai ('to destroy, to tear down') and oikodomēsai ('to build, to construct') frame the claim as both demolition and reconstruction — an absurd claim if taken literally about Herod's temple.
62. The high priest's rising (anastas) is a dramatic gesture of authority. The double question — first about Jesus's silence, then about the testimony — presses for a response. The verb katamartyrosin ('testify against') uses the prefix kata- ('against'), making the adversarial nature of the testimony explicit.
63. Jesus's silence (esiōpa, 'was silent') fulfills Isaiah 53:7 ('like a sheep before its shearers is silent'). The high priest escalates to a formal oath-adjudication: exorkizō se kata tou theou tou zōntos ('I adjure you by the living God'). Under this oath, silence would constitute contempt of court. The question combines two titles — ho Christos ('the Christ/Messiah') and ho huios tou theou ('the Son of God') — forcing Jesus to make an explicit claim.
63. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 53:7 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
64. The response sy eipas ('you have said it') is affirmative but nuanced — Jesus accepts the titles but redefines them on his own terms. The plēn ('but, moreover') introduces a counter-declaration. Jesus combines Psalm 110:1 (seated at the right hand) with Daniel 7:13 (coming on the clouds) — the two most important messianic texts in early Christianity. 'Power' (tēs dynamēōs) is a circumlocution for God — 'the right hand of Power' means 'God's right hand.' The phrase ap' arti ('from now on') suggests that the exaltation begins immediately.
64. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalms 110:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
64. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 7:13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
65. The tearing of robes (dierrhēxen ta himatia) was the prescribed response to hearing blasphemy (cf. Mishnah, Sanhedrin 7:5). Ironically, the high priest was prohibited from tearing his garments (Leviticus 21:10) — though some interpret this prohibition as applying only to mourning, not to judicial response. The charge of blasphemia ('blasphemy') rests on Jesus's claim to sit at God's right hand — a claim to divine status that, if false, constitutes the gravest offense against God.
65. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 21:10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
66. The phrase enochos thanatou ('liable to death, deserving of death, guilty of a capital offense') is a formal legal verdict. The sentence is passed without formal vote procedure as described in the Mishnah — another irregularity in the proceedings.
67. The progression of abuse — spitting (eneptusam, fulfilling Isaiah 50:6), punching (ekolaphisan, 'struck with fists'), and slapping (erapisan, 'struck with open hand') — constitutes deliberate humiliation. The spitting in the face was the most degrading insult in the ancient world (cf. Numbers 12:14, Deuteronomy 25:9).
67. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 50:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
67. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Numbers 12:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
67. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 25:9. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
68. The taunt 'prophecy!' (prophēteuson) is ironic on multiple levels: Jesus has just prophesied about the Son of Man's exaltation, and the very events unfolding fulfill his earlier prophecies. The game — blindfolding someone and asking them to identify who struck them — mocks his claim to supernatural knowledge. The title Christe ('Christ') is used mockingly.
69. The scene shifts to the courtyard (aulē) where Peter sits with the guards (v. 58). The first accuser is a paidiskē ('servant girl, female slave') — the lowest-status person in the household. The identification 'Jesus the Galilean' (Iēsou tou Galilaiou) marks Jesus as an outsider, a northern provincial. Peter's denial before the least threatening accuser makes his cowardice more stark.
70. The first denial. The verb ἑρῆσατο ('denied') is the same root as aparnēsē ('you will deny') from Jesus's prediction in verse 34. The phrase emprosthen pantōn ('before all') makes the denial public. Peter's response ouk oida ti legeis ('I do not know what you are saying') is evasive rather than a direct denial — a strategy of feigned ignorance.

71. Peter retreats from the courtyard to the gateway (pylōna) — attempting to distance himself physically from the identification. A second servant girl (allē) makes the accusation to bystanders rather than to Peter directly, broadening the circle of awareness. The identification shifts from 'the Galilean' to 'of Nazareth' (tou Nazōraiou).
72. The second denial escalates — meta horkou ('with an oath') means Peter swears. This is deeply ironic given Jesus's teaching against oath-taking in 5:33-37. The phrase ouk oida ton anthrōpon ('I do not know the man') depersonalizes Jesus — 'the man' rather than 'Jesus' — creating verbal distance from the relationship.
73. The third accusation comes from multiple bystanders (hoi hestōtes, 'those standing by'). The evidence is now Peter's lalia ('speech, accent, dialect') — his Galilean accent was distinctive and recognizable (cf. the Shibboleth test, Judges 12:6). The adverb alēthōs ('truly, certainly') indicates growing confidence in the identification. Peter can no longer hide.
73. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Judges 12:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
74. The third denial reaches maximum intensity: katathematizein ('to invoke curses upon oneself') means Peter calls down divine punishment if he is lying — but he is lying. The verb omnuein ('to swear') adds formal oath-taking. Peter's denial has progressed from evasion (v. 70) to oath (v. 72) to self-cursing (v. 74). The rooster's crow (alektōr ephōnēsen) fulfills Jesus's exact prediction from verse 34 with devastating precision.
75. The verb emnēsthē ('remembered') marks the moment of devastating recognition — memory and reality collide. The adverb pikrōs ('bitterly') describes the quality of Peter's weeping — not gentle tears but anguished, bitter sobbing. Unlike Judas (27:3-5), Peter's response to failure is grief rather than despair. This is the last we see of Peter until the resurrection, and Matthew leaves him weeping — the restoration will come later (cf. John 21).

Summary: Matthew 27 narrates the crucifixion, death, and burial of Jesus. The chapter opens with the council's formal decision to hand Jesus to Pilate, Judas's remorse and suicide, and the trial before Pontius Pilate. Pilate offers to release either Jesus or Barabbas; the crowd demands Barabbas and calls for Jesus's crucifixion. After scourging, mocking, and the journey to Golgotha, Jesus is crucified between two criminals. Darkness covers the land for three hours, and Jesus cries out in Aramaic from Psalm 22. At his death, the temple curtain tears, the earth quakes, and tombs open. Joseph of Arimathea buries Jesus in a new tomb, and the chief priests secure the tomb with a guard.

What Makes This Remarkable: Matthew's passion narrative contains several elements unique to this Gospel: Judas's return of the silver and suicide (vv. 3-10), Pilate's wife's dream (v. 19), Pilate's hand-washing (v. 24), the crowd's cry 'His blood be on us and on our children' (v. 25), the earthquake and resurrection of the saints at Jesus's death (vv. 51-53), and the posting of the guard at the tomb (vv. 62-66). The Zechariah fulfillment citation (vv. 9-10) is attributed to Jeremiah, a well-known difficulty. The tearing of the temple curtain (v. 51) symbolizes the removal of the barrier between God and humanity.

Translation Friction: Verse 25 ('His blood be on us and on our children') has been weaponized throughout history to justify antisemitic violence and persecution. This is a misreading: the verse records the words of a specific crowd in a specific moment, not a divine curse on all Jewish people for all time. We render the Greek as given and note the historical misuse. The Barabbas episode raises historical questions — was the custom of releasing a prisoner at Passover a regular practice? The evidence is thin outside the Gospels. We render the narrative as given.

Connections: Judas's thirty silver coins and the potter's field connect to Zechariah 11:12-13 (and possibly Jeremiah 18-19, 32:6-9). The Barabbas release echoes the Day of Atonement scapegoat ritual (Leviticus 16). Jesus's cry from Psalm 22:1 connects to the entire psalm, which moves from abandonment to vindication. The torn curtain connects to Exodus 26:33 and the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 16). The darkness echoes Amos 8:9-10. The burial by Joseph of Arimathea fulfills Isaiah 53:9 ('with a rich man in his death'). The guard at the tomb sets up the resurrection narrative of chapter 28.

¹When the daybreak was come, all the leading priests and elders of the people took counsel against Jesus to put him to death. ²They bound him, led him away, and handed him over to Pilate the governor. ³Then when Judas, his betrayer, saw that Jesus had been condemned, he was seized with remorse and returned the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, ⁴Indeed, declaring, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. Then they stated, What is that to us? see you to that. ⁵He threw the silver coins into the temple sanctuary and left. Then he went away and hanged himself. ⁶The chief priests picked up the silver coins and said, "It is not lawful to put this into the temple treasury, since it is blood money." ⁷After conferring together, they used the money to buy the potter's field as a burial place for foreigners. ⁸For this reason that field has been called the Field of Blood to this day. ⁹Then what was spoken through the prophet Jeremiah was fulfilled: "They took the thirty pieces of silver, the price set on him by the people of Israel, ¹⁰Offered them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me. ¹¹Now Jesus stood before the governor, and the governor asked him, "Are you the King of the Jews?" Jesus said, "You have said so." ¹²But when he was accused by the chief priests and elders, he gave no answer. ¹³Then Pilate said to him, "Do you not hear how many charges they are bringing against you?" ¹⁴But he did not answer him, not even a single word, so that the governor was greatly amazed. ¹⁵Now at the festival the governor had a custom of releasing to the crowd one prisoner whom they wanted. ¹⁶At that time they had a notorious prisoner called Barabbas. ¹⁷So when they had gathered, Pilate said to them, "Whom do you want me to release for you — Barabbas, or Jesus who is called Christ?" ¹⁸For he knew it was out of envy that they had handed him over. ¹⁹While he was sitting on the judgment seat, his wife sent word to him: "Have nothing to do with that righteous man, for I have suffered greatly today because of a dream about him." ²⁰But the chief priests and the elders persuaded the crowds to ask for Barabbas and to have Jesus destroyed. ²¹The governor answered them, "Which of the two do you want me to release for you?" They said, "Barabbas." ²²Pilate said to them, "Then what should I do with Jesus who is called Christ?" They all said, "Let him be crucified!" ²³He said, "Why? What crime has he committed?" But they shouted all the more, "Let him be crucified!" ²⁴When Pilate saw that he was getting nowhere and that a riot was starting instead, he took water and washed his hands before the crowd, saying, "I am innocent of this man's blood. It is your responsibility." ²⁵All the people answered, "His blood be on us and on our children!" ²⁶Then he released Barabbas to them, and after having Jesus flogged, he handed him over to be crucified. ²⁷Then the governor's soldiers took Jesus into the governor's headquarters and gathered the whole cohort around him. ²⁸They stripped him and put a scarlet robe on him, ²⁹Following they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head, and a reed in his right hand — then they bowed the knee prior to him, and mocked him and stated, Hail, King of the Jews! ³⁰They spat on him and took the reed and struck him on the head. ³¹When they had finished mocking him, they stripped him of the robe, put his own clothes back on him, and led him away to crucify him. ³²As they were going out, they found a man from Cyrene named Simon, and they forced him to carry Jesus's cross. ³³When they came to a place called Golgotha (which means Place of a Skull), ³⁴They offered him vinegar to drink mingled with gall — and following he had tasted thereof, he would not drink. ³⁵After they crucified him, they divided his garments among themselves by casting lots. ³⁶Then they sat down and kept watch over him there. ³⁷Above his head they placed the written charge against him: THIS IS JESUS, THE KING OF THE JEWS. ³⁸Then two rebels were crucified with him, one on his right and one on his left. ³⁹Those who passed by hurled insults at him, shaking their heads ⁴⁰Declaring, you that destroyest the sanctuary, and buildest it in three period, rescue thyself. If you be the Descendant of God, come down from the cross. ⁴¹In the same way the chief priests, along with the scribes and elders, mocked him, saying, ⁴²"He saved others, but he cannot save himself! He is the King of Israel — let him come down now from the cross, and we will believe in him. ⁴³He trusts in God — let God rescue him now, if he wants him! For he said, 'I am the Son of God.'" ⁴⁴The rebels who were crucified with him also reviled him in the same way. ⁴⁵From noon, darkness came over the whole land until three in the afternoon. ⁴⁶About three in the afternoon, Jesus cried out in a loud voice, "Eli, Eli, lema sabachthani?" — that is, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" ⁴⁷When some of those standing there heard this, they said, "This man is calling for Elijah." ⁴⁸Immediately one of them ran and took a sponge, filled it with sour wine, put it on a reed, and held it up for him to drink. ⁴⁹But the rest said, "Leave him alone! Let us see if Elijah comes to save him." ⁵⁰Then Jesus cried out again with a loud voice and breathed his last. ⁵¹At that moment the curtain of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom, the earth shook, and the rocks were split. ⁵²The tombs were opened, and many bodies of the saints who had fallen asleep were raised. ⁵³They came out of the tombs after his resurrection, entered the holy city, and appeared to many. ⁵⁴When the centurion and those with him who were keeping watch over Jesus saw the earthquake and all that had happened, they were terrified and said, "Truly this man was the Son of God!" ⁵⁵Many women were there watching from a distance — those who had followed Jesus from Galilee, serving him. ⁵⁶Among them were Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee. ⁵⁷When evening came, a rich man from Arimathea named Joseph arrived — he himself had also become a disciple of Jesus. ⁵⁸He went to Pilate and asked for the body of Jesus. Then Pilate ordered it to be given to him. ⁵⁹Joseph took the body and wrapped it in a clean linen cloth. ⁶⁰Placed it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock — then he rolled a remarkable stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed. ⁶¹Mary Magdalene and the other Mary were sitting there, facing the tomb. ⁶²The next day — that is, the day after the Day of Preparation — the chief priests and the Pharisees gathered before Pilate ⁶³Declaring, Sir, we remember that that deceiver stated, while he was yet alive, following three days I will rise again. ⁶⁴So give the order for the tomb to be secured until the third day. Otherwise his disciples may come and steal the body and tell the people, 'He has been raised from the dead,' and the last deception will be worse than the first." ⁶⁵Pilate said to them, "You have a guard. Go, make the tomb as secure as you know how." ⁶⁶So they went and secured the tomb by sealing the stone and posting a guard.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The morning session (prōias, 'early morning') may represent the formal ratification of the nighttime verdict, since Jewish law required capital sentences to be confirmed during daylight. The phrase symboulion elabon ('took counsel, reached a decision') indicates a formal resolution. The purpose clause hōste thanatōsai ('so as to put to death') confirms the death sentence from 26:66.
2. The verb dēsantes ('having bound') indicates Jesus was physically restrained for transfer. The verb paredōkan ('handed over') is the same word used for Judas's betrayal — the chain of 'handing over' continues from Judas to the council to Pilate. The Greek hēgemoni ('governor, prefect') is the general term for a Roman provincial administrator. Pontius Pilate served as prefect of Judea from approximately 26-36 AD.
3. The verb metamelētheis ('having felt regret, having changed his mind') is distinct from metanoō ('to repent'). Metamelētheis describes emotional regret over consequences, not the spiritual turning (teshuvah/metanoia) that leads to restoration. Judas regrets the outcome but does not seek reconciliation with God or Jesus. The act of returning (estrepseis) the silver attempts to undo the transaction but cannot undo the betrayal.
4. Judas's confession hēmarton ('I have sinned') and his acknowledgment of haima athōon ('innocent blood') are genuine recognitions of guilt. The priests' response — ti pros hēmas ('what is that to us?') — is chillingly dismissive: having used Judas, they discard him. The phrase sy opsē ('you will see to it,' or 'that is your concern') places all responsibility back on Judas.
5. The word naon ('temple sanctuary') refers specifically to the inner sanctuary, not the outer courts — Judas threw the money into the sacred space itself. The verb apēnxato ('hanged himself') describes suicide by hanging. Acts 1:18 gives a different account of Judas's death (falling and bursting open); the two accounts have been harmonized in various ways throughout church history. We render Matthew's account as given.
6. The irony is devastating: the priests who paid for innocent blood now scruple about the ritual propriety of depositing that payment. The word korbanan ('treasury,' from the Hebrew qorban, 'offering') refers to the temple treasury where offerings were deposited. The phrase timē haimatos ('price of blood') acknowledges what they paid for — they know they have purchased a man's life.
7. The 'potter's field' (agron tou kerameōs) was apparently a tract of land associated with pottery-making, perhaps where potters dug clay. Its purchase as a burial ground for xenois ('foreigners, strangers') — non-Jews who died in Jerusalem — ironically connects to Zechariah 11:13 (silver thrown 'to the potter').
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Zechariah 11:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The name Agros Haimatos ('Field of Blood') corresponds to the Aramaic Akeldama (Acts 1:19). The phrase heōs tēs sēmeron ('until today') is an etiological formula indicating that the name persisted into Matthew's own time, connecting past event to present landmark.
9. The attribution to Jeremiah (Jeremiou) when the quotation primarily derives from Zechariah 11:12-13 is a well-known difficulty. Several explanations have been proposed: (1) Jeremiah was named because the quotation also draws on Jeremiah 18:1-4 (the potter) and 32:6-9 (buying a field); (2) Jeremiah stood first in the prophetic scroll and could refer to the entire collection; (3) a scribal error. We render the text as given and note the difficulty.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Zechariah 11:12-13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Jeremiah 18:1-4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The quotation freely adapts Zechariah 11:13 with elements from Jeremiah. The phrase katha synetaxen moi kyrios ('as the Lord directed me') indicates that the disposal of the blood money was under divine sovereignty — even the priests' solution for the tainted silver fulfills prophecy.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Zechariah 11:12-13 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

11. The charge has shifted from the religious 'Christ/Son of God' (26:63) to the political 'King of the Jews' (basileus tōn Ioudaiōn) — the formulation relevant to Roman authority. Pilate's concern is political sedition, not theological heresy. Jesus's response sy legeis ('you say so') is the same ambiguous affirmation given to Caiaphas (26:64) and Judas (26:25).
12. Jesus's silence before accusers again evokes Isaiah 53:7. The verb katēgoreisthai ('to be accused') is a legal term from which 'category' derives. The phrase ouden apekritnato ('he answered nothing') emphasizes total silence despite multiple accusations.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. Pilate's question reveals his expectation: a defendant should respond to accusations. The verb katamartyrosin ('testify against') and posa ('how many') suggest numerous charges. Roman legal procedure allowed the accused to defend himself.
14. The phrase pros oude hen rhēma ('not even one word') emphasizes the completeness of Jesus's silence. The governor's amazement (thaumazein lian) indicates this was extraordinary behavior — defendants typically fought for their lives. Jesus's silence is an active choice, not passive resignation.
15. The custom (eiōthei, 'was accustomed') of releasing a prisoner at Passover is not independently attested outside the Gospels, though analogous prisoner releases are documented in other Roman contexts. The phrase hon ēthelon ('whom they wanted') gives the crowd a choice — the mechanism that Pilate will attempt to use in Jesus's favor.
16. The adjective episēmon ('notable, notorious, well-known') suggests Barabbas was a famous criminal. The name Barabbas (Barabbas) means 'son of the father' (bar-abbā) in Aramaic — a striking irony given that Jesus is the Son of the Father. Some manuscripts include the first name 'Jesus Barabbas' (Iēsoun Barabban), which, if original, would make the choice between two men named Jesus even more pointed.
17. Pilate's question frames the choice as a binary: Barabbas or Jesus. The phrase ton legomenon Christon ('the one called Christ') uses the title without committing to its truth — Pilate reports the title attributed to Jesus. Pilate's strategy is transparent: he expects the crowd to choose Jesus, the less dangerous of the two.
18. The narrator provides Pilate's internal assessment: dia phthonon ('because of envy') — the chief priests' motivation was jealousy of Jesus's popularity and authority, not genuine concern about blasphemy or sedition. This editorial note reveals Pilate's political awareness — he understands the real dynamics at play.
19. This episode is unique to Matthew. Pilate's wife (tradition names her Claudia Procula) sends a message from outside the proceedings. The phrase tō dikaiō ekeinō ('that righteous man') provides an external witness to Jesus's innocence. Dreams in Matthew carry divine significance (1:20, 2:12, 2:13, 2:19, 2:22) — this is yet another dream-warning that the Roman authorities choose to ignore.
20. The verb epeisan ('persuaded, convinced') reveals active manipulation: the crowd's demand for Barabbas is not spontaneous but orchestrated by the religious leaders. The verb apolesōsin ('they should destroy') is stark — they do not merely want Jesus released or exiled but destroyed.
21. Pilate repeats his question, perhaps expecting a different answer. The crowd's single-word response — ton Barabban ('Barabbas') — is decisive. The brevity conveys the crowd's settled determination.
22. Pilate's question ti oun poiēsō ('what then should I do?') reveals his loss of control over the situation. The unanimous response — legousin pantes ('they all say') — and the passive imperative staurōthētō ('let him be crucified!') is the crowd's explicit demand for Roman execution. Crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment but a Roman one, reserved for slaves, rebels, and the lowest criminals.
23. Pilate's question ti gar kakon epoiēsen ('what evil has he done?') is his third attempt to prevent the execution. The comparative perissōs ('more exceedingly, all the more') indicates the crowd's response is escalating beyond reason — they are not answering his question but repeating their demand with increasing volume.
24. Pilate's hand-washing (apenipsato tas cheiras) is unique to Matthew and evokes the Deuteronomic ritual for unsolved murder (Deuteronomy 21:6-7), where elders wash their hands and declare innocence of blood. Whether a Roman governor would adopt a Jewish ritual is debated — this may be Matthew's theological interpretation of Pilate's attempt to deflect blame. The phrase athōos eimi ('I am innocent') uses the same word Judas used for Jesus's blood in verse 4. Pilate's hymeis opsesthe ('you will see to it') echoes the priests' dismissal of Judas in verse 4 — a chain of responsibility shifting.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 21:6-7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. This verse has been the most misused text in the history of Jewish-Christian relations, weaponized to justify centuries of antisemitic persecution. The text records the words of a specific crowd (pas ho laos, 'all the people' present) at a specific moment, incited by specific leaders (v. 20). It is not a divine curse on all Jewish people for all time — such a reading contradicts the entire prophetic tradition and Paul's teaching in Romans 9-11. The phrase to haima autou eph' hēmas ('his blood upon us') is a legal formula accepting responsibility for a death (cf. Joshua 2:19, 2 Samuel 1:16). We render the Greek as given.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Joshua 2:19 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Samuel 1:16 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

- 26. The verb phragellōsas ('having flogged, having scourged') describes the Roman flagellum — a whip with leather thongs embedded with bone or metal fragments. This was not a light beating but a severe punishment that often left victims near death. Pilate's action — releasing a criminal and scourging an innocent man — epitomizes the injustice of the proceedings. The verb paredōken ('handed over') completes the chain: Judas handed Jesus to the priests, the priests to Pilate, and now Pilate to the executioners.
- 27. The praitōrion ('praetorium, governor's residence') was likely the Herodian palace on the western side of Jerusalem or the Antonia Fortress near the temple. The speira ('cohort') was a Roman military unit of 600 soldiers, though the entire cohort may not have been present — 'whole' (holēn) may be hyperbolic.
- 28. The chlamyda kokkinēn ('scarlet cloak') was a Roman military cloak, used here as a mock royal robe (Mark and John describe it as purple). The mockery takes the form of a parody investiture — dressing Jesus as a king to ridicule the charge of kingship.
- 29. The mock investiture includes three elements: a crown (stephanon ex akanthōn, 'crown from thorns' — painful and parodic), a scepter (kalamon, 'reed' — a flimsy imitation of royal authority), and obeisance (gonypetēsantes, 'kneeling'). The greeting chaire basileu tōn Ioudaiōn ('Hail, King of the Jews!') parodies the imperial salute Ave Caesar. The soldiers' mockery, intended as cruelty, unwittingly proclaims the truth.
- 30. The imperfect etyton ('they kept striking') indicates repeated blows. Striking his head would drive the thorns deeper. The spitting (emptysantes) reprises the abuse at the Jewish trial (26:67). The reed given as a mock scepter is now used as a weapon — the symbols of kingship become instruments of torture.
- 31. The re-dressing in Jesus's own clothes (ta himatia autou) before the crucifixion procession was standard procedure — the condemned carried their crossbeam through the streets as a public deterrent. The verb apēgagon ('led away') begins the final journey.
- 32. The verb ēngareusan ('they compelled, they pressed into service') is a Persian loanword for requisitioning — Roman soldiers had the legal right to conscript civilians for temporary service (cf. 5:41, 'if anyone forces you to go one mile'). Cyrene was a city in North Africa (modern Libya) with a large Jewish community. Simon may have been a Jewish pilgrim in Jerusalem for Passover. The stauros ('cross') he carried would have been the crossbeam (patibulum), not the entire cross.
- 33. Golgotha (Golgotha) is Aramaic for 'skull' (gulgalta). The Latin equivalent Calvaria gives us the English 'Calvary.' The name may refer to the shape of the hill or to its use as an execution site. The location was outside the city walls (Hebrews 13:12) but near enough for public visibility.
- 34. The Greek cholēs ('gall, bile') may refer to a bitter substance (Matthew changes Mark's 'myrrh' to 'gall' to echo Psalm 69:21). A drugged wine was sometimes offered to condemned prisoners as a mild sedative. Jesus tastes it (geusamenos) but refuses (ouk ēthelēsen) — he will face the crucifixion fully conscious.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 69:21. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. The act of crucifixion itself is stated in a single participle — staurōsantes ('having crucified') — with no description of the physical process. The Gospel writers consistently avoid graphic details of the crucifixion itself. The division of garments (diemerisanto ta himatia) fulfills Psalm 22:18. The soldiers' share of the condemned person's clothing was a legal perquisite. The SBLGNT does not include the explicit Psalm 22 quotation found in some manuscripts and the KJV.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalms 22:18 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. The verb etēroun ('they were watching, they were guarding') indicates the soldiers' duty to prevent rescue attempts or premature removal. Their sitting (kathēmenoi) while Jesus hangs creates a stark visual contrast — bored guards and a dying man.
- 37. The titulus (aitian, 'charge, accusation') was a placard stating the crime, carried ahead of the condemned or fixed to the cross. The inscription houtos estin Iēsous ho basileus tōn Ioudaiōn ('This is Jesus the King of the Jews') states the political charge — sedition by claiming kingship. Each Gospel records the inscription slightly differently; Matthew's version is the longest. Like the soldiers' mockery, the inscription proclaims what it intends to ridicule.
- 38. The Greek lēstai ('bandits, rebels, insurrectionists') is the same word from 26:55 — not mere thieves (kleptai) but violent criminals or political revolutionaries. Crucifixion between two criminals fulfills Isaiah 53:12 ('he was numbered with the transgressors'). The positions 'right and left' recall the request of James and John in 20:21 — the positions of honor in the kingdom are filled by criminals at the cross.
- 38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 53:12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 39. The verb eblasphēmoun ('they were blaspheming, they were reviling') is the same word used for the charge against Jesus (26:65) — now passersby commit the very act Jesus was condemned for. The head-shaking (kinountes tas kephalas) fulfills Psalm 22:7 and echoes Lamentations 2:15.
- 39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 22:7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Lamentations 2:15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 40. The taunt recycles the distorted testimony from 26:61. The conditional ei huios ei tou theou ('if you are the Son of God') echoes Satan's temptation in 4:3, 6 — the same structure, the same challenge. The demand sōson seauton ('save yourself') misunderstands the nature of Jesus's mission: he saves others precisely by not saving himself.

41. The religious leaders who orchestrated Jesus's arrest and trial now come to witness and mock his execution. The presence of chief priests (archiereis), scribes (grammateōn), and elders (presbyterōn) — the full complement of the Sanhedrin — makes this an institutional act of rejection.
42. The taunt allous esōsen heauton ou dynatai sōsai ('he saved others, himself he cannot save') is theologically profound in ways the speakers do not intend — it states the precise logic of the atonement. The promise pisteusomen ('we will believe') is conditional on a sign (katabatō, 'let him come down') — the same demand Jesus consistently refused (12:39, 16:4).
43. This taunt directly echoes Psalm 22:8 ('He trusts in the LORD; let the LORD rescue him'). The leaders unknowingly recite the very psalm that Jesus is living out on the cross. The conditional ei thelei auton ('if he wants him') questions whether God actually cares about Jesus — the deepest possible taunt against a man of faith.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 22:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. Matthew records both criminals joining in the mockery (unlike Luke 23:39-43, where one repents). The verb ōneidizon ('reviled, insulted, reproached') indicates verbal abuse. Jesus is mocked from every quarter — passersby, leaders, and fellow condemned.
45. The sixth hour (hektēs hōras) is noon; the ninth hour (enatēs) is 3:00 PM. The three hours of darkness (skotos) during midday echoes Amos 8:9 ('I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight') and the ninth plague on Egypt (Exodus 10:21-23). The Greek gēn can mean 'land' (of Israel) or 'earth' (the whole world) — the scope is ambiguous.
45. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Amos 8:9 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
45. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 10:21-23 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
46. Jesus quotes Psalm 22:1, partially in Aramaic (lema sabachthani) and partially in Hebrew (Eli, Eli — 'my God'). Matthew preserves the Semitic words and provides a Greek translation. This is the only saying from the cross recorded in Matthew. The cry expresses the experience of divine abandonment — whether as a genuine theological crisis, as the opening line of a psalm that ends in vindication, or as both, is a question the text does not resolve. The depth of this cry resists systematic theological explanation.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 22:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
47. The confusion between Eli ('my God') and Ēlian ('Elijah') may be genuine (the words sound similar, especially in a cry of anguish) or deliberate mockery. The popular expectation that Elijah would return before the Messiah (Malachi 4:5) gives the misidentification a theological edge — they wonder if the dying man is calling for supernatural rescue.
47. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Malachi 4:5. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
48. The oxos ('sour wine, vinegar') was the cheap wine (posca) that Roman soldiers drank. The act may be compassionate (offering liquid to a dying man) or cruel (prolonging consciousness to extend suffering). The sponge on a reed (kalamō) was necessary to reach Jesus's mouth on the cross. The scene echoes Psalm 69:21 ('for my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink').
48. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 69:21 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
49. The bystanders' response — aphes idōmen ('let us see') — treats Jesus's dying cry as entertainment. The phrase ei erchetai Ēlias sōsōn auton ('whether Elijah comes to save him') expresses mocking curiosity rather than genuine expectation. Even at the moment of death, the watching crowd is more interested in spectacle than compassion.
50. The second loud cry (kraxas phōnē megalē) is not identified with specific words in Matthew. The phrase aphēken to pneuma ('released the spirit') is unique to Matthew — the other Gospels say he 'breathed out' (exepneusen) or 'handed over' (paredōken) the spirit. Matthew's choice of aphēken ('released, let go, sent away') implies volition: Jesus did not have his life taken but actively gave it up.
51. The katapetasma tou naou ('curtain of the temple sanctuary') most likely refers to the inner curtain separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (Exodus 26:33) — the barrier that only the high priest could pass through, once a year, on the Day of Atonement. The tearing ap' anōthen heōs katō ('from top to bottom') indicates divine action — it was torn from God's side, not from below. The accompanying earthquake (hē gē eseisthē) and splitting rocks (hai petrai eschisthēsan) represent cosmic responses to Jesus's death, echoing theophanic language from the Old Testament.
51. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 26:33. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
52. This event is unique to Matthew and is one of the most enigmatic episodes in the Gospels. The phrase kekoimēmenōn hagiōn ('saints who had fallen asleep') uses the standard metaphor of death as sleep. The passive ēgerthēsan ('were raised') is a divine passive — God raised them. The relationship between these resurrections and Jesus's own resurrection (detailed in the next verse) is theologically complex.
53. The phrase meta tēn egersin autou ('after his resurrection') creates a chronological puzzle: if the tombs opened at Jesus's death (v. 52) but the saints emerged after his resurrection, what happened in between? Various solutions have been proposed. The 'holy city' (tēn hagian polin) is Jerusalem.

The verb enephanisthēsan ('appeared, became visible to') implies recognizable manifestations to multiple witnesses (pollois, 'many').

54. The confession comes from Gentile soldiers — the centurion (hekatontarchos, commander of 100 men) and his squad. The evidence that convinces them is the seismon ('earthquake') and ta genomena ('the things that happened'). The declaration alēthōs theou huios ēn houtos ('truly this was God's Son') echoes the disciples' confession in 14:33. The absence of the article before theou huios ('Son of God') might allow the reading 'a son of God' (i.e., a divine man), but in Matthew's narrative context the full Christological meaning is intended. The first people to confess Jesus as Son of God after his death are pagan soldiers.
55. The women who remained at the cross after all the male disciples had fled (26:56) are now named as witnesses. They watched apo makrothen ('from a distance') — the same phrase used for Peter's distant following in 26:58. The participle diakonousai ('serving, ministering to') uses the root of 'deacon' — these women had been active supporters of Jesus's ministry, a detail often overlooked.
56. Three women are named: Mary Magdalene (from Magdala on the Sea of Galilee), Mary the mother of James and Joseph (possibly Jesus's mother, since James and Joseph are brothers of Jesus in 13:55, though this identification is uncertain), and the mother of Zebedee's sons (James and John, who requested seats of honor in 20:20–21). These women become the essential witnesses who link the crucifixion, burial, and resurrection.
57. Evening (opsias) signals urgency: the Sabbath begins at sunset, and bodies must be buried before then (Deuteronomy 21:22–23). Joseph's wealth (plousios) is significant — it fulfills Isaiah 53:9 ('with a rich man in his death'). Arimathea is probably Ramathaim (1 Samuel 1:1). The verb emathēteuthē ('had become a disciple') indicates secret discipleship, now made public by this bold act.
57. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 21:22–23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
57. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53:9. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
57. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Samuel 1:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
58. Requesting the body of an executed criminal required courage and status — a crucified person's body could be denied burial as additional punishment. The verb ētēsato ('requested, asked for') and Pilate's prompt order (ekeleusen, 'commanded') suggest Joseph had sufficient standing to make the request successfully.
59. The sindoni kathara ('clean linen cloth') was used for Jewish burial wrapping. The adjective kathara ('clean, pure') indicates both physical cleanliness and ritual purity — Joseph ensures proper, respectful burial. The wrapping (enetylixen, 'wound around, wrapped') was the first step of Jewish burial preparation.
60. The tomb was kainō ('new') and autou ('his own') — Joseph donated his personal tomb. Rock-cut tombs (elatomēsen en tē petra, 'hewn in the rock') were expensive, consistent with Joseph's wealth. The large stone (lithon megan) was a disc-shaped stone rolled in a channel to seal the entrance — these are well-attested archaeologically in first-century Jerusalem.
61. Two of the women from verse 55–56 remain as witnesses to the burial location. Their presence establishes continuity — the same women who saw Jesus die now see where he is buried, and they will be the first to discover the empty tomb (28:1). The phrase kathēmenai apenanti ('sitting opposite') indicates a vigil of grief.
62. The chronological note identifies the day: the day after Preparation (paraskeuen), which is the Sabbath. The chief priests and Pharisees approach Pilate on the Sabbath — an action that reveals the urgency of their concern about the tomb. This episode (vv. 62–66) is unique to Matthew and sets up the guard at the tomb.
63. The address kyrie ('sir, lord') is politely deferential. They call Jesus ekeinos ho planos ('that deceiver') — planos means 'wanderer, deceiver, impostor.' Their quotation meta treis hēmeras egeiromai ('after three days I rise/am raised') shows they understood Jesus's resurrection predictions even though the disciples apparently did not (cf. 16:21, 17:23, 20:19).
64. The request asphalisthēnai ('to be made secure') leads to the guard posting. The fear of body-snatching (klepsōsin, 'they might steal') by the disciples reveals that the leaders took the resurrection claim seriously enough to guard against it. The phrase hē eschatē planē cheirōn tēs prōtēs ('the last deception worse than the first') identifies the 'first deception' as Jesus's ministry and the feared 'last deception' as a resurrection claim. Ironically, Matthew includes this episode to show that the authorities themselves ensured the tomb was under guard — making the resurrection that much harder to explain away.
65. The phrase echete koustōdian could be imperative ('take a guard') or indicative ('you have a guard' — i.e., use your own temple police). The koustōdia is a Latin loanword (custodia) for a military guard unit. Pilate's response is terse and slightly dismissive — asphalisasthe hōs oidate ('secure it as you know how') leaves the details to them.
66. The verb sphragisantes ('having sealed') indicates that a seal — probably a cord with a wax or clay seal impression — was placed across the stone, so that any tampering would be immediately evident. The combination of a sealed stone and an armed guard represents the maximum human effort to prevent the resurrection from being claimed. Matthew's narrative irony is that these very precautions will become evidence that the resurrection was genuine: when the tomb is found empty despite a sealed stone and armed guard, natural explanations become far more difficult.

Summary: Matthew 28, the final chapter of the Gospel, narrates the resurrection of Jesus and its immediate aftermath. Mary Magdalene and the other Mary come to the tomb at dawn and encounter an angel who announces that Jesus has risen. They meet the risen Jesus himself on their way to tell the disciples. The chief priests bribe the guards to spread the lie that the disciples stole the body. The chapter — and the entire Gospel — culminates with the Great Commission on a mountain in Galilee, where Jesus claims all authority in heaven and on earth and sends his disciples to make disciples of all nations, baptizing and teaching, with the promise of his presence until the end of the age.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Great Commission (vv. 18-20) is Matthew's theological climax. The Gospel that began with 'Emmanuel — God with us' (1:23) ends with 'I am with you always' (28:20) — the entire narrative is framed by divine presence. The Trinitarian baptismal formula ('in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit') is the most explicit Trinitarian statement in the Gospels. The universal scope — 'all nations' (panta ta ethnē) — fulfills the promise to Abraham (Genesis 12:3) and the trajectory that began with the Magi (2:1-12). The guards' bribery (vv. 11-15) represents Matthew's engagement with the competing narrative circulating in his day: the claim that the disciples stole the body.

Translation Friction: The guard story (vv. 11-15) is unique to Matthew and is often seen as apologetic — a response to Jewish counter-claims about the empty tomb. The phrase 'this story has been spread among the Jews to this day' (v. 15) reflects the tension between Matthew's community and the broader Jewish community. The Great Commission's Trinitarian formula has been questioned by some scholars as reflecting later liturgical development rather than Jesus's exact words. We render the Greek as given. The note that 'some doubted' (v. 17) at the resurrection appearance is a remarkably honest admission that even among the eleven, faith was not unanimous.

Connections: The angel's appearance echoes Daniel 10:5-6 and connects to the angel at Jesus's birth (1:20). The earthquake parallels 27:51-54. The mountain setting for the Great Commission recalls the mountain of the Sermon on the Mount (5:1), the Transfiguration (17:1), and ultimately Sinai/Horeb. The promise of universal presence ('I am with you always') echoes the divine name revealed at the burning bush (Exodus 3:14) and the Emmanuel prophecy (Isaiah 7:14, Matthew 1:23). The phrase 'the end of the age' (synteleias tou aiōnos) connects to the Olivet Discourse (24:3).

¹After the Sabbath, as the first day of the week was dawning, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary went to see the tomb. ²Suddenly there was a great earthquake, for an angel of the Lord descended from heaven, came and rolled back the stone, and sat on it. ³His appearance was like lightning, and his clothing was white as snow. ⁴The guards shook with fear of him and became like dead men. ⁵The angel said to the women, "Do not be afraid, for I know that you are looking for Jesus who was crucified. ⁶He is not here, for he has been raised, just as he said. Come, see the place where he lay. ⁷Then go quickly and tell his disciples, 'He has been raised from the dead, and look — he is going ahead of you to Galilee. There you will see him.' See, I have told you." ⁸So they left the tomb quickly, with fear and great joy, and ran to tell his disciples. ⁹Suddenly Jesus met them and said, "Greetings!" They came to him, clasped his feet, and worshiped him. ¹⁰Then Jesus said to them, "Do not be afraid. Go and tell my brothers to go to Galilee, and there they will see me." ¹¹While the women were on their way, some of the guards went into the city and reported to the chief priests everything that had happened. ¹²After the chief priests had assembled with the elders and devised a plan, they gave a large sum of money to the soldiers, ¹³Declaring, Say you, His followers arrived by night, and stole him away while we slept. ¹⁴If this reaches the governor's ears, we will satisfy him and keep you out of trouble." ¹⁵The soldiers took the money and did as they were instructed. And this story has been widely circulated among the Jewish people to this day. ¹⁶Now the eleven disciples went to Galilee, to the mountain where Jesus had directed them. ¹⁷When they noticed him, they worshipped him — but some doubted. ¹⁸Jesus came to them and said, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. ¹⁹Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, ²⁰Teaching them to observe all matters whatsoever I have commanded you — and, lo, I am with you always, indeed to the end of the world. Amen.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek opse sabbatōn ('late on the Sabbath' or 'after the Sabbath') combined with tē epiphōskousē eis mian sabbatōn ('as it was dawning toward the first of the week') describes the early morning of Sunday. The two Marys are the same women who witnessed the burial (27:61). The verb theōrēsai ('to see, to observe') suggests they came to visit the tomb, not expecting resurrection. Mark adds that they brought spices for anointing.
2. The second earthquake (seismos megas, cf. 27:51) accompanies divine action. The angel (angelos kyriou, 'angel of the Lord') descends from heaven (katabas ex ouranou) — the same phrase used for divine agents throughout Matthew. The angel rolls away the stone not to let Jesus out (he has already risen) but to show the women the empty tomb. The detail that the angel sat (ekathēto) on the stone conveys sovereign composure — the guards' seal and the massive stone are trivial obstacles.
3. The description echoes Daniel 7:9 (the Ancient of Days with garment 'white as snow') and Daniel 10:6 (face like lightning). The combination of astrapē ('lightning') and chiōn ('snow') — brilliant light and pure whiteness — are the standard biblical markers of heavenly beings. The word eidea ('appearance, form') occurs only here in the New Testament.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7:9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 10:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The verb eseisthēsan ('they shook, they were shaken') uses the same root as seismos ('earthquake') — the guards experience their own personal earthquake of terror. The phrase egenēthēsan hōs nekroi ('they became as dead men') describes paralysis from fear — ironic, since they were guarding a dead man who is now alive, and the living guards appear dead.
5. The emphatic hymeis ('you,' as opposed to the guards) distinguishes the women from the soldiers — the women need not fear because they come seeking (zēteite, 'you are seeking') Jesus. The perfect participle estaurōmenon ('the crucified one') keeps the crucifixion in view even at the moment of resurrection — the risen Jesus is still the crucified Jesus.
6. The announcement ouk estin hōde ('he is not here') is the empty tomb's testimony. The passive ēgerthē ('he was raised') is a divine passive — God raised Jesus. The phrase kathōs eipen ('just as he said') links the resurrection to Jesus's own predictions (16:21, 17:23, 20:19). The invitation deute idete ('come, see') makes the women eyewitnesses of the empty tomb. The SBLGNT does not include 'the Lord' (ho kyrios) before 'lay,' which appears in some manuscripts and the KJV.
7. The command is urgent: tachy poreutheiasai ('going quickly'). The women are commissioned as the first witnesses and messengers of the resurrection — apostles to the apostles. The phrase proagei hymas eis tēn Galilaian ('he goes ahead of you to Galilee') fulfills Jesus's promise in 26:32 and uses the shepherd imagery of going ahead of the flock. The closing idou eipon hymin ('see, I have told you') functions as a formal charge — the message has been entrusted.
8. The combination meta phobou kai charas megalēs ('with fear and great joy') captures the complex emotional state of encountering the divine — the two emotions are not contradictory but complementary. Fear at the angel's presence and joy at the news coexist. The verb edramon ('they ran') conveys urgency — they do not walk to deliver this message.
9. The greeting chairete ('Rejoice! Greetings!') is the ordinary Greek salutation, but in this context it carries its full weight — 'Rejoice!' The women's response — kratēsan autou tous podas ('they grasped his feet') — demonstrates both physical reality (the risen body can be touched) and devotion (clasping the feet is a posture of worship). The verb prosekynēsan ('they worshiped') is the same word used for worship of God throughout Matthew — applied to the risen Jesus without reservation.
10. Jesus repeats the angel's command (mē phobeisthe, 'do not be afraid') and the instruction about Galilee. Remarkably, he calls the disciples tois adelphois mou ('my brothers') — the men who abandoned him (26:56) are not disowned but claimed as family. This is the first word of the risen Jesus to his followers: reassurance and reconciliation, not rebuke.
11. The narrative shifts to the guards' report. The phrase tines tēs koustōdias ('some of the guard') suggests that not all the guards came — some may have fled in different directions. They report to the chief priests (archiereusin), not to Pilate — indicating that these were temple guards, not Roman soldiers, or that the priests were their primary employers. The word hapanta ('all things') means they gave a complete account of the earthquake, the angel, and the empty tomb.
12. The verb synachthentes ('having assembled') and symbolion labontes ('having taken counsel') mirror the conspiracy of 27:1 — the same group that plotted Jesus's death now plots to suppress his resurrection. The phrase argyria hikana ('sufficient silver, a large sum') repeats the pattern of financial corruption: first they paid Judas (26:15), now they pay the guards. Money is the weapon of choice.
13. The fabricated story is internally contradictory: if the guards were sleeping (koimōmenōn, 'while we were sleeping'), how would they know who took the body? The fact that sleeping on guard duty was a capital offense in the Roman military makes the story even less plausible — no soldier would voluntarily confess to this. Matthew includes this detail to expose the alternative explanation as absurd.

14. The priests promise protection: peisomen auton ('we will persuade him') and hymas amerimous poiēsomen ('we will make you free from worry/care'). The word amerimous ('without anxiety, free from concern') assures the soldiers that the political consequences of admitting they slept on duty will be handled. The priests are confident in their ability to manage Pilate — a confidence consistent with their political influence throughout the narrative.
15. The phrase diēphēmisthē ho logos houtos ('this story was spread abroad') indicates that the stolen-body theory was actively circulated and had currency in Matthew's time. The phrase para Ioudaiois ('among the Jews') reflects the distinction between Matthew's community and the broader Jewish community — a distinction that had sharpened by the time of writing. The phrase mechri tēs sēmeron hēmeras ('until the present day') is an authorial aside placing Matthew's writing at some distance from the events described.
16. The number 'eleven' (hendeka) is a permanent reminder of Judas's absence. The mountain (to oros) is not identified but connects to Matthew's mountain theology — major revelations occur on mountains (5:1, 17:1). The verb etaxato ('had directed, had appointed') indicates a prearranged meeting place, showing that the resurrection appearance was not random but planned.
17. The response is divided: prosekynēsan ('they worshiped') from some and edistasan ('they doubted, they hesitated') from others. The verb distazō ('to doubt, to waver, to hesitate') appears only twice in the New Testament — here and in 14:31 (Peter sinking in the water). Matthew's honesty about doubt within the resurrection community is remarkable — even a direct encounter with the risen Jesus does not compel unanimous faith. The 'some' (hoi de) who doubted may be a smaller group, but their presence is not hidden.
18. The claim edothē moi pasa exousia ('all authority has been given to me') is the most comprehensive authority claim in the New Testament. The passive edothē ('was given') indicates the Father as the source. The scope — en ouranō kai epi tēs gēs ('in heaven and on earth') — is total and universal. This fulfills Daniel 7:14, where the Son of Man receives authority, glory, and sovereign power from the Ancient of Days. The word exousia ('authority, right, power') has been a key theme in Matthew from the beginning (7:29, 9:6, 9:8, 10:1, 21:23-27).
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7:14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The main imperative is mathēteusate ('make disciples') — not merely 'go' (poreuthentes is a participle). The task is disciple-making, not just traveling. The scope panta ta ethnē ('all nations/peoples') breaks open the Jewish-focused mission of 10:5-6 ('do not go to the Gentiles') into universal mission. The Trinitarian baptismal formula eis to onoma tou patros kai tou huiou kai tou hagiou pneumatos ('into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit') is unique in the Gospels. The singular 'name' (onoma) governing three persons is theologically significant — one name, three persons. This formula became the standard baptismal rite of the early church.
20. The second participle didaskontes ('teaching') defines discipleship: it involves instruction in panta hosa eneteilamēn ('everything I commanded') — the entire ethical and theological teaching of Jesus recorded in Matthew. The closing promise egō meth' hymōn eimi pasas tas hēmeras ('I am with you all the days') is the Gospel's final and climactic statement. It echoes the Emmanuel prophecy of 1:23 ('God with us'), forming an inclusio that frames the entire Gospel with the theme of divine presence. The phrase heōs tēs synteleias tou aiōnos ('until the completion of the age') connects to the eschatological language of 13:39-40, 49 and 24:3. The SBLGNT does not include 'Amen' (amēn) at the end, which appears in some manuscripts and the KJV. Matthew's Gospel ends not with a period but with a promise — the open-ended assurance of Christ's continuing presence.

Mark

Summary: Mark 1 opens with the ministry of John the Baptist in the wilderness, proclaiming a baptism of repentance and preparing the way for the one coming after him. Jesus arrives from Nazareth, is baptized by John, and the Spirit descends on him like a dove while a voice from heaven declares him God's beloved Son. The Spirit immediately drives Jesus into the wilderness for forty days of testing. After John's arrest, Jesus begins his public ministry in Galilee, announcing that the kingdom of God has drawn near. He calls his first disciples — Simon, Andrew, James, and John — then demonstrates his authority through exorcisms, healings, and teaching in Capernaum and throughout Galilee. The chapter culminates with Jesus healing a leper and being unable to enter towns openly because of the growing crowds.

What Makes This Remarkable: Mark's Gospel begins without a birth narrative or genealogy, plunging directly into the action with John the Baptist. The word euthys ('immediately') appears repeatedly — a hallmark of Mark's urgent, fast-paced narrative style. The messianic secret theme emerges early: Jesus commands demons and the healed leper to remain silent about his identity. The opening verse may function as a title for the entire Gospel. Mark's Jesus is a man of decisive action who teaches with authority unlike the scribes, and whose identity the demons recognize even as humans struggle to comprehend it.

Translation Friction: The opening quotation in verses 2-3 is attributed to 'Isaiah the prophet' but actually combines Malachi 3:1 and Isaiah 40:3. Some manuscripts read 'in the prophets' to avoid this difficulty, but the SBLGNT follows the harder reading. We render the Greek as given. The phrase 'Son of God' in verse 1 is absent from some early manuscripts (notably Sinaiticus); we include it following the SBLGNT. Mark's abrupt transitions and paratactic style ('and... and... and...') are smoothed slightly in English while preserving the narrative urgency.

Connections: The opening quotation from Isaiah 40:3 and Malachi 3:1 frames Jesus's arrival as the fulfillment of Israel's prophetic hope for God's return to his people. The wilderness setting evokes Israel's exodus experience. The Spirit's descent at baptism recalls Genesis 1:2 (the Spirit hovering over the waters). The forty days of testing parallel Israel's forty years in the wilderness and Moses's forty days on Sinai. Jesus's authority over unclean spirits and disease demonstrates the in-breaking of God's kingdom that he announces.

¹The beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. ²As it is written in Isaiah the prophet: "Look, I am sending my messenger ahead of you, who will prepare your way." ³"A voice crying out in the wilderness: 'Prepare the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.'" ⁴John appeared, baptizing in the wilderness and proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins. ⁵The whole Judean countryside and all the people of Jerusalem went out to him, and they were baptized by him in the Jordan River, confessing their sins. ⁶Now John wore clothing made of camel's hair with a leather belt around his waist, and he ate locusts and wild honey. ⁷He proclaimed, "One who is more powerful than I is coming after me. I am not worthy to stoop down and untie the strap of his sandals. ⁸I have baptized you with water, but he will baptize you with the Holy Spirit." ⁹In those days, Jesus came from Nazareth in Galilee and was baptized by John in the Jordan. ¹⁰Immediately, as he came up out of the water, he saw the heavens being torn open and the Spirit descending on him like a dove. ¹¹And a voice came from heaven: "You are my beloved Son; with you I am well pleased." ¹²Immediately the Spirit drove him out into the wilderness. ¹³He was in the wilderness forty days, being tested by Satan. He was with the wild animals, and the angels were serving him. ¹⁴After John was arrested, Jesus came into Galilee proclaiming the good news of God, ¹⁵Saying, The time is fulfilled, and God's kingdom is drawing near. Repent you, and believe the gospel. ¹⁶As he passed along the Sea of Galilee, he saw Simon and his brother Andrew casting a net into the sea, for they were fishermen. ¹⁷Jesus said to them, "Come, follow me, and I will make you fishers of people." ¹⁸Immediately they left their nets and followed him. ¹⁹Going on a little farther, he saw James the son of Zebedee and his brother John in their boat mending their nets. ²⁰Immediately he called them, and they left their father Zebedee in the boat with the hired workers and went after him. ²¹They went to Capernaum, and immediately on the Sabbath he entered the synagogue and began teaching. ²²They were astonished at his teaching, for he was teaching them as one who had authority, and not as the scribes. ²³Immediately there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit, and he cried out, ²⁴"What do you want with us, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come to destroy us? I know who you are — the Holy One of God!" ²⁵Jesus rebuked it, saying, "Be silent and come out of him!" ²⁶The unclean spirit convulsed the man, screamed with a loud voice, and came out of him. ²⁷They were all amazed, so that they debated among themselves, saying, "What is this? A new teaching with authority! He commands even the unclean spirits, and they obey him." ²⁸Immediately the news about him spread everywhere throughout the whole surrounding region of Galilee. ²⁹Immediately after leaving the synagogue, they went to the house of Simon and Andrew, along with James and John. ³⁰Simon's mother-in-law was lying ill with a fever, and immediately they told him about her. ³¹He went to her, took her by the hand, and raised her up. The fever left her, and she began serving them. ³²That evening, after the sun had set, they brought to him all who were sick and those who were demon-possessed. ³³The whole town was gathered at the door. ³⁴He healed many who were sick with various diseases and cast out many demons, and he would not allow the demons to speak, because they knew him. ³⁵Very early in the morning, while it was still dark, he got up, went out, and withdrew to a deserted place, and there he was praying. ³⁶Simon and those with him searched for him, ³⁷After they had found him, they stated to him, All men seek for you. ³⁸He said to them, "Let us go on to the neighboring towns, so that I may preach there also, for that is why I came out." ³⁹So he went throughout all of Galilee, preaching in their synagogues and casting out demons. ⁴⁰A man with a skin disease came to him, kneeling and begging him, "If you are willing, you can make me clean." ⁴¹Moved with compassion, he stretched out his hand and touched him, saying, "I am willing. Be clean." ⁴²Immediately the skin disease left him, and he was made clean. ⁴³Jesus sternly warned him and immediately sent him away, ⁴⁴Says to him, See you say nothing to any man — but go your way, shew thyself to the priest, and offer since your cleansing those things which Moses commanded, for a testimony to them. ⁴⁵But the man went out and began to proclaim it widely and spread the word, so that Jesus could no longer enter a town openly but stayed out in deserted places. Yet people came to him from everywhere.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek euangelion ('good news, gospel') was not originally a religious term — in the Roman world it referred to imperial proclamations, especially announcements of military victory or a new emperor's accession. Mark's use of it for Jesus is a counter-imperial claim. The phrase may function as a title for the entire book rather than the first sentence of a narrative.

1. The phrase 'Son of God' (huiou theou) is absent from Codex Sinaiticus and a few other witnesses, but the SBLGNT includes it. If original, it frames the entire Gospel with a christological declaration that the narrative will progressively unfold.
2. This verse actually quotes Malachi 3:1 (combined with Exodus 23:20), not Isaiah. The Isaiah quotation comes in verse 3. Mark attributes the composite quotation to Isaiah, likely because Isaiah was the more prominent prophet and the primary source. Some later manuscripts changed 'Isaiah the prophet' to 'the prophets' to resolve the difficulty, but the SBLGNT preserves the harder reading.
2. The Greek angelos ('messenger') is the same word used for 'angel.' Here it refers to John the Baptist as God's human messenger.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Malachi 3:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 23:20. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. This quotes Isaiah 40:3 from the Septuagint. In the Hebrew original, the phrase division is 'A voice cries out: In the wilderness prepare the way of the LORD' — the wilderness is where the road is built, not where the voice cries. The Septuagint and Mark connect 'in the wilderness' with the voice, which conveniently describes John's actual location. The Greek euthys ('straight') here is an adjective, different from the adverb euthys ('immediately') that will become Mark's signature word.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 40:3 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The Greek egeneto Iōannēs ho baptizōn ('there appeared John the one baptizing') introduces John as a figure bursting onto the scene. Mark uses his characteristic participial style. The word metanoia ('repentance') means a fundamental change of mind and direction, corresponding to the Hebrew teshuvah ('return'). Aphasis hamartōn ('forgiveness/release of sins') uses aphesis, which carries the sense of release or liberation — as in releasing a prisoner or canceling a debt.
5. The 'all' (pasa, pantes) is hyperbolic, a common Semitic literary device emphasizing the magnitude of the response. The imperfect tenses (exeporeueto, ebaptizonto) indicate ongoing, repeated action — the crowds kept coming and kept being baptized. Exomologoumenoi ('confessing') is a present participle indicating that confession accompanied the act of baptism.
6. John's appearance deliberately echoes Elijah's description in 2 Kings 1:8 ('a man wearing a garment of hair with a leather belt around his waist'). Mark presents John as the returning Elijah prophesied in Malachi 4:5, a connection Jesus makes explicit later (9:13). Locusts were a permissible food under Levitical law (Leviticus 11:22) and remain part of the diet in some regions of the Middle East today.

6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Malachi 4:5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Leviticus 11:22. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. Untying sandals was a task considered too menial even for a Hebrew slave — a rabbinic tradition held that a disciple must do everything for his teacher except remove his sandals. John claims he is not even worthy of the task that was beneath a slave. The comparative ischyroteros ('more powerful') is emphatic — John is not describing a slight superiority but an incomparable difference in status and power.
8. The contrast between water and Spirit baptism is stark. The pronoun ego ('I') and autos ('he') are both emphatic in Greek, creating a sharp personal contrast. Mark omits 'and fire' found in Matthew 3:11 and Luke 3:16, focusing solely on the Spirit. The verb baptizō literally means 'to immerse, to dip' — the Spirit baptism implies being immersed in God's Spirit.
9. Mark introduces Jesus abruptly — no birth narrative, no genealogy, no childhood. He simply arrives from the obscure village of Nazareth. The phrase en ekeinai tais hēmerais ('in those days') is a general temporal marker connecting Jesus's appearance to John's ministry. The preposition eis ('into') with the Jordan may suggest full immersion, though the preposition alone is not conclusive.
10. This is the first occurrence of Mark's characteristic euthys ('immediately, at once'), which appears over forty times in this Gospel, creating a sense of urgency and rapid action. The Greek schizomenous ('being torn, split') is much more violent than 'opened' — it is the same root used for the tearing of the temple curtain at Jesus's death (15:38). Mark depicts not a gentle opening but a forceful rending of the barrier between heaven and earth. The vision is described as Jesus's experience — 'he saw' (eiden) — making it a personal revelation rather than a public spectacle in Mark's account.
11. Mark's version addresses Jesus directly ('You are') rather than speaking about him in the third person ('This is') as in Matthew 3:17. The declaration combines Psalm 2:7 ('You are my Son') — a royal enthronement psalm — with Isaiah 42:1 ('my chosen one, in whom my soul delights') — the first Servant Song. Jesus is thus identified simultaneously as the Davidic king and the Suffering Servant, two strands that Mark's Gospel will weave together throughout. The Greek agapētos ('beloved') may also carry the sense of 'only' or 'unique,' echoing Genesis 22:2 where Isaac is called Abraham's 'beloved son.'

12. The verb ekballei ('drives out, casts out, expels') is startlingly forceful — it is the same word Mark uses for casting out demons. The Spirit does not lead or guide Jesus into the wilderness; he is thrust there. Mark's use of the historical present tense (ekballei rather than the aorist) makes the action vivid and immediate. The wilderness (erēmos) connects to the wilderness motifs of Exodus and Isaiah 40.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 40. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. Mark compresses what Matthew and Luke expand into three specific temptations into a single, vivid summary. The 'forty days' echoes Israel's forty years in the wilderness (Deuteronomy 8:2), Moses's forty days on Sinai (Exodus 34:28), and Elijah's forty-day journey to Horeb (1 Kings 19:8). The detail about wild animals (thērion) is unique to Mark and may evoke either danger or the Edenic peace of Isaiah 11:6–9 where the messianic figure restores harmony with the animal kingdom. The Greek peirazomenos can mean 'tempted' or 'tested' — we use 'tested' to capture the broader sense of being put to the proof.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 8:2 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 11:6–9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The Greek paradothēnai ('to be handed over, arrested') is the same verb used later for Jesus's own betrayal and arrest (14:10, 41). Mark subtly foreshadows that the fate of the forerunner will become the fate of the one he announced. The phrase 'good news of God' (euangelion tou theou) means the good news that comes from God, about God, or both — the genitive is intentionally ambiguous.
15. The Greek kairos ('time') denotes an appointed or decisive moment, distinct from chronos (ordinary sequential time). The perfect tense peplērōtai ('has been fulfilled') indicates a completed action with ongoing significance — the decisive moment has arrived and remains in effect. The perfect tense ēngiken ('has drawn near') similarly indicates that the kingdom has arrived at the threshold and remains there. The two imperatives — metanoete ('repent') and pisteuete ('believe') — form the twofold human response to the kingdom's arrival.
16. The Greek thalassa ('sea') is technically a lake (Lake Gennesaret/Kinneret), but the Gospels consistently call it a 'sea,' which reflects local usage. The verb amphiballontas ('casting a net') is a technical fishing term — casting a circular hand net. Mark introduces Simon without explanation, suggesting his audience already knew who Simon Peter was.
17. The call narrative is remarkably brief — no prior conversation, no credentials, no negotiation. The metaphor 'fishers of people' (halieis anthrōpōn) draws on their existing vocation but transforms it. The plural anthrōpōn ('of people') is rendered inclusively rather than with the gendered 'of men,' since the Greek anthrōpos refers to human beings generally.
18. The word euthys ('immediately') again emphasizes the instantaneous nature of the response. The verb aphentes ('leaving, abandoning') conveys a decisive break. The aorist tense ēkolouthēsan ('followed') marks the beginning of a new course of life. The cost of discipleship is implicit — nets represent livelihood, investment, and family trade.
19. The verb katartizontas ('mending, preparing, making ready') suggests the brothers were repairing or preparing their nets for the next fishing trip — they were in the middle of their workday. James is named before John, likely indicating he was the elder brother.
20. Again euthys ('immediately') underscores the urgency of Jesus's call and the decisiveness of the response. The mention of hired workers (misthōtōn) is unique to Mark and indicates that Zebedee's fishing business was substantial enough to employ laborers — James and John were not destitute. Their leaving is therefore a sacrifice of relative comfort, not desperation.
21. Mark shifts to the historical present tense (eisporeuontai, 'they enter') for vivid narration, then back to the aorist. Capernaum (Kfar Nahum, 'village of Nahum') served as Jesus's base of operations in Galilee. The imperfect edidasken ('he was teaching') indicates ongoing or repeated action — he taught at length, not just a brief remark.
22. The Greek exeplēssonto ('were astonished, were struck out of their senses') is stronger than mild surprise — it conveys being overwhelmed or stunned. The scribes typically taught by citing prior rabbinic authorities ('Rabbi Hillel says... Rabbi Shammai says...'). Jesus taught on his own authority, without appealing to tradition. The noun exousia ('authority, power, right') implies both the right to speak and the power behind the words.

- 23. The phrase 'in an unclean spirit' (en pneumatī akathartō) describes the man as being under the spirit's domination — literally 'in' its sphere of influence. The unclean spirit's presence in the synagogue is jarring — the place of worship is invaded by the impure. Mark's use of euthys here connects the teaching about authority directly to the demonstration of that authority.
- 24. The phrase ti hēmin kai soi ('what to us and to you?') is a Semitic idiom meaning 'what business do we have with each other?' or 'leave us alone.' The spirit alternates between plural ('us') and singular ('I know'), perhaps speaking for the entire demonic realm. The title 'Holy One of God' (ho hagios tou theou) demonstrates supernatural knowledge of Jesus's identity — a key element in Mark's messianic secret theme. The spirit's recognition contrasts sharply with human incomprehension throughout the Gospel.
- 25. The verb epetimēsēn ('rebuked') carries the force of a commanding reprimand. The imperative phimōthēti ('be muzzled, be silenced') is vivid — literally 'be muzzled' as one would muzzle an animal. Jesus's first miracle in Mark is an exorcism, establishing that his ministry is fundamentally a conflict with evil powers. The command to silence is the first instance of the messianic secret — Jesus does not want his identity proclaimed by demons.
- 26. The verb sparaxan ('convulsed, tore at, threw into spasms') describes violent physical distress. The spirit's departure is not quiet or easy — it is violent and loud, demonstrating both the spirit's malice and Jesus's superior power. Despite the spirit's resistance, it cannot disobey Jesus's command.
- 27. The Greek ethambēthēsan ('were amazed, alarmed, astonished') conveys not just wonder but a sense of alarm or awe — something unsettling has happened. The crowd links Jesus's teaching and his exorcism as two expressions of the same authority (exousia). The adjective kainē ('new') can mean new in kind (qualitatively unprecedented) rather than merely new in time — this is teaching unlike anything they have encountered.
- 28. The Greek akoē ('report, news, fame, what is heard') literally means 'the hearing' — what people were saying and hearing about Jesus. Again euthys ('immediately') drives the narrative forward. The geographic scope — 'the whole surrounding region of Galilee' — shows how rapidly Jesus's reputation expanded.
- 29. Again euthys marks the rapid transition. The four disciples just called now accompany Jesus. The house of Simon and Andrew in Capernaum becomes a base of operations. Archaeological excavations at Capernaum have identified a first-century house beneath the later 'Church of St. Peter' that tradition associates with this location.
- 30. The detail that Simon had a mother-in-law presupposes he was married, a detail Paul confirms in 1 Corinthians 9:5. The verb katekeito ('was lying down') indicates she was bedridden. The impersonal 'they told him' reflects Mark's characteristic vagueness about who exactly is speaking.
- 31. The verb ēgeiren ('raised') is the same verb used for resurrection throughout the New Testament. Mark may intend a double meaning — Jesus 'raises' Simon's mother-in-law from her sickbed, foreshadowing the greater raising to come. The verb diēkonei ('she was serving') uses the root from which 'deacon' comes; her immediate service demonstrates both complete healing and a model of discipleship as responsive service.
- 32. The double time reference — 'evening' and 'after the sun had set' — is significant: the Sabbath ended at sundown, and only then could people carry the sick without violating Sabbath law. Mark shows the community's eagerness by noting they came as soon as they legally could. The distinction between those who are 'sick' (kakōs echontas, 'having it badly') and 'demon-possessed' (daimonizomenous) maintains two categories of affliction.
- 33. Another Markan hyperbole — 'the whole town' (holē hē polis) creates a vivid image of the entire community crowding around the doorway of Simon's house. The periphrastic construction (ēn episynēgmenē) emphasizes the state of being gathered rather than the act of gathering — they were assembled and waiting.
- 34. The shift from 'all' (v. 32) to 'many' (pollous) has been debated — does Mark mean he healed many but not all? More likely 'many' simply describes the large number healed from the large crowd brought. The silencing of demons (ouk ēphien lalein, 'he was not allowing them to speak') continues the messianic secret motif. The reason given — 'because they knew him' (hoti ēdeisan auton) — confirms that the demons possess supernatural knowledge of Jesus's identity that Jesus does not want publicly proclaimed at this stage.
- 35. The piling up of temporal markers — prōi ('early morning'), ennycha ('while still night'), lian ('very') — emphasizes just how early Jesus rose. After the intense demands of the previous day, Jesus seeks solitude for prayer. Mark records Jesus praying at three key moments: here, at Gethsemane (14:32-42), and possibly by implication at other points. The imperfect prosēucheto ('he was praying') indicates extended, ongoing prayer, not a brief petition.
- 36. The verb katediōxen ('pursued, hunted down, tracked') is much stronger than 'followed' — it implies an urgent, determined search. The KJV's 'followed after' is too gentle. Simon takes the initiative, already emerging as the leader and spokesman of the group.
- 37. The disciples' report — 'everyone is looking for you' (pantes zētousin se) — reveals their expectation: the crowds want more miracles, and Jesus should return to meet the demand. The verb zēteō ('to seek, search for') is neutral here but will carry negative connotations later in Mark when opponents 'seek' to arrest Jesus.
- 38. The word kōmopoleis ('market-towns') describes settlements larger than villages but smaller than cities — the small towns of rural Galilee. Jesus resists the pull of popular demand in Capernaum, insisting his mission extends beyond one location. The phrase eis touto gar exēlthon ('for this is why I came out') is ambiguous — 'came out' could mean from Capernaum, from his prayer retreat, or from God (a statement of divine mission). The ambiguity may be deliberate.

39. This verse serves as a summary statement for Jesus's early Galilean ministry, linking proclamation and exorcism as the twin activities that characterize his mission. The synagogues were the natural venues for a traveling teacher, and their mention 'throughout all Galilee' indicates a comprehensive itinerant ministry.
40. The Greek lepros traditionally rendered 'leper' covers a range of skin conditions described in Leviticus 13-14, not limited to modern Hansen's disease. 'Skin disease' is more accurate to the biblical category. The man's statement is remarkable — he does not doubt Jesus's power ('you can') but only questions his willingness ('if you are willing'). Kneeling (gonypetōn) expresses desperate supplication. Under Levitical law, a person with such a disease was ritually unclean and excluded from community life.
40. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 13-14 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
41. The Greek splanchnistheis ('moved with compassion') derives from splanchna ('intestines, bowels'), indicating a deep, visceral emotional response — compassion felt in the gut. Some manuscripts read orgistheis ('moved with anger') instead, which would describe anger at the disease or the system that ostracized the man. The SBLGNT follows the compassion reading. The physical touch is the most striking detail — by touching a ritually unclean person, Jesus would normally contract uncleanness himself. Instead, the cleanness flows in the opposite direction.
42. The dual statement — the disease 'left' (apēlthen) and he 'was made clean' (ekatharisthē) — addresses both the physical condition and the ritual status. Healing and cleansing are distinct: the disease departs (medical), and the person is restored to cleanness (ritual/social). The word euthys again emphasizes the instantaneous nature of Jesus's healing power.
43. The verb embrimēsamenos ('sternly warned, snorted with indignation') is a strong word that implies deep emotion — it is used of horses snorting. The intensity is puzzling: why such a forceful warning after a compassionate healing? Some scholars suggest Jesus was moved by anger at the disease, the social system that excluded the man, or the situation that would unfold if the healing became public. The verb exebalen ('sent away, cast out') is the same word used for casting out demons, adding to the forcefulness of the scene.
44. The command to silence (the messianic secret) is combined with a command to obey the Levitical purification procedure of Leviticus 14:1-32. Jesus does not abolish the law but upholds it. The phrase eis martyriōn autois ('as a testimony to them') is ambiguous — 'to them' could refer to the priests (as proof of healing), to the people (as evidence of God's power), or as a witness against the religious establishment. The double negative mēden mēden ('to no one, nothing') is emphatic — absolute silence is demanded.
44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 14:1-32. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
45. The healed man's disobedience has ironic consequences — he does what Jesus commanded him not to do (proclaim the healing) and presumably neglects what Jesus commanded him to do (go to the priest). The verb diaphēmizein ('to spread abroad, make known far and wide') indicates enthusiastic, widespread broadcasting. The result inverts the leper's situation: the formerly excluded man now moves freely in society while Jesus, who touched the unclean, now remains outside in deserted places. Yet even in isolation, the crowds find him — the messianic secret cannot be contained.

Summary: Mark 2 presents a series of five controversy stories that escalate tension between Jesus and the religious authorities. Jesus heals a paralytic and forgives his sins, provoking accusations of blasphemy. He calls Levi the tax collector and eats with sinners, scandalizing the Pharisees. Questions arise about fasting and Sabbath observance. Through these encounters, Jesus reveals himself as one with authority to forgive sins, as a physician for the sick rather than the righteous, and as lord of the Sabbath.

What Makes This Remarkable: The five controversy stories in chapters 2-3 follow a chiastic or escalating pattern common in ancient rhetoric. The paralytic's healing is the first time Jesus explicitly claims divine prerogative (forgiving sins). The 'Son of Man' title appears here for the first time in Mark — Jesus's preferred self-designation, drawn from Daniel 7:13-14. The grain-plucking episode reveals Jesus's interpretive method: he appeals to narrative precedent (David) rather than legal technicality, subordinating Sabbath regulation to human need.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'Son of Man' (ho huīos tou anthrōpou) is notoriously difficult — it can mean simply 'a human being' (as in Ezekiel), or it can evoke the heavenly figure of Daniel 7. In Mark, Jesus uses it with both ordinary and exalted connotations. We render it literally and note the ambiguity. The identity of 'Levi son of Alphaeus' and his relationship to Matthew and to 'James son of Alphaeus' among the Twelve remains debated.

Connections: The forgiveness of sins connects to Isaiah's new exodus themes (Isaiah 43:25). Jesus's table fellowship with sinners enacts the eschatological banquet. The David and showbread episode (1 Samuel 21:1-6) establishes a precedent for human need superseding ritual law. The bridegroom metaphor echoes Old Testament imagery of God as Israel's husband (Hosea 2, Isaiah 54).

¹When he returned to Capernaum after some days, word got out that he was at home. ²So many gathered that there was no longer room for them, not even around the door, and he was speaking the word to them. ³Some people came bringing a paralyzed man to him, carried by four men. ⁴Since they could not bring him to Jesus because of the crowd, they removed the roof above where he was, and after digging through it, they lowered the mat on which the paralyzed man was lying. ⁵When Jesus saw their faith, he said to the paralyzed man, "Child, your sins are forgiven." ⁶Now some of the scribes were sitting there, questioning in their hearts, ⁷"Why does this man speak this way? He is blaspheming! Who can forgive sins except God alone?" ⁸Immediately Jesus, perceiving in his spirit that they were reasoning this way within themselves, said to them, "Why are you reasoning about these things in your hearts? ⁹Which is easier — to say to the paralyzed man, 'Your sins are forgiven,' or to say, 'Get up, pick up your mat, and walk'? ¹⁰But so that you may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins" — he said to the paralyzed man — ¹¹"I say to you, get up, pick up your mat, and go home." ¹²He got up, immediately picked up his mat, and went out in front of everyone, so that they were all astounded and glorified God, saying, "We have never seen anything like this!" ¹³He went out again beside the sea, and the whole crowd was coming to him, and he was teaching them. ¹⁴As he passed by, he saw Levi the son of Alphaeus sitting at the tax booth, and he said to him, "Follow me." And he got up and followed him. ¹⁵As Jesus reclined at table in his house, many tax collectors and sinners were dining with him and his disciples, for there were many who followed him. ¹⁶When the scribes of the Pharisees saw that he was eating with sinners and tax collectors, they said to his disciples, "Why does he eat with tax collectors and sinners?" ¹⁷When Jesus heard this, he said to them, "Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick. I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners." ¹⁸Now John's disciples and the Pharisees were fasting. People came and said to him, "Why do John's disciples and the disciples of the Pharisees fast, but your disciples do not fast?" ¹⁹Jesus said to them, "Can the wedding guests fast while the bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. ²⁰But the days will come when the bridegroom is taken away from them, and then they will fast on that day. ²¹No one sews a patch of unshrunk cloth on an old garment. Otherwise the new patch pulls away from the old, and the tear becomes worse. ²²And no one pours new wine into old wineskins. Otherwise the wine will burst the skins, and both the wine and the skins are ruined. Instead, new wine is for fresh wineskins." ²³One Sabbath he was going through the grainfields, and his disciples began to pick heads of grain as they made their way. ²⁴The Pharisees said to him, "Look, why are they doing what is not lawful on the Sabbath?" ²⁵He said to them, "Have you never read what David did when he was in need and hungry, he and those with him — ²⁶How he traveled into the home of God in the period of Abiathar the elevated priest, and did consume the shewbread, which is not lawful to consume but for the priests, and offered as well to them which were with him? ²⁷Then he said to them, "The Sabbath was made for people, not people for the Sabbath. ²⁸So the Son of Man is lord even of the Sabbath."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase en oikō estin can mean 'in a house' or 'at home,' suggesting Capernaum had become Jesus's home base — likely Simon and Andrew's house from 1:29. The passive ēkousthē ('it was heard') vividly captures how news travels in a small town.
2. The phrase ton logon ('the word') in Mark refers to the message of the kingdom — the good news Jesus proclaimed in 1:14-15. The imperfect elalei ('he was speaking') indicates ongoing teaching when the interruption of the next verse occurs. The overcrowding sets the stage for the dramatic entry through the roof.
3. Mark's historical present (erchontai, 'they come') creates immediacy. The detail of 'four' carriers is unique to Mark, adding eyewitness specificity. The Greek paralytikos describes someone with paralysis or severe motor impairment.
4. Palestinian houses typically had flat roofs made of wooden beams covered with branches, mud, and packed earth, accessible by an exterior staircase. The verb exoryxantes ('having dug through') indicates the physical labor of breaking through this material. The krabattos ('mat, pallet') was a poor person's bed — a simple mat rather than a proper bed frame. The determination of the four friends is extraordinary and becomes a model of faith in action.

5. Jesus sees 'their faith' (tēn pistin autōn) — the faith of the four friends, not just the paralytic. Faith in Mark is often corporate and active, not merely individual belief. The address teknon ('child') is tender and personal. The present passive aphientai ('are being forgiven') is a divine passive — God is the implied agent, and Jesus speaks with God's authority. The crowd came for a healing; Jesus addresses a deeper need first.
6. The scribes' objection is internal — dialogizomenoi en tais kardiais ('reasoning in their hearts') — not spoken aloud. This makes Jesus's response in verse 8 all the more striking, since he perceives their unspoken thoughts. The verb dialogizomai can mean 'to reason, debate, question' and here carries a tone of hostile deliberation.
7. The scribes' theological logic is sound: in Jewish theology, only God can forgive sins (cf. Isaiah 43:25, 'I, I am he who blots out your transgressions'). Their accusation of blasphemy (blasphēmei) is the most serious religious charge possible. The irony in Mark is that the reader knows from 1:1 that Jesus is the Son of God — the scribes are theologically correct about who can forgive sins, but wrong about who is standing before them.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 43:25. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The phrase epignous tō pneumati autou ('perceiving in his spirit') describes supernatural insight — Jesus knows their unspoken thoughts. The word euthys ('immediately') again marks the swift narrative pace. Jesus's question does not deny their premise (that only God forgives sins) but challenges them to draw the right conclusion from it.
9. Jesus's question is a masterful argument: pronouncing forgiveness is 'easier' to say because no one can verify it, while commanding a paralytic to walk demands visible proof. By performing the harder, verifiable act, Jesus validates the easier, unverifiable one. The logic assumes that the power to heal and the power to forgive both come from the same divine source.
10. This is the first appearance of 'Son of Man' (ho huios tou anthrōpou) in Mark. The title is drawn from Daniel 7:13-14, where 'one like a son of man' receives dominion and authority from God. In Aramaic, 'son of man' (bar enash) can also simply mean 'a human being.' Jesus uses the title to make a veiled claim — those who know Daniel will recognize the authority claim, while others may hear only a self-reference. The phrase 'on earth' (epi tēs gēs) may emphasize that this divine authority is now operative on earth, not only in heaven.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 7:13-14 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The emphatic soi legō ('to you I say') places the full weight of Jesus's authority behind the command. Three imperatives follow in rapid succession: egeire ('get up'), aron ('pick up'), hypage ('go'). The command to go home implies full restoration — the man can now resume his place in family and community life.
12. The healing is instantaneous and complete — the man performs all three commanded actions. The verb existasthai ('to be astounded, beside oneself') is stronger than ordinary amazement; it suggests being overwhelmed to the point of losing composure. The crowd's response — glorifying God — is the correct theological interpretation of what they have witnessed. Their exclamation 'we have never seen anything like this' confirms the unprecedented nature of Jesus's ministry.
13. This transitional verse moves the setting from the house to the seaside. The imperfect tenses (ērchetō, edidasken) indicate continuous, repeated action — the crowds kept coming, and Jesus kept teaching. The seaside becomes a recurring venue for Jesus's teaching in Mark (cf. 3:7, 4:1).
14. The call of Levi mirrors the call of the fishermen in 1:16-20 — Jesus sees, calls, and the person immediately follows. The telōnion ('tax booth, customs post') was where tolls were collected on goods passing through. Levi was likely a toll collector for Herod Antipas rather than a direct agent of Rome, but the occupation was despised nonetheless as collaborationist and prone to corruption. The relationship between this Levi and the apostle Matthew (cf. Matthew 9:9) is uncertain — Mark never identifies them as the same person.
15. The phrase 'in his house' (en tē oikia autou) is ambiguous — it could be Levi's house or Jesus's house. Given the context of Levi's call, Levi's house is more likely. The verb synaneekento ('were reclining together') describes the Greco-Roman dining posture of reclining on couches. Shared meals in the ancient world signified acceptance and fellowship. The category 'sinners' (hamartōloi) likely refers to those whose occupations or lifestyles placed them outside the boundaries of Torah observance as defined by the Pharisees.
16. The phrase 'scribes of the Pharisees' (hoi grammateis tōn Pharisaion) designates legal scholars aligned with the Pharisaic movement specifically. They address the disciples rather than Jesus directly — perhaps a social convention of indirect confrontation. The Pharisaic concern about table fellowship reflected their understanding that eating together constituted a form of religious communion; sharing a meal with the impure made one impure by association.
17. The physician metaphor reframes the entire controversy: Jesus is not endorsing sin by eating with sinners but treating a disease. The SBLGNT does not include 'to repentance' (eis metanoian), which appears in some manuscripts harmonizing with Luke 5:32. The statement 'I did not come to call the righteous' may be ironic — in Mark's theology, no one is truly righteous apart from God's action. The verb kalēsai ('to call, invite') connects to the calling of disciples — Jesus's table fellowship is itself an act of calling sinners to follow him.
18. The question groups John's disciples with the Pharisees against Jesus's disciples — a surprising alignment, since John opposed the religious establishment. The fasting in question likely refers to voluntary fasting beyond the required Day of Atonement fast, which the Pharisees practiced twice weekly (cf. Luke 18:12). The implied criticism is that Jesus's disciples are insufficiently pious.

19. The phrase hoi huioi tou nymphōnos ('the sons of the bridal chamber') is a Semitic idiom for wedding guests, particularly the close friends of the groom. The bridegroom metaphor carries rich Old Testament resonance — God is frequently portrayed as Israel's bridegroom (Isaiah 54:5, 62:5; Hosea 2:16-20). By identifying himself as the bridegroom, Jesus implicitly claims a divine role. Jewish wedding celebrations lasted seven days, during which fasting was considered inappropriate and even prohibited.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 54:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Hosea 2:16-20. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. This is Jesus's first veiled reference to his death in Mark. The passive aparthē ('is taken away') implies violent removal, not voluntary departure. The sudden shift from celebration to mourning foreshadows the Passion. The phrase 'on that day' (en ekeinē tē hēmera) may refer specifically to the day of Jesus's death or to the entire period of his absence.
21. The word agnaphou ('unshrunk, unfulled') refers to cloth that has not been processed by a fuller — it will shrink when washed, pulling away from the surrounding fabric. The parable illustrates that Jesus's ministry cannot simply be patched onto existing religious structures. The 'old garment' represents the current religious framework; the 'new cloth' represents what Jesus brings. The two are not merely different but incompatible.
22. The askoi ('wineskins') were made of animal hides. Old wineskins had lost their elasticity and could not expand with the fermentation of new wine. The metaphor reinforces the previous parable: the ferment of Jesus's ministry requires entirely new containers. Mark uses two different words for 'new' — neos (new in time, freshly made wine) and kainos (new in kind, qualitatively different wineskins) — a distinction that may be theologically significant.
23. The phrase hodon poiein ('to make a way, to make a path') combined with tillontes tous stachyas ('plucking the grain heads') describes the disciples pulling off grain heads as they walked through a field. Plucking grain from a neighbor's field was permitted under Deuteronomy 23:25, but the Pharisees considered it a form of 'reaping' — one of the thirty-nine categories of work prohibited on the Sabbath in later rabbinic tradition.
23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 23:25 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
24. The imperfect elegon ('were saying') may suggest ongoing complaint rather than a single objection. The phrase ho ouk exestin ('what is not lawful') frames the issue as a legal violation. The Pharisees hold Jesus responsible for his disciples' behavior, which was standard in the teacher-disciple relationship — a rabbi was accountable for his students' conduct.
25. Jesus's response appeals to Scripture rather than engaging in legal debate on Pharisaic terms. The rhetorical question 'Have you never read?' (oudepote anegnōte) is pointed — he is asking legal experts if they know their own Scriptures. The appeal to David's precedent (1 Samuel 21:1-6) is an argument from the greater to the lesser: if David could override ritual law in a time of need, how much more can the Son of David?
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Samuel 21:1-6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. The reference to 'Abiathar the high priest' poses a difficulty: according to 1 Samuel 21:1-6, the priest was Ahimelech, Abiathar's father. Various explanations have been proposed — the preposition epi can mean 'in the time of' (a general era reference), or this may be a genuine historical error in the tradition. The 'bread of the Presence' (artous tēs protheseōs) translates the Hebrew lechem hapanim — the twelve loaves placed before God in the tabernacle/temple weekly (Leviticus 24:5-9), restricted to priests.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Samuel 21:1-6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.

27. This revolutionary principle reorients Sabbath theology: the Sabbath is a gift designed to serve human well-being, not an institution to which humans are subordinated. The Greek anthrōpos ('human being') is generic, not male-specific, so 'people' captures the intended scope. A similar sentiment appears in later rabbinic literature (Mekhilta on Exodus 31:13: 'The Sabbath is handed over to you, not you to the Sabbath'), though Jesus draws a more radical conclusion in the next verse.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 31:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. The concluding claim is extraordinary: Jesus asserts authority over the Sabbath itself — an institution established by God at creation (Genesis 2:2-3). The word kyrios ('lord, master') denotes sovereign authority. If the Sabbath was made for humanity (v. 27), and the Son of Man has authority over it (v. 28), then Jesus claims the right to define how the Sabbath is properly observed. The word 'even' (kai) in 'even of the Sabbath' suggests that lordship over the Sabbath is one instance of a broader authority.

Summary: Mark 3 concludes the five controversy stories with a Sabbath healing that provokes the Pharisees to conspire with the Herodians against Jesus. Crowds from across the region press in on Jesus, and unclean spirits fall before him, recognizing him as the Son of God. Jesus withdraws to a mountain to appoint the Twelve as his inner circle. The chapter closes with two linked controversies: scribes from Jerusalem accuse Jesus of operating by Beelzebul's power, and Jesus's own family comes to seize him, thinking he is out of his mind. Jesus redefines family as those who do God's will.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Beelzebul controversy contains some of Jesus's most tightly reasoned argumentation: the divided-kingdom analogy, the strong-man parable, and the warning about blaspheming the Holy Spirit. The appointment of the Twelve echoes Israel's twelve tribes and signals the reconstitution of God's people. The tension between Jesus's biological family and his spiritual family is stark — Mark uniquely records that his family thought he was 'out of his mind' (3:21). The twelve are called both to 'be with him' (relationship) and to 'be sent out' (mission).

Translation Friction: The 'unforgivable sin' passage (vv. 28-30) has generated centuries of theological debate. We render the Greek faithfully and note the interpretive range without resolving it. The list of the Twelve varies slightly across the Synoptics; we follow the SBLGNT text of Mark. The identity of Jesus's 'brothers' (adelphoi) in verse 31 is disputed among Christian traditions — biological siblings, half-siblings, or cousins.

Connections: The appointment of twelve apostles on a mountain echoes Moses and the twelve tribes at Sinai. The Beelzebul accusation connects to the broader theme of cosmic conflict in Mark. The redefinition of family anticipates the new community that will form around Jesus. The 'strong man' parable illuminates Jesus's exorcism ministry as plundering Satan's household.

¹He entered the synagogue again, and a man was there who had a withered hand. ²They were watching him closely to see if he would heal the man on the Sabbath, so that they could accuse him. ³He said to the man with the withered hand, "Stand up here in the middle." ⁴Then he said to them, "Is it lawful on the Sabbath to do good or to do evil, to save a life or to kill?" But they were silent. ⁵He looked around at them with anger, grieved at the hardness of their hearts, and said to the man, "Stretch out your hand." He stretched it out, and his hand was restored. ⁶The Pharisees went out and immediately began conspiring with the Herodians against him, plotting how to destroy him. ⁷Jesus withdrew with his disciples to the sea, and a large crowd from Galilee followed. Also from Judea, ⁸Jerusalem, Idumea, beyond the Jordan, and the region around Tyre and Sidon — a large crowd, hearing about all that he was doing, came to him. ⁹He told his disciples to have a small boat ready for him because of the crowd, so that they would not crush him. ¹⁰For he had healed many, so that all who had diseases were pressing forward to touch him. ¹¹Whenever the unclean spirits saw him, they fell down before him and cried out, "You are the Son of God!" ¹²He sternly ordered them not to make him known. ¹³He went up on the mountain and summoned those whom he wanted, and they came to him. ¹⁴He appointed twelve — whom he also named apostles — so that they would be with him and so that he could send them out to preach ¹⁵To have authority to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils: ¹⁶He appointed the Twelve: Simon, to whom he gave the name Peter; ¹⁷James the son of Zebedee and his brother John — he gave them the name Boanerges, which means "Sons of Thunder"; ¹⁸Andrew, Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Thomas, James the son of Alphaeus, Thaddaeus, Simon the Zealot, ¹⁹Judas Iscariot, which also betrayed him — then they traveled into an home. ²⁰Then he went home, and the crowd gathered again, so that they could not even eat a meal. ²¹When his family heard about it, they went out to seize him, for they were saying, "He is out of his mind." ²²The scribes who came down from Jerusalem were saying, "He has Beelzebul," and "He casts out demons by the ruler of the demons." ²³He called them to himself and spoke to them in parables: "How can Satan cast out Satan? ²⁴That kingdom cannot stand, and if a kingdom be divided against itself. ²⁵And if a household is divided against itself, that household will not be able to stand. ²⁶And if Satan has risen up against himself and is divided, he cannot stand — his end has come. ²⁷But no one can enter a strong man's house and plunder his possessions unless he first ties up the strong man. Then he can plunder his house. ²⁸"Truly I say to you, all sins will be forgiven the children of humanity, and whatever blasphemies they utter. ²⁹But whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit never has forgiveness but is guilty of an eternal sin." ³⁰He said this because they were saying, "He has an unclean spirit." ³¹Then his mother and his brothers came, and standing outside, they sent word to him, calling for him. ³²A crowd was sitting around him, and they said to him, "Look, your mother and your brothers are outside asking for you." ³³He replied, "Who are my mother and my brothers?" ³⁴Looking around at those seated in a circle around him, he said, "Here are my mother and my brothers! ³⁵Whoever does the will of God — that person is my brother and sister and mother."

1. The perfect participle exērammenēn ('having been withered, dried up') suggests a condition that was not congenital but developed over time — the hand had dried up and remained in that state. The scene is set for a confrontation: Jesus, the synagogue, a person in need, and watching opponents.
2. The imperfect paretēroun ('they were watching closely') implies sustained, hostile surveillance. The verb carries connotations of lying in wait. The purpose clause hina katēgorēsōsin ('so that they might accuse') reveals their intent from the outset — they are not seeking truth but building a case. Later rabbinic law permitted healing on the Sabbath only when life was in danger; a withered hand was not life-threatening.
3. Jesus deliberately makes the healing public by calling the man to the center (eis to meson). He does not heal secretly to avoid confrontation but forces the issue in full view of his opponents. The command egaire ('rise, stand up') is the same word used in resurrection contexts.
4. Jesus reframes the legal question in stark binary terms: not healing is not neutral — it is 'doing evil' and 'killing.' The Pharisees' silence (esiōpōn) is telling — they cannot answer without either condemning themselves or conceding Jesus's point. The verb sōsai ('to save') and apokteinai ('to kill') may be doubly ironic, since the Pharisees are about to plot to kill Jesus (v. 6) on the very Sabbath when they forbid saving a life.
5. Mark is the only evangelist who records Jesus's anger (met' orgēs) and grief (sylypoumenos) together in this scene. The combination reveals a complex emotional response: anger at the opponents' callousness, grief at their spiritual blindness. The word pōrōsis ('hardness, callousness') literally refers to the calcification of bone — their hearts have become petrified. The same word describes Pharaoh's hardened heart in the Septuagint. The healing requires no touch, no word of power — just a command to stretch, and the restoration is immediate.
6. The alliance between Pharisees and Herodians is deeply ironic — these were natural enemies. The Pharisees represented strict Jewish piety; the Herodians supported the Herodian dynasty and its accommodation with Rome. Their shared hostility toward Jesus unites them. The verb apolesōsin ('might destroy') makes the murderous intent explicit. The word euthys ('immediately') underscores the urgency of their response — the Sabbath healing has pushed them to decisive action.
7. The verb anechōrēsen ('withdrew') indicates a strategic retreat from the hostility described in verse 6. The geographic catalog that follows (vv. 7-8) shows that Jesus's fame has spread far beyond Galilee, drawing people from virtually every region of Jewish settlement.
8. The geographic scope is remarkable: Galilee (north), Judea and Jerusalem (south), Idumea (far south — Edomite territory), Transjordan (east), and Tyre and Sidon (Phoenician northwest, Gentile territory). This represents virtually the entire extent of the Jewish diaspora in the region, plus Gentile areas. Mark presents Jesus's appeal as transcending all geographic and ethnic boundaries.
9. The verb thlibōsin ('press upon, crush, squeeze') conveys genuine physical danger from the pressing crowd. The small boat (ploiaron, diminutive form) would serve as both an escape route and a floating platform from which to teach (as in 4:1). This practical detail adds eyewitness vividness to the narrative.
10. The verb epipiptein ('to fall upon, press against') describes an almost frantic surge. The noun mastigas (literally 'whips, scourges') is used metaphorically for diseases — afflictions experienced as divine scourging. The desire to touch (hapsōntai) reflects the ancient belief that healing power could be transmitted through physical contact, a belief Mark affirms in the case of the woman with the hemorrhage (5:28-30).
11. The imperfect tenses (etheōroun, prosepipten, ekrazon) indicate repeated, habitual action — this happened consistently, not just once. The demons' recognition of Jesus as 'the Son of God' (ho huios tou theou) contrasts sharply with the human characters' inability to grasp his identity. The prostration (prosepipten, 'fell before') could express both involuntary submission to superior power and an attempt to gain control by naming Jesus.
12. The adverb polla ('much, repeatedly') with epetima ('rebuked, commanded') indicates that Jesus had to silence the demons repeatedly and emphatically. The messianic secret continues — Jesus controls the revelation of his identity. The phrase phaneron poiēsōsin ('make manifest, make known') implies public disclosure of his messianic identity.
13. The mountain setting (to oros, with the article — 'the mountain') evokes Sinai, where God constituted Israel as a people through Moses. Jesus now constitutes a new community. The verb proskaleitai ('summons, calls to himself') emphasizes Jesus's sovereign initiative — he chose them, not the reverse. The phrase hous ēthelen autos ('whom he himself wanted') stresses the personal, deliberate nature of the selection.
14. The verb epoiēsen ('made, appointed, created') is striking — the same verb used for God's creative acts. Jesus 'makes' the Twelve as a new creation. The number twelve corresponds to the twelve tribes of Israel, signaling the reconstitution of God's people. The dual purpose is significant: first, 'to be with him' (relationship and formation), and second, 'to be sent out' (mission). Some manuscripts omit 'whom he also named apostles,' but the SBLGNT includes it.

15. The SBLGNT does not include 'to heal sicknesses' (therapeuīn tas nosous), which appears in some later manuscripts. The authority (exousia) given to the Twelve is a delegated form of Jesus's own authority demonstrated in chapters 1-2. The focus on exorcism aligns with Mark's emphasis on Jesus's ministry as cosmic conflict with demonic powers.
16. The repetition of 'he appointed the Twelve' (epoiēsen tous dōdeka) may indicate that verses 14-15 state the general purpose while verses 16-19 list the specific members. The name Petros is the Greek translation of the Aramaic Kepha ('rock, stone'). The renaming signifies a new identity and mission, echoing the Old Testament pattern of God renaming Abram to Abraham and Jacob to Israel.
17. The Aramaic nickname Boanerges is difficult to reconstruct — the Greek transliteration does not correspond neatly to known Aramaic forms. It may derive from bene regesh ('sons of tumult/thunder'). Mark provides the translation for his Greek-speaking audience. The nickname may reflect the brothers' temperament (cf. Luke 9:54, where they want to call fire from heaven) or their powerful speaking style.
18. The name Kananaion is not 'Canaanite' (an ethnicity) but a transliteration of the Aramaic qan'ana ('zealot, enthusiast'), which Luke renders with the Greek Zēlōtēs. This may indicate membership in the Zealot movement or simply a zealous temperament. Thaddaeus appears here and in Matthew's list, while Luke has 'Judas son of James' in the same position — these may be the same person with different names, or the lists may reflect some variation in the group's composition.
19. Judas is listed last, and the note about his betrayal (paredōken, 'handed over') is attached immediately, ensuring the reader knows from the start what role he will play. The name Iskariōth may mean 'man of Kerioth' (a Judean town), which would make Judas the only non-Galilean among the Twelve. The verb paradidōmi ('hand over, betray, deliver up') is the same verb used for John's arrest in 1:14 and for Jesus's passion predictions.
20. The phrase eis oikon ('into a house' or 'home') likely refers again to the house in Capernaum. The detail that they cannot even eat (mēde arton phagein, literally 'not even bread to eat') underscores the overwhelming demand on Jesus — the ministry has become so consuming that basic needs go unmet.
21. The phrase hoi par' autou ('those from beside him') most likely refers to Jesus's family, as confirmed by verse 31 where his mother and brothers arrive. The verb kratēsai ('to seize, take hold of forcibly') is strong — the same verb used for arresting someone. The word exestē ('he has lost his mind, is beside himself') is a frank assessment that Jesus's behavior appeared mentally unstable. This remarkably candid detail is unique to Mark and would not have been invented by the early church.
22. These are not local scribes but representatives from Jerusalem — an official delegation sent to investigate and pronounce judgment. The accusation has two parts: Jesus is himself possessed ('He has Beelzebul'), and his exorcisms operate through demonic power. The name Beelzebul likely derives from the Philistine deity Ba'al Zebub ('Lord of the Flies,' 2 Kings 1:2), modified to Beelzebul ('Lord of the Dwelling/Dung'). The charge is devastating: Jesus's power is real, but its source is satanic.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Kings 1:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. The phrase en parabolais ('in parables') here refers to figurative speech and analogies rather than the extended narrative parables of chapter 4. Jesus addresses the scribes' charge with logical argumentation. The question itself exposes the absurdity of the accusation — if Satan were working against his own forces, his realm would collapse.
24. The conditional clause presents a self-evident political principle that any listener could verify from history. The verb meristhē ('is divided') implies internal faction and civil war. Jesus is arguing from common experience to expose the logical impossibility of the scribes' accusation.
25. The word oikia can mean both a physical 'house' and a 'household' (the extended family and its affairs). The second analogy moves from the political sphere to the domestic, making the point more personal and immediate. The same principle applies at every level of social organization.
26. Jesus applies the principle to the specific case: if Satan is fighting against his own agents (the demons Jesus expels), then Satan's kingdom is in self-destructive civil war. The phrase telos echei ('has an end') means 'is finished, is done for.' Jesus's argument is: either the accusation is false (Satan is not behind the exorcisms) or Satan's kingdom is collapsing — either way, the scribes' position fails.
27. Jesus now offers his own explanation of the exorcisms through the 'strong man' parable. Satan is the 'strong man' (ischyros); his 'house' is the domain of demonic oppression; his 'possessions' (skeuē) are the people held captive. Jesus is the one who has 'bound' (dēsē) the strong man — likely a reference to the wilderness testing (1:12-13) — and is now systematically plundering Satan's realm through exorcisms. The verb diarpasai ('plunder, thoroughly rob') implies a complete ransacking.
28. The introductory amēn legō hymin ('truly I say to you') is a solemn formula of authority unique to Jesus in the Gospels — no rabbi preceded his own statements with 'amen.' The sweeping scope of forgiveness — 'all sins' (panta ta hamartēmata) and 'all blasphemies' (hai blasphēmiai) — makes the exception in the next verse all the more striking. The phrase tois huiōis tōn anthrōpōn ('to the sons of men') is a Semitic expression for human beings in general.
29. The SBLGNT reads 'eternal sin' (aiōniou hamartēmatos) rather than 'eternal condemnation/judgment' found in some manuscripts. The phrase ouk echei aphesis eis ton aiōna ('has no forgiveness into the age') is an emphatic negation. The context (v. 30) defines this blasphemy specifically as attributing the Holy Spirit's work to Satan — calling divine good demonic evil. This is not a momentary sin of speech but a settled, deliberate posture of calling light darkness. Many interpreters note that the very anxiety about having committed this sin is itself evidence that one has not, since it presupposes sensitivity to the Spirit.

30. Mark provides the explicit reason for Jesus's warning: the scribes had attributed the work of the Holy Spirit to an unclean spirit. The imperfect elegon ('they were saying') suggests this was not a one-time remark but a sustained accusation. The blasphemy against the Spirit consists precisely in this inversion — seeing the Spirit's liberating work and calling it demonic.
31. This resumes the narrative begun in verse 21 — the family that set out to 'seize' Jesus has now arrived. The word adelphoi ('brothers') most naturally means biological siblings in Greek, though Catholic tradition interprets it as 'cousins' or 'step-brothers.' They stand 'outside' (exō), which becomes symbolically significant: they are on the outside while those sitting around Jesus are on the inside (v. 34).
32. The spatial arrangement is significant: the crowd sits 'around' (peri) Jesus in a circle, while the family stands 'outside' (exō). The verb zētousin ('are seeking, looking for') recalls the earlier note that the family came to seize him (v. 21). The crowd serves as messengers, informing Jesus of his family's presence.
33. The question is not a denial of his biological family but a redefinition of family itself. In a culture where kinship was the primary social bond and honoring parents was a foundational commandment, this question would have been shocking. Jesus does not go outside to his family; instead, he uses their arrival as a teaching moment.
34. The verb periblepsámenos ('looking around') is characteristically Markan — Jesus surveys the circle of listeners with a deliberate gaze. The demonstrative 'Here are' (ide, 'look, see') draws attention to those physically present. The insiders (those seated around Jesus, doing God's will) are his true family; the outsiders (his biological family, who think he is mad) are not.
35. The criterion for belonging to Jesus's family is singular: doing the will of God (to thelēma tou theou). The list — 'brother and sister and mother' — is inclusive of both genders but notably omits 'father,' perhaps because God alone holds that role in Jesus's reconstituted family. This saying creates a new kinship structure based on obedience to God rather than biological descent, a radical redefinition with profound implications for the early church's self-understanding as a family of faith.

Summary: Mark 4 presents Jesus's major teaching discourse: a collection of parables about the kingdom of God delivered from a boat on the Sea of Galilee. The Parable of the Sower dominates the chapter, followed by Jesus's explanation of why he teaches in parables, the private interpretation for the disciples, and additional parables about a lamp, the measure, the seed growing secretly, and the mustard seed. The chapter concludes dramatically with Jesus calming a storm on the sea, revealing his authority over nature itself.

What Makes This Remarkable: Mark's parable discourse is shorter than Matthew's (chapter 13) but more focused on the mystery of the kingdom. The 'hardening' passage (vv. 11-12) is one of the most debated texts in the Gospels — does Jesus teach in parables to reveal or to conceal? Mark's answer appears to be both. The Parable of the Seed Growing Secretly (vv. 26-29) is unique to Mark. The storm-calming miracle transitions from the theme of hidden power in the parables to a dramatic display of cosmic authority, with the disciples' question 'Who then is this?' becoming the central question of the entire Gospel.

Translation Friction: The purpose of parables in verses 11-12 (quoting Isaiah 6:9-10) is theologically challenging. The Greek hina ('so that') appears to indicate purpose rather than result — Jesus teaches in parables so that outsiders will not understand. We render the Greek faithfully and note the interpretive options. The Parable of the Sower is technically a parable about soils/responses, but we retain the traditional title.

Connections: The sower parable draws on agricultural imagery common in prophetic literature (Isaiah 55:10-11; Hosea 10:12). The storm-calming echoes Psalm 107:23-32 and Jonah 1, where God alone controls the sea. The mustard seed parable may allude to Ezekiel 17:22-24 and Daniel 4:10-12, where great trees shelter the nations. The 'mystery of the kingdom' language connects to Daniel's apocalyptic framework.

¹Again he began to teach beside the sea. Such a very large crowd gathered around him that he got into a boat on the sea and sat down, while the whole crowd was on the shore facing the sea. ²He was teaching them many things in parables, and in his teaching he said to them: ³"Listen! A sower went out to sow. ⁴As he sowed, some seed fell along the path, and the birds came and devoured it. ⁵Other seed fell on rocky ground where it did not have much soil, and it sprang up immediately because the soil had no depth. ⁶When the sun rose, it was scorched, and since it had no root, it withered. ⁷Other seed fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up and choked it, and it produced no grain. ⁸Still other seed fell on good soil and produced grain, growing up and increasing, yielding thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold." ⁹Then he said, "Whoever has ears to hear, let them hear." ¹⁰When he was alone, those around him along with the Twelve asked him about the parables. ¹¹He said to them, "To you the mystery of the kingdom of God has been given, but to those outside, everything comes in parables, ¹²That looking they may see, and not grasp the meaning. And hearing they may hear, and not understand. Lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them. ¹³Then he said to them, "Do you not understand this parable? Then how will you understand all the parables? ¹⁴The sower sows the word. ¹⁵These are the ones along the path where the word is sown: when they hear, Satan immediately comes and takes away the word that was sown in them. ¹⁶And these are the ones sown on rocky ground: when they hear the word, they immediately receive it with joy. ¹⁷But they have no root in themselves and last only a short time. Then when trouble or persecution comes because of the word, they immediately fall away. ¹⁸Others are the ones sown among thorns. These are the ones who hear the word, ¹⁹Worldly concerns, and the deception of wealth, and cravings for other things creeping in, choke out the message, and it becometh unfruitful. ²⁰But those are the ones sown on good soil: they hear the word, accept it, and bear fruit — thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold." ²¹He said to them, "Is a lamp brought in to be put under a basket or under a bed? Is it not to be placed on a lampstand? ²²For there is nothing hidden except to be revealed, nor is anything secret except to come to light. ²³If anyone has ears to hear, let them hear." ²⁴He said to them, "Pay attention to what you hear. With the measure you use, it will be measured back to you — and more will be added to you. ²⁵For whoever has, more will be given to them. But whoever does not have, even what they have will be taken from them." ²⁶He also said, "The kingdom of God is like this: a man scatters seed on the ground. ²⁷He sleeps and rises, night and day, and the seed sprouts and grows — he does not know how. ²⁸The earth produces fruit by itself — first the stalk, then the head, then the full grain in the head. ²⁹But when the grain is ripe, he immediately sends in the sickle, because the harvest has come." ³⁰He also said, "How shall we picture the kingdom of God, or with what parable shall we present it? ³¹It is like a mustard seed, which when sown on the ground is the smallest of all the seeds on the earth. ³²Yet when it is sown, it grows up and becomes the largest of all garden plants, and produces such large branches that the birds of the sky can nest in its shade." ³³With many such parables he spoke the word to them, as much as they were able to hear. ³⁴He did not speak to them without a parable, but privately to his own disciples he explained everything. ³⁵On that day, when evening had come, he said to them, "Let us cross over to the other side." ³⁶Leaving the crowd behind, they took him along just as he was in the boat, and other boats were with him. ³⁷A fierce windstorm arose, and the waves were breaking over the boat so that the boat was already being swamped. ³⁸But he was in the stern, asleep on a cushion. They woke him and said to him, "Teacher, do you not care that we are perishing?" ³⁹He woke up, rebuked the wind, and said to the sea, "Silence! Be still!" The wind ceased, and there was a great calm. ⁴⁰He said to them, "Why are you so afraid? Do you still have no faith?" ⁴¹They were filled with great fear and said to one another, "Who then is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?"

1. The boat from 3:9 now serves its purpose as a teaching platform. The superlative pleistos ('very large, greatest') indicates an extraordinary crowd. The spatial arrangement — Jesus on the water, crowd on the land — creates a natural amphitheater. The detail that Jesus 'sat down' (kathēsthai) reflects the standard Jewish teaching posture; a rabbi sat to teach and stood to read Scripture.
2. The Greek parabolē covers a range of figurative speech — from simple comparisons to extended narrative allegories. Mark notes that Jesus taught 'many things' (polla) in parables, though only a selection is recorded. The phrase en tē didachē autou ('in his teaching') frames what follows as representative of Jesus's broader teaching ministry.
3. The imperative akouete ('listen!') demands attention and becomes thematically central — hearing and understanding are the parable's main concern. The verb speirai ('to sow') describes broadcast sowing, where seed is scattered by hand across a field before plowing. In Palestinian agriculture, sowing preceded plowing, which explains why seed falls on various types of ground.
4. The 'path' (hodos) refers to a footpath running through or alongside the field, where the ground was packed hard by foot traffic. Seed landing there could not penetrate the surface and was easily picked off by birds. The verb katephagen ('devoured, ate up completely') indicates total loss.
5. The 'rocky ground' (petrōdes) refers to a thin layer of soil over a limestone shelf, common in Galilee. The word euthys ('immediately') here describes the rapid germination caused by the rock underneath retaining heat — ironically, the fastest growth comes from the worst soil. The lack of depth (bathos) prevents root development.
6. The sun that normally nurtures growth becomes destructive when roots are absent. The verb ekaumatisthē ('was scorched, burned') and exēranthē ('withered, dried up') describe a rapid decline. The sequence — quick growth, scorching, withering — creates a vivid agricultural picture that any Galilean farmer would recognize.

7. The thorns (akanthai) were dormant root systems already present in the soil — invisible at planting time but growing faster and more aggressively than the grain. The verb synepnixan ('choked, strangled together') is vivid — the thorns literally suffocate the crop by competing for light, water, and nutrients. The result: karpon ouk edōken ('it gave no fruit') — total fruitlessness despite genuine growth.
8. The good soil's harvest is described with three participles — 'growing up' (anabainonta), 'increasing' (auxanomena), and 'yielding' (epheren) — creating a sense of abundant, overflowing productivity. Normal yields in ancient Palestine were roughly seven to tenfold; thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold represent extraordinary, almost miraculous abundance. The escalating numbers build toward a climax of superabundant fruitfulness that more than compensates for the three types of loss.
9. This formulaic saying (repeated in 4:23 and elsewhere) signals that the parable requires deeper reflection. Physical hearing is not enough — true 'hearing' involves understanding and response. The phrase echoes Deuteronomy's call to 'hear, O Israel' (Shema Yisrael), where hearing means obedient response.
10. The phrase kata monas ('in private, alone') indicates a shift from public teaching to private instruction. Those asking include not just the Twelve but a wider circle of followers (hoi peri auton, 'those around him'). The plural tas parabolas ('the parables') suggests they asked about the meaning of parables in general, not just the Sower.
11. The word mystērion ('mystery, secret') in biblical Greek does not mean something unknowable but something that was hidden and is now being revealed to those chosen to receive it. The concept draws on Daniel's apocalyptic language (Daniel 2:28-29), where God reveals mysteries about his kingdom. The contrast between 'you' (insiders) and 'those outside' (ekeinois tois exō) creates two categories of hearers. The passive dedotai ('has been given') is a divine passive — God is the giver of understanding.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Daniel 2:28-29. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. This quotes Isaiah 6:9-10, the prophet's commission where God tells Isaiah that his preaching will harden, not soften, the people. The conjunction hina ('so that') appears to express purpose — the parables are given so that outsiders will not understand. This is theologically difficult and has been interpreted variously: (1) the hina expresses divine purpose in hardening, (2) it should be understood as result rather than purpose ('with the result that'), (3) it reflects an Aramaic conjunction that could mean 'who' rather than 'so that.' Mark's Greek as written presents the strongest version: the parables simultaneously reveal to insiders and conceal from outsiders.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 6:9-10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. Jesus expresses surprise — even mild exasperation — at the disciples' lack of understanding. The implication is that the Sower parable is foundational; it is the key that unlocks all the other parables. If they cannot grasp this one, they will struggle with the rest. This is the first hint of the disciples' persistent incomprehension, a major Markan theme.
14. The identification is simple but profound: the seed is 'the word' (ton logon) — the message of the kingdom that Jesus proclaims (cf. 1:14-15, 2:2). The parable is thus self-referential: it describes the reception of the very teaching that includes this parable.
15. The birds of verse 4 are identified as Satan. The word euthys ('immediately') here describes Satan's swift action in removing the word before it can take root. Mark's interpretation identifies the four soils as four types of human response to the proclaimed word. The first type represents a total failure of reception — the word never penetrates at all.
16. The second type receives the word with enthusiasm — meta charas ('with joy'). The immediate, joyful reception looks promising but proves shallow. Mark's euthys ('immediately') parallels the rapid germination of the seed on rocky soil — quick growth that lacks depth.
17. The word proskairoi ('temporary, lasting for a time') describes people whose commitment is seasonal. The terms thlipsis ('trouble, affliction, pressure') and diōgmos ('persecution') reflect the experience of the early church, suggesting Mark's audience would recognize themselves in this warning. The verb skandalizontai ('are caused to stumble, fall away') derives from skandalon, the trigger of a trap — they are ensnared and brought down.
18. The third soil type hears the word genuinely — the problem is not with reception but with competing commitments. The thorns represent internal rather than external obstacles, making this category perhaps the most insidious because the word does take root and grow but is gradually suffocated.
19. Three thorns are named: merimna tou aiōnos ('anxieties of the age' — daily worries), apatē tou ploutou ('the deception of wealth' — the false promise that material prosperity brings security), and epithumiai peri ta loipa ('desires for everything else' — a catch-all for competing attachments). The verb sympnigousin ('choke together') echoes the agricultural imagery. The result is akarpōs ('fruitless') — the word is present but produces nothing.
20. The good soil hearers do three things: akouousin ('hear'), paradechontai ('accept, welcome, embrace'), and karpophorousin ('bear fruit'). The verb paradechomai implies a hospitable reception — welcoming the word as one would welcome a guest. The varying yields (thirty, sixty, hundred) suggest that even among faithful hearers, there are differences in fruitfulness without any being inadequate.
21. The Greek modios is a dry measure container (roughly a peck or 8.75 liters), used here as a basket that could cover a lamp. The saying works against any interpretation of verses 11-12 that suggests permanent concealment — what is hidden now will eventually be revealed. The parable's logic: hiding is temporary; revelation is the purpose.

22. The double negative construction emphasizes the absolute certainty of future revelation. The Greek krypton ('hidden') and apokryphon ('concealed, secret') are near synonyms used for emphasis. This saying qualifies the hardening passage of verses 11-12: the mystery is given to insiders now, but God's purpose is ultimate revelation, not permanent concealment.
23. This repetition of the hearing formula from verse 9 brackets the explanation section and emphasizes the parable's demand for responsive hearing. The conditional 'if anyone' (ei tis) makes the invitation universal while acknowledging that not all will respond.
24. The imperative blepete ('pay attention, watch out') shifts the responsibility to the hearer. The measure saying (en hō metrō metreite metrēthēsetai hymin) uses the figure of a measuring container: the more attention and obedience you invest in hearing, the more understanding you will receive in return. The addition (prostēthēsetai, 'will be added') suggests compounding returns — faithful hearing produces exponentially more understanding.
25. This paradoxical saying describes a spiritual principle: receptive hearing generates more capacity for understanding, while failure to receive causes even existing understanding to atrophy. The saying sounds harsh but describes an observable dynamic — engagement deepens capacity, while neglect erodes it. In context, it applies to the reception of Jesus's teaching.
26. This parable of the seed growing secretly is unique to Mark — neither Matthew nor Luke includes it. The introductory formula houtōs estin hē basileia tou theou ('thus is the kingdom of God') directly identifies the parable as describing how God's kingdom operates. The emphasis falls on the mysterious, autonomous growth of the seed apart from human effort.
27. The repetitive rhythm of 'sleeps and rises, night and day' conveys the ordinary passage of time. The farmer's ignorance (ouk oiden autos, 'he himself does not know') is the parable's key point: the growth happens independently of the farmer's knowledge, effort, or understanding. The kingdom of God has its own power and timetable that operates beyond human control.
28. The key word is automatē ('by itself, of its own accord') — from which we derive 'automatic.' The earth's productivity is inherent, not dependent on the farmer's intervention. The three stages — chorton (green shoot/stalk), stachyn (grain head), plērēs siton en tō stachyi ('full grain in the head') — describe the natural progression from germination to harvest. The parable assures: the kingdom will reach its fullness through God's own power, regardless of human inability to accelerate or control the process.
29. The verb paradoi ('yields, delivers itself up') uses the same root as paradidōmi ('hand over, betray') — the grain 'hands itself over' to be harvested. The harvest imagery echoes Joel 3:13 ('Put in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe'), which is a judgment image. The word euthys ('immediately') here suggests that when God's appointed time arrives, the harvest comes swiftly. The farmer's only role at harvest is to recognize the moment and act.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Joel 3:13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. The deliberative subjunctives (homoiōsōmen, 'shall we liken'; thōmen, 'shall we set forth') use the first person plural, inviting the audience into the process of reflection. The double question creates anticipation. The verb homoioō means 'to make like, compare, represent' — Jesus is searching for adequate analogies for an unprecedented reality.
31. The mustard seed (kokkos sinapeōs) was proverbially the smallest seed known in Palestinian agriculture. The claim 'smallest of all seeds on earth' is not a botanical absolute but a proverbial expression — 'small as a mustard seed' was a common Jewish idiom for something tiny. The contrast between the seed's smallness and the plant's size is the parable's point.
32. The mustard plant (Brassica nigra) can grow to 8-12 feet in a single season — large enough for birds to perch in its branches. The birds 'nesting in its shade' (kataskēnōn) echoes Ezekiel 17:23 and Daniel 4:12, 21, where a great tree sheltering birds represents a powerful kingdom that provides for the nations. The kingdom of God begins as the smallest, most unimpressive seed but grows into something that shelters all who come to it.
32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ezekiel 17:23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 4:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
33. The phrase kathōs ēdynanto akouein ('as they were able to hear') suggests Jesus calibrated his teaching to his audience's capacity. This qualification softens the hardening language of verses 11-12 — Jesus did not overwhelm people but met them where they were. The word logos ('the word') again refers to the kingdom message.
34. The contrast between public parabolic teaching and private explanation reinforces the insider/outsider distinction of verse 11. The verb epelyen ('explained, solved, interpreted') literally means 'to loose, untie' — Jesus 'unties' the parables for the disciples, unwinding their meaning. The word panta ('everything, all things') indicates thorough instruction.
35. The temporal note 'on that day' (en ekeinē tē hēmera) connects the storm miracle to the teaching day. The command 'let us cross to the other side' (dielthōmen eis to peran) initiates a journey to the eastern (Gentile) shore of the Sea of Galilee. The 'other side' will increasingly become the space where Jesus encounters Gentiles and the margins of Jewish society.
36. The phrase hōs ēn en tō ploioi ('just as he was in the boat') suggests they departed without preparation — Jesus was still in the teaching boat and simply set off. The mention of 'other boats' (alla ploia) is a detail unique to Mark that disappears from the narrative once the storm hits, adding to the sense of eyewitness recollection of incidental detail.

37. The word lailaps designates a sudden, violent squall — the Sea of Galilee, situated 700 feet below sea level and surrounded by hills, is notorious for sudden storms as cool Mediterranean air rushes down the surrounding valleys and collides with the warm air above the lake. The imperfect epeballen ('kept breaking over') describes wave after wave crashing into the boat. The passive gemizesthai ('being filled, being swamped') indicates the boat was taking on water to a dangerous degree.
38. The detail of Jesus sleeping on the prospephalaion ('cushion, headrest') in the stern (prymna) is remarkably specific — likely a rower's seat cushion or a sandbag used for ballast. Jesus's sleep during a life-threatening storm demonstrates either supreme faith or utter exhaustion (or both). The disciples' question — ou melei soi ('does it not matter to you?') — is a rebuke more than a request. Their verb apolymetha ('we are being destroyed, we are perishing') conveys genuine terror.
39. Jesus addresses the wind and sea with the same authority he uses against demons — epetimēsen ('rebuked') is the exorcism verb from 1:25. The command pephimōso ('be muzzled') is the same word used to silence the demon in 1:25. Mark may be implying that the storm has a demonic dimension, or simply that Jesus's authority extends over all forces, natural and supernatural. The instant result — 'a great calm' (galēnē megalē) — contrasts with the 'great windstorm' (lailaps megalē) of verse 37.
40. The word deiloi ('cowardly, fearful, timid') is stronger than ordinary fear — it implies a failure of nerve, a lack of trust. The question oupō echete pistin ('do you not yet have faith?') implies that by now, after all they have seen, they should have developed faith. The 'not yet' (oupō) suggests faith is a process that the disciples have barely begun.
41. The phrase ephobēthēsan phobon megan ('they feared a great fear') uses a cognate accusative for emphasis — the fear after the miracle is greater than the fear during the storm. They are more terrified of Jesus than of the storm. The question tis ara houtos estin ('who then is this?') is the central question of Mark's Gospel. The Old Testament answer is clear: it is God who controls the sea (Psalm 89:9, 'You rule the raging of the sea; when its waves rise, you still them'; Psalm 107:29, 'He made the storm be still'). The disciples' question thus points toward a divine identity they cannot yet articulate.

Summary: Mark 5 presents three powerful miracle stories that demonstrate Jesus's authority over the most extreme forms of human suffering. First, Jesus crosses to the eastern (Gentile) shore and encounters a man possessed by a legion of demons living among the tombs, whom he delivers in a dramatic exorcism involving a herd of pigs. Returning to the western shore, Jesus is approached by Jairus, a synagogue leader whose daughter is dying. On the way, a woman who has suffered from bleeding for twelve years touches Jesus's garment and is healed. Jesus then raises Jairus's daughter from death. The three stories form a crescendo: power over demons, power over chronic illness, and power over death itself.

What Makes This Remarkable: Mark's intercalation technique is on full display — the story of Jairus's daughter is 'sandwiched' around the hemorrhaging woman's story, each enriching the other. Both feature the number twelve (the woman's twelve years of illness, the girl's age of twelve). Both involve ritual impurity — bleeding and death. Both require faith. The Gerasene demoniac is Mark's most detailed miracle account, with vivid narrative elements that suggest eyewitness memory. The healed demoniac becomes the first commissioned evangelist in Mark — and a Gentile one at that.

Translation Friction: *The location of the Gerasene miracle is textually uncertain — manuscripts read 'Gerasenes,' 'Gadarenes,' or 'Gergesenes.' Gerasa is 30 miles from the lake, Gadara is 6 miles away, and Gergesa (modern Kursi) is on the shore. We follow the SBLGNT reading 'Gerasenes.' The drowning of the pigs raises ethical questions we do not resolve — we render the text faithfully. The Greek talitha kum in verse 41 is Aramaic preserved in the Greek text.*

Connections: The Gerasene setting evokes the unclean lands of the nations. The legion of demons uses Roman military terminology — Mark's audience in Rome would not miss the irony. The hemorrhaging woman's healing connects to Levitical purity laws (Leviticus 15:25-30). Jairus's daughter anticipates Jesus's own resurrection. The command to silence in verse 43 contrasts with the command to proclaim in verse 19.

¹They came to the other side of the sea, to the region of the Gerasenes. ²As soon as he got out of the boat, immediately a man from the tombs with an unclean spirit met him. ³He lived among the tombs, and no one could restrain him any longer, not even with a chain. ⁴For he had often been bound with shackles and chains, but he tore the chains apart and smashed the shackles, and no one had the strength to subdue him. ⁵Night and day among the tombs and on the mountains, he was always crying out and cutting himself with stones. ⁶When he saw Jesus from a distance, he ran and fell down before him. ⁷Crying out with a loud voice, he said, "What do you want with me, Jesus, Son of the Most High God? I implore you by God, do not torment me!" ⁸For Jesus had been saying to him, "Come out of the man, you unclean spirit!" ⁹Jesus asked him, "What is your name?" He replied, "My name is Legion, for we are many." ¹⁰He begged him earnestly not to send them out of the region. ¹¹Now a large herd of pigs was feeding there on the hillside. ¹²The demons begged him, "Send us into the pigs; let us enter them." ¹³He gave them permission. The unclean spirits came out and entered the pigs, and the herd — about two thousand — stampeded down the steep bank into the sea and drowned in the sea. ¹⁴Those tending the pigs fled and reported it in the town and in the countryside, and people came to see what had happened. ¹⁵They came to Jesus and saw the man who had been demon-possessed — the one who had had the legion — sitting there, clothed and in his right mind, and they were afraid. ¹⁶Those who had seen it described to them what had happened to the demon-possessed man and about the pigs. ¹⁷Then they began to beg him to leave their region. ¹⁸As Jesus was getting into the boat, the man who had been demon-possessed begged to go with him. ¹⁹But Jesus did not permit him. Instead he said to him, "Go home to your own people and report to them how much the Lord has done for you, and how he has had mercy on you." ²⁰He went away and began to proclaim in the Decapolis how much Jesus had done for him, and everyone was amazed. ²¹When Jesus had crossed again in the boat to the other side, a large crowd gathered around him, and he was beside the sea. ²²One of the synagogue leaders, named Jairus, came, and when he saw Jesus, he fell at his feet. ²³Besought him greatly and stated, My little daughter lieth at the point of death — I pray you, come and lay your hands on her, that she may be healed. Then she will live. ²⁴So Jesus went with him, and a large crowd followed him and pressed in on him. ²⁵A woman who had suffered from a flow of blood for twelve years, ²⁶Had suffered numerous things of numerous physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse,. ²⁷When she had listened to of Jesus, arrived in the press behind, and touched his garment. ²⁸For she was saying, "If I just touch his clothes, I will be saved." ²⁹Immediately the flow of her blood dried up, and she felt in her body that she was healed of her affliction. ³⁰Immediately Jesus, aware that power had gone out from him, turned around in the crowd and said, "Who touched my clothes?" ³¹His disciples said to him, "You see the crowd pressing against you, and yet you say, 'Who touched me?'" ³²But he kept looking around to see who had done this. ³³But the woman, knowing what had happened to her, came in fear and trembling, fell down before him, and told him the whole truth. ³⁴He said to her, "Daughter, your faith has saved you. Go in peace, and be healed of your affliction." ³⁵While he was still speaking, people came from the synagogue leader's house saying, "Your daughter has died. Why bother the teacher any further?" ³⁶But Jesus, overhearing what was said, told the synagogue leader, "Do not be afraid; just believe." ³⁷He did not allow anyone to go with him except Peter, James, and John the brother of James. ³⁸They came to the house of the synagogue leader, and he saw a commotion — people weeping and wailing loudly. ³⁹Going in, he said to them, "Why are you making a commotion and weeping? The child is not dead but sleeping." ⁴⁰They laughed at him. But he put them all outside, took the child's father and mother and those who were with him, and went in to where the child was. ⁴¹Taking the child by the hand, he said to her, "Talitha koum" — which means, "Little girl, I say to you, get up." ⁴²Immediately the girl stood up and began walking, for she was twelve years old. They were immediately overcome with great amazement. ⁴³He strictly ordered them that no one should know about this, and told them to give her something to eat.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The SBLGNT reads Gerasēnōn ('Gerasenes') rather than the KJV's 'Gadarenes.' The 'other side' (to peran) is the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee — predominantly Gentile territory, as the presence of a pig herd will confirm. Jesus is crossing from Jewish to Gentile space, a significant boundary in Mark's narrative geography.

2. The word euthys ('immediately') marks the instant confrontation — Jesus barely steps ashore before encountering the demoniac. The man comes 'from the tombs' (ek tōn mnēmeiōn), his dwelling place among the dead. Every detail accumulates uncleanness: Gentile territory, tombs, an unclean spirit. Jesus enters the most impure space imaginable.
3. The triple negative (oude... ouketi... oudeis, 'not even... no longer... no one') emphasizes the absolute impossibility of human control over this man. The verb dēsai ('bind, tie up') echoes the 'binding the strong man' language of 3:27 — no one can bind this man because the strong man (Satan) controls him. Only the one who has already bound the strong man can free his captive.
4. The distinction between pedais ('shackles' for the feet) and halysēs ('chains' for the hands/body) indicates repeated, thorough attempts at physical restraint. The verbs diespatthai ('tore apart') and syntetripthai ('crushed, smashed to pieces') convey superhuman strength. The verb damasai ('tame, subdue') is used for taming wild animals — the community has tried to treat this man as a beast. The perfect tenses indicate a history of failed attempts.
5. The description is harrowing: constant screaming (krazōn) and self-mutilation (katakoptōn heauton lithois, 'cutting himself down with stones'). The phrase dia pantos ('continually, always') with nyktos kai hēmeras ('night and day') portrays unceasing torment. The man oscillates between tombs (death) and mountains (isolation), with no rest and no human community. Mark paints the most extreme portrait of demonic oppression in the Gospels.
6. The verb prosekunēsēn ('fell down before, prostrated himself, worshipped') can mean either worship or obeisance. Given the demonic context, this is likely involuntary submission to Jesus's authority rather than genuine worship. The man runs toward Jesus — not away. Despite the demons' hostility, something in the man is drawn to Jesus as his only hope.
7. The demon uses the same defensive formula as in 1:24 — ti emoi kai soi ('what to me and to you?'). The title 'Son of the Most High God' (huie tou theou tou hypsistou) uses the Gentile designation for Israel's God (cf. Genesis 14:18-22), appropriate for the Gentile setting. The irony is profound: the demon adjures Jesus by God (horkizō se ton theon) — attempting to use divine authority against the divine Son. The verb basanisēs ('torment') refers to eschatological punishment — the demon fears Jesus has come to execute final judgment ahead of schedule.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 14:18-22. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The imperfect elegen ('he was saying, had been saying') indicates that Jesus had already begun commanding the spirit before the exchange in verse 7. The demon's plea in verse 7 is a response to Jesus's initial exorcism command. Mark presents the encounter as a struggle, albeit one whose outcome is never in doubt.
9. In ancient practice, knowing a spirit's name gave power over it. Jesus's question asserts authority. The answer legiōn is a Latin loanword — a Roman legion numbered approximately 5,000-6,000 soldiers. The name evokes both the overwhelming number of demons and, for Mark's Roman audience, the occupying military force. The shift between singular ('my name') and plural ('we are many') reflects the blurred identity of the possessed man and the possessing spirits.
10. The imperfect parekalei ('kept begging') indicates persistent pleading. The demons' request not to be sent 'out of the region' (exō tēs chōras) is puzzling — perhaps they fear being sent to the abyss (cf. Luke 8:31) or prefer to remain in familiar territory. Their desperation and subservience to Jesus's authority is clear: they negotiate from a position of total weakness.
11. The presence of pigs confirms the Gentile setting — pigs were unclean animals under Jewish law (Leviticus 11:7) and would not be raised in Jewish territory. The word agelē ('herd') is typically used for cattle; its use for pigs may reflect the unusually large number. The hillside (pros tō orei) near the sea sets up the dramatic plunge of verse 13.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Leviticus 11:7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The demons' request to enter the pigs rather than be cast into the abyss reveals their desperate desire to remain embodied and in the earthly realm. Their need to ask Jesus's permission demonstrates his absolute authority — they cannot act without his consent.
13. The number 'about two thousand' (hōs dishilioi) reinforces the name 'Legion' and the scale of the oppression. The verb hōrmēsēn ('rushed, stampeded') describes a headlong, uncontrollable charge. The verb epnigonto ('were drowning, suffocating') is imperfect, depicting the ongoing process. The sea, which in Jewish cosmology was associated with chaos and evil, swallows the unclean spirits along with the unclean animals — a symbolic victory over the forces of chaos.
14. The herdsmen's flight (ephygon, 'fled') reflects terror at the supernatural event. Their report spreads to both urban (polis) and rural (agrous) areas. The phrase ti estin to gegonos ('what is the thing that has happened') uses the perfect participle — the accomplished event with ongoing implications.
15. The transformation is described in three participles: kathēmenon ('sitting' — formerly restless), himatismenon ('clothed' — formerly naked, implied), and sōphronounta ('in his right mind' — formerly raving). The fear (ephobēthēsan) is not gratitude but dread — the power that could do this is as terrifying as the demoniac himself had been. The townspeople fear Jesus's power more than they appreciate the man's healing.
16. The eyewitnesses (hoi idontes, 'those who saw') provide a detailed account (diēgēsanto, 'narrated, described'). The dual focus — what happened to the man and what happened to the pigs — reflects the community's twin concerns: the miraculous healing and the economic loss.

17. The verb parakalein ('to beg, urge, implore') is the same word the demons used in verse 10. The community asks Jesus to leave — they prefer the familiar misery of a demoniac to the disruptive power of the healer. The economic loss of two thousand pigs may also motivate their request. This is one of the rare occasions where Jesus is rejected by an entire community.
18. The verb parakalei ('was begging') appears for the third time in this passage — the demons begged (v. 10, 12), the townspeople begged (v. 17), and now the healed man begs. His request 'to be with him' (hina met' autou ē) echoes the purpose of the Twelve's appointment in 3:14 — he wants to become a disciple. In contrast to the community's rejection, the healed man is drawn to Jesus.
19. This is the only case in Mark where Jesus commands someone to proclaim rather than to keep silent. The messianic secret does not apply in Gentile territory, where there is no risk of politicized messianic misunderstanding. The phrase ho kyrios ('the Lord') could refer to God or to Jesus — the ambiguity may be intentional. The verb ēlēsen ('had mercy') attributes the healing to divine compassion.
20. The man exceeds his commission — Jesus said to tell 'your own people' what 'the Lord' had done; the man proclaims throughout the entire Decapolis (a league of ten Greco-Roman cities) what 'Jesus' had done. He identifies Jesus as the Lord. The Decapolis was predominantly Gentile territory, making this man effectively the first Gentile missionary in Mark. The imperfect ethaumazon ('were amazed, kept marveling') indicates an ongoing response.
21. Jesus returns to the western (Jewish) shore. The recurring setting — 'beside the sea' (para tēn thalassan) — connects this to previous lakeside scenes. The crowd's immediate gathering indicates Jesus's continued popularity despite official opposition.
22. The title archisynagōgos ('synagogue ruler/leader') denotes the person responsible for managing synagogue services and facilities — a position of considerable local prestige. That such a figure would prostrate himself publicly before an itinerant teacher indicates extreme desperation. The name Iairos is the Greek form of Hebrew Ya'ir ('he will enlighten/awaken'), which becomes poignant given the story's outcome.
23. The diminutive thygatrion ('little daughter') conveys parental tenderness. The phrase eschatōs echei ('is at the last, at extremity') indicates she is near death. The verb sōthē ('may be saved') carries both physical healing and theological salvation in its range — Mark often uses sōzō with this double sense. Jairus's faith is expressed in his confidence that Jesus's touch will heal.
24. The verb synethlibon ('were pressing together against, crushing') recalls 3:9 where Jesus needed a boat to escape the crowd. The crushing crowd creates the condition for the next episode — the hemorrhaging woman can approach Jesus unnoticed because of the dense press of bodies.
25. The phrase rhyis haimatos ('flow of blood') likely refers to chronic vaginal bleeding, which under Levitical law (Leviticus 15:25-30) rendered the woman perpetually ritually unclean and made anyone or anything she touched unclean as well. For twelve years she has been excluded from the temple, synagogue worship, and normal social contact. The twelve years will be paralleled by the twelve years of Jairus's daughter's life.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 15:25-30 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. Mark's description is blunt about the medical profession: the woman suffered (pathousa, 'having endured much') under (hypo — from) the doctors, spent all her money (dapanēsasa ta par' autēs panta, 'having spent all that she had'), received no benefit (mēden ōphelētheisa), and actually deteriorated (eis to cheiron elthousa, 'having gone to the worse'). This frank assessment of ancient medicine is unique to Mark — Luke, the physician-evangelist, softens it considerably.
27. Her approach from behind (opisthen) suggests both hope and fear — hope that Jesus can help, fear of public exposure of her condition. By touching his garment, she would technically transmit her ritual impurity to him. Her action is bold but covert, reflecting a woman who has been marginalized for twelve years and is reluctant to draw attention to herself.
28. The imperfect elegen ('she was saying, kept saying to herself') suggests ongoing internal deliberation as she worked up courage. The verb sōthēsomai ('I will be saved/healed') again carries the dual sense of physical healing and spiritual wholeness. Her faith, though expressed through what might seem a superstitious mechanism (touching clothing), is directed toward Jesus personally.
29. The healing is instantaneous (euthys) and physically perceptible. The word pēgē ('spring, fountain, source') for the bleeding is a medical term. The verb egnō tō sōmati ('she knew in her body') describes a somatic awareness — she could physically feel the change. The word mastigos ('affliction, scourge') is the same word used in 3:10 for diseases, viewing illness as a kind of divine whipping.
30. The phrase epignous en heautō tēn ex autou dynamin exelthousan ('perceiving in himself the power having gone out from him') presents healing power as something that flows from Jesus and that he can detect. The word dynamis ('power') here is almost tangible — it has direction and movement. Jesus's question is not about information (he will identify the woman) but about relationship — he refuses to let the healing be anonymous.
31. The disciples' response borders on exasperation — in a crushing crowd, everyone is touching him. They cannot distinguish between the incidental contact of the crowd and the deliberate, faith-driven touch of the woman. The imperfect elegon ('they were saying') suggests they pressed the point.
32. The imperfect perieblepeto ('he was looking around') indicates a sustained, searching gaze. The feminine participle tēn touto poiēsasan ('the woman who had done this') reveals that Jesus already knew it was a woman. His searching look gives her the opportunity to come forward voluntarily rather than being exposed.
33. Her fear (phobētheisa) and trembling (tremousa) may reflect fear of rebuke for transmitting impurity, fear of losing the healing, or awe at the divine power she has experienced. She tells 'the whole truth' (pasan tēn alētheian) — her twelve years of suffering, her desperate act, her healing. The public confession is both brave and necessary: Jesus will not allow healing to be separated from relationship.

34. The address 'Daughter' (thygatēr) restores her to family — she has been isolated for twelve years, and Jesus claims her as kin. The phrase hē pistis sou sesōken se ('your faith has saved you') uses the perfect tense — the salvation is accomplished and enduring. The verb sōzō again carries both physical and spiritual dimensions. 'Go in peace' (hypage eis eirēnēn) is the Hebrew shalom blessing — 'go into wholeness.' The command isthi hygiēs ('be healthy') confirms the healing as permanent.
35. The timing is devastating — 'while he was still speaking' (eti autou lalountos), the worst news arrives. The delay caused by the hemorrhaging woman's interruption has cost Jairus his daughter. The verb skylleis ('trouble, bother, harass') suggests they view any further appeal as pointless. The message assumes death is the absolute limit of Jesus's power. Mark's intercalation technique creates maximum dramatic tension.
36. The verb parakousas can mean either 'overhearing' or 'ignoring/disregarding.' Both readings work: Jesus either overhears the message meant for Jairus, or he deliberately disregards its hopeless conclusion. His response — mē phobou, monon pisteue ('do not fear, only believe') — calls Jairus to the same kind of faith the hemorrhaging woman demonstrated. The present imperative pisteue ('keep believing') demands sustained trust in the face of apparent impossibility.
37. The inner circle of three — Peter, James, and John — appears here for the first time. They will also be present at the Transfiguration (9:2) and Gethsemane (14:33). This select group witnesses events too profound or intimate for the larger group. The exclusion of others creates privacy for the family and limits witnesses to the raising.
38. The noun thorybos ('commotion, uproar, tumult') describes the scene of ritual mourning. Professional mourners would have been summoned quickly; Jewish custom required even the poorest family to hire at least two flute players and one wailing woman (Mishnah Ketubbot 4:4). The verb alalazontas ('wailing, shrieking') describes the loud, ritualized cries of formal lamentation.
39. Jesus's statement 'the child is not dead but sleeping' (to paidion ouk apethanen alla katheudei) has been interpreted as either (1) a metaphor for death — the girl is dead but Jesus views death as temporary sleep, or (2) a literal claim that she is merely unconscious. Given the certainty of the death announcement (v. 35) and the mockery that follows, Mark appears to present an actual death that Jesus redefines as sleep because he intends to 'wake' her. The metaphor of death as sleep becomes standard Christian language (cf. 1 Thessalonians 4:13-14).
40. The verb kategelōn ('were laughing at, ridiculing, mocking') indicates contemptuous dismissal. Their laughter confirms the girl is genuinely dead — they know death when they see it. The verb ekbalōn ('having thrown out') is the same forceful word used for casting out demons. Jesus removes the scorners and creates an intimate space with only the parents and the three disciples.
41. The preservation of the Aramaic talitha koum (or koumi in some manuscripts) is one of several instances where Mark retains Jesus's actual spoken words in Aramaic (cf. 7:34 ephphatha; 15:34 eloi eloi). Talitha means 'little girl' or 'lamb' (a term of endearment), and koum is the imperative 'arise, get up.' The tender address combined with the authoritative command creates a powerful contrast. Jesus touches a corpse, which would render him ritually unclean — but as with the leper, purity flows from Jesus rather than impurity flowing to him.
42. The girl's response is immediate (euthys) and complete — she not only rises but walks. Her age — twelve years — creates a link with the hemorrhaging woman (twelve years of illness). The woman has been ill for the girl's entire lifetime. The phrase exestēsan ekstasei megalē ('they were astonished with a great astonishment') uses a cognate construction for emphasis — the witnesses are utterly overwhelmed.
43. The messianic secret returns: diesteilato autois polla ('he ordered them repeatedly and emphatically'). Given that the mourners and crowd already know the girl died, keeping the raising secret seems impossible — yet Jesus commands it. The final detail — 'give her something to eat' — is profoundly human after the divine miracle. The command confirms the physical reality of her restoration: she is truly alive, with a living body that needs food. The juxtaposition of cosmic power and domestic tenderness is characteristically Markan.

Summary: Mark 6 is the longest chapter in the Gospel and marks a turning point. Jesus is rejected at his hometown of Nazareth, then sends the Twelve on their first mission. Mark intercalates the account of John the Baptist's execution by Herod Antipas — a grim foreshadowing of Jesus's own fate. The chapter then presents two great wilderness miracles: the feeding of the five thousand and Jesus walking on the sea. The chapter closes with a summary of widespread healing activity in Gennesaret.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Nazareth rejection establishes that even Jesus's own community cannot see past his ordinary origins. The mission of the Twelve extends Jesus's authority through delegation. The death of John the Baptist is Mark's longest non-Jesus narrative and functions as a dark mirror of what awaits Jesus. The feeding of the five thousand is the only miracle (besides the resurrection) found in all four Gospels. The sea-walking scene contains the mysterious phrase 'he intended to pass them by' — echoing Old Testament theophanies where God 'passes by' (Exodus 33:19-22; 1 Kings 19:11).

Translation Friction: Herod's identity as 'king' (v. 14) is technically inaccurate — he was a tetrarch, not a king. Mark may use the popular designation or employ irony. The relationship between Herodias, Philip, and Herod is historically complex. The 'passing by' in verse 48 is theologically loaded and we render it literally with a note on the theophanic background.

Connections: The feeding miracle echoes Elisha feeding a hundred men (2 Kings 4:42-44), Moses and the manna (Exodus 16), and anticipates the Last Supper. The sea-walking draws on divine prerogatives — God alone 'treads on the waves of the sea' (Job 9:8). The disciples' hardened hearts (v. 52) echo the Pharaoh motif from Exodus.

¹He left that place and came to his hometown, and his disciples followed him. ²On the Sabbath he began to teach in the synagogue, and many who heard him were astonished, saying, "Where did this man get these things? What is this wisdom given to him? How are such mighty works performed through his hands? ³Is this not the carpenter, the son of Mary and brother of James, Joses, Judas, and Simon? Are not his sisters here with us?" And they took offense at him. ⁴Jesus said to them, "A prophet is not without honor except in his hometown, among his relatives, and in his own household." ⁵He was not able to do any mighty work there, except that he laid his hands on a few sick people and healed them. ⁶He was amazed at their unbelief. Then he went around among the villages teaching. ⁷He summoned the Twelve and began to send them out two by two, and he gave them authority over unclean spirits. ⁸He instructed them to take nothing for the journey except a staff — no bread, no bag, no money in their belts. ⁹They were to wear sandals but not put on two tunics. ¹⁰He said to them, "Whenever you enter a house, stay there until you leave that town. ¹¹If any place will not welcome you and they will not listen to you, as you leave, shake the dust off your feet as a testimony against them." ¹²So they went out and proclaimed that people should repent. ¹³They cast out many demons and anointed many sick people with oil and healed them. ¹⁴King Herod heard about it, for Jesus's name had become well known. Some were saying, "John the Baptist has been raised from the dead, and that is why miraculous powers are at work in him." ¹⁵Others were saying, "He is Elijah." And others were saying, "He is a prophet, like one of the prophets of old." ¹⁶But when Herod heard about it, he said, "John, whom I beheaded — he has been raised!" ¹⁷For Herod himself had sent men to arrest John and had him bound in prison on account of Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, because Herod had married her. ¹⁸For John had been telling Herod, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife." ¹⁹So Herodias held a grudge against him and wanted to kill him, but she could not, ²⁰For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him. And when he listened to him, he did numerous things, and listened to him gladly. ²¹An opportune day came when Herod on his birthday gave a banquet for his courtiers, military commanders, and the leading men of Galilee. ²²When his daughter Herodias came in and danced, she pleased Herod and his dinner guests. The king said to the girl, "Ask me for whatever you wish, and I will give it to you." ²³He swore to her, "Whatever you ask me, I will give you, up to half my kingdom." ²⁴She went out and said to her mother, "What should I ask for?" She said, "The head of John the Baptist." ²⁵Immediately she hurried back to the king and made her request: "I want you to give me right now the head of John the Baptist on a platter." ²⁶The king was deeply distressed, but because of his oaths and his dinner guests, he did not want to refuse her. ²⁷Immediately the king sent an executioner and commanded him to bring John's head. He went and beheaded him in the prison, ²⁸brought his head in a charger, and offered it to the damsel — and the damsel offered it to her mother. ²⁹When his disciples heard about it, they came and took his body and laid it in a tomb. ³⁰The apostles gathered around Jesus and reported to him everything they had done and taught. ³¹He said to them, "Come away by yourselves to a deserted place and rest a while." For many were coming and going, and they had no opportunity even to eat. ³²So they went away in the boat to a deserted place by themselves. ³³But many saw them going and recognized them, and they ran there on foot from all the towns and arrived ahead of them. ³⁴When he went ashore, he saw a large crowd, and he had compassion on them because they were like sheep without a shepherd, and he began to teach them many things. ³⁵When the hour had grown late, his disciples came to him and said, "This is a deserted place and the hour is already late. ³⁶Send them away so they can go into the surrounding countryside and villages and buy themselves something to eat." ³⁷But he answered them, "You give them something to eat." They said to him, "Should we go and buy two hundred denarii worth of bread and give it to them to eat?" ³⁸He said to them, "How many loaves do you have? Go and see." When they found out, they said, "Five, and two fish." ³⁹He directed them to have everyone sit down in groups on the green grass. ⁴⁰

They sat down in groups of hundreds and fifties. ⁴¹Taking the five loaves and the two fish, he looked up to heaven, blessed and broke the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before the people. He also divided the two fish among them all. ⁴²Everyone ate and was satisfied. ⁴³They picked up twelve baskets full of broken pieces and of the fish. ⁴⁴Those who ate the loaves were five thousand men. ⁴⁵Immediately he made his disciples get into the boat and go ahead of him to the other side, toward Bethsaida, while he dismissed the crowd. ⁴⁶After saying farewell to them, he went up on the mountain to pray. ⁴⁷When evening came, the boat was in the middle of the sea, and he was alone on the land. ⁴⁸He saw them straining at the oars, for the wind was against them. About the fourth watch of the night he came toward them, walking on the sea, and he intended to pass by them. ⁴⁹But when they saw him walking on the sea, they thought it was a ghost and screamed, ⁵⁰Since they all noticed him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them, and says to them, Be of good cheer — it is I. Be not afraid. ⁵¹He got into the boat with them, and the wind died down. They were utterly astounded, ⁵²Indeed, since they considered not the miracle of the loaves — for their heart was hardened. ⁵³When they had crossed over, they came to land at Gennesaret and moored the boat. ⁵⁴When they got out of the boat, people immediately recognized him ⁵⁵Ran by way of that whole region round about, and started to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they listened to he was. ⁵⁶Wherever he went — into villages, towns, or countryside — they laid the sick in the marketplaces and begged him to let them touch even the fringe of his garment. And all who touched it were healed.

1. The word patris ('hometown, fatherland') refers to Nazareth, though Mark does not name it here (cf. 1:9). The historical present erchetai ('he comes') is characteristic of Mark's vivid narrative style. Jesus returns home, but after all that has happened, the homecoming will prove uncomfortable.
2. The townspeople's questions acknowledge both Jesus's wisdom and power but frame them as a puzzle rather than a revelation. The passive dothesia ('given') is a divine passive — they recognize that his wisdom comes from God but stumble over the delivery mechanism. The word dynameis ('mighty works, miracles') is plural, indicating they knew of his wider ministry.
3. The title tektōn ('carpenter, builder, craftsman') identifies Jesus by his trade — a worker in wood and possibly stone. Mark alone calls Jesus himself a carpenter; Matthew 13:55 calls him 'the carpenter's son.' The identification as 'son of Mary' (rather than 'son of Joseph') is unusual and may suggest Joseph had died, or may carry a hint of illegitimacy. Four brothers are named, and sisters (plural) are mentioned. The verb eskandalizōnto ('were offended, stumbled') indicates that his ordinariness became the obstacle to faith.
4. The proverb has parallels in Greek literature and appears to have been widely known. Mark's version is the most expansive: three concentric circles of rejection — hometown (patris), relatives (syngeneusin), and household (oikia). Each circle narrows toward greater intimacy and greater pain. Jesus implicitly identifies himself as a prophet — a claim with dangerous implications given what happened to prophets.
5. The bold statement ouk edynato ('he was not able, could not') is remarkable — Mark presents unbelief as genuinely limiting Jesus's power, not just his willingness. Matthew 13:58 softens this to 'he did not do many mighty works.' The exception — healing a few sick people — shows that even limited faith allowed some access to Jesus's power.
6. The verb ethaumazen ('was amazed, marveled') is used elsewhere in Mark for human amazement at Jesus; here uniquely, Jesus is amazed at human unbelief. The word apistia ('unbelief, faithlessness, lack of trust') is the opposite of the pistis ('faith') he commends elsewhere. Jesus does not remain to argue but moves on to the surrounding villages.
7. The verb apostellein ('to send out') is the root of 'apostle' — the Twelve are now being sent. Pairing them 'two by two' (dyo dyo) follows the Old Testament principle that testimony requires two witnesses (Deuteronomy 19:15) and provides mutual support. The authority (exousia) over unclean spirits extends Jesus's own exorcism ministry through his delegates.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 19:15. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. Mark permits a staff (rhabdon), while Matthew 10:10 and Luke 9:3 forbid even that — a minor discrepancy among the Synoptics. The pēra ('bag') was a traveler's knapsack. The chalkon ('copper, bronze money') represents the smallest denomination. The radical simplicity forces dependence on God and the hospitality of those they serve.
9. Mark allows sandals; Matthew 10:10 forbids them. The chitōn ('tunic, inner garment') was the basic garment worn next to the skin. Forbidding a second tunic means traveling without a change of clothes or an extra layer for cold nights — radical vulnerability and trust.
10. The instruction to stay in one house prevents the missionaries from trading up to better accommodations — they are to accept whatever hospitality is offered and remain loyal to their host. This practice also provides a stable base for ministry in each location.
11. Shaking off dust (ektinaxate ton choun) was a Jewish gesture performed when leaving Gentile territory — symbolically removing foreign contamination. Directed at fellow Jews, it declares that the rejecting town has placed itself outside the covenant community. The SBLGNT does not - include the Sodom and Gomorrah comparison found in some manuscripts and in the KJV; this is a later scribal addition harmonizing with Matthew 10:15.

12. The Twelve's message — metanoōsin ('that they should repent') — echoes Jesus's opening proclamation in 1:15. They extend his call for repentance to a wider audience. The verb kēryssō ('proclaim, preach as a herald') is the same verb used for Jesus's own preaching.
 13. The anointing with oil (ēleiphon elaiō) is unique to Mark's account of this mission. Oil was used medicinally in the ancient world (cf. Isaiah 1:6; Luke 10:34), but here it functions as a vehicle for divine healing — a practice the early church continued (James 5:14). The combination of exorcism and healing mirrors Jesus's own ministry pattern.
 13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 1:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
 14. Mark calls Herod Antipas 'king' (basileus), though his actual title was 'tetrarch' (ruler of a quarter). This may be popular usage, Markan irony, or deliberate contrast with Jesus as the true king. The SBLGNT reads 'they were saying' (elegon, third person plural) rather than 'he said,' attributing the opinion about John to popular rumor rather than to Herod directly. The belief that John had risen reflects a popular view that the powers of a martyred prophet could be transferred or amplified after death.
 15. Three theories about Jesus circulate: resurrected John, returned Elijah (expected before the Day of the Lord, Malachi 4:5), or a new prophet in the line of the great prophets. Notably, none of the popular opinions identifies Jesus as the Messiah — the true answer that Peter will give in 8:29. These same three theories reappear in 8:28.
 15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Malachi 4:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
 16. The emphatic word order places 'whom I beheaded' (hon egō apekephalisa) first for dramatic impact. Herod's guilty conscience interprets Jesus through the lens of his own crime. The verb apekephalisa ('I beheaded') is blunt and brutal. His conviction that John has risen suggests both superstitious fear and an inability to escape the consequences of his deed.
 17. The flashback begins. The historical situation: Herod Antipas divorced his first wife (a Nabatean princess) to marry Herodias, who had been wife of his half-brother. Josephus (Antiquities 18.5.1-2) confirms the basic story but attributes John's execution to political fears rather than the banquet scenario Mark describes. The phrase 'his brother Philip's wife' identifies the relationship that made the marriage unlawful under Leviticus 18:16 and 20:21.
 17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 18:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
 18. The imperfect elegen ('he was saying, kept saying') indicates this was not a one-time confrontation but a repeated prophetic challenge. John stands in the tradition of prophets who confronted kings — Nathan before David (2 Samuel 12), Elijah before Ahab (1 Kings 21). The prohibition is rooted in Leviticus 18:16.
 18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Samuel 12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
 18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Kings 21 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
 18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 18:16 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
 19. The verb eneichen ('held against, bore a grudge, harbored resentment') describes Herodias's sustained hostility. The parallel with Jezebel seeking to kill Elijah (1 Kings 19:2) is unmistakable and likely intentional — John is the new Elijah opposed by a new Jezebel. Herodias's desire to kill is blocked by Herod's ambivalence (v. 20).
 19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Kings 19:2. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
 20. Herod's complex response to John — fear, recognition of his holiness, protection, perplexity, and fascination — makes him one of Mark's most psychologically nuanced characters. The SBLGNT reads ēporei ('was perplexed, at a loss') rather than epoiei ('did many things') found in some manuscripts. Herod is drawn to John's message but lacks the will to act on it — a tragic portrait of partial openness to truth.
 21. The word eukairos ('opportune, convenient') is loaded with dark irony — it is opportune for Herodias's scheme. The guest list — megistanes ('courtiers, nobles'), chiliarchoi ('commanders of a thousand,' military officers), and prōtoi ('leading men, elite') — represents the full spectrum of Galilean power. The birthday banquet (genesiois) sets the stage for the grim request that follows.
 22. The SBLGNT reads 'his daughter Herodias' (tēs thygatros autou Hērōdiados), which is textually difficult since the daughter is traditionally named Salome (Josephus, Antiquities 18.5.4). Some manuscripts read 'the daughter of Herodias herself.' The dance of a royal princess before a banquet of men was culturally extraordinary and suggests Herodias's manipulation. The rash promise echoes Esther 5:3, 6 and 7:2, where the Persian king makes a similar open-ended offer.
 22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Esther 5:3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

- 23. The oath (ōmosen) escalates the promise — Herod binds himself before his guests. The phrase 'up to half my kingdom' echoes Esther 5:3 almost verbatim. Since Herod was a tetrarch ruling at Rome's pleasure, the offer of half his kingdom was an empty boast, but it creates a binding social obligation.
- 23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Esther 5:3 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 24. The girl's question reveals she is acting as Herodias's agent. Herodias's response is instant and specific — she has been waiting for this opportunity (the 'opportune day' of v. 21). The request for John's 'head' (kephalēn) is shockingly literal and demands immediate execution.
- 25. The word euthys ('immediately') and meta spoudēs ('with haste, urgency') convey the girl's rush to lock in the request before Herod can reconsider. The addition 'on a platter' (epi pinaki) adds grotesque detail — the prophet's head served as a banquet dish. The demand exautēs ('right now, at once') leaves no room for delay or negotiation.
- 26. The word perilypos ('deeply grieved, exceedingly sorrowful') is the same word used for Jesus in Gethsemane (14:34). But Herod's sorrow does not lead to right action — he is trapped by his oaths (plural, horkous — he had sworn repeatedly) and by social pressure (the guests witnessed the oath). Fear of losing face costs John his life. Herod chooses honor before men over honoring God.
- 27. The Greek spekoulatōr is a Latin loanword (speculator) — a member of the bodyguard who could serve as executioner. The Latin military term is appropriate for Herod's court and reflects Mark's Roman audience. The execution happens with grim efficiency — euthys ('immediately') marking the speed of the killing.
- 28. The chain of delivery — executioner to girl to mother — is narrated with chilling matter-of-factness. The prophet's head passes through three sets of hands like a dish at a banquet. The scene is a grim anti-feast that inverts the coming banquet of the five thousand.
- 29. John's disciples perform the act of burial, paralleling what Joseph of Arimathea will do for Jesus (15:46). The word ptōma ('corpse, fallen body') is blunt — literally 'something that has fallen.' The burial in a tomb (mnēmeiō) provides closure to John's story and anticipates the empty tomb of chapter 16.
- 30. This is the only place in Mark where the Twelve are called 'apostles' (apostoloi, 'sent ones') — the title applies specifically to their role as commissioned delegates who have now returned from their mission. Their report covers both actions (hosa epoiēsan, 'what they did') and teaching (hosa edidaxan, 'what they taught'), mirroring Jesus's own ministry of deed and word.
- 31. Jesus recognizes the disciples' need for rest after their mission. The phrase kat' idian ('privately, by themselves') seeks solitude. The detail that they had no time to eat (oude phagein eukairoun) echoes 3:20. The word eukairoun ('had opportunity') uses the same root as the 'opportune' (eukairos) day of Herod's banquet (v. 21) — a subtle verbal link between the two scenes.
- 32. The boat provides transportation to the 'deserted place' (erēmon topon) — the wilderness that will become the setting for the feeding miracle. The attempt at privacy will be frustrated by the crowds who see them leaving.
- 33. The crowd's determination is remarkable — they outran the boat on foot (pezē), traveling along the northern shore of the lake. The verb synedramom ('ran together') describes a mass rush from multiple towns converging on the destination. The verb proēlthon ('arrived ahead of, preceded') means the crowd was waiting when the boat landed.
- 34. The verb esplanchnisthē ('was moved with compassion') describes the same deep, visceral response as in 1:41. The simile 'sheep without a shepherd' (probata mē echonta poimena) echoes Numbers 27:17, where Moses asks God to appoint a successor so Israel will not be 'like sheep without a shepherd.' It also evokes Ezekiel 34, where God condemns Israel's failed shepherds and promises to shepherd the flock himself. Jesus's response to the shepherdless crowd is to teach — in Mark, teaching is the primary expression of pastoral care.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 27:17. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Ezekiel 34. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. The disciples emphasize two problems: the isolation of the location (erēmos estin ho topos) and the lateness of the hour (hōra pollē). Both are practical concerns about feeding a large crowd in the wilderness — a problem that evokes the wilderness feeding narratives of Exodus and Numbers.
- 36. The disciples propose the practical solution: dismiss the crowd to fend for themselves. The verb apolyson ('send away, dismiss') is an aorist imperative suggesting urgency. The surrounding farms (agrous) and villages (kōmas) would have limited supplies for such a multitude.
- 37. The emphatic hymeis ('you yourselves') makes the command startling — Jesus places the responsibility on the disciples. Two hundred denarii was roughly eight months' wages for a laborer. Their response drips with incredulity, possibly sarcasm. The denarius was a Roman silver coin, the standard day's wage.
- 38. Jesus redirects from what they cannot do to what they have. The instruction 'go and see' (hypagete idete) forces them to take inventory of their actual resources. The five loaves were likely flat barley bread, the common food of the poor. Two fish (ichthys) were probably dried or pickled fish from the lake.
- 39. The Greek symposia symposia ('group by group') is a distributive repetition — the crowd was organized into table-fellowship groups, the word symposion normally meaning a drinking party or dinner gathering. The detail 'green grass' (chlōrō chortō) indicates spring — near Passover (cf. John 6:4) when grass would be green in Galilee. The organized seating transforms a chaotic crowd into an ordered meal.

40. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 18:25 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
41. The four verbs — took (labōn), blessed (eulogēsen), broke (kateklasen), gave (edidou) — form the pattern that will reappear at the Last Supper (14:22) and become the structure of the Christian Eucharist. Looking up to heaven (anablepsas eis ton ouranon) acknowledges God as the source. The imperfect edidou ('kept giving') suggests the multiplication happened progressively as the bread was distributed.
42. The verb echortasthēsan ('were satisfied, filled to the full') originally described the feeding of animals — to be gorged, fully fed. Its use here emphasizes the abundance of the provision. The word pantes ('all, everyone') ensures no one was left out.
43. The twelve baskets (dōdeka kophinōn) correspond to the twelve tribes of Israel and the twelve apostles — the symbolism is likely intentional. The kophinos was a wicker basket distinctively associated with Jewish travelers (Juvenal, Satire 3.14). The surplus exceeds the initial supply, demonstrating superabundant provision.
44. The number pentakischilioi andres ('five thousand men') counts only adult males. Matthew 14:21 adds 'besides women and children,' suggesting the total crowd was much larger. The number may echo the military organization of the wilderness groups (v. 40), creating an image of a new Israel being fed by a new Moses in a new wilderness.
45. The verb ēnagkasen ('compelled, forced, made') is unusually strong — Jesus pressured the reluctant disciples to leave. John 6:15 explains why: the crowd wanted to make Jesus king by force, and Jesus needed to separate the disciples from the political enthusiasm. The word euthys ('immediately') marks the urgency. Bethsaida ('house of fishing') was a town on the northeastern shore.
46. The verb apotaxamenos ('having said farewell, having taken leave of') indicates a deliberate departure. Jesus again seeks solitude for prayer (cf. 1:35). The mountain (to oros) is a place of encounter with God in biblical tradition. This is Jesus's second recorded prayer in Mark, following a major public event, as in 1:35.
47. The scene is set with stark simplicity: the boat in the middle (en mesō) of the sea, Jesus alone (monos) on the land. The separation creates both physical and symbolic distance. The Sea of Galilee is roughly 7 miles wide at its widest point; 'in the middle' means 3-4 miles from shore.
48. That Jesus 'saw' (idōn) them from the mountain in darkness implies supernatural sight. The verb basanizomenous ('being tortured, strained, distressed') conveys the physical agony of rowing against a headwind. The fourth watch was 3-6 AM (Roman time reckoning). The phrase ēthelen parelthein autous ('he intended to pass by them') is the most theologically loaded detail; in the Old Testament, God 'passes by' Moses (Exodus 33:19-22) and Elijah (1 Kings 19:11) in theophanies — divine self-revelations. Jesus walking on the sea and intending to 'pass by' identifies him with the God of Israel.

48. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Kings 19:11 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
49. The word phantasma ('apparition, ghost, phantom') reflects their terror — they interpret the figure on the water as a spirit of the dead. The verb anekraxan ('screamed, cried out') conveys raw terror. Their inability to recognize Jesus is part of Mark's theme of the disciples' persistent blindness.
50. The phrase egō eimi ('it is I' or 'I AM') is both a simple self-identification and potentially a divine self-revelation — the same phrase used by God in Exodus 3:14 (in the Septuagint) and Isaiah 43:10. In the context of a sea-theophany, the reader is meant to hear both levels. The command 'do not be afraid' (mē phobeisthe) is the standard reassurance in divine appearances (Genesis 15:1; Isaiah 41:10; Daniel 10:12).

51. The wind ceasing (ekopasen) when Jesus enters the boat echoes the storm-calming of 4:39 but without a verbal command — his mere presence stills the wind. The phrase lian ek perissou ('exceedingly, beyond all measure, utterly') piles up intensifiers to convey the disciples' overwhelming astonishment. The verb existanto ('were beside themselves, astounded') indicates they were mentally overwhelmed.
52. Mark's editorial comment is devastating: the disciples' astonishment at the sea-walking reveals that they missed the meaning of the feeding miracle. If they had understood epi tois artois ('about the loaves') — that Jesus had divine creative power — the sea-walking would not have shocked them. The phrase hē kardia pepōrōmenē ('their heart was hardened/calcified') uses the same word applied to Pharaoh's heart in the Septuagint and to the Pharisees in 3:5. Mark places the disciples dangerously close to Jesus's opponents.

53. Gennesaret (Gennēsaret) was a fertile plain on the northwestern shore of the Sea of Galilee, south of Capernaum. The verb prosōrmisthēsan ('moored, anchored') is a nautical technical term, suggesting they pulled up at a landing or dock.
54. The adverb euthys ('immediately') once more. The verb epignontes ('recognizing, identifying') indicates Jesus was known by sight in this region — his reputation and face were familiar from previous ministry.
55. The verb periedramon ('ran around, ran throughout') indicates a frantic, widespread mobilization. The word krabattois ('mats, pallets') is the same as in 2:4 — poor people's beds on which the sick were carried. The phrase hopou ēkouon hoti estin ('wherever they heard he was') shows the crowd tracking Jesus's movements.
56. This summary statement covers an extended period of ministry. The kraspedon ('fringe, tassel, border') refers to the tassels (tzitzit) on the corners of a Jewish garment prescribed by Numbers 15:38-39. The desire to touch the fringe echoes the hemorrhaging woman's faith (5:28). The verb esōzonto ('were being saved/healed') is imperfect, indicating continuous, repeated healing. The word encompasses both physical restoration and the deeper salvation it signifies.

Summary: Mark 7 centers on the theme of purity — what truly makes a person clean or unclean. Pharisees and scribes from Jerusalem challenge Jesus about his disciples' failure to observe handwashing traditions. Jesus responds with a sharp critique of human tradition that nullifies God's commandment, using the 'Corban' example. He then teaches the crowd that defilement comes from within, not from external contact with food. The chapter shifts to Gentile territory where Jesus heals the daughter of a Syrophoenician woman after a remarkable exchange, and then heals a deaf man with a speech impediment in the Decapolis.

What Makes This Remarkable: Mark's parenthetical comment in verse 19 — 'thus he declared all foods clean' — is one of the most theologically significant editorial asides in the Gospel, effectively ending the Levitical food laws. The Syrophoenician woman is the only person in Mark who wins an argument with Jesus, and her faith opens the door to Gentile inclusion. The Aramaic word 'Ephphatha' preserved in verse 34 is another instance of Mark retaining Jesus's actual spoken words. The chapter moves from Jewish purity concerns to Gentile healing, enacting the very boundary-crossing that the teaching about inner purity makes possible.

Translation Friction: *The 'all foods clean' comment in verse 19 is debated — is it Mark's theological interpretation or Jesus's explicit teaching? The Greek is ambiguous. The exchange with the Syrophoenician woman contains language ('dogs,' kynaria) that sounds harsh; we render it faithfully and note the cultural context. The geographic itinerary in verse 31 is circuitous and difficult to map precisely.*

Connections: The Corban teaching connects to the fifth commandment (Exodus 20:12) and prophetic critiques of empty ritual (Isaiah 29:13). The Syrophoenician woman's story anticipates the Gentile mission. The healing of the deaf-mute echoes Isaiah 35:5-6 ('the ears of the deaf shall be opened... the tongue of the mute shall sing'). The 'Ephphatha' miracle in Gentile territory suggests the messianic age is dawning beyond Israel's borders.

¹The Pharisees and some of the scribes who had come from Jerusalem gathered around him. ²They noticed that some of his disciples were eating with defiled — that is, unwashed — hands. ³(For the Pharisees and all the Jews do not eat unless they wash their hands carefully, holding to the tradition of the elders. ⁴When they come from the marketplace, they do not eat unless they wash. And there are many other traditions they observe, such as the washing of cups, pitchers, copper vessels, and dining couches.) ⁵So the Pharisees and scribes asked him, "Why do your disciples not walk according to the tradition of the elders, but eat with defiled hands?" ⁶He said to them, "Isaiah prophesied accurately about you hypocrites, as it is written: 'This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. ⁷They worship me in vain, teaching as doctrines the commandments of human beings.' ⁸You abandon the commandment of God and hold to human tradition." ⁹He also said to them, "How skillfully you set aside the commandment of God in order to establish your own tradition! ¹⁰For Moses said, 'Honor your father and your mother,' and, 'Whoever speaks evil of father or mother must certainly die.' ¹¹But you say, 'If a man tells his father or mother, "Whatever support you might have received from me is Corban" — that is, an offering to God — ¹²You suffer him no more to do anything for his father or his mother;. ¹³Making the message of God of none effect by way of your tradition, which you have delivered — and numerous such like things do you. ¹⁴He called the crowd to him again and said to them, "Listen to me, all of you, and understand: ¹⁵There is nothing outside a person that by going in can defile them. Rather, it is what comes out of a person that defiles them." ¹⁷When he had left the crowd and entered a house, his disciples asked him about the parable. ¹⁸He said to them, "Are you also without understanding? Do you not see that whatever goes into a person from outside cannot defile them, ¹⁹On account of the fact that it entereth not into his inner self, but into the belly, and goes out into the draught, purging all meats? ²⁰He said, "It is what comes out of a person that defiles them. ²¹For from within, out of the human heart, come evil thoughts, sexual immorality, theft, murder, ²²Thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, sensuality, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness:. ²³All these evil things come from within and defile a person." ²⁴From there he set out and went to the region of Tyre. He entered a house and did not want anyone to know, but he could not escape notice. ²⁵Immediately a woman whose little daughter had an unclean spirit heard about him and came and fell at his feet. ²⁶The woman was a Greek, a Syrophoenician by birth. She kept asking him to cast the demon out of her daughter. ²⁷He said to her, "Let the children be fed first, for it is not right to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs." ²⁸But she answered him, "Lord, even the dogs under the table eat the children's crumbs." ²⁹He said to her, "Because of this word, go — the demon has left your daughter." ³⁰She went home and found her child lying on the bed, and the demon gone. ³¹Then he returned from the region of Tyre and went through Sidon to the Sea of Galilee, through the region of the Decapolis. ³²They brought to him a man who was deaf and could hardly speak, and they begged him to lay his hand on him. ³³He took him aside from the crowd privately, put his fingers into the man's ears, and after spitting, touched his tongue. ³⁴Looking up to heaven, he sighed deeply and said to him, "Ephphatha" — that is, "Be opened." ³⁵Immediately his ears were opened, the binding of his tongue was released, and he spoke clearly. ³⁶He ordered them to tell no one, but the more he ordered them, the more widely they proclaimed it. ³⁷They were utterly astonished, saying, "He has done everything well. He even makes the deaf hear and the mute speak."

1. As in 3:22, scribes from Jerusalem represent an official investigation. Their arrival 'from Jerusalem' (apo Hierosolymōn) indicates these are not local critics but representatives of the central religious authority. The historical present synagontai ('they gather') creates narrative immediacy.
2. The word koinais ('common, defiled, ritually impure') does not mean physically dirty but ritually contaminated. Mark provides the parenthetical explanation 'that is, unwashed' (tout' estin aniptoiois) for his Gentile readers who would not know Jewish purity customs. The issue is ritual hand-washing before meals, a Pharisaic tradition not required by the Torah itself.
3. Mark inserts a long parenthetical explanation (vv. 3-4) for readers unfamiliar with Jewish customs — strong evidence that his audience was predominantly Gentile. The word pygmē ('with a fist' or 'carefully, thoroughly') is debated — it may describe a specific washing technique or simply mean 'diligently.' The 'tradition of the elders' (paradosis tōn presbyterōn) refers to the oral law later codified in the Mishnah.
4. The verb baptisōntai ('wash, immerse') is the same root as 'baptize,' suggesting full immersion rather than merely rinsing hands. The marketplace (agora) was a place of contact with Gentiles and other sources of ritual contamination. The list of items requiring purification — cups (potēriōn), pitchers (xestōn, a Latin loanword from sextarius), copper vessels (chalkiōn), and dining couches (klinōn) — illustrates how extensively purity concerns pervaded daily life.
5. The verb peripatousin ('walk') is a metaphor for conduct or lifestyle — 'why do your disciples not live according to...' The question holds Jesus responsible for his disciples' behavior, as in 2:24. The phrase 'tradition of the elders' places oral tradition on par with Scripture — precisely the equation Jesus will challenge.
6. Jesus opens with a devastating quotation from Isaiah 29:13, applying it directly to his questioners. The word hypokritēs ('hypocrite') originally meant a stage actor — one who wears a mask and plays a role. Jesus accuses them of performing religion without genuine devotion. The quote comes from the Septuagint, which differs slightly from the Hebrew text of Isaiah.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 29:13. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The word matēn ('in vain, to no purpose, uselessly') declares their worship empty and ineffective. The core accusation: human traditions (entalmata anthrōpōn) have been elevated to the status of divine teaching (didaskalias). The verse strikes at the heart of the Pharisaic project of building a 'fence around the Torah' — Jesus sees the fence as replacing the Torah.

8. The contrast is stark: aphentes ('abandoning, leaving behind, forsaking') the commandment of God versus krateite ('holding fast, gripping, clinging to') human tradition. The verb kratein ('to hold, grip') implies a tight, determined grasp. They cling to tradition while letting go of God's actual command.
9. The adverb kalōs ('well, skillfully, finely') is biting sarcasm — 'how expertly you reject God's command.' The verb atheteite ('set aside, nullify, reject') is a legal term for annulling a contract or agreement. Jesus moves from a general critique (vv. 6-8) to a specific example (vv. 10-13).
10. Jesus cites two commandments: Exodus 20:12 (the fifth commandment) and Exodus 21:17. Together they establish the inviolable obligation of children to care for and respect their parents. The phrase thanatō teleutatō ('let him surely die, let him die the death') is an emphatic death sentence using the cognate dative construction from the Septuagint.
11. The Aramaic word korban (from the Hebrew qorban, meaning 'offering, gift dedicated to God') refers to a vow dedicating money or property to the temple. Mark translates it for his Gentile readers: ho estin dōron ('which is, a gift'). The practice Jesus critiques allowed a person to declare assets 'Corban' and thereby exempt them from being used to support aging parents — technically fulfilling a religious vow while violating the commandment to honor father and mother.
12. The verb aphiete ('you allow, permit') indicates that the religious authorities enforced the Corban vow even against the person's later desire to help their parents. Once declared, the vow was considered binding — tradition trumped the commandment. The irony: a supposedly pious act (vowing to God) is used to evade a clear divine command (caring for parents).
13. The verb akyrountes ('nullifying, invalidating, rendering void') is a legal term for canceling a valid document. The 'word of God' (ton logon tou theou) — the Torah itself — is voided by human tradition. The final remark, 'and many similar things you do' (paromoia toiauta polla poieite), generalizes: the Corban example is one of many instances where tradition overrides Scripture.
14. Jesus shifts from the scribes and Pharisees to the general crowd (ton ochlon). The double imperative — akousate ('listen') and synete ('understand') — demands not just hearing but comprehension. What follows is a teaching for everyone, not just the religious elite.
15. This is a revolutionary principle: defilement is internal, not external. The verb koinōsai ('make common, defile, pollute') is the same word from verse 2. Jesus overturns the entire external purity system in a single sentence. The logic is spatial: nothing from outside (exōthen) entering (eisporeuomenon) can contaminate; only what exits (ekporeuomena) from within defiles. The implications for food laws, Gentile contact, and the whole purity system are enormous.
16. Verse 16 does not appear in the earliest and most reliable manuscripts and is not included in the SBLGNT critical text. It is a scribal addition harmonizing with 4:9 and 4:23. Some later manuscripts and the KJV include it: 'If anyone has ears to hear, let them hear.' We follow the SBLGNT in omitting it.
17. The pattern from chapter 4 repeats: public parabolic teaching followed by private explanation to the disciples. The disciples' need for explanation underscores their persistent difficulty in understanding. They call Jesus's statement a 'parable' (parabolē), meaning they recognized it as figurative speech requiring interpretation.
18. Jesus's exasperation is evident: kai hymeis ('you also, even you') — even the insiders need explanation. The adjective asynetoi ('without understanding, senseless') is blunt. Jesus repeats his principle and now explains the physiological reason why external food cannot defile spiritually.
19. Jesus's argument is straightforward: food enters the stomach (koilia), not the heart (kardia), and exits through the digestive system into the sewer (aphedrōna, 'latrine, drain'). The heart in biblical anthropology is the seat of moral and spiritual life. The parenthetical comment katharizōn panta ta brōmata can be read as the subject being Jesus ('he declared all foods clean') or as the process of digestion ('purifying all foods'). Most modern translations follow the former reading, understanding this as Mark's theological commentary declaring the end of kosher food laws. This is one of the most consequential editorial comments in the New Testament.
20. Jesus returns to the positive side of his principle: defilement originates from within. The repeated emphasis on what 'comes out' (ekporeuomenon) prepares for the vice list that follows, which catalogs the internal sources of true defilement.
21. The heart (kardia) is the source of all moral contamination. The list begins with dialogismoi hoi kakoi ('evil thoughts, wicked deliberations') as the root, then specifies manifestations. The word porneiai ('sexual immorality') covers all forms of sexual wrongdoing, broader than just adultery or prostitution. The list has twelve items, possibly echoing the twelve sons/tribes or simply providing a comprehensive catalog.
22. The list moves from plural actions (sexual immorality, theft, murder, adultery — things done) to singular dispositions (greed, wickedness, deceit — character traits). The 'evil eye' (ophthalmos ponēros) is a Semitic idiom for envy or stinginess. The word aselgeia ('sensuality, debauchery, licentiousness') refers to unrestrained self-indulgence. Aphrosynē ('foolishness') in biblical wisdom literature is not intellectual deficiency but moral and spiritual blindness — the refusal to acknowledge God.
23. The summary restates the principle: panta tauta ta ponēra esōthen ekporeuetai ('all these evil things come from within'). The argument is complete: true defilement is moral, not ritual; internal, not external. This teaching dismantles the entire system of external purity that the Pharisees' question presupposed.

24. Jesus travels into unambiguously Gentile territory — Tyre was a Phoenician coastal city. The SBLGNT reads 'Tyre' only; 'and Sidon' appears in later manuscripts. His desire for anonymity (oudena ēthelen gnōnai, 'he wanted no one to know') again fails — as in 1:45, his reputation precedes him. The timing is significant: after declaring all foods clean and teaching that external purity does not matter, Jesus crosses into the unclean Gentile world.
25. The word euthys ('immediately') drives the narrative. The diminutive thygatrion ('little daughter') conveys the mother's tenderness. The woman's prostration (prosepesen, 'fell before') indicates desperate supplication. An unclean spirit in a Gentile girl — the encounter concentrates every purity boundary that Jesus has been challenging.
26. Mark provides a double identification: Hellēnis ('Greek' — culturally Hellenistic, i.e., pagan) and Syrophoinikissa ('Syrophoenician' — ethnically from the Phoenician region of Syria, distinguished from Libyphoenicians of North Africa). The imperfect ērōta ('kept asking') indicates persistent, repeated pleading.
27. This is one of the most debated sayings in the Gospels. The 'children' (tekna) represent Israel; the 'dogs' (kynaria, diminutive — 'little dogs, house dogs,' not wild street dogs) represent Gentiles. The word 'first' (prōton) is crucial to Mark — it implies a sequence, not an exclusion: Israel first, then Gentiles. The diminutive kynaria softens the harshness somewhat — these are household pets, not scavenging strays. Some interpret Jesus as testing the woman's faith; others see him articulating the salvation-historical priority of Israel that the woman then reframes.
28. The woman does not reject Jesus's metaphor but brilliantly extends it: she accepts the priority of the children but argues that feeding the dogs does not require depriving the children — crumbs fall naturally from the table while the children eat. Her response demonstrates both humility (she does not claim to be a child at the table) and bold faith (she insists that Jesus's power is so abundant that even the overflow is sufficient). She is the only person in Mark who outargues Jesus.
29. Jesus commends her logos ('word, saying, argument') — it is the quality of her faith as expressed in her reply that moves him. The perfect exelēlythen ('has gone out') indicates the exorcism is already accomplished at a distance — Jesus does not go to the house, touch the girl, or speak a word of command. The healing is performed solely on the basis of the mother's faith expressed through clever, humble argumentation. This is the only distance healing of an exorcism in the Synoptics.
30. The perfect participles — beblēmenon ('lying, thrown/placed') and exelēluthos ('having gone out') — describe the completed states the woman finds. The child is at rest on the bed (no longer convulsing or disturbed), and the demon has departed. The scene is quiet and domestic — a sharp contrast to the violent Gerasene exorcism. Faith, not spectacle, has been the instrument of deliverance.
31. The itinerary is geographically circuitous: north from Tyre to Sidon, then southeast through the Decapolis to the Sea of Galilee — a long loop through predominantly Gentile territory. This extended journey through Gentile lands follows naturally from the principle that what defiles comes from within, not from external contact. Jesus is enacting the boundary-crossing his teaching authorized.
32. The word mogilalon ('having difficulty speaking, speaking with impediment') appears only here in the New Testament and only once in the Septuagint — in Isaiah 35:6 ('then the tongue of the mute will shout for joy'). Mark's use of this rare word signals that Jesus is fulfilling Isaiah's messianic prophecy. The man's condition — deaf and nearly mute — represents complete communicative isolation.
32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 35:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
33. Jesus's healing method here is unusually physical and elaborate. He takes the man aside privately (kat' idian) — perhaps because the man cannot hear verbal instructions and needs physical communication. The fingers in the ears and spitting on the tongue are symbolic actions directed at the organs of hearing and speech. Saliva was believed to have healing properties in the ancient world, but Jesus's use of it appears to be a sign-act communicating what he is about to do to a man who cannot hear words.
34. The sigh (estenaxen) expresses deep emotion — compassion for the man's suffering, or the burden of confronting a broken world, or the spiritual effort of the healing act. The Aramaic ephphatha (from the root p-t-ch, 'to open') is another instance of Mark preserving Jesus's actual spoken words. The translation for Gentile readers — dianoichthēti ('be opened, be completely opened') — uses a compound verb intensifying the opening. The single word commands the opening of both ears and mouth.
35. The healing is instant (eutheōs, variant of euthys). The word desmos ('bond, chain, binding') describes the tongue as having been tied or bound — freed from whatever held it. The adverb orthōs ('correctly, plainly, clearly') indicates full, normal speech. The language of binding and release connects to the strong-man parable (3:27) — Jesus releases captives from the bonds of affliction.
36. The messianic secret continues, and continues to fail. The comparative construction — 'the more he ordered, the more they proclaimed' (hoson diesteileto, autoi mallon perisoteron ekērisson) — creates a paradox: Jesus's commands produce the opposite effect. The verb ekērysson ('proclaimed, heralded') is the same word used for public proclamation of the gospel. The people cannot contain their witness.
37. The adverb hyperperissōs ('exceedingly, beyond all measure') is one of Mark's strongest intensifiers. The crowd's exclamation 'he has done everything well' (kalōs panta pepoieken) echoes Genesis 1:31 ('God saw everything that he had made, and it was very good') and Isaiah 35:5-6 ('then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf unstopped'). The people unknowingly declare that Jesus is doing the work of the Creator and fulfilling messianic prophecy in Gentile territory.

Summary: Mark 8 is the pivotal chapter of the Gospel. It begins with a second feeding miracle (four thousand this time), followed by the Pharisees demanding a sign, Jesus warning about the 'leaven' of the Pharisees and Herod, and the disciples' persistent failure to understand. A two-stage healing of a blind man at Bethsaida symbolically mirrors the disciples' gradual (and still incomplete) sight. The chapter reaches its climax at Caesarea Philippi, where Peter confesses Jesus as the Christ — but immediately reveals that he misunderstands what that means. Jesus delivers the first passion prediction and teaches that discipleship requires taking up one's cross.

What Makes This Remarkable: The two-stage healing of the blind man (vv. 22-26) is unique to Mark and functions as a parable of discipleship: the disciples, like the blind man, see partially but not yet clearly. Peter's confession is the hinge of the entire Gospel — everything before leads to this moment, and everything after redefines what 'Christ' means through the lens of suffering. The first passion prediction (v. 31) introduces the three-fold pattern of death-and-resurrection predictions. The rebuke 'Get behind me, Satan' is among the most dramatic moments in the Gospels.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the two feeding miracles is debated — are they doublets of the same event or distinct occasions? Mark's text treats them as separate (8:19-20 distinguishes them), and the differences in numbers, vocabulary, and setting support this. Peter's confession uses 'Christ' (Christos) without further qualification — Mark may intend this as both correct and insufficient.

Connections: The feeding of four thousand in Gentile territory parallels the feeding of five thousand in Jewish territory, suggesting Jesus is 'bread' for all peoples. The blindness theme connects to Isaiah 42:18-19 and 35:5. Caesarea Philippi, built by Philip the Tetrarch at the source of the Jordan near a shrine to Pan, provides an ironic backdrop for confessing the true God. The cross-bearing teaching echoes the reality of Roman crucifixion that Mark's audience knew firsthand.

¹In those days, when there was again a large crowd with nothing to eat, he called his disciples and said to them, ²"I have compassion on the crowd, because they have already been with me three days and have nothing to eat. ³If I send them home hungry, they will collapse on the way, and some of them have come from a great distance." ⁴His disciples answered him, "How can anyone find enough bread to feed these people here in this desolate place?" ⁵He asked them, "How many loaves do you have?" They said, "Seven." ⁶He directed the crowd to sit down on the ground. Then he took the seven loaves, gave thanks, broke them, and gave them to his disciples to distribute, and they set them before the crowd. ⁷They also had a few small fish, and after blessing them, he said that these also should be distributed. ⁸They ate and were satisfied, and they collected seven baskets full of leftover broken pieces. ⁹There were about four thousand people. Then he sent them away. ¹⁰Immediately he got into the boat with his disciples and went to the district of Dalmanutha. ¹¹The Pharisees came out and began to argue with him, demanding from him a sign from heaven, to test him. ¹²He sighed deeply in his spirit and said, "Why does this generation seek a sign? Truly I say to you, no sign will be given to this generation." ¹³He left them, got back into the boat, and crossed to the other side. ¹⁴They had forgotten to bring bread and had only one loaf with them in the boat. ¹⁵He warned them, saying, "Watch out — guard against the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod." ¹⁶They began discussing with one another the fact that they had no bread. ¹⁷Aware of this, he said to them, "Why are you discussing the fact that you have no bread? Do you still not perceive or understand? Are your hearts hardened? ¹⁸Having eyes, do you not see? Having ears, do you not hear? And do you not remember? ¹⁹When I broke the five loaves for the five thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces did you collect?" They said to him, "Twelve." ²⁰"And when I broke the seven for the four thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces did you collect?" They said, "Seven." ²¹He said to them, "Do you still not understand?" ²²They came to Bethsaida, and some people brought a blind man to him and begged him to touch him. ²³He took the blind man by the hand and led him out of the village. After spitting on his eyes and laying his hands on him, he asked him, "Do you see anything?" ²⁴He looked up and said, "I see people, but they look like trees walking around." ²⁵Then Jesus laid his hands on his eyes again, and the man looked intently, and his sight was restored, and he saw everything clearly. ²⁶Jesus sent him home, saying, "Do not even go into the village." ²⁷Jesus went out with his disciples to the villages of Caesarea Philippi. On the way he asked his disciples, "Who do people say that I am?" ²⁸They told him, "John the Baptist; others say Elijah; and still others, one of the prophets." ²⁹Then he asked them, "But who do you say that I am?" Peter answered him, "You are the Christ." ³⁰He sternly ordered them to tell no one about him. ³¹And after three days rise again, he began to teach them, that the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes, and be killed. ³²He spoke this word openly. Then Peter took him aside and began to rebuke him. ³³But turning and looking at his disciples, he rebuked Peter and said, "Get behind me, Satan! For you are not thinking about the things of God, but the things of human beings." ³⁴He called the crowd together with his disciples and said to them, "If anyone wants to follow me, let them deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow me. ³⁵For whoever wants to save their life will lose it, but whoever loses their life for my sake and the sake of the good news will save it. ³⁶For what does it profit a person to gain the whole world and forfeit their life? ³⁷For what can a person give in exchange for their life? ³⁸For whoever is ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of Man will also be ashamed of them when he comes in the glory of his Father with the holy angels."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase en ekeinai tais hēmerais ('in those days') is a general temporal marker connecting this to Jesus's extended ministry in Gentile territory (Decapolis, 7:31). The word palin ('again') signals a parallel to the first feeding. This time Jesus takes the initiative rather than the disciples.
2. The verb splanchnizomai ('I have compassion, my gut is moved') is the same visceral compassion from 1:41 and 6:34. The three days (hēmerai treis) indicates the crowd's extraordinary persistence — they have stayed with Jesus for three days in a remote area without adequate food. This detail also foreshadows the 'three days' of the passion predictions.
3. The verb eklythēsontai ('will give out, collapse, become faint') describes physical exhaustion from hunger and travel. The note that some came 'from a great distance' (apo makrothen) may hint at the Gentile composition of the crowd — they have come from far away, perhaps symbolically representing the nations drawn to Israel's God.
4. The disciples' question is astonishing given that they witnessed the feeding of the five thousand. Their inability to connect that experience to this situation is precisely the 'hardness of heart' Mark identified in 6:52. The word erēmia ('wilderness, desolate place') evokes the Exodus feeding narratives. Their question pothen ('from where?') echoes Israel's complaint in the wilderness (Numbers 11:13).
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 11:13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The number seven may carry symbolic weight — seven often represents completeness or universality in biblical numerology. Some interpreters see the five loaves of the first feeding as representing the five books of Torah (for the Jewish crowd) and seven as representing the completeness of God's provision for all nations (for the Gentile crowd).
6. The verb eucharistēsas ('having given thanks') differs from eulogēsen ('blessed') used in the first feeding (6:41). Both are standard Jewish meal blessings, but eucharistēsas became the technical term for the Lord's Supper (the 'Eucharist'). The same four-action pattern appears: taking, thanking, breaking, giving.
7. The diminutive ichthydia ('small fish') and the adjective oliga ('few') emphasize the meagreness of the supply. The fish receive their own separate blessing (eulogēsas), suggesting a careful, deliberate process. The verb paratihenai ('to set before, to serve') places the disciples in the role of servers at a divine banquet.
8. The word spyridas ('baskets') differs from the kophinous ('wicker baskets') of the first feeding. The spyris was a large rope basket, possibly large enough to hold a person (cf. Acts 9:25, where Paul is lowered in a spyris). Seven baskets from seven loaves — the surplus matches the initial supply, demonstrating abundance. The readers are meant to compare: twelve baskets from five loaves in the first feeding, seven from seven here.
9. The number four thousand (tetrakischilioi) is smaller than the first feeding's five thousand. The word 'about' (hōs) indicates an approximation. Jesus dismisses (apelysen) the crowd — the same verb used in 6:36 where the disciples wanted to dismiss the first crowd.
10. Dalmanutha is mentioned only in Mark and its location is uncertain — Matthew's parallel (15:39) reads 'Magadan' (or 'Magdala'). It was apparently on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. The word euthys ('immediately') again drives the narrative pace.

11. The verb syzetein ('to argue, debate, dispute') indicates hostile engagement. The demand for a sêmeion apo tou ouranou ('sign from heaven') means a cosmic, unmistakable divine authentication — something beyond the healings and exorcisms they could attribute to other sources. The participle peirazontes ('testing') is the same word used for Satan's testing in 1:13; the Pharisees are aligned with the tempter.
12. The verb anastenaxas ('sighed deeply, groaned') is intensified with the prefix ana- and describes profound emotional distress. The phrase ei dothēsetai ('if a sign will be given') is a Hebrew oath formula — literally 'if [such a thing happens, may God punish me]' — meaning emphatically 'no sign will be given.' Mark's Jesus gives no sign at all; Matthew 12:39 adds 'except the sign of Jonah.' The word genea ('generation') implies not just the contemporaries but a type — a faithless generation that demands proof instead of responding in faith.
13. The abrupt departure — apheis autous ('leaving them behind') — reflects Jesus's frustration. He does not continue the argument but withdraws. The crossing to 'the other side' (eis to peran) continues the pattern of back-and-forth movement across the sea.
14. The detail that they forgot bread is both a narrative setup and deeply ironic — they are with the one who has just twice multiplied bread miraculously and they worry about having only one loaf. The 'one loaf' (hena arton) may symbolically refer to Jesus himself, the true bread, though Mark does not make this explicit.
15. Leaven (zymē) is used metaphorically for a pervasive, corrupting influence — a small amount of yeast transforms an entire batch of dough. The 'leaven of the Pharisees' is their demand for signs and their replacement of God's word with human tradition. The 'leaven of Herod' may refer to political power, worldly ambition, or moral compromise. Mark mentions Herod where Matthew 16:6 has 'Sadducees.' The disciples will completely miss the point.
16. The disciples interpret Jesus's metaphorical warning literally — they think he is talking about actual bread. The verb dielogizonto ('were reasoning, deliberating, arguing among themselves') is the same word used for the scribes' hostile reasoning in 2:6, 8. The irony is thick: they worry about bread in the presence of the one who fed thousands.
17. Jesus fires a barrage of questions — five in rapid succession (vv. 17-21) — each one more pointed than the last. The word pepōrōmenēn ('hardened, calcified, petrified') for their hearts echoes 6:52 and 3:5 (the Pharisees). Jesus is saying that his own disciples have the same spiritual condition as his opponents. The phrase oupō ('not yet') implies an expected progression that has stalled.
18. This echoes Jeremiah 5:21 ('Hear this, O foolish and senseless people, who have eyes but do not see, who have ears but do not hear') and Ezekiel 12:2. Jesus places his disciples in the category of those prophetically condemned for spiritual blindness and deafness. The question 'do you not remember?' (ou mnēmoneuete) shifts from perception to memory — they have the data but fail to interpret it.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 5:21 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Ezekiel 12:2 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. Jesus catechizes the disciples like a teacher testing students. The word kophinous ('wicker baskets') is the distinctive basket type from the first feeding. The answer 'twelve' is correct — they remember the facts but miss their significance.
20. The word spyridōn ('large baskets') is the distinctive type from the second feeding. Again the disciples answer correctly: seven. The two feedings are explicitly distinguished — five/five thousand/twelve and seven/four thousand/seven — confirming they are separate events.
21. The final question oupō syniete ('do you not yet understand?') is left without an answer — the reader is left to supply it. The 'not yet' preserves hope that understanding will come, but the disciples remain blind. This sets the stage for the blind man of Bethsaida (vv. 22-26), whose gradual healing mirrors the disciples' gradual perception.
22. Bethsaida ('house of fishing') was a town at the north end of the Sea of Galilee. The pattern of others bringing the afflicted person to Jesus recurs throughout Mark (cf. 2:3, 7:32). The request to 'touch' (hapsētai) the blind man parallels the deaf man's story in 7:32-37. This healing — unique to Mark — is the only miracle in the Gospels that happens in stages.
23. As with the deaf man (7:33), Jesus takes the man aside privately, uses saliva, and lays on hands. The question 'do you see anything?' (ei ti blepeis) is extraordinary — Jesus asks about the result of his healing, something he never does elsewhere. The two-stage healing is unique and appears deliberate, not because of any limitation in Jesus's power but to serve a narrative-theological purpose.
24. The man's response describes partial sight — he can see shapes and movement but cannot distinguish people clearly. The comparison of people to trees suggests blurred, indistinct vision. This intermediate stage of sight mirrors the disciples' condition after the feeding miracles: they have some perception but cannot see clearly who Jesus is.
25. Three verbs describe the progression: dieblpesen ('he looked through, saw clearly' — a sudden piercing clarity), apekatestē ('was restored' — returned to full function), and eneblepen tēlaugōs hapanta ('was seeing everything at a distance clearly'). The adverb tēlaugōs ('clearly, distinctly, far-shiningly') indicates not just restoration but enhanced vision. The two-stage healing enacts what will happen to the disciples: Peter's confession (v. 29) is partial sight; full vision awaits the resurrection.
26. The command to avoid the village continues the messianic secret — the healing is not to be publicized. The SBLGNT has the shorter reading 'do not even go into the village' (mēde eis tēn kōmēn eiselthēs) without the additional prohibition about telling anyone, which appears in later manuscripts.

27. Caesarea Philippi (modern Banias) was located at the northern extreme of Jewish territory, near the sources of the Jordan River, at the foot of Mount Hermon. Philip the Tetrarch had rebuilt it and named it after Caesar and himself. The region was marked by pagan shrines, including a grotto dedicated to Pan. Against this backdrop of pagan worship, Jesus asks the central question of the Gospel. The phrase en tē hodō ('on the way') makes this a traveling conversation — the 'way' becomes a metaphor for discipleship in Mark.
28. These are the same three categories from 6:14-15 — resurrected John, returned Elijah, or a new prophet. All three recognize Jesus as a prophetic figure but none identifies him as the Messiah. Public opinion sees Jesus through the categories of the past rather than as something new.
29. The emphatic hymeis de ('but you') contrasts the disciples' answer with popular opinion. Peter speaks as the group's representative. His confession — sy ei ho Christos ('you are the Christ/Messiah') — is the correct answer to the question posed in 1:1. Mark's version is unadorned — no 'Son of the living God' (Matthew 16:16), no commendation. The confession is right but, as the next verses will show, Peter's understanding of what 'Christ' means is dangerously wrong.
30. The verb epetimēsen ('sternly warned, rebuked') is the same word used for rebuking demons (1:25) and the wind (4:39). The intensity suggests that premature proclamation of a misunderstood messiahship would be dangerous. Before anyone can proclaim Jesus as Christ, they must learn that the Christ must suffer — the teaching that follows immediately.
31. This is the first of three passion predictions (cf. 9:31, 10:33-34), each more detailed than the last. The word dei ('it is necessary, must') indicates divine necessity — this is not mere prediction but theological imperative. The title 'Son of Man' replaces 'Christ,' redefining messiahship through Daniel 7's suffering and vindicated figure. The three groups — elders, chief priests, and scribes — constitute the Sanhedrin, Israel's supreme council. The phrase meta treis hēmeras ('after three days') is Mark's way of expressing what other Gospels call 'on the third day.'
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Daniel 7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The word parrēsia ('openly, plainly, boldly, without concealment') contrasts with the messianic secrecy — for the first time, Jesus speaks directly about his fate rather than in parables. The verb proslabomenos ('taking aside, drawing to himself') and epitiman ('to rebuke') are astonishing: Peter presumes to correct Jesus, using the same verb (epitimaō) that Jesus uses against demons. The one who just confessed Jesus as Christ now opposes Christ's self-defined mission.
33. Jesus turns to face the disciples — the rebuke is public, not private, because the temptation Peter represents threatens the entire group. Calling Peter 'Satan' (Satana) identifies Peter's opposition to suffering as the same temptation Jesus faced in the wilderness (1:13). The verb phroneis ('think, set your mind on, have a mindset toward') goes deeper than a single thought — it describes an entire orientation. Peter's mind is set on human values (power, victory, avoidance of suffering) rather than God's purposes (redemption through suffering).
34. Jesus expands the audience from the Twelve to the crowd — this teaching is for all, not just apostles. Three imperatives define discipleship: aparnēsasthō heauton ('let them deny themselves' — renounce self as the center of life), aratō ton stauron autou ('let them take up their cross' — accept the possibility of execution), and akolouthēitō moi ('let them follow me' — walk the same path). For Mark's Roman audience, 'taking up a cross' was not a metaphor — they had seen crucifixion victims carrying their crossbeams through the streets.
35. The word psychē means both 'life' (physical existence) and 'soul/self' (deeper identity). The paradox works on both levels: clinging to physical safety leads to spiritual loss; risking physical life for Jesus leads to ultimate salvation. The phrase heneken emou kai tou euangeliou ('for my sake and the gospel's') uniquely yokes Jesus's person to the message — the two are inseparable.
36. The commercial language — ōphelei ('profit, benefit'), kerdēsai ('gain'), zēmiōthēnai ('suffer loss, forfeit') — frames the question in terms of a cosmic cost-benefit analysis. The 'whole world' (ton kosmon holon) is the maximum possible gain; one's psychē is what is at stake. No amount of worldly acquisition can compensate for the loss of one's true self.
37. The word antallagma ('exchange, ransom price, equivalent') comes from commercial vocabulary — what could possibly serve as a buyback price for a forfeited soul? The implied answer: nothing. Once the psychē is lost, no transaction can recover it. This echoes Psalm 49:7-9 ('no one can redeem the life of another or give to God a ransom for them').
37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 49:7-9. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
38. The verb epaischynthē ('is ashamed') describes the social pressure to distance oneself from Jesus — a very real temptation for Mark's audience facing persecution in Rome. The present generation is called moichalidi ('adulterous') — using the Old Testament prophetic image of Israel as an unfaithful spouse (Hosea 1-3). The Son of Man's future coming 'in the glory of his Father with the holy angels' draws on Daniel 7:13-14, where the Son of Man receives glory and dominion. The one who suffers now will be vindicated then.

Summary: Mark 9 moves from the Transfiguration on the mountain — where Jesus is revealed in divine glory alongside Moses and Elijah — to the valley below, where a desperate father brings his demon-possessed son to disciples who cannot heal him. Jesus delivers the boy and offers the second passion prediction. The chapter continues with teachings on true greatness (the least is the greatest), radical inclusion ('whoever is not against us is for us'), and radical self-discipline (the 'cutting off' sayings about sin). The chapter's arc moves from heavenly glory to earthly failure to ethical demand.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Transfiguration is the only episode in Mark where Jesus's divine identity is openly displayed before the resurrection. The voice from the cloud — 'This is my beloved Son; listen to him' — repeats the baptismal declaration (1:11) but now addresses the disciples directly. The failed exorcism below the mountain (vv. 14-29) creates a dramatic contrast between the glory above and the struggle below. The father's cry — 'I believe; help my unbelief!' (v. 24) — is one of the most honest prayers in Scripture.

Translation Friction: The saying 'this kind cannot come out except by prayer' (v. 29) raises questions about exorcism methodology. Some manuscripts add 'and fasting,' but the SBLGNT omits it. The 'salt' sayings at the end of the chapter (vv. 49-50) are notoriously difficult to interpret, and their connection to the preceding material is unclear. We render the Greek as given and address the interpretive challenges in the notes.

Connections: The Transfiguration echoes Moses on Sinai (Exodus 24, 34) — the mountain, the cloud, the voice, the shining appearance, the six days. Elijah's presence connects to Malachi 4:5-6 and the expected return of Elijah before the Day of the Lord. The second passion prediction (v. 31) advances the trajectory toward Jerusalem. The teaching on greatness (vv. 33-37) inverts all conventional honor systems and anticipates Jesus's own self-offering.

¹And he said to them, "Truly I say to you, there are some standing here who will not taste death until they see the kingdom of God having come in power." ²After six days Jesus took Peter, James, and John and led them up a high mountain by themselves, alone. And he was transfigured before them, ³His raiment became gleaming, exceeding brilliant as snow. So as no fuller on earth can white them. ⁴And Elijah appeared to them along with Moses, and they were talking with Jesus. ⁵Then Peter said to Jesus, "Rabbi, it is good for us to be here. Let us make three shelters — one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elijah." ⁶For he did not know what to say, because they were terrified. ⁷Then a cloud came, overshadowing them, and a voice came from the cloud: "This is my beloved Son — listen to him." ⁸Suddenly, looking around, they no longer saw anyone with them but Jesus alone. ⁹As they were coming down the mountain, he ordered them to tell no one what they had seen until the Son of Man had risen from the dead. ¹⁰They kept the matter to themselves, questioning what this "rising from the dead" meant. ¹¹And they asked him, "Why do the scribes say that Elijah must come first?" ¹²He said to them, "Elijah does come first and restores all things. And how is it written of the Son of Man that he should suffer many things and be treated with contempt? ¹³But I tell you that Elijah has come, and they did to him whatever they wished, just as it is written about him." ¹⁴When they came to the other disciples, they saw a great crowd around them and scribes arguing with them. ¹⁵Immediately the whole crowd, when they saw him, were greatly amazed and ran to greet him. ¹⁶He asked them, "What are you arguing about with them?" ¹⁷Someone from the crowd answered him, "Teacher, I brought my son to you, for he has a spirit that makes him mute. ¹⁸Whenever it seizes him, it throws him down, and he foams at the mouth and grinds his teeth and becomes rigid. I asked your disciples to cast it out, but they could not." ¹⁹He answered them, "O faithless generation, how long am I to be with you? How long am I to bear with you? Bring him to me." ²⁰They brought the boy to him. When the spirit saw Jesus, it immediately threw the boy into convulsions, and he fell on the ground and rolled around, foaming at the mouth. ²¹Jesus asked his father, "How long has this been happening to him?" He said, "From childhood. ²²It has often thrown him into fire and into water to destroy him. But if you can do anything, have compassion on us and help us." ²³Jesus said to him, "'If you can!' All things are possible for the one who believes." ²⁴Immediately the father of the child cried out, "I believe — help my unbelief!" ²⁵When Jesus saw that a crowd was rapidly gathering, he rebuked the unclean spirit, saying to it, "You mute and deaf spirit, I command you, come out of him and never enter him again." ²⁶After crying out and convulsing him violently, it came out. The boy became like a corpse, so that most of them said, "He is dead." ²⁷But Jesus took him by the hand and raised him up, and he stood. ²⁸After he had gone indoors, his disciples asked him privately, "Why could we not cast it out?" ²⁹He said to them, "This kind cannot come out by anything except prayer." ³⁰They went out from there and passed through Galilee. He did not want anyone to know, ³¹Since he taught his followers, and stated to them, the Son of Man is delivered into the hands of men, then they will kill him. And following that he is killed, he will rise the third day. ³²But they did not understand the saying, and they were afraid to ask him. ³³They came to Capernaum. When he was in the house, he asked them, "What were you discussing on the way?" ³⁴But they were silent, for on the way they had argued with one another about who was the greatest. ³⁵He sat down, called the twelve, and said to them, "If anyone wants to be first, he must be last of all and servant of all." ³⁶Taking a child, he set him in the middle of them. Then taking him in his arms, he said to them, ³⁷"Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me, and whoever receives me receives not me but the one who sent me." ³⁸John said to him, "Teacher, we saw someone casting out demons in your name, and we tried to stop him because he was not following us." ³⁹But Jesus said, "Do not stop him, for no one who does a mighty work in my name will be able soon afterward to speak evil of me. ⁴⁰For whoever is not against us is for us. ⁴¹For truly I say to you, whoever gives you a cup of water to drink because you belong to Christ will by no means lose his reward. ⁴²"Whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to stumble, it would be better for him if a great millstone were hung around his neck and he were thrown into the sea. ⁴³If your hand causes you to stumble, cut it off. It is better for you to enter life crippled than with two hands to go into Gehenna, into the unquenchable fire. ⁴⁵And if your foot causes you to stumble, cut it off. It is better for you to enter life lame than with two feet to be thrown into Gehenna. ⁴⁷And if your eye causes you to stumble, tear it out. It is better for you to enter the kingdom of God with one eye than with two eyes to be thrown into Gehenna, ⁴⁸Where their decay dieth not, and the fire is not put out. ⁴⁹For every one will be refined by fire. ⁵⁰Salt is good, but if the salt loses its saltiness, how will you make it salty again? Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace with one another."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This saying is linked to 8:38 and serves as a transition to the Transfiguration. The phrase 'taste death' (geusōntai thanatou) is a Semitic idiom meaning 'experience death.' The perfect participle elēlythuiān ('having come') indicates a completed arrival, not a gradual process. The referent — what 'seeing the kingdom come in power' means — is debated: the Transfiguration, the resurrection, Pentecost, or the destruction of Jerusalem have all been proposed.
2. The 'six days' may echo Exodus 24:16, where the cloud covered Sinai for six days before God spoke to Moses on the seventh. Peter, James, and John form Jesus's inner circle (cf. 5:37, 14:33). The verb metamorphōthē ('was transfigured, was transformed') indicates a change of form (morphē), not merely appearance — the same root Paul uses in Romans 12:2 and 2 Corinthians 3:18.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 24:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. Mark's description is earthy and vivid — he compares the supernatural brilliance to a launderer's best work and declares it surpassed. The word gnaphēus ('fuller, launderer, cloth-bleacher') is a working-class trade term. The whiteness signals heavenly origin (cf. Daniel 7:9, where the Ancient of Days wears white garments).
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7:9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. Mark names Elijah first (Matthew and Luke name Moses first), perhaps reflecting Mark's sustained interest in the Elijah-John the Baptist connection. Moses represents the Law, Elijah the Prophets — the entire Old Testament bears witness to Jesus. The content of their conversation is not recorded in Mark (Luke 9:31 says they discussed Jesus's 'departure' in Jerusalem).
5. Peter addresses Jesus as 'Rabbi' (teacher) — a title that seems inadequate given what he is witnessing. The proposal to build three skēnas ('tents, shelters, tabernacles') may reflect the Feast of Tabernacles, when Israel dwelt in booths commemorating the wilderness wandering. Peter's impulse is to prolong the mountaintop experience and to place Jesus on an equal footing with Moses and Elijah — both errors the divine voice will correct.
6. Mark's candid editorial comment explains Peter's remark: he spoke from terror (ekphoboi, 'terrified, struck with fear'), not from understanding. This is a theophanic response — the fear that grips humans in the presence of the divine (cf. Exodus 3:6, Isaiah 6:5).

6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 3:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 6:5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The cloud (nephelē) is the shekinah — the glory-cloud of God's presence that filled the tabernacle (Exodus 40:34-35) and the temple (1 Kings 8:10-11). The voice from the cloud repeats the baptismal declaration (1:11) with a crucial change: 'This is my Son' (third person, addressed to the disciples) replaces 'You are my Son' (second person, addressed to Jesus). The command 'listen to him' (akouete autou) echoes Deuteronomy 18:15, where Moses promises a prophet like himself whom the people must obey.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 40:34-35. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 8:10-11. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 18:15. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The vision ends abruptly. Moses and Elijah have vanished; only Jesus remains. The theological point is clear: the Law and the Prophets have given way to Jesus. He alone is the one to whom they must listen.
9. The messianic secret here has an explicit time limit: silence until the resurrection. This is the clearest indication that the secrecy is temporary and pedagogical — the Transfiguration cannot be properly understood until after the cross and resurrection provide the interpretive framework.
10. The disciples obeyed the command to silence but were puzzled by the phrase 'rising from the dead.' While Jews believed in a general resurrection at the end of the age (cf. Daniel 12:2), the idea of a single individual rising before the general resurrection was unprecedented.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 12:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The appearance of Elijah on the mountain prompted the question. The scribal teaching was based on Malachi 4:5-6: 'I will send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the LORD.' If Elijah must come first to restore all things, why is the Son of Man speaking of suffering?
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Malachi 4:5-6:. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. Jesus affirms the Elijah tradition but adds a counter-question: if Scripture speaks of Elijah's restoration, it also speaks of the Son of Man's suffering. The verb exoudenēthē ('treated with contempt, despised, counted as nothing') echoes Isaiah 53:3 and Psalm 22:6.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53:3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 22:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The reference is to John the Baptist, whose execution by Herod was narrated in 6:14-29. The pattern Jesus establishes is clear: Elijah came and was mistreated; the Son of Man will come and be mistreated. The phrase 'as it is written about him' is difficult — no Old Testament text explicitly describes Elijah being mistreated, though 1 Kings 19:2 and 19:10 recount threats against his life.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Kings 19:2 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The descent from the mountain of glory to a scene of confusion and controversy mirrors Moses's descent from Sinai to find Israel's golden calf apostasy (Exodus 32). The nine disciples left behind are overwhelmed.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 32. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The crowd's amazement (exethambēthēsan) at seeing Jesus may suggest that some residual glory from the Transfiguration lingered on his face, as with Moses in Exodus 34:29-30, though Mark does not make this explicit.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 34:29-30 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. Jesus addresses either the crowd or the scribes (the pronoun is ambiguous), asking about the dispute with the disciples.
17. The father addresses Jesus as 'Teacher' (Didaskale). The spirit is called alalon ('mute, speechless') — it has robbed the boy of speech. The description that follows (v. 18) also suggests seizure activity, leading many to identify epilepsy as the physical manifestation of the spiritual affliction.
18. The symptoms described — seizures, foaming, teeth-grinding, rigidity (xērainetai, literally 'dries up, withers, becomes stiff') — are consistent with severe epileptic episodes. The disciples' inability to cast out this spirit sets up the teaching in verse 29 about prayer.

19. Jesus's exasperation echoes Moses's frustration with Israel in the wilderness (Numbers 14:27, Deuteronomy 32:5, 20). The address 'faithless generation' (genea apistos) encompasses not just the disciples but the entire unbelieving context. The double question — 'how long... how long...' — expresses both impatience and poignant awareness of limited time.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 14:27. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 32:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The spirit reacts violently to Jesus's presence — a pattern in Mark's exorcism accounts (1:26, 5:6-7). The verb synesparaxen ('convulsed violently, tore') describes the physical violence of the seizure. The scene is raw and distressing.
21. Jesus's question is not for information-gathering (as if he needed it) but to draw out the father's faith and to reveal the depth of the suffering. The answer 'from childhood' (ek paidiothen) indicates years of torment.
22. The spirit is actively trying to kill the boy — the fires and waters are not accidental but purposeful attempts at destruction. The father's 'if you can' (ei ti dynē) reveals honest doubt after the disciples' failure. His plea is for 'us' (hēmas), not just the boy — the whole family suffers.
23. Jesus throws the father's words back at him with the quotation 'If you can!' (to Ei dynē) — the issue is not Jesus's ability but the father's faith. The declaration 'all things are possible for the one who believes' (panta dynata tō pisteuonti) locates the power in faith's connection to God, not in faith as a psychological force.
24. This is one of the most psychologically honest prayers in Scripture. The father simultaneously affirms faith and confesses its inadequacy. He does not pretend to more faith than he has, nor does he surrender to doubt. The paradox — believing and unbelieving at once — captures the human condition before God. The SBLGNT does not include 'with tears' (meta dakryōn), found in some manuscripts.
25. Jesus acts quickly before the crowd grows larger — consistent with his pattern of avoiding public spectacle. The emphatic pronoun egō ('I myself') asserts personal authority over the spirit. The command 'never enter him again' (mēketi eiselhthēs eis auton) goes beyond exorcism to permanent prohibition, ensuring the boy's lasting freedom.
26. The departure of the spirit is violent — a final act of destruction on the way out. The boy's apparent death creates a narrative of resurrection: he appears dead, then Jesus raises him. This prefigures Jesus's own death and resurrection.
27. The verb egeiren ('raised up') is the same word used for resurrection throughout the New Testament. The boy's raising prefigures the ultimate raising that Jesus has been predicting. The physical touch — taking the hand — echoes the raising of Jairus's daughter (5:41).
28. The private setting (kat' idian, 'privately') continues Mark's pattern of public ministry followed by private instruction. The disciples' question reveals their awareness of having received authority over unclean spirits (6:7) and their confusion at its failure.
29. The SBLGNT reads only 'prayer' (proseuchē) without 'and fasting' (kai nēsteia), which appears in later manuscripts. The point is that the disciples relied on their delegated authority as a technique rather than maintaining dependence on God through prayer. The word genos ('kind, type, class') suggests categories of spiritual opposition with varying degrees of resistance.
30. The desire for secrecy here serves the need for focused teaching: Jesus is preparing the disciples for what lies ahead in Jerusalem, and public ministry would be a distraction.
31. The second passion prediction is more concise than the first (8:31) but adds the detail of being 'delivered into the hands of men' (paradidotai eis cheiras anthrōpōn). The present tense paradidotai ('is being delivered') suggests the betrayal is already in process. The wordplay between 'Son of Man' (huios tou anthrōpou) and 'hands of men' (cheiras anthrōpōn) is deliberate — the Human One is handed over to humans.
32. After Peter's rebuke in 8:33, the disciples are now afraid to question Jesus about his passion predictions. The verb ēgnōoun ('they did not understand') is the imperfect of agnōō ('to be ignorant, to not comprehend') — their incomprehension was ongoing.
33. Capernaum was Jesus's base of operations in Galilee (cf. 1:21, 2:1). 'The house' (tē oikia) likely refers to Peter's house, used as a regular meeting place. Jesus's question draws out a confession the disciples are embarrassed to make.
34. Their silence reveals their shame. The irony is brutal: Jesus has just predicted his death, and the disciples are competing for rank. The question 'who is greatest' (tis meizōn) exposes the distance between Jesus's understanding of messiahship and theirs.
35. Sitting down (kathisas) is the posture of an authoritative teacher. The reversal is total: the one who wants to be first (prōtos) must become last (eschatos) and servant (diakonos). The word diakonos ('servant, one who serves at table') is not the word for slave (doulos) but for voluntary service — though Jesus will use doulos in 10:44.
36. The physical gesture — embracing the child (enagkalisamenos, 'having taken in his arms') — is tender and deliberate. In the ancient world, children had no social standing and were valued primarily as future adults. Jesus places a person of zero social status at the center of the community.
37. The chain of identification — child to Jesus to God — inverts the honor scale. To receive (dexētai, 'welcome, accept') the lowest is to receive the highest. The phrase 'in my name' (epi tō onomati mou) means 'for my sake, as my representative, on the basis of my authority.'
38. John's report introduces a question about boundaries: who has the right to act in Jesus's name? The disciples assumed that only those in their group had authority. The imperfect ekōlyomen ('we were trying to stop him') suggests repeated attempts.

39. Jesus's response is strikingly generous: effective use of his name is self-authenticating. The word dynamis ('mighty work, miracle, act of power') refers to the exorcism. The logic is practical: someone who experiences divine power through Jesus's name is unlikely to turn against him.
40. This principle of inclusion contrasts with the exclusionary version in Matthew 12:30 ('whoever is not with me is against me'). The two sayings address different situations: Matthew 12:30 confronts neutrality in the face of spiritual warfare; Mark 9:40 addresses overzealous boundary-drawing by the disciples.
41. The example descends to the smallest possible act of kindness — a cup of water. Even this minimal gesture, if motivated by allegiance to Christ, carries eternal significance. The phrase 'because you belong to Christ' (hoti Christou este) uses the genitive of possession.
42. The verb skandalisē ('cause to stumble, cause to fall into sin') gives us the English 'scandalize.' The 'little ones' (mikrōn) extends beyond children to include all vulnerable believers. The mylos onikos ('donkey-millstone') is the large upper millstone turned by a donkey, as opposed to the small hand-mill — a weight ensuring drowning. The image is deliberately extreme to convey the severity of leading others astray.
43. The hyperbolic language demands radical action against sin, not literal self-mutilation. 'Gehenna' (geenna) refers to the Valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem, where child sacrifices were once offered (2 Kings 23:10) and which became a symbol of divine judgment. 'Unquenchable fire' (to pyr to asbeston) draws on Isaiah 66:24.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Kings 23:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 66:24 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. Verse 44 is absent from the earliest and best manuscripts of Mark and is not included in the SBLGNT critical text. It duplicates verse 48 and was likely added by scribes for symmetry. We follow the SBLGNT in omitting it while retaining the verse number for reference.
45. The pattern continues: hand, foot, eye — each body part represents a different avenue of sin (actions, paths taken, desires). The contrast between entering 'life' (zōē, eternal life with God) and being thrown into 'Gehenna' (judgment) frames existence as a binary choice.
46. Verse 46, like verse 44, is absent from the SBLGNT critical text and was likely added by scribes to create a refrain after each body-part saying. We follow the critical text in omitting it.
47. The final member of the triad uses 'kingdom of God' (basileia tou theou) where the previous two used 'life' (zōē), confirming that the two expressions are synonymous in this context. The eye represents desire and covetousness (cf. 7:22, 'evil eye').
48. Jesus quotes Isaiah 66:24, the final verse of Isaiah, which describes the fate of those who rebelled against God. The 'worm' (skōlēx) and 'fire' represent ongoing destruction. Whether this imagery describes eternal conscious torment or complete destruction has been debated throughout Christian history; the Greek text states the permanence of the agents of destruction.
48. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 66:24 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
49. This is one of the most cryptic sayings in the Gospels. The connection between salt and fire may relate to the purifying function of both (Leviticus 2:13 required salt on every grain offering; fire tests and refines, cf. Malachi 3:2-3). The saying may mean that all disciples will undergo the refining fire of persecution and testing.
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 2:13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Malachi 3:2-3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
50. The chapter ends with a proverbial cluster around salt. Salt that becomes analon ('unsalty, tasteless') is worthless — a metaphor for discipleship that loses its distinctive character. The final command — 'be at peace with one another' (eirēneuete en allēlois) — returns to the dispute about greatness that opened this section (v. 34). The salt sayings bind together purification (v. 49), distinctiveness, and communal harmony.

Summary: Mark 10 records Jesus's journey from Galilee toward Jerusalem through the region beyond the Jordan. The chapter addresses marriage and divorce, the blessing of children, the encounter with a rich man who cannot part with his possessions, the third and most detailed passion prediction, the request of James and John for positions of honor, and the healing of blind Bartimaeus at Jericho. Each episode deepens the contrast between worldly values and kingdom values as Jesus moves steadily toward the cross.

What Makes This Remarkable: The rich man's encounter (vv. 17-27) contains Jesus's most direct teaching on wealth and the kingdom of God. The image of a camel passing through the eye of a needle is deliberately absurd — it is not softened by any appeal to narrow gates or rope-for-camel theories. The third passion prediction (vv. 33-34) is the most specific, naming the Gentiles and detailing mocking, spitting, flogging, and killing. Bartimaeus's healing (vv. 46-52) closes the journey section by restoring the sight that the disciples still lack — and Bartimaeus, unlike the healed blind man of 8:22-26, follows Jesus 'on the way' to Jerusalem.

Translation Friction: Jesus's teaching on divorce (vv. 2-12) has been interpreted variously across Christian traditions. We render the Greek as given: Jesus distinguishes between Moses's concession (Deuteronomy 24:1-4) and God's original intent (Genesis 1:27, 2:24). The 'exception clause' found in Matthew 19:9 is absent from Mark. The phrase 'for your hardness of heart' (pros tēn sklērokardian hymōn) is translated directly.

Connections: The divorce teaching connects to Genesis 1-2 (creation of male and female) and Deuteronomy 24 (certificate of divorce). The rich man episode echoes the Decalogue (Exodus 20:12-17). The third passion prediction fulfills Isaiah 50:6 (spitting and striking) and Isaiah 53 (the Suffering Servant). The 'ransom for many' saying (v. 45) is one of the clearest atonement statements in Mark, echoing Isaiah 53:10-12. Bartimaeus's cry 'Son of David' is the first public messianic acclamation in Mark.

¹He got up and went from there to the region of Judea and beyond the Jordan, and crowds gathered around him again, and as was his custom, he taught them again. ²Pharisees came up and, to test him, asked, "Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife?" ³He answered them, "What did Moses command you?" ⁴They said, "Moses permitted a man to write a certificate of divorce and send her away." ⁵Jesus said to them, "Because of your hardness of heart he wrote you this commandment. ⁶But from the start of creation God created them as male and female. ⁷For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, ⁸Indeed, they twain will be one flesh — so then they are no more twain, but one flesh. ⁹Therefore what God has joined together, let no one separate." ¹⁰In the house, the disciples asked him again about this. ¹¹He said to them, "Whoever divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery against her. ¹²And if she divorces her husband and marries another, she commits adultery." ¹³People were bringing children to him so that he might touch them, but the disciples rebuked them. ¹⁴When Jesus saw this, he was indignant and said to them, "Let the children come to me — do not hinder them, for the kingdom of God belongs to such as these. ¹⁵Truly I say to you, whoever does not receive the kingdom of God like a child will never enter it." ¹⁶And he took them in his arms and blessed them, laying his hands on them. ¹⁷As he was setting out on his journey, a man ran up and knelt before him and asked him, "Good Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" ¹⁸Jesus said to him, "Why do you call me good? No one is good except God alone. ¹⁹You know the commandments: 'Do not murder, Do not commit adultery, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Do not defraud, Honor your father and mother.'" ²⁰He said to him, "Teacher, all these I have kept from my youth." ²¹Jesus, looking at him, loved him and said to him, "You lack one thing: go, sell everything you have and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me." ²²Disheartened by the word, he went away grieving, for he had many possessions. ²³Jesus looked around and said to his disciples, "How difficult it will be for those who have wealth to enter the kingdom of God!" ²⁴The disciples were amazed at his words. But Jesus said to them again, "Children, how difficult it is to enter the kingdom of God! ²⁵Than for a rich man to enter into god's kingdom, and it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. ²⁶They were exceedingly astonished and said to one another, "Then who can be saved?" ²⁷Jesus looked at them and said, "With man it is impossible, but not with God. For all things are possible with God." ²⁸Peter began to say to him, "Look, we have left everything and followed you." ²⁹Jesus said, "Truly I say to you, there is no one who has left house or brothers or sisters or mother or father or children or fields, for my sake and for the gospel's, ³⁰Yet he will accept an hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brothers and sisters, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions. And in the world to come eternal life. ³¹But many who are first will be last, and the last first." ³²They were on the road going up to Jerusalem, and Jesus was walking ahead of them. They were amazed, and those who followed were afraid. Taking the twelve aside again, he began to tell them what was about to happen to him: ³³"Look, we are going up to Jerusalem, and the Son of Man will be delivered over to the chief priests and the scribes, and they will condemn him to death and deliver him over to the Gentiles. ³⁴They will mock him, spit on him, flog him, and kill him. And after three days he will rise." ³⁵James and John, the sons of Zebedee, came up to him and said to him, "Teacher, we want you to do for us whatever we ask of you." ³⁶He said to them, "What do you want me to do for you?" ³⁷They said to him, "Grant us to sit, one at your right hand and one at your left, in your glory." ³⁸Jesus said to them, "You do not know what you are asking. Are you able to drink the cup that I drink, or to be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?" ³⁹They said to him, "We are able." Jesus said to them, "The cup that I drink you will drink, and with the baptism with which I am baptized, you will be baptized. ⁴⁰But to sit at my right hand or at my left is not mine to grant, but it is for those for whom it has been prepared." ⁴¹When the ten heard this, they began to be indignant with James and John. ⁴²Jesus called them to him and said to them, "You know that those who are considered rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them. ⁴³But it is not so among you. Instead, whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant, ⁴⁴Indeed, whosoever of you will be the chiefest, will be servant of all. ⁴⁵For even the Son of Man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many." ⁴⁶They came to Jericho. As he was leaving Jericho with his disciples and a large crowd, Bartimaeus, a blind beggar, the son of Timaeus, was sitting by the roadside. ⁴⁷When he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, "Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!" ⁴⁸Many rebuked him, telling him to be silent. But he cried out all the more, "Son of David, have mercy on me!" ⁴⁹Jesus stopped and said, "Call him." They called the blind man, saying to him, "Take heart! Get up, he is calling you." ⁵⁰Throwing off his cloak, he sprang up and came to Jesus. ⁵¹Jesus said to him, "What do you want me to do for you?" The blind man said to him, "Rabboni, let me recover my sight." ⁵²Jesus said to him, "Go, your faith has made you well." Immediately he recovered his sight and followed him on the way.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The geographical notice marks the shift from Galilee to Judea — Jesus is now on the road to Jerusalem. The route 'beyond the Jordan' (peran tou Iordanou) describes the Transjordan route through Perea, avoiding Samaria. The phrase 'as was his custom' (hōs eiōthei) reminds the reader that teaching was Jesus's primary activity.
2. The participle peirazontes ('testing') signals hostile intent, not genuine inquiry. The question about the legality (exestin, 'is it permitted') of divorce was debated among the rabbis — the school of Shammai allowed it only for sexual immorality, the school of Hillel for almost any cause. The question was designed to trap Jesus in a controversial position.
3. Jesus redirects the question to Scripture itself. His use of 'command' (eneteilato) rather than 'permit' is significant — he will soon distinguish between what Moses commanded and what Moses merely permitted.
4. The Pharisees answer with Deuteronomy 24:1-4, which assumes the practice of divorce and regulates it. They use the word epetrepsen ('permitted, allowed'), acknowledging this was a concession rather than a positive command. The 'certificate of divorce' (biblion apostasiou) was a legal document protecting the woman's right to remarry.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 24:1-4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The compound noun sklērokardian ('hardness of heart') combines sklēros ('hard, stiff') and kardia ('heart'). The Mosaic divorce provision is characterized as an accommodation to human fallenness, not an expression of God's ideal. Jesus frames the Deuteronomy passage as a concession, not a norm.
6. Jesus goes behind Moses to Genesis 1:27, treating the creation narrative as the foundational expression of God's will for humanity. The appeal to 'the beginning of creation' (archēs ktiseōs) establishes creation order as the standard against which the Mosaic concession is measured.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 1:27. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. Jesus continues quoting, now from Genesis 2:24. The verb kataleipsei ('will leave, will forsake') indicates a fundamental reorientation of primary loyalty — from birth family to marriage covenant. Some SBLGNT manuscripts include 'and be joined to his wife' (kai proskollēthēsetai pros tēn gynaika autou) while others do not.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 2:24. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The quotation from Genesis 2:24 concludes, and Jesus draws the inference: if marriage creates a unity ('one flesh,' mia sarx), then divorce is not merely a legal action but a tearing apart of what has been joined. The phrase 'one flesh' encompasses the totality of the shared life — physical, emotional, economic, and spiritual.

8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 2:24 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The verb synezeyxen ('joined together, yoked together') comes from the world of harnessing animals — two made into a working pair. The prohibition 'let no one separate' (anthrōpos mē chōrizetō) uses the present imperative, forbidding an ongoing practice. The shift from 'Moses permitted' to 'God joined' reframes the entire discussion from legal permission to divine intention.
10. Mark's pattern of public teaching followed by private explanation continues (cf. 4:10, 7:17). The disciples need further clarification about the divorce teaching.
11. The phrase 'against her' (ep' autēn) is significant — in Jewish law, a man could commit adultery against another man (by violating his marriage) but not against his own wife. Jesus's statement grants the wife equal standing as the wronged party, a radical elevation of women's status in marriage.
12. This verse addresses a woman initiating divorce — possible under Roman and some Hellenistic Jewish law but not standard in Palestinian Judaism. Mark's inclusion reflects his Roman audience. The symmetry of the teaching (both husband and wife are held to the same standard) is remarkable for the ancient world.
13. The verb epetimēsan ('rebuked') is the strong word used for commanding demons — the disciples treat the children's approach as an intrusion. In a society where children had no social standing, the disciples' action reflects conventional values. Jesus will overturn those values.
14. The verb ēganaktēsen ('was indignant, was angry') is one of the few places Mark records Jesus's anger directed at his own disciples. The statement that the kingdom 'belongs to such as these' (tōn toioutōn estin hē basileia tou theou) does not idealize childhood innocence but identifies the child's position — dependent, without status, unable to earn — as the posture required for receiving the kingdom.
15. The double negative ou mē ('by no means, never') is the strongest negation in Greek. Receiving the kingdom 'like a child' (hōs paidion) means receiving it as a gift, without pretension, without credentials, in total dependence — the opposite of earning or deserving it.
16. The verb kateulogeī ('blessed fervently, blessed abundantly') is an intensified form — Mark emphasizes the warmth of Jesus's response. The physical gesture of taking children in his arms (enagkalisamenos) repeats the action of 9:36. Jesus does not merely permit the children's approach; he embraces and blesses them.
17. The man's urgency (running, kneeling) and respectful address ('Good Teacher') suggest genuine sincerity. The question frames eternal life as something to be 'inherited' (klēronomēsō) — received as a family right — yet also asks 'what must I do,' revealing a works-based framework. Mark does not call him 'young' (that is Matthew's addition) or 'ruler' (that is Luke's).
18. Jesus's response is not a denial of his own goodness but a challenge to the man's casual use of the word. If 'good' belongs properly to God alone, then calling Jesus 'good' either means nothing or means everything. The statement forces the man to reckon with who Jesus is.
19. Jesus cites the second table of the Decalogue (commandments governing human relationships). Notably absent is 'You shall not covet' — replaced by 'Do not defraud' (mē apostērēsēs), which may be a practical application of the covetousness prohibition, particularly relevant to a wealthy person. The first table (love of God) is not mentioned but will be implied by the demand in verse 21.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 20:12-16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The verb ephyllaxamēn ('I have guarded, kept, observed') indicates careful compliance. The claim is not dismissed by Jesus — he takes it at face value. 'From my youth' (ek neotētos mou) means from the age of accountability (approximately twelve or thirteen in Jewish practice).
21. The detail 'loved him' (ēgapēsen auton) is unique to Mark and is striking — Jesus's demand is motivated by love, not hostility. The verb emblepsas ('looking intently at') suggests a penetrating gaze. The 'one thing' (hen) is not merely divestiture but the total reorientation it represents: allegiance to Jesus over wealth. The SBLGNT does not include 'take up the cross' (aras ton stauron), found in some manuscripts.
22. The verb stygnasas ('became gloomy, was shocked, was appalled') describes a visible darkening of the face — the opposite of the eager approach in verse 17. The man's grief (lypoumenos) is genuine; he is not indifferent but cannot bring himself to act. He is the only person in the Gospels who comes to Jesus with a sincere question and leaves without following.
23. The adverb dyskolōs ('with difficulty, hardly') sets up the astonishment that follows. Jesus does not say it is impossible, but 'how difficult' (pōs dyskolōs) — the difficulty is stressed, not absolute impossibility.
24. The disciples' amazement (ethambounto) reveals their assumption that wealth was a sign of divine blessing. The address 'Children' (Tekna) is tender — Jesus softens his teaching with familial affection. The SBLGNT reads simply 'how difficult it is to enter the kingdom of God' without the qualification 'for those who trust in riches' found in some manuscripts.
25. The image is deliberately impossible — a camel (kamēlon) through the eye of a sewing needle (trymalia raphidos). Attempts to soften this (a 'rope' instead of a camel, or a small gate called 'the Needle's Eye') have no textual or archaeological support. Jesus uses comic hyperbole to make a serious point: wealth creates an attachment that is humanly impossible to overcome.
26. The disciples' question reveals their logic: if even the wealthy (assumed to be divinely blessed) cannot enter the kingdom, then salvation is impossible for anyone. This is exactly the conclusion Jesus wants them to reach — so that verse 27 can redirect them to God's power.

27. The statement echoes Genesis 18:14 ('Is anything too hard for the LORD?') and Job 42:2 ('I know that you can do all things'). Salvation is not a human achievement but a divine gift. The word adynaton ('impossible') is unqualified — Jesus does not say 'difficult' but 'impossible' for humans, possible only for God.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 18:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Job 42:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. Peter's statement is both a contrast to the rich man (who would not leave his possessions) and an implicit question: 'What will we get?' The verb aphēkamen ('we have left, abandoned') is the same word used for the rich man's failure — the disciples did what he could not.
29. The list of what may be left covers the entire social world: home, family, and livelihood. The phrase 'for my sake and for the gospel's' (heneken emou kai heneken tou euangeliou) links personal loyalty to Jesus with commitment to the mission of proclamation.
30. The promise of a hundredfold return is remarkable, but the parenthetical 'with persecutions' (meta diōgmōn) prevents any prosperity-gospel reading. The new community of faith provides the extended family, but that community exists under the cross. Note that 'fathers' are absent from the return list — there is only one Father in the new community. The two-age framework ('this present age' and 'the age to come') reflects Jewish eschatology.
31. This reversal saying (cf. 9:35) provides the hermeneutical key: the kingdom of God inverts every human hierarchy. The rich man who seemed 'first' ends up unable to enter; the disciples who left everything are promised abundance.
32. The scene is vivid: Jesus strides ahead toward Jerusalem with grim determination while the disciples follow in a mixture of amazement and fear. The verb proagōn ('going before, leading the way') shows Jesus actively leading toward his death, not being swept along by events. 'Going up' (anabainontes) is both geographical (Jerusalem sits at elevation) and theological (ascending to the place of sacrifice).
33. The third passion prediction (cf. 8:31, 9:31) is the most detailed, adding the condemnation by the Sanhedrin and the delivery to the Gentiles (the Romans). The verb paradothēsetai ('will be delivered over, betrayed') is used twice — first of the Jewish leaders handing Jesus to the Romans, then of the betrayal itself. The passive may imply divine agency: God is delivering the Son of Man into human hands.
34. The specificity is remarkable: mocking, spitting, flogging — each fulfilled in the passion narrative (14:65, 15:15-20). The verb mastigōsousin ('they will flog') refers to the Roman flagellum, a whip with embedded bone or metal. The prediction ends, as always, with resurrection — the suffering is not the last word.
35. The brazenness of the request — a blank check ('whatever we ask') — is remarkable coming immediately after the most detailed passion prediction. In Matthew's account (20:20), their mother makes the request; Mark attributes it directly to James and John.
36. Jesus asks the same question he will ask blind Bartimaeus in verse 51. The contrast is telling: James and John ask for thrones; Bartimaeus asks for sight.
37. The right and left positions are seats of highest honor, sharing the ruler's authority. The phrase 'in your glory' (en tē doxē sou) shows they believe in Jesus's coming triumph — they simply want the best seats. The irony is that the positions at Jesus's right and left in his 'glory' will be occupied by two crucified criminals (15:27).
38. The 'cup' (potērion) is a biblical metaphor for one's allotted portion, often God's wrath (Psalm 75:8, Isaiah 51:17, Jeremiah 25:15). The 'baptism' (baptisma) metaphor extends the image — being submerged in suffering. Jesus uses the present tense ('I drink,' 'I am baptized'), indicating that his suffering is already underway.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 75:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 51:17 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 25:15 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
39. Their confident 'We are able' (Dynametha) is brave but uninformed. Jesus affirms they will indeed share his suffering — James was the first apostle martyred (Acts 12:2), and John, according to tradition, endured exile. Sharing Jesus's suffering, however, does not guarantee sharing his throne.
40. Jesus distinguishes between what he can promise (shared suffering) and what belongs to the Father's sovereignty (positions of honor). The passive hētoimastai ('it has been prepared') is a divine passive — God is the unnamed agent who determines positions in the kingdom.
41. The indignation (aganaktein) of the other ten is not righteous — it stems from the same desire for status. They are angry not because the request was inappropriate but because James and John tried to get there first.
42. The verbs katakuriēuousin ('lord it over, dominate') and katexousiazousin ('exercise authority over, tyrannize') both have the prefix kata- ('down upon'), emphasizing the downward pressure of coercive power. The phrase 'those considered rulers' (hoi dokountes archein) is subtly ironic — they merely 'seem' to rule; true authority lies elsewhere.

43. The contrast is absolute: 'not so among you' (ouch houtōs en hymin). The kingdom community operates on an entirely different power structure. The word diakonos ('servant, attendant') describes one who serves others' needs.
44. Jesus escalates from diakonos ('servant') in verse 43 to doulos ('slave') here. A doulos had no rights, no status, no self-determination. This is the most radical statement of servant leadership in the Gospels — the one who would be 'first' (prōtos) must become a slave (doulos) to 'all' (pantōn).
45. This is Mark's clearest atonement statement. The word lytron ('ransom') is the price paid to liberate a slave or prisoner of war. The preposition anti ('in place of, instead of, in exchange for') indicates substitution. 'For many' (anti pollōn) echoes Isaiah 53:11-12, where the Servant bears the sins of 'the many.' Jesus grounds the call to service in his own example — the Son of Man's ultimate service is sacrificial death.
45. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 53:11-12 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
46. Bartimaeus is one of the few people healed by Jesus whose name Mark preserves (cf. Jairus, 5:22), suggesting he was known to Mark's community. The name Bar-Timaïos is Aramaic for 'son of Timaeus.' His position — blind, begging, by the roadside — represents the lowest social status. Jericho was the last major stop before the ascent to Jerusalem.
47. Bartimaeus's cry 'Son of David' (Huie Daid) is the first public messianic acclamation in Mark. The blind man sees what the sighted crowd does not — that Jesus is the Davidic Messiah. The plea 'have mercy on me' (eleēson me) echoes the psalms of lament (Psalm 6:2, 9:13, 51:1).
47. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 6:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
48. The crowd tries to silence Bartimaeus, but like the Syrophenician woman (7:26-28), he refuses to be deterred. His persistence intensifies — 'all the more' (pollō mallon). Faith in Mark is characterized by persistence in the face of opposition.
49. Jesus stops the entire procession for a blind beggar — a dramatic reversal of social convention. The crowd that tried to silence Bartimaeus now encourages him. The three imperatives — 'Take heart' (tharsei), 'Get up' (egeire), 'he is calling you' (phōnei se) — convey excitement.
50. The cloak (himation) was a beggar's most valuable possession — his bedding, his shelter, his collection surface for coins. Bartimaeus throws it aside without hesitation, in stark contrast to the rich man who could not part with his possessions (v. 22). The verb anapēdēsas ('sprang up, jumped up') conveys explosive energy.
51. The question is identical to verse 36, asked of James and John. The contrast in answers is devastating: James and John wanted thrones; Bartimaeus wants sight. Rabbouni (an intensified form of 'Rabbi') appears only here and in John 20:16 (Mary Magdalene at the tomb).
52. The phrase 'your faith has saved you' (hē pistis sou sesōken se) uses the perfect tense of sōzō, which means both 'save' and 'heal.' Unlike the blind man at Bethsaida (8:22-26) who was sent home, Bartimaeus follows Jesus 'on the way' (en tē hodō) — the way to Jerusalem, the way of the cross. His story closes the journey section that began in 8:22 with another blind man, forming an inclusio of restored sight.

Summary: Mark 11 narrates Jesus's entry into Jerusalem, the cursing of the fig tree, the cleansing of the temple, and a series of confrontations with the religious authorities. Jesus enters the city riding a colt in deliberate fulfillment of Zechariah 9:9, the crowds hailing him with messianic acclamations. The fig tree episode frames the temple action — the fruitless tree symbolizes the fruitless temple. Jesus drives out the merchants, accusing them of turning God's house of prayer into a den of robbers. The chapter concludes with a teaching on faith and prayer, and a challenge to Jesus's authority that he parries with a counter-question about John the Baptist.

What Makes This Remarkable: The fig tree and temple cleansing form a Markan 'sandwich' (intercalation): fig tree cursed (vv. 12-14), temple cleansed (vv. 15-19), fig tree withered (vv. 20-21). This literary structure signals that the fig tree interprets the temple — both are judged for failing to bear fruit. The quotation combining Isaiah 56:7 ('house of prayer for all nations') and Jeremiah 7:11 ('den of robbers') encapsulates Jesus's critique: the temple has failed its intended purpose of drawing all peoples to God.

Translation Friction: The cursing of the fig tree (v. 13) — especially Mark's note that 'it was not the season for figs' — has puzzled commentators. If it was not fig season, why expect fruit? The action is best understood as a prophetic sign-act (like Jeremiah's broken jar or Ezekiel's siege) rather than a display of frustration. The tree represents Israel's religious establishment. The 'den of robbers' language does not mean the merchants were overcharging; it means the temple itself had become a hideout for those who exploit others while maintaining a religious facade.

Connections: The entry fulfills Zechariah 9:9 (the king coming on a donkey) and echoes 2 Kings 9:13 (garments spread for a new king). The temple action connects to Malachi 3:1-3 (the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple). The fig tree echoes Hosea 9:10, Jeremiah 8:13, and Micah 7:1, where figs symbolize Israel's faithfulness. The authority question (vv. 27-33) continues the pattern of Jesus turning hostile questions back on his questioners.

¹When they drew near to Jerusalem, to Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples ²Says to them, Go your way into the village over opposed to you — and as soon as you be entered into it, you will find a colt tied, whereon never man sat. Loose him, and bring him. ³If anyone says to you, 'Why are you doing this?' say, 'The Lord has need of it and will send it back here immediately.'" ⁴They went away and found a colt tied at a door outside in the street, and they untied it. ⁵Some of the bystanders said to them, "What are you doing, untying the colt?" ⁶They told them what Jesus had said, and they let them go. ⁷They brought the colt to Jesus and threw their cloaks on it, and he sat on it. ⁸Many spread their cloaks on the road, and others spread leafy branches that they had cut from the fields. ⁹Those who went before and those who followed were crying out, "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! ¹⁰Blessed is the coming kingdom of our father David! Hosanna in the highest!" ¹¹He entered Jerusalem and went into the temple. After looking around at everything, since it was already late, he went out to Bethany with the twelve. ¹²On the following day, when they came from Bethany, he was hungry. ¹³Seeing in the distance a fig tree in leaf, he went to see if he could find anything on it. When he came to it, he found nothing but leaves, for it was not the season for figs. ¹⁴He said to it, "May no one ever eat fruit from you again." And his disciples heard it. ¹⁵They came to Jerusalem. And he entered the temple and began to drive out those who were selling and those who were buying in the temple, and he overturned the tables of the money changers and the seats of those who sold pigeons. ¹⁶And he would not allow anyone to carry merchandise through the temple. ¹⁷He was teaching and saying to them, "Is it not written, 'My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations'? But you have made it a den of robbers." ¹⁸The chief priests and the scribes heard this and were looking for a way to destroy him, for they feared him, because the whole crowd was astonished at his teaching. ¹⁹And when evening came, they went out of the city. ²⁰As they passed by in the morning, they saw the fig tree withered away to its roots. ²¹Peter remembered and said to him, "Rabbi, look! The fig tree that you cursed has withered." ²²Jesus answered them, "Have faith in God. ²³Truly I say to you, whoever says to this mountain, 'Be taken up and thrown into the sea,' and does not doubt in his heart but believes that what he says will happen, it will be done for him. ²⁴Therefore I tell you, whatever you ask in prayer, believe that you have received it, and it will be yours. ²⁵And whenever you stand praying, forgive, if you have anything against anyone, so that your Father who is in heaven may also forgive you your trespasses." ²⁷They came again to Jerusalem. As he was walking in the temple, the chief priests, the scribes, and the elders came to him ²⁸Say to him, By what authority doest you these things? and who offered you this authority to do these things? ²⁹Jesus said to them, "I will ask you one question; answer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. ³⁰Was the baptism of John from heaven or from man? Answer me." ³¹They discussed it among themselves, saying, "If we say, 'From heaven,' he will say, 'Why then did you not believe him?' ³²But shall we say, 'From man'?" — they were afraid of the crowd, for they all held that John really was a prophet. ³³So they answered Jesus, "We do not know." And Jesus said to them, "Neither will I tell you by what authority I do these things."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Bethphage ('house of unripe figs') and Bethany ('house of affliction' or 'house of dates') were villages on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, about two miles from Jerusalem. The Mount of Olives carried eschatological significance — Zechariah 14:4 places God's final intervention there.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Zechariah 14:4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The colt (pōlon) that has never been ridden fulfills the requirement that animals used for sacred purposes be previously unused (cf. Numbers 19:2, Deuteronomy 21:3, 1 Samuel 6:7). Jesus's foreknowledge of the colt's location and circumstances suggests either prophetic insight or prior arrangement.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Numbers 19:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 21:3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Samuel 6:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The title 'the Lord' (ho kyrios) is ambiguous — it could mean 'the owner' or 'the Master.' If the latter, it would be one of the rare instances in Mark where Jesus applies the title kyrios to himself.
4. The Greek amphodou ('street, lane, the open road') indicates a public thoroughfare. The detail confirms Jesus's prediction exactly.
5. The challenge comes exactly as Jesus predicted, allowing the disciples to give the pre-arranged response.
6. The smooth exchange suggests either that the owners recognized Jesus's authority or that the arrangement had been made beforehand.
7. Spreading garments on the animal serves as an improvised saddle but also echoes the acclamation of Jehu as king in 2 Kings 9:13, where the people spread their garments under him.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Kings 9:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. The Greek stibadas ('leafy branches, rushes, bedding of leaves') describes foliage cut from fields rather than palm branches specifically (that detail is in John 12:13). The gesture creates a processional carpet, a spontaneous royal welcome.
9. The crowd quotes Psalm 118:25-26, a Hallel psalm sung during Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles. 'Hosanna' (hōsanna) transliterates the Hebrew hoshia-na ('save, please!' or 'save now!'). Originally a prayer for deliverance, it had become an acclamation of praise. 'He who comes' (ho erchomenos) carried messianic overtones — the 'coming one' was an expected deliverer.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalms 118:26. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The reference to 'the kingdom of our father David' is explicitly messianic and political — the crowd expects the restoration of David's kingdom. 'Hosanna in the highest' (en tois hypsistois, 'in the highest [heavens]') directs the acclamation upward, asking heaven itself to join the praise.
11. Mark uniquely records this preliminary survey visit — Jesus inspects the temple before acting. The verb periblespamenos ('having looked around') suggests a deliberate assessment. The temple cleansing the next day is therefore premeditated, not spontaneous. Jesus returns to Bethany for the night, probably staying with Lazarus, Mary, and Martha (cf. John 11:1).
12. The note about hunger serves the narrative by motivating the approach to the fig tree, but the symbolic dimension is primary. The fig tree episode begins the Markan sandwich that frames the temple action.
13. Mark's explanatory note — 'for it was not the season for figs' (ho gar kairos ouk ēn sykōn) — seems to excuse the tree, making Jesus's response puzzling if taken as a literal quest for fruit. The action is best understood as a prophetic sign-act: the tree advertises fruitfulness (it has leaves) but produces nothing, just as the temple advertises God's presence but has become spiritually barren. Fig trees in the Old Testament regularly symbolize Israel (Hosea 9:10, Jeremiah 8:13, Micah 7:1).
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Hosea 9:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 8:13 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Micah 7:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The curse uses the optative mood (phagoi, 'may eat') — the strongest form of wish or prohibition. The note 'his disciples heard it' (ēkouon hoi mathētai autou) prepares for the discovery of the withered tree in verse 20 and the teaching that follows.
15. The action takes place in the Court of the Gentiles — the only area where non-Jews could pray. By filling this space with commerce, the temple authorities had effectively eliminated Gentile access to worship. The money changers (kollybistōn) converted foreign currency into the Tyrian shekels required for the temple tax. The pigeon sellers provided sacrificial animals for the poor (Leviticus 5:7, 12:8).
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 5:7 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The word skeuos ('vessel, object, goods') refers to commercial goods being transported as a shortcut through the temple courts. The Mishnah later prohibited this same practice (Berakhot 9:5), indicating that Jesus's concern was shared by later rabbinic authorities.
17. Jesus combines Isaiah 56:7 ('my house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples') and Jeremiah 7:11 ('Has this house become a den of robbers?'). Mark alone includes 'for all the nations' (pasin tois ethnesin) — significant for his Gentile audience. The word lēstōn ('robbers, bandits, insurrectionists') is stronger than 'thieves' — Jeremiah used it for those who commit violence and then retreat to the temple for sanctuary.
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 56:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Jeremiah 7:11. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. The temple action seals Jesus's fate. The verb apolesōsin ('they might destroy') reveals murderous intent. The irony is layered: they fear Jesus because of his popularity, yet his popularity will not save him. The crowd is 'astonished' (exēplēsseto) but astonishment is not the same as faith.
19. Jesus continues the pattern of withdrawing from Jerusalem each evening, likely returning to Bethany. This may reflect both practical safety and the symbolic rejection of the city.
20. The phrase 'from the roots' (ek rhizōn) indicates total destruction — not merely wilted leaves but death from the foundation upward. The Markan sandwich is now complete: the withered tree interprets the temple cleansing. The temple, like the tree, advertises life but produces no fruit and faces judgment.
21. Peter's exclamation connects the cursing (v. 14) with the result (v. 20). Jesus will use the occasion to teach about faith and prayer, but the symbolic meaning — judgment on the barren temple — remains the primary narrative function.
22. The phrase pistin theou ('faith of God') could be translated 'faith in God' (objective genitive) or 'the kind of faith God has' (subjective genitive). Either way, the call is to radical trust in divine power.
23. 'This mountain' (tō orei toutō) may refer to the Mount of Olives or, more pointedly, to the Temple Mount visible from where they stood. The hyperbolic image of moving a mountain expresses the power of faith aligned with God's purposes. The verb diakrithērē ('doubt, waver, be divided') literally means 'to be separated within oneself.'
24. The aorist tense elabete ('you received') is striking — Jesus says 'believe that you received,' using the past tense for a future reality. Faith treats the answer as already given. This does not describe a psychological technique but the confidence of prayer aligned with God's revealed will.
25. Standing (stēkete) was the normal Jewish posture for prayer. The connection between divine forgiveness and human forgiveness echoes the Lord's Prayer (Matthew 6:12, 14-15). The word paraptōmata ('trespasses, transgressions, false steps') literally means 'falling beside' — stepping off the path.
26. Verse 26 is absent from the earliest and best manuscripts of Mark and is not included in the SBLGNT critical text. It appears to be a later scribal addition, possibly drawn from Matthew 6:15. We follow the SBLGNT in omitting it while retaining the verse number for reference.
27. The three groups — chief priests, scribes, elders — constitute the Sanhedrin, the supreme Jewish council. Their approach is an official delegation, challenging Jesus's right to act as he did in cleansing the temple.
28. The question about authority (exousia) is legitimate from their perspective — they are the recognized authorities over the temple. 'These things' (tauta) refers to the temple cleansing, the teaching, and the implied messianic claims. The double question asks both the nature of the authority and its source.
29. Jesus's counter-question is not evasion but rabbinic method — answering a question with a question that, if answered honestly, would also answer the original. The connection between John's baptism and Jesus's authority will become clear in the next verses.
30. The binary question — 'from heaven' (divine origin) or 'from men' (human invention) — traps the authorities. If they say 'from heaven,' they must explain why they did not believe John, who testified about Jesus. If they say 'from men,' they risk the crowd's anger, since the people regarded John as a genuine prophet.
31. The leaders' internal deliberation reveals that their concern is political calculation, not truth. They are not asking 'What is the right answer?' but 'What answer will get us in the least trouble?'
32. The dash represents the breaking off of their deliberation — they cannot even finish the sentence because the consequences are too dangerous. The word ontōs ('really, actually, in truth') expresses the crowd's genuine conviction about John's prophetic status.
33. Their 'We do not know' (Ouk oidamen) is a lie — they have a strong opinion but are unwilling to state it publicly. Jesus's refusal to answer is not evasion but a response in kind: those who will not honestly answer a simple question have no right to demand answers from him. The contest of authority ends with Jesus in control.

Summary: Mark 12 presents a series of confrontations in the temple courts during Jesus's final week in Jerusalem. Jesus tells the parable of the wicked tenants, exposing the religious leaders' rejection of God's messengers. The Pharisees and Herodians attempt to trap him with a question about taxes to Caesar, the Sadducees test him on the resurrection, and a scribe asks about the greatest commandment. Jesus then poses his own question about the Messiah's identity as David's son and Lord, warns against the scribes' hypocrisy, and commends a poor widow whose two small coins surpass every other offering.

What Makes This Remarkable: The parable of the wicked tenants (vv. 1-12) draws directly on Isaiah 5's vineyard imagery and compresses Israel's prophetic history into a single narrative. The tribute question (v. 17) produces one of Jesus's most famous responses, which neither endorses nor condemns Roman taxation but reframes the entire question around what belongs to God. The exchange on the greatest commandment (vv. 28-34) is the only place in Mark where Jesus tells an interlocutor 'You are not far from the kingdom of God' — a striking affirmation within a chapter of conflict. The widow's offering (vv. 41-44) closes the temple teaching section with a devastating contrast between religious performance and genuine devotion.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'Render to Caesar' (v. 17) has been applied to justify everything from tax compliance to separation of church and state. The Greek apodote ('give back, return') implies returning what already belongs to someone, not simply paying a bill. The question about David's son (vv. 35-37) uses Psalm 110:1, which in Hebrew distinguishes YHWH (the LORD) from adoni ('my lord') — a distinction lost in Greek where kyrios covers both. We render the Greek as given while noting the Hebrew background.

Connections: The vineyard parable connects to Isaiah 5:1-7 and the rejected-stone quotation to Psalm 118:22-23. The Shema quotation (v. 29) anchors the chapter in Deuteronomy 6:4-5, while the love-of-neighbor command comes from Leviticus 19:18. Psalm 110:1 is the most-quoted Old Testament text in the New Testament, and Jesus's use of it here establishes a Christological argument that runs through early Christian preaching (Acts 2:34-35; Hebrews 1:13).

¹And he began to speak to them in parables: "A man planted a vineyard and put a fence around it and dug a pit for the winepress and built a tower. Then he leased it to tenant farmers and went away. ²At harvest time he sent a servant to the tenants to collect from them some of the fruit of the vineyard. ³But they seized him and beat him and sent him away empty-handed. ⁴Again he sent another servant to them, and they struck him on the head and treated him shamefully. ⁵He sent yet another, and that one they killed. And so with many others — some they beat, and some they killed. ⁶He had still one other — a beloved son. He sent him last of all to them, saying, 'They will respect my son.' ⁷But those tenants said to one another, 'This is the heir. Come, let us kill him, and the inheritance will be ours.' ⁸And they seized him and killed him and threw him out of the vineyard. ⁹What will the owner of the vineyard do? He will come and destroy the tenants and give the vineyard to others. ¹⁰Have you not read this Scripture: 'The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone.' ¹¹And is it marvellous in our eyes?, and this was the Lord's doing. ¹²They were seeking to arrest him but feared the crowd, for they knew he had told the parable against them. So they left him and went away. ¹³Then they sent to him some of the Pharisees and some of the Herodians to trap him in his words. ¹⁴They came and said to him, "Teacher, we know that you are truthful and do not defer to anyone, for you show no partiality but truly teach the way of God. Is it lawful to pay taxes to Caesar, or not? Should we pay them, or should we not?" ¹⁵But knowing their hypocrisy, he said to them, "Why are you testing me? Bring me a denarius so I can look at it." ¹⁶They brought one. And he said to them, "Whose image is this, and whose inscription?" They said to him, "Caesar's." ¹⁷Jesus said to them, "Give back to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." And they were utterly amazed at him. ¹⁸Then Sadducees came to him — those who say there is no resurrection — and they asked him a question: ¹⁹"Teacher, Moses wrote for us that if a man's brother dies and leaves a wife but no child, his brother must take the wife and raise up offspring for his brother. ²⁰There were seven brothers. The first took a wife, and when he died he left no offspring. ²¹The second took her and died, leaving no offspring. And the third likewise. ²²All seven left no offspring. Last of all, the woman also died. ²³In the resurrection, when they rise, whose wife will she be? For all seven had her as wife." ²⁴Jesus said to them, "Is this not the reason you are wrong — that you know neither the Scriptures nor the power of God? ²⁵For when they rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like the angels in heaven. ²⁶But concerning the dead being raised, have you not read in the book of Moses, in the passage about the bush, how God spoke to him, saying, 'I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob'? ²⁷He is not God of the dead but of the living. You are greatly mistaken." ²⁸One of the scribes came and heard them debating. Seeing that Jesus had answered them well, he asked him, "Which commandment is the most important of all?" ²⁹Jesus answered, "The most important is: 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one. ³⁰And you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind and with all your strength.' ³¹The second is this: 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' There is no other commandment greater than these." ³²The scribe said to him, "Well said, Teacher. You have truly stated that he is one, and there is no other besides him. ³³And to love him with all the heart and with all the understanding and with all the strength, and to love one's neighbor as oneself, is far more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices." ³⁴When Jesus saw that he answered wisely, he said to him, "You are not far from the kingdom of God." And after that, no one dared to ask him any more questions. ³⁵And as Jesus taught in the temple, he said, "How can the scribes say that the Christ is the son of David? ³⁶David himself said by the Holy Spirit, 'The Lord said to my Lord, "Sit at my right hand, until I put your enemies under your feet."' ³⁷David himself calls him Lord, so how is he his son?" And the large crowd was listening to him with delight. ³⁸And in his teaching he said, "Beware of the scribes, who like to walk around in long robes and to receive greetings in the marketplaces ³⁹The prominent places in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts. ⁴⁰They devour widows' houses and for a pretense make lengthy prayers. They will receive greater condemnation." ⁴¹He sat down opposite the treasury and watched the crowd putting money into the offering box. Many rich people put in large amounts. ⁴²And a poor widow came and put in two small copper coins, which make a penny. ⁴³He called his disciples to him and said to them, "Truly I say to you, this poor widow has put in more than all those contributing to the treasury. ⁴⁴For they all contributed out of their abundance, but she out of her poverty put in everything she had — all she had to live on."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The vineyard description echoes Isaiah 5:1-2 almost verbatim, and Jesus's audience would have recognized the allusion immediately. The Greek georgois ('farmers, tenants') denotes those who work the land under lease — they are caretakers, not owners.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 5:1-2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The Greek kairos ('season, appointed time') carries more theological weight than chronos ('chronological time'). The servant represents the prophets sent to Israel to call for covenant faithfulness.
3. The escalating pattern of violence against the servants mirrors the biblical pattern of prophetic rejection throughout Israel's history (cf. 2 Chronicles 36:15-16; Nehemiah 9:26).

3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Nehemiah 9:26 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The Greek ekēphaliōsan ('struck on the head') is a rare word. Some manuscripts and translations interpret it as stoning, but the verb derives from kephalē ('head') and most likely means they wounded his head.
5. The escalation from beating to killing compresses the history of prophetic martyrdom. The parable's audience — the chief priests, scribes, and elders (11:27) — would have recognized themselves in the tenants' role.
6. The phrase huion agapēton ('beloved son') echoes the voice from heaven at Jesus's baptism (1:11) and transfiguration (9:7), using identical language. Mark's audience would hear the parable as Jesus identifying himself as the beloved son who will be killed.
7. The Greek klēronomos ('heir') and klēronomia ('inheritance') carry covenantal weight — Israel's 'inheritance' is the land God promised. The tenants' reasoning exposes the logic of power: eliminate the rightful heir to seize what belongs to another.

8. In Mark's order, they kill first and cast out afterward — a detail that may foreshadow Jesus's death and burial outside the city walls. Matthew and Luke reverse the order to match the historical detail that Jesus was crucified outside Jerusalem (cf. Hebrews 13:12).
9. In Mark, Jesus answers his own question — unlike Matthew 21:41 where the audience answers. The phrase 'give the vineyard to others' points beyond the parable to the inclusion of Gentiles or to a new community of faith.
10. Jesus quotes Psalm 118:22-23, which was originally a psalm of thanksgiving for unexpected vindication. The 'stone' metaphor shifts from agriculture to construction but makes the same point: what the authorities reject, God exalts. The phrase kephalēn gōnias ('head of the corner') may refer to a cornerstone (foundation) or capstone (crowning stone).
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalms 118:22-23 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The quotation continues from Psalm 118:23. The Greek thaumastē ('marvelous, wonderful') indicates something that provokes astonishment — God's reversal of human judgment is both surprising and awe-inspiring.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 118:22-23. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The leaders' recognition that the parable was directed 'against them' (pros autous) confirms its transparency. Their restraint is political, not moral — they fear the crowd's reaction, not God's judgment. This sets the stage for their clandestine plot in chapter 14.
13. The Pharisees and Herodians were natural enemies — the Pharisees resisted Roman cultural influence while the Herodians supported the Herodian dynasty and its Roman alliance. Their collaboration against Jesus reveals the depth of opposition. The Greek agreuōsin ('trap, catch, hunt') is a hunting term — they are stalking prey.
14. The flattery is calculated to prevent evasion. The Greek kēnson is a loanword from the Latin census, referring specifically to the Roman poll tax — a deeply resented symbol of subjugation. If Jesus says 'pay,' he alienates the populace; if he says 'don't pay,' he commits sedition against Rome. The phrase ou blepeis eis prosōpon anthrōpōn ('you do not look at the face of men') is a Semitic idiom meaning 'you show no partiality.'
15. The Greek hypokrisin ('hypocrisy') comes from the theater — a hypocrite is literally 'one who plays a role.' Jesus sees through the performance. The request for a coin is masterful: by producing a Roman denarius in the temple precincts, the questioners reveal that they already participate in Caesar's economy.
16. The Greek eikōn ('image') is theologically loaded — Genesis 1:26-27 declares that humans bear the image (tselem) of God. By asking whose image is on the coin, Jesus sets up a contrast: the coin bears Caesar's image, but human beings bear God's image. The inscription on a Tiberian denarius typically read 'Tiberius Caesar, son of the divine Augustus' — a claim that would have been offensive to Jewish monotheists.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 1:26-27. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The Greek apodote ('give back, return, render') is stronger than 'give' — it implies returning what already belongs to someone. The second clause reframes everything: if Caesar's coins bear Caesar's image, then human beings — who bear God's image — belong entirely to God. The response neither endorses nor condemns taxation but subordinates all political claims to God's total claim on human life.
18. Mark introduces the Sadducees with a parenthetical note about their denial of the resurrection. The Sadducees accepted only the Torah (the five books of Moses) as authoritative and found no explicit resurrection teaching there. Their question is designed to make resurrection belief look absurd.
19. The Sadducees invoke the levirate marriage law from Deuteronomy 25:5-6. The term 'levirate' comes from the Latin levir ('husband's brother'). The purpose of the law was to preserve the deceased brother's name and inheritance within Israel — a practice also illustrated in the story of Ruth and Boaz.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 25:5-6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The scenario is likely hypothetical, constructed for maximum rhetorical effect. The number seven — the number of completeness — ensures the problem has no easy resolution by simply choosing one husband.
21. The repetitive structure is deliberate — each death without offspring intensifies the absurdity the Sadducees are constructing.
22. The scenario concludes with universal death — the very reality the Sadducees believe is final. Ironically, their story about death becomes the occasion for Jesus to teach about life beyond death.
23. The Sadducees' question assumes that resurrection life would be a simple continuation of earthly existence. Jesus's answer will challenge this assumption entirely, reframing resurrection as transformation rather than restoration.
24. Jesus identifies two sources of error: ignorance of Scripture and ignorance of God's power. The Greek planasthe ('you are led astray, you wander') implies not just intellectual error but spiritual disorientation. The charge is sharp — the Sadducees prided themselves on scriptural expertise.
25. Jesus does not say the resurrected become angels but that they are 'like' (hōs) angels in this specific respect — the institution of marriage, which addresses mortality and procreation, is transcended. This addresses the power of God that the Sadducees have underestimated: resurrection is not mere resuscitation but a transformation of the conditions of existence.

- 26. Jesus strategically argues from the Torah — the only portion of Scripture the Sadducees accepted as authoritative. The citation is Exodus 3:6. The reference 'in the passage about the bush' (epi tou batou) uses a method of citing Scripture by location, since there were no chapter and verse numbers. Jesus's argument is that God's use of the present tense 'I am' implies an ongoing relationship with the patriarchs — which requires their continued existence.
- 26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 3:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 27. The concluding statement is emphatic: poly planasthe ('you are greatly in error'). The argument rests on the covenant relationship — if God identifies himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, then those patriarchs must still exist in some meaningful sense, because God's covenant faithfulness does not terminate at death.
- 28. Unlike the previous questioners, this scribe approaches with genuine interest — he has been impressed by Jesus's answers. The question about ranking commandments was a recognized topic in rabbinic discussion. Tradition counted 613 commandments in the Torah (248 positive, 365 negative), and rabbis debated which was the foundational principle.
- 29. Jesus begins with the Shema (Hebrew: 'Hear!'), from Deuteronomy 6:4, which every observant Jew recited twice daily. Only Mark includes this preamble; Matthew and Luke skip directly to the love command. By quoting the Shema, Jesus grounds the love command in monotheism — love for God is the proper response to the reality that there is only one God.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 6:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. The fourfold formula (heart, soul, mind, strength) expands the Hebrew original in Deuteronomy 6:5, which has three terms (heart, soul, strength). The addition of 'mind' (dianoia) may reflect the Septuagint tradition or an interpretive expansion. The cumulative effect is totality — every dimension of human existence is to be oriented toward loving God.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 6:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 31. The neighbor command comes from Leviticus 19:18. Jesus's pairing of these two commandments — love of God and love of neighbor — was not entirely unique in Jewish tradition (cf. Testament of Issachar 5:2; Testament of Dan 5:3), but his elevation of them as the supreme summary of the law was distinctive. The phrase 'as yourself' (hōs seauton) sets self-love as the measure, not the motive, of neighbor-love.
- 31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Leviticus 19:18. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 32. The scribe's affirmation is remarkable — he validates Jesus's teaching as a peer might, using the adverb kalōs ('well, rightly'). His restatement of the Shema adds the phrase 'there is no other besides him,' echoing Deuteronomy 4:35 and Isaiah 45:21.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 4:35. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 45:21. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The scribe goes beyond Jesus's statement by adding a prophetic insight: love surpasses the entire sacrificial system. This echoes 1 Samuel 15:22 ('to obey is better than sacrifice'), Hosea 6:6 ('I desire steadfast love and not sacrifice'), and Micah 6:6-8. The word holokautōmatōn ('whole burnt offerings') refers to sacrifices entirely consumed by fire — the most complete form of offering — yet even these are surpassed by love.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Samuel 15:22 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Hosea 6:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Micah 6:6-8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The Greek nounechōs ('wisely, thoughtfully, with understanding') is a rare word in the New Testament. Jesus's response — 'not far from the kingdom of God' — is both commendation and invitation. The scribe is close but not yet there; understanding is the threshold, but entry requires something more. The note that no one dared ask further questions marks the end of the public debate sequence that began in 11:27.
- 35. Having silenced his questioners, Jesus now poses his own question. He does not deny that the Messiah is David's son — the genealogies in Matthew and Luke affirm this — but he challenges the assumption that Davidic descent is the whole picture. The question probes whether 'son of David' adequately captures the Messiah's identity.
- 36. Jesus quotes Psalm 110:1, attributing it to David and to the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. In the Hebrew, the first 'LORD' is YHWH and the second 'my lord' is adoni — a distinction lost in Greek where kyrios covers both. The psalm envisions a figure whom David calls 'my lord' being enthroned at God's right hand. Jesus's argument: if David calls the Messiah 'my lord,' the Messiah must be more than David's descendant.

36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 110:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
37. The question is not a denial of Davidic messiahship but an expansion of it — the Messiah is David's son and David's Lord simultaneously. The crowd's delight (hēdeōs, 'with pleasure, gladly') contrasts with the leaders' hostility. The common people enjoy seeing their leaders outmatched.
38. The Greek stolais ('long robes') refers to the flowing garments that marked a person of status and learning. The desire for public greetings (aspmous) in the marketplace reflects a culture of honor — being recognized and addressed with titles in public spaces.
39. The prōtokathedrias ('chief seats') in the synagogue were benches facing the congregation, reserved for the most respected members. The prōtoklisias ('first couches') at banquets were the reclining positions closest to the host. Both represent the social currency of religious prestige.
40. The Greek katesthiontes ('devour, consume') is vivid — these scribes are predators. 'Widows' houses' likely refers to mismanaging estates entrusted to their care or extracting excessive fees for legal or religious services. The phrase proophasēi ('as a pretext, for show') exposes their prayers as performance. The 'greater condemnation' (perissoteron krima) implies degrees of judgment — those who exploit the vulnerable while performing piety bear heavier accountability. This warning about widows transitions directly into the widow's offering that follows.
41. The Greek gazophylakion ('treasury') refers to the temple collection receptacles, traditionally described as thirteen trumpet-shaped containers in the Court of Women. The verb etheōrei ('he was watching, observing') implies sustained, attentive observation — Jesus is not glancing but studying the scene.
42. The Greek lepta duo ('two lepta') represents the smallest denomination of currency in circulation — each lepton was worth half a quadrans (kodrantēs), the smallest Roman coin. Mark provides the Roman equivalent for his Gentile readers. The widow could have kept one coin for herself but gave both — a detail Jesus will emphasize.
43. The solemn introduction 'Truly I say to you' (amēn legō hymin) marks a pronouncement of special authority. The Greek pleion pantōn ('more than all') is absolute — not 'more than most' but more than the combined total of all other givers. Jesus measures generosity not by amount but by cost.
44. The contrast is between perisseuontos ('surplus, abundance') and husterēseōs ('lack, poverty, deficiency'). The final phrase holon ton bion autēs ('her whole livelihood') is devastating — bios here means not just 'life' but 'means of living.' She gave not from surplus but from substance. Coming after the warning about scribes who devour widows' houses (v. 40), this scene may also carry an ironic edge: the temple system that should protect widows instead receives their last resources.

Summary: Mark 13, commonly called the Olivet Discourse, is Jesus's longest continuous teaching in Mark's Gospel. Prompted by a disciple's admiration of the temple, Jesus predicts its destruction and then delivers an extended prophetic address from the Mount of Olives to Peter, James, John, and Andrew. The discourse warns of false messiahs, wars, persecutions, cosmic upheaval, and the coming of the Son of Man. It concludes with the parable of the doorkeeper and repeated calls to watchfulness: 'Stay awake — for you do not know when the master of the house will come.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The discourse blends near-future and eschatological horizons in ways that have generated centuries of interpretive debate. The destruction of the temple (fulfilled in AD 70) and the coming of the Son of Man appear interwoven rather than chronologically separated. The phrase 'this generation will not pass away until all these things take place' (v. 30) alongside 'concerning that day or hour, no one knows' (v. 32) creates a deliberate tension between imminence and unknowability. Jesus's admission that even 'the Son' does not know the timing (v. 32) is one of the most theologically striking statements in the Gospels.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the temple's destruction and the cosmic signs of vv. 24-27 is the central interpretive question. Preterist readers see the entire discourse fulfilled in AD 70; futurist readers see vv. 24-27 as still awaiting fulfillment; many scholars see a prophetic 'telescoping' where near and far events overlap. We render the Greek without imposing a particular eschatological framework. The 'abomination of desolation' (v. 14) alludes to Daniel 9:27, 11:31, and 12:11, originally referring to Antiochus IV's desecration of the temple in 167 BC — Jesus reapplies it to a future event.

Connections: The discourse draws heavily on Daniel 7:13-14 (Son of Man coming on clouds), Daniel 9:27 and 12:11 (abomination of desolation), Isaiah 13:10 and 34:4 (cosmic signs), and Zechariah 2:6 (gathering from the four winds). The call to watchfulness connects to the Gethsemane scene in 14:32-42, where the same disciples fail to stay awake. The fig tree parable (vv. 28-29) echoes the cursed fig tree of 11:12-14, 20-21.

¹As he was going out of the temple, one of his disciples said to him, "Teacher, look! What massive stones and what magnificent buildings!" ²Jesus said to him, "Do you see these great buildings? Not one stone will be left upon another that will not be thrown down." ³As he sat on the Mount of Olives opposite the temple, Peter, James, John, and Andrew asked him privately, ⁴"Tell us, when will these things be, and what will be the sign when all these things are about to be accomplished?" ⁵Jesus began to say to them, "Watch out that no one leads you astray. ⁶Many will come in my name, saying, 'I am he,' and they will lead many astray. ⁷When you hear of wars and rumors of wars, do not be alarmed. This must take place, but the end is not yet. ⁸For nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. There will be earthquakes in various places; there will be famines. These are the beginning of birth pains. ⁹But watch out for yourselves. They will hand you over to councils, and you will be beaten in synagogues, and you will stand before governors and kings because of me, as a testimony to them. ¹⁰And the gospel must first be proclaimed to all nations. ¹¹And when they bring you to trial and hand you over, do not worry beforehand about what to say. But say whatever is given to you in that hour, for it is not you who speak, but the Holy Spirit. ¹²Brother will betray brother to death, and a father his child. Children will rise against parents and have them put to death. ¹³You will be hated by everyone because of my name. But the one who endures to the end will be saved. ¹⁴"But when you see the abomination of desolation standing where it should not be" — let the reader understand — "then let those in Judea flee to the mountains. ¹⁵Let the one on the housetop not go down or enter to take anything out of his house. ¹⁶And let the one in the field not turn back to get his cloak. ¹⁷How terrible it will be in those days for women who are pregnant and for those who are nursing! ¹⁸Pray that it may not happen in winter. ¹⁹For in those days there will be tribulation such as has not been from the beginning of the creation that God created until now, and never will be. ²⁰And if the Lord had not cut short the days, no human being would be saved. But for the sake of the elect, whom he chose, he cut short the days. ²¹And then if anyone says to you, 'Look, here is the Christ!' or 'Look, there he is!' do not believe it. ²²For false christs and false prophets will arise and perform signs and wonders, to lead astray, if possible, the elect. ²³But be on your guard. I have told you all things beforehand." ²⁴And the moon will not give her light, but at that time, after that tribulation, the sun will be darkened. ²⁵The stars of heaven will fall, and the powers that are in heaven will be shaken. ²⁶And then they will see the Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory. ²⁷And then he will send out the angels and gather his elect from the four winds, from the ends of the earth to the ends of heaven. ²⁸"From the fig tree learn its lesson: as soon as its branch becomes tender and puts out its leaves, you know that summer is near. ²⁹So also, when you see these things taking place, you know that he is near, at the very gates. ³⁰Truly I say to you, this generation will not pass away until all these things take place. ³¹Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away. ³²"But concerning that day or that hour, no one knows — not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son — but only the Father. ³³Be on guard, stay awake — for you do not know when the time will come. ³⁴It is like a man going on a journey, who left his house and put his servants in charge, each with his work, and commanded the doorkeeper to stay awake. ³⁵Therefore stay awake, for you do not know when the master of the house will come — in the evening, or at midnight, or when the rooster crows, or in the morning — ³⁶Indeed, lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. ³⁷What I say to you, I say to all: Stay awake."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek potapoi ('what sort of, what impressive') expresses wonder. Josephus describes the temple stones as approximately 37 feet long, 12 feet high, and 18 feet wide (Antiquities 15.392). Herod's temple complex was one of the architectural wonders of the ancient world, and the disciple's awe was entirely appropriate — which makes Jesus's response all the more shocking.
2. The double negative ou mē ('absolutely not') is the strongest form of denial in Greek. The prediction was fulfilled in AD 70 when Roman forces under Titus destroyed the temple. The phrase 'stone upon stone' became proverbial for total destruction. For Jesus's Jewish audience, this prediction was not merely architectural but theological — the temple was God's dwelling place on earth.
3. The Mount of Olives overlooks the temple mount from the east, providing a panoramic view of the complex Jesus has just predicted will be destroyed. The private audience — Peter, James, John, plus Andrew (who is not usually in this inner circle) — gives the discourse an intimate, revelatory character. In Jewish tradition, the Mount of Olives was associated with eschatological events (cf. Zechariah 14:4).
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Zechariah 14:4 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

4. The disciples ask two questions: when (pote) and what sign (ti to sēmeion). In Mark, both questions concern the temple's destruction — unlike Matthew 24:3, which adds 'and of your coming and of the end of the age.' The Greek synteleisthai ('to be completed, accomplished, brought to an end') carries eschatological weight.
5. Jesus's first response is not an answer but a warning. The verb planēsē ('leads astray, deceives') is the same root used in 12:24, 27. The discourse begins not with timetables but with the imperative to avoid deception — the primary danger is not suffering but being led away from truth.
6. The phrase egō eimi ('I am') could mean 'I am the Christ' (supplying the predicate) or could echo the divine self-identification of Exodus 3:14 and Isaiah 43:25. Mark does not add 'Christ' — the claim is left ambiguous and therefore more ominous. History records several messianic claimants in the decades before AD 70 (cf. Acts 5:36-37; Josephus, Antiquities 20.97-99, 169-172).
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 3:14. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 43:25. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The Greek dei ('it is necessary, it must') introduces divine necessity — these events are within God's sovereign plan, not evidence of its failure. The distinction between wars and the end (telos) is crucial: Jesus explicitly warns against interpreting every crisis as the final event.
8. The phrase archē ōdinōn ('beginning of birth pains') draws on a well-established Jewish metaphor — the 'birth pains of the Messiah' (chevlei mashiach) referred to the period of intense suffering expected to precede the messianic age. Birth pains imply purpose: the suffering leads to new life, not meaningless destruction.
9. The shift from 'they' to 'you' personalizes the warning. The Greek paradōsoun ('they will hand over') uses the same verb used for Judas's betrayal (paradidōmi) — the disciples will be 'handed over' just as Jesus will be. Synedria ('councils') refers to local Jewish courts; synagogues were places of communal discipline including flogging; governors and kings represent Roman authority. The phrase eis martyron autois could mean 'as a testimony to them' or 'as evidence against them.'
10. This verse interrupts the persecution sequence with a mission imperative — before the end comes, the gospel must reach all nations (panta ta ethnē). The dei ('must') again signals divine necessity. The word kērychthenai ('be proclaimed, be heralded') comes from kēryx ('herald') — the gospel is a public announcement, not a private philosophy.
11. The Greek promerimnate ('worry beforehand, be anxious in advance') is a compound word unique to this passage — the prefix pro- ('before') intensifies the prohibition against pre-trial anxiety. The promise of the Holy Spirit's aid in persecution is one of Mark's clearest pneumatological statements.
12. The disintegration of family bonds under persecution echoes Micah 7:6, which Jesus also cites in Matthew 10:35-36. The Greek paradōsei ('will hand over, betray') again uses the paradidōmi language. The escalation is severe: even the most fundamental human bonds — sibling, parent-child — will fracture under the pressure of allegiance to Jesus.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Micah 7:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The promise is conditional on endurance (hypomeinas, 'having endured, having stood firm'). The Greek telos ('end') could refer to the end of the individual's life or the eschatological end. The verb sōthēsetai ('will be saved') encompasses both physical deliverance and ultimate salvation — the ambiguity may be intentional.
14. The phrase bdelygma tēs erēmōseōs ('abomination of desolation') comes from Daniel (9:27, 11:31, 12:11), where it refers to the pagan altar Antiochus IV Epiphanes erected in the temple in 167 BC. Jesus reapplies the phrase to a future desecration. The masculine participle hestēkota ('standing') with a neuter noun (bdelygma) may hint at a personal figure. The parenthetical 'let the reader understand' is Mark's editorial aside — addressing those who will later read the Gospel, urging them to discern the contemporary application.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 9:27. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. Flat-roofed houses in first-century Palestine had external staircases; one could descend directly to the street without entering the house. The urgency is total — there is no time to retrieve possessions. The imagery conveys the speed required when the crisis arrives.
16. Workers in the field would leave their outer garment (himation) at the edge of the field while working. Even this brief detour is too dangerous. The echo of Lot's flight from Sodom (Genesis 19:17, 'Do not look back') may be intentional.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 19:17. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The Greek ouai ('woe, alas') expresses grief rather than condemnation — Jesus is lamenting, not cursing. Pregnant and nursing women cannot flee quickly and are especially vulnerable during siege warfare. Josephus's account of the siege of Jerusalem in AD 70 confirms the horrifying reality of these words (War 5-6).
18. The Greek cheimōnos ('winter, stormy season') refers to the rainy season when wadis flood and mountain travel becomes treacherous. The instruction to pray implies that while the event is certain, its timing and circumstances may be influenced by prayer.

19. The language echoes Daniel 12:1. The Greek thlipsis ('tribulation, distress, affliction') is a key eschatological term. The phrase 'from the beginning of creation' (ap' archēs ktiseōs) sets the tribulation against the entire sweep of cosmic history. Whether this refers solely to the siege of Jerusalem or to a still-future tribulation has been debated since the early church.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 12:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The Greek ekolobōsen ('shortened, cut short, curtailed') implies divine intervention to limit the duration of suffering. The phrase pasa sarx ('all flesh') is a Hebraism meaning 'any human being.' The eklektous ('elect, chosen ones') refers to God's people — those chosen by grace, for whose preservation God restrains the full measure of tribulation.
21. The warning repeats the opening theme (v. 5-6). In times of crisis, messianic expectation intensifies and false claims proliferate. The imperative mē pisteuete ('do not believe') is categorical — no exception is allowed.
22. The Greek pseudochristoi ('false christs') and pseudoprophētai ('false prophets') are compound words indicating counterfeit versions of the real. The phrase ei dynaton ('if possible') implies that the elect will be severely tested but are ultimately guarded by God's sovereign choice. Signs and wonders alone do not validate a messenger — a principle established in Deuteronomy 13:1-3.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 13:1-3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. The emphatic hymeis ('you yourselves') places responsibility squarely on the disciples. The verb proeirēka ('I have told beforehand') means that forewarning eliminates the excuse of surprise. Jesus's prophecy is not meant to satisfy curiosity but to equip for faithfulness.
24. The cosmic imagery draws on Isaiah 13:10 (judgment on Babylon) and Joel 2:10, 31. In Old Testament prophetic language, the darkening of sun and moon frequently symbolizes the collapse of political powers and the upheaval of the existing order. Whether this is literal astronomical phenomena or symbolic prophetic language (or both) is a central interpretive question.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 13:10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Joel 2:10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The language continues from Isaiah 34:4. The 'powers in the heavens' (dynameis hai en tois ouranois) may refer to celestial bodies, angelic beings, or spiritual forces — the Greek is deliberately encompassing. The shaking of cosmic structures signals that the entire created order is being disrupted in anticipation of God's decisive intervention.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 34:4 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. The primary allusion is Daniel 7:13-14, where 'one like a son of man' comes on the clouds of heaven to receive dominion, glory, and kingdom from the Ancient of Days. In Daniel, the figure comes to God (ascending), not from God (descending) — which complicates simplistic interpretations. Jesus identifies himself as this figure throughout Mark (2:10, 2:28, 8:31, 8:38, 9:9, 9:31, 10:33, 10:45, 14:21, 14:41, 14:62).
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Daniel 7:13. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The gathering of the elect echoes Deuteronomy 30:4 ('Even if your outcasts are in the uttermost parts of heaven, from there the LORD your God will gather you') and Zechariah 2:6 (the four winds). The phrase ap' akrou gēs heōs akrou ouranou ('from the end of earth to the end of heaven') is a merism expressing totality — no elect person will be left behind.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 30:4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Zechariah 2:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. The fig tree parable uses observable nature to teach discernment. In Palestine, the fig tree is one of the last trees to leaf out in spring, making its budding an unmistakable sign of approaching summer. The connection to the cursed fig tree in 11:12-14, 20-21 may be intentional — the fig tree that symbolized Israel's failed fruitfulness now serves as a parable of eschatological awareness.
29. The Greek epi thurais ('at the doors/gates') implies imminent arrival. The subject of 'is near' is ambiguous — it could be 'it' (the end) or 'he' (the Son of Man). We render 'he' following the Danielic context of verse 26, but the ambiguity may be deliberate.
30. This is one of the most debated verses in the Gospels. The Greek genea ('generation') most naturally means the people alive at the time of speaking — approximately 40 years, which would reach to AD 70. Some interpreters take 'generation' to mean 'race' (i.e., the Jewish people) or 'type of people' (i.e., the faithless), but these readings strain the word's normal usage. If 'all these things' includes the temple's destruction, the prophecy was fulfilled within the generation. If it includes the cosmic signs of vv. 24-27, the interpretive puzzle remains.
31. The claim is extraordinary: Jesus places his own words on a level of permanence that surpasses the physical cosmos. The double negative ou mē ('absolutely will not') strengthens the guarantee. In the Old Testament, only God's word is described with such permanence (Isaiah 40:8; 55:11). Jesus implicitly claims divine authority for his teaching.

32. Jesus's admission that 'the Son' does not know the timing is one of the most theologically remarkable statements in the Gospels. It asserts a genuine limitation of knowledge within the incarnation. The ascending hierarchy of ignorance — humans, angels, the Son — makes the Father's exclusive knowledge emphatic. Some manuscripts omit 'nor the Son,' likely due to theological discomfort, but the harder reading is almost certainly original.
33. The twin imperatives blepete ('watch out, be alert') and agrypneite ('stay awake, be vigilant') establish the discourse's practical conclusion. The Greek kairos ('appointed time') is distinct from chronos — it is the decisive moment, not the passing of hours. Not knowing the time is not cause for anxiety but for constant readiness.
34. The parable of the absent master is unique to Mark in this form. Each servant receives exousia ('authority') and a specific ergon ('task, work'). The doorkeeper (thyroōs) receives the explicit command to watch — his role is vigilance itself. The parable implies that Jesus's departure places responsibility on his followers.
35. The four watches of the night correspond to the Roman division: evening (6-9 PM), midnight (9 PM-12 AM), rooster-crowing (12-3 AM), and morning (3-6 AM). The mention of alektorophōnias ('rooster-crowing') foreshadows Peter's denial in 14:30, 72, adding dramatic irony — Peter, who is hearing this warning, will fail to 'stay awake' in precisely this watch.
36. The Greek katheudontas ('sleeping') will recur in Gethsemane (14:37, 40, 41), where Jesus finds Peter, James, and John — the very audience of this discourse — sleeping when they should be watching. The literary connection between the Olivet Discourse and Gethsemane is deliberate.
37. The final word — grēgoreite ('stay awake, be watchful') — breaks the private frame of the discourse and addresses all of Mark's readers across time. The Greek pasin ('to all') universalizes the command beyond the four disciples on the Mount of Olives. The entire discourse concludes not with a timetable but with an imperative.

Summary: Mark 14 narrates the final hours before Jesus's crucifixion in dense, rapid sequence. The chapter opens with the plot to kill Jesus and the anointing at Bethany, where a woman pours costly perfume over his head. Judas arranges to betray him. Jesus celebrates the Passover meal with his disciples, institutes the Lord's Supper, and predicts Peter's denial. In Gethsemane, Jesus prays in anguish while his disciples sleep. Judas arrives with an armed crowd, Jesus is arrested, and a young man flees naked. Jesus is tried before the Sanhedrin, where he declares himself the Christ and the Son of the Blessed One. Peter, waiting in the courtyard below, denies knowing Jesus three times — and the rooster crows.

What Makes This Remarkable: The anointing woman (vv. 3-9) is the only person in Mark's Gospel whom Jesus says will be memorialized 'wherever the gospel is proclaimed in the whole world' — yet Mark never gives her name. The Last Supper (vv. 22-25) reinterprets the Passover through Jesus's own body and blood, creating the central ritual of Christian worship. Jesus's Gethsemane prayer (v. 36) with its Aramaic 'Abba' is the most intimate window into his inner life. His confession before the high priest (v. 62) breaks the 'messianic secret' that has defined Mark's narrative — only now, when it will lead to his death, does Jesus openly claim his identity. Peter's denial fulfills the prediction of verse 30 with devastating precision.

Translation Friction: The trial scene raises historical questions about Jewish legal procedure — holding a capital trial at night during a festival appears to violate Mishnaic rules (Sanhedrin 4:1), though the Mishnah postdates this event. We render the text as Mark presents it without adjudicating historicity. The young man who flees naked (vv. 51-52) is unique to Mark and has generated extensive speculation — some identify him as Mark himself, others as a symbolic figure representing the disciples' total abandonment. The Greek is straightforward; we render it without speculation.

Connections: The anointing connects to burial customs and anticipates 16:1. The Passover setting connects to Exodus 12. The cup saying echoes Exodus 24:8 ('the blood of the covenant') and Jeremiah 31:31 ('new covenant'). The Gethsemane prayer echoes Psalm 42:5-6 ('My soul is deeply grieved'). Jesus's trial declaration combines Psalm 110:1 (sitting at the right hand) and Daniel 7:13 (coming on clouds). Peter's denial fulfills 14:30 and contrasts with the Olivet Discourse command to 'stay awake' (13:37).

¹It was two days before the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The chief priests and the scribes were seeking how to arrest him by stealth and kill him, ²Yet they stated, Not on the festival day, lest there be an uproar of the people. ³While he was at Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, as he reclined at table, a woman came with an alabaster flask of very expensive ointment of pure nard. She broke the flask and poured it over his head. ⁴Some were indignant, saying to one another, "Why was this ointment wasted? ⁵For this ointment could have been sold for more than three hundred denarii and given to the poor." And they scolded her harshly. ⁶But Jesus said, "Leave her alone. Why do you trouble her? She has done a beautiful thing to me. ⁷For you always have the poor with you, and whenever you want, you can do good for them. But you will not always have me. ⁸She has done what she could. She has anointed my body beforehand for burial. ⁹Truly I say to you, wherever the gospel is proclaimed in the whole world, what she has done will also be told in memory of her." ¹⁰To betray him to them, Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went to the chief priests. ¹¹When they heard this, they were glad and promised to give him money. And he began looking for an opportunity to betray him. ¹²On the first day of Unleavened Bread, when they sacrificed the Passover lamb, his disciples said to him, "Where do you want us to go and prepare for you to eat the Passover?" ¹³He sent two of his disciples and said to them, "Go into the city, and a man carrying a jar of water will meet you. Follow him, ¹⁴Wheresoever he will go in, say you to the goodman of the home, The Master says, Where is the guestchamber, where I will eat the passover with my followers? ¹⁵He will show you a large upper room, furnished and ready. Make preparations for us there." ¹⁶The disciples set out and went to the city and found it just as he had told them, and they prepared the Passover. ¹⁷When it was evening, he came with the twelve. ¹⁸As they were reclining at table and eating, Jesus said, "Truly I say to you, one of you will betray me — one who is eating with me." ¹⁹They began to be grieved and to say to him one by one, "Surely not I?" ²⁰He said to them, "It is one of the twelve, one who is dipping bread into the dish with me. ²¹For the Son of Man goes as it is written of him, but woe to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! It would have been better for that man if he had not been born." ²²While they were eating, he took bread, and after blessing it, he broke it and gave it to them and said, "Take; this is my body." ²³He gave it to them — and they all drank of it, he took the cup, and after he had given thanks. ²⁴And he said to them, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many. ²⁵Truly I say to you, I will not drink again of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God." ²⁶They left into the mount of olives, and after they had sung an hymn. ²⁷Jesus said to them, "You will all fall away, for it is written, 'I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered.' ²⁸But after I am raised up, I will go before you to Galilee." ²⁹Peter said to him, "Even if they all fall away, I will not." ³⁰Jesus said to him, "Truly I say to you, today — this very night — before the rooster crows twice, you will deny me three times." ³¹But he kept saying emphatically, "Even if I must die with you, I will never deny you." And they all said the same. ³²They came to a place called Gethsemane, and he said to his disciples, "Sit here while I pray." ³³He took Peter, James, and John with him, and he began to be deeply distressed and troubled. ³⁴He said to them, "My soul is deeply grieved, to the point of death. Remain here and stay awake." ³⁵Going a little farther, he fell on the ground and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him. ³⁶He said, "Abba, Father, all things are possible for you. Remove this cup from me. Yet not what I will, but what you will." ³⁷He came and found them sleeping, and he said to Peter, "Simon, are you asleep? Could you not stay awake one hour? ³⁸Stay awake and pray that you may not enter into temptation. The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." ³⁹Again he went away and prayed, saying the same words. ⁴⁰And again he came and found them sleeping, for their eyes were very heavy, and they did not know what to answer him. ⁴¹He came the third time and said to them, "Are you still sleeping and resting? It is enough. The hour has come. Look, the Son of Man is being betrayed into the hands of sinners. ⁴²Get up, let us go. Look, my betrayer is near." ⁴³Immediately, while he was still speaking, Judas came — one of the twelve — and with him a crowd armed with swords and clubs, from the chief priests and the scribes and the elders. ⁴⁴Now his betrayer had given them a signal, saying, "The one I will kiss is the man. Arrest him and lead him away under guard." ⁴⁵When he came, he went up to him at once and said, "Rabbi!" And he kissed him. ⁴⁶Then they laid hands on him and arrested him. ⁴⁷But one of those standing by drew his sword and struck the high priest's servant and cut off his ear. ⁴⁸Jesus said to them, "Have you come out with swords and clubs to arrest me as though I were a rebel? ⁴⁹Day after day I was with you in the temple teaching, and you did not arrest me. But let the Scriptures be fulfilled." ⁵⁰And they all left him and fled. ⁵¹A young man was following him, wearing nothing but a linen cloth. They seized him, ⁵²He departed the linen cloth, and fled from them naked. ⁵³They led Jesus to the high priest, and all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes assembled. ⁵⁴Peter had followed him at a distance, right into the courtyard of the high priest, and he was sitting with the guards and warming himself at the fire. ⁵⁵Now the chief priests and the whole council were seeking testimony against Jesus to put him to death, but they could not find any. ⁵⁶For many bore false witness against him, but their testimonies did not agree. ⁵⁷Some stood up and bore false witness against him, saying, ⁵⁸"We heard him say, 'I will destroy this temple made with hands, and in three days I will build another not made with hands.'" ⁵⁹Yet even in this their testimony did not agree. ⁶⁰The high priest stood up in the midst and asked Jesus, "Have you no answer? What is it that these men testify against you?" ⁶¹But he remained silent and did not answer. Again the high priest asked him, "Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed One?" ⁶²Jesus said, "I am, and you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power and coming with the clouds of heaven." ⁶³The high priest tore his garments and said, "What further need do we have of witnesses? ⁶⁴You have heard his blasphemy! What is your judgment?" And they all condemned him as deserving death. ⁶⁵Some began to spit on him and to cover his face and to strike him, saying to him, "Prophecy!" And the guards received him with slaps. ⁶⁶While Peter was below in the courtyard, one of the servant girls of the high priest came, ⁶⁷When she noticed Peter warming himself, she looked upon him, and stated, And you also wast with Jesus of Nazareth. ⁶⁸But he denied it, saying, "I neither know nor understand what you are talking about." And he went out into the gateway, and a rooster crowed. ⁶⁹The servant girl saw him and began again to say to the bystanders, "This man is one of them." ⁷⁰But again he denied it. After a little while, the bystanders again said to Peter, "Certainly you are one of them, for you are a Galilean." ⁷¹But he began to invoke a curse on himself and to swear, "I do not know this man you are talking about." ⁷²Immediately the rooster crowed a second time. And Peter remembered the word that Jesus had said to him, "Before the rooster crows twice, you will deny me three times." And he broke down and wept.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek pascha is a transliteration of the Aramaic form of the Hebrew pesach ('Passover'). The Feast of Unleavened Bread (ta azyma) technically followed Passover but by the first century the terms were used interchangeably for the entire festival period. The phrase en dolō ('by stealth, by deceit') reveals the conspirators' awareness that a public arrest would provoke a riot.
2. The irony is that Jesus will be arrested and executed during the feast — the very timing they tried to avoid. The Greek thorybos ('uproar, riot, commotion') reflects the volatile political atmosphere. Jerusalem's population swelled enormously during Passover, and the festival's themes of liberation from slavery made Roman and priestly authorities especially nervous.
3. The Greek alabastron refers to a sealed flask with a long neck that had to be broken to release its contents — the breaking means the entire quantity was given at once, with nothing held back. Nard (nardos) is an aromatic plant from the Himalayas; the adjective pistikēs probably means 'pure, genuine' (from pistos, 'faithful, reliable'). The anointing of the head is a royal action — kings were anointed on the head (1 Samuel 10:1; 16:13). Mark does not name this woman.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Samuel 10:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The Greek aganaktoountes ('being indignant, being angry') is the same word used when the disciples were indignant about James and John's request (10:41). Mark says 'some' without specifying who — John 12:4 identifies Judas. The word apōleia ('waste, loss, destruction') frames the woman's gift as reckless extravagance.
5. Three hundred denarii represented roughly a year's wages for a common laborer (one denarius per day). The objection sounds morally serious — the poor are genuine. But Jesus will reframe the woman's act as itself a moral priority. The Greek enebrimōnto ('scolded harshly, rebuked, snorted at') is a strong word suggesting anger and contempt.
6. The Greek kalon ergon ('good/beautiful work') can mean either morally good or aesthetically beautiful. Jesus defends the woman against the group's hostility. The phrase 'in me' (en emoi) is striking — the act was performed on Jesus and finds its meaning in relation to him.
7. This echoes Deuteronomy 15:11 ('there will never cease to be poor in the land'), which is not a dismissal of poverty but a recognition that care for the poor is a permanent obligation. Jesus's point is not that the poor do not matter but that this moment — his imminent death — is unrepeatable. The opportunity to serve the poor is ongoing; the opportunity to anoint Jesus for burial is not.
7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 15:11. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

8. The phrase proelaben myrisai ('anointed beforehand') interprets the woman's act as prophetic preparation for Jesus's death. Whether she intended this meaning is unclear — Jesus assigns it regardless. The word entaphiasmon ('burial preparation') connects to 15:46 and 16:1, where the women who come to anoint Jesus after death find the tomb empty. This woman alone succeeded in anointing Jesus's body.
9. Jesus promises this unnamed woman a memorial (mnēmosynon) coextensive with the gospel's reach — wherever the good news goes, her story goes with it. The irony is pointed: the religious leaders will be remembered for plotting murder, the disciples for failing and fleeing, but this woman will be remembered for an act of extravagant devotion.
10. Mark places Judas's betrayal immediately after the anointing, creating a stark juxtaposition: a woman gives everything for Jesus; one of the twelve sells him out. The phrase ho heis tōn dōdeka ('the one of the twelve') emphasizes the scandal — this is not an outsider but a member of the inner circle. The Greek paradoi ('betray, hand over') uses the same paradidōmi language that runs throughout the passion narrative.
11. The chief priests' gladness (echarēsan) at finding an insider willing to betray Jesus contrasts with their earlier fear of public reaction (v. 2). The word eukairōs ('conveniently, at the right moment') suggests Judas was looking for a time when Jesus was away from the protective crowds.
12. The Passover lambs were sacrificed in the temple on the afternoon of Nisan 14. Mark's chronology places the Last Supper as a Passover meal — a point of tension with John's Gospel, which places the crucifixion on Nisan 14 when the lambs were being sacrificed. We render Mark's text as given.
13. A man carrying a water jar (keramion hydatos) would be unusual — water-carrying was typically women's work. This distinctive detail would make the man easy to identify. The prearranged sign suggests Jesus had made preparations, possibly secretly to prevent Judas from knowing the location in advance.
14. The Greek katalyma ('guest room, lodging') is the same word used in Luke 2:7 for the place where there was 'no room.' Here it refers to a room made available for Passover pilgrims. Jesus's use of 'my guest room' (to katalyma mou) suggests prior arrangement. The title 'the Teacher' (ho didaskalos) serves as an identifying code between Jesus and the homeowner.
15. The anagaion ('upper room') was a second-story room, often the largest space in a house. The word estrōmenon ('furnished, spread with carpets/cushions') indicates the room was already prepared for reclining at a meal. Passover preparations would include roasting the lamb, preparing unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and wine.
16. The phrase kathōs eipen autois ('just as he had told them') emphasizes Jesus's foreknowledge and control of events — even as his enemies plot against him, the details unfold according to his arrangements.
17. Evening (opsias) marked the beginning of Nisan 15 by Jewish reckoning, since the day began at sunset. Jesus arrives with 'the twelve' — including Judas, whose betrayal plan is already in motion.
18. The phrase ho esthiōn met' emou ('the one eating with me') echoes Psalm 41:9 ('Even my close friend in whom I trusted, who ate my bread, has lifted his heel against me'). Sharing a meal in ancient Near Eastern culture established a bond of trust and obligation — betrayal by a table companion was the deepest violation of hospitality and fellowship.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 41:9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The Greek mēti egō expects a negative answer ('It's not I, is it?') — but the fact that each disciple asks reveals their own uncertainty about their loyalty. The phrase heis kata heis ('one by one, one after another') emphasizes that every single disciple asks the question, including Judas.
20. The Greek embaptomenos ('dipping') refers to dipping bread or herbs into a common dish — a standard part of the Passover meal. Jesus does not name Judas directly but narrows the identification. The shared dish intensifies the intimacy of the betrayal.
21. The statement holds two truths in tension: divine necessity ('as it is written') and human responsibility ('woe to that man'). The Son of Man's death is part of God's plan revealed in Scripture, yet Judas bears full moral culpability. The phrase kalon autō ei ouk egennēthē ('better for him if he had not been born') is among the most severe judgments Jesus pronounces on any individual.
22. The four verbs — took (labōn), blessed (eulogēsas), broke (eklasen), gave (edōken) — became the foundational pattern of Christian eucharistic practice. The blessing would have been the standard Jewish bread blessing: 'Blessed are you, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who brings forth bread from the earth.' The declaration touto estin to sōma mou ('this is my body') is without precedent in Jewish Passover practice and has generated centuries of theological debate about its meaning.
23. The Greek eucharistēsas ('having given thanks') is the root of 'Eucharist,' the term later used for the Lord's Supper. The Passover meal included four cups of wine; this is likely the third cup, called the 'cup of blessing' (cf. 1 Corinthians 10:16). Mark notes that all drank — including Judas, whose presence at this table of covenant renewal deepens the tragedy of his betrayal.
24. The phrase 'blood of the covenant' (haima tēs diathēkēs) echoes Exodus 24:8, where Moses sprinkled blood on the people saying, 'Behold the blood of the covenant that the LORD has made with you.' Jesus identifies his own death as the sacrifice that seals a new covenant. The SBLGNT does not include the word 'new' (kainēs) before 'covenant,' though some manuscripts add it under the influence of Luke 22:20 and 1 Corinthians 11:25. The phrase hyper pollōn ('for many') echoes Isaiah 53:12 and Mark 10:45.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 24:8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.

25. Jesus declares this cup his last until the eschatological banquet in the kingdom of God. The phrase kainon ('new') suggests not merely temporal newness but qualitative transformation — a new kind of celebration in a renewed creation. The vow of abstinence gives the Last Supper both finality and hope: the next shared cup will be in God's kingdom.
26. The hymn (hymnēsantes) was almost certainly the second half of the Hallel — Psalms 115-118 — which was sung at the conclusion of the Passover meal. Psalm 118 contains the rejected-stone quotation Jesus used in 12:10-11 and the words 'Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord' (118:26), sung at his entry into Jerusalem (11:9). The psalms Jesus sang on the way to his death contained his own story.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 115-118. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The Greek skandalisthēsēste ('you will be caused to stumble, you will fall away') is from skandalon ('stumbling block'). The quotation is from Zechariah 13:7, with a significant change: the Hebrew has 'Strike the shepherd' (imperative), but the Greek uses the first person 'I will strike' — God himself strikes the shepherd. Jesus's death is simultaneously human violence and divine action.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Zechariah 13:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. This promise is recalled by the young man at the empty tomb (16:7). The verb proaxō ('I will go before you, I will lead you') is a shepherd's term — the scattered sheep will be regathered by their risen shepherd in Galilee, where the story began. The passive egerthēnai ('to be raised') implies that God raises Jesus, consistent with early Christian theology.
29. Peter's declaration exemplifies confident self-assurance that overestimates one's own strength. The emphatic ouk egō ('not I') sets Peter apart from the group — he claims an exceptional loyalty that he will fail to deliver. This overconfidence was anticipated in Jesus's Olivet Discourse warning to 'watch and be on guard' (13:33).
30. Mark specifies 'twice' (dis) for the rooster and 'three times' (tris) for the denial — more precise than Matthew and Luke. The temporal markers 'today' (sēmeron) and 'this night' (tautē tē nykti) compress the timeline — Peter's failure is not distant but imminent. The verb aparnēsē ('you will deny, disown') means more than simple contradiction; it is a public repudiation of relationship.
31. The Greek ekperissōs ('emphatically, exceedingly, vehemently') shows Peter doubling down on his claim. The conditional ean deē me synapothanein soi ('even if it is necessary for me to die with you') raises the stakes to the ultimate level — Peter pledges his life. The final note that 'they all said the same' (hōsautōs de kai pantes elegon) means every disciple made this pledge and every disciple will break it.
32. The name Gethsēmani comes from the Aramaic gat shemane, meaning 'oil press' — an olive oil production site on the Mount of Olives. John 18:1 identifies it as a garden across the Kidron Valley from the temple. The instruction to 'sit here' separates the larger group from the inner three.
33. The same three disciples who witnessed the transfiguration (9:2) now witness the agony. The Greek ekthambeisthai ('to be deeply distressed, terrified, alarmed') is a strong word unique to Mark — it suggests something beyond sorrow, closer to horror or dread. The verb adēmonein ('to be troubled, anxious, distressed') adds a dimension of anguished restlessness.
34. The language echoes Psalm 42:5-6, 11 and 43:5 ('Why are you cast down, O my soul?'). The phrase heōs thanatou ('to the point of death') means the grief itself is life-threatening — this is not mere sadness but existential anguish. The command grēgoreite ('stay awake, watch') directly recalls the Olivet Discourse (13:34-37) — the very thing Jesus commanded, the disciples will fail to do.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 42:5-6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
35. Falling on the ground (epipten epi tēs gēs) is the posture of extreme desperation — not kneeling but prostration. The Greek hōra ('hour') carries the weight of the entire passion — it is the divinely appointed moment toward which the entire Gospel has been moving (cf. John 12:27). Jesus's prayer 'if it is possible' acknowledges God's sovereignty while expressing genuine human desire to avoid the coming suffering.
36. Mark preserves the Aramaic Abba alongside the Greek ho patēr ('the Father'). Abba is an intimate family term — not the casual 'daddy' sometimes claimed, but a term of close, trusting relationship rarely used for God in Jewish prayer. The 'cup' (potērion) is a biblical metaphor for God's wrath and judgment (Isaiah 51:17, 22; Jeremiah 25:15-16). Jesus's final clause — 'not what I will, but what you will' — is the supreme expression of obedient submission.
36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Jeremiah 25:15-16. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
37. Jesus addresses Peter by his original name 'Simon' — not 'Peter' (the Rock). The shift may signal disappointment: the man who pledged to die with Jesus cannot manage one hour of wakefulness. The Greek mian hōran ('one hour') is painfully minimal — the request was modest, and even that proved too much.
38. The Greek peirasmon ('temptation, trial, testing') encompasses both moral temptation and eschatological trial. The aphorism about spirit and flesh does not reflect later Greek dualism but a Semitic understanding: the human will (pneuma, 'spirit') desires faithfulness, but human limitation (sarx, 'flesh') makes failure possible. Jesus diagnoses the disciples' condition with compassion, not contempt.

39. The repetition — 'the same words' (ton auton logon) — is not formulaic but reflects the intensity of the struggle. Jesus's prayer does not evolve into acceptance through new arguments; he submits by returning to the same petition and the same surrender, again and again.
40. The Greek katabarynomenoi ('weighed down, very heavy') suggests a physical heaviness beyond mere tiredness — it may reflect the emotional exhaustion of grief and confusion. The clause ouk ēdeisan ti apokrithōsin autō ('they did not know what to answer him') echoes Peter's bewildered response at the transfiguration (9:6). When faced with divine moments beyond their comprehension, the disciples are speechless.
41. The Greek apechei is notoriously difficult — it can mean 'it is enough,' 'the account is settled,' or 'he (Judas) has received (his payment).' We follow the most common reading, 'It is enough.' The phrase ēlthen hē hōra ('the hour has come') marks the decisive turning point. The present tense paradidotai ('is being betrayed') captures the action in progress — Judas is already approaching.
42. The command egeisthe agōmen ('get up, let us go') is striking — Jesus does not flee but moves toward his betrayer. The verb ēggiken ('has drawn near, is at hand') is the same word used for the arrival of the kingdom of God (1:15). The hour of supreme evil and the hour of God's decisive action are one and the same moment.
43. Mark's characteristic euthys ('immediately') accelerates the narrative. The parenthetical 'one of the twelve' (heis tōn dōdeka) is repeated from verse 10, driving the scandal home again. The crowd comes armed with machairan ('swords') and xylōn ('clubs, wooden weapons') — the swords likely carried by temple police, the clubs by hired servants. The three groups — chief priests, scribes, elders — constitute the Sanhedrin.
44. The Greek syssēmon ('pre-arranged signal, sign') is a military term. The kiss (philēsō) was a standard greeting between a disciple and his rabbi — a sign of respect and affection. Judas weaponizes intimacy. The word asphalōs ('securely, safely, under guard') suggests they feared Jesus might escape or that the crowd might intervene.
45. The Greek katēphilēsen is an intensified form of phileō — 'kissed warmly, kissed repeatedly, kissed fervently.' The intensified verb makes the betrayal more grotesque: Judas does not give a perfunctory peck but an effusive greeting. The title 'Rabbi' ('my great one, my teacher') adds another layer of bitter irony — the language of discipleship employed to betray the master.
46. The Greek epebalon tas cheiras ('laid hands on') and ektratēsan ('seized, arrested') are violent terms. The arrest is physical and forceful. Jesus offers no resistance — a detail that becomes explicit in the next verses.
47. Mark does not identify this swordsman — John 18:10 names him as Peter and the servant as Malchus. The Greek ōtarion ('ear,' diminutive) may refer to the earlobe. The act of violence is futile and immediately abandoned — no further resistance occurs. Jesus will address this act in the next verse.
48. The Greek lēstēs ('robber, bandit, insurrectionist') is the same word used for the two men crucified alongside Jesus (15:27) and for those who had turned the temple into a 'den of robbers' (11:17). The term carried revolutionary connotations — Josephus uses it for armed Jewish resistance fighters. Jesus's question exposes the absurdity of armed force against a teacher who has been publicly accessible in the temple.
49. Jesus points out the hypocrisy of a nighttime ambush by those who could have arrested him publicly. The phrase alla hina plērōthōsin hai graphai ('but let the Scriptures be fulfilled') is not resignation but recognition — Jesus interprets his arrest as the fulfillment of God's plan revealed in Scripture.
50. The Greek apentes auton ('leaving him, abandoning him') and ephygon pantes ('all fled') fulfills the prediction of verse 27 — the sheep scatter when the shepherd is struck. The word pantes ('all') is absolute: not one disciple remained. The contrast with their collective pledge in verse 31 is devastating.
51. This episode is unique to Mark. The neaniskos ('young man') wearing only a sindona ('linen cloth') over his naked body has generated much speculation. Some identify him with Mark himself (an autobiographical detail), others with the young man at the tomb (16:5, same word neaniskos). The linen cloth (sindon) is the same word used for Jesus's burial shroud (15:46). The scene may symbolize the stripping away of everything — even a follower's last garment — in the hour of abandonment.
52. The flight into nakedness (gymnos ephygen) represents total loss — not merely of garments but of dignity and identity. The scene is the nadir of the disciples' failure: all have fled, and the last follower runs away with nothing. Some scholars see an echo of Amos 2:16 ('The bravest among warriors will flee naked on that day').
52. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Amos 2:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
53. Mark does not name the high priest — Matthew 26:57 identifies him as Caiaphas. The assembly of 'all' (pantes) the chief priests, elders, and scribes constitutes a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin, the supreme Jewish governing council of seventy-one members.
54. Mark sets up a literary intercalation (sandwich structure): the trial of Jesus (vv. 55-65) is nested between the introduction (v. 54) and conclusion (vv. 66-72) of Peter's denial. While Jesus confesses his identity above, Peter denies his below. The phrase apo makrothen ('from a distance') captures Peter's compromised position — following, but not close enough to be identified as a disciple. The fire (phōs, literally 'light') will illuminate him in the darkness.

55. The Greek synedrion ('council, Sanhedrin') refers to the supreme judicial body. The imperfect tense ezētoun ('were seeking') and ouch hēuriskon ('were not finding') describe repeated, frustrated attempts. The outcome — execution (thanatōsai) — was predetermined; they needed only the legal basis. Mark presents the trial as a miscarriage of justice.
56. Jewish law required the testimony of at least two witnesses to agree (Deuteronomy 19:15). The Greek pseudoemarturoun ('bore false testimony') and the note that their testimony was not isai ('equal, consistent') means the legal standard was not met — even by the prosecution's own rules.
56. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 19:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
57. Mark again labels this testimony as false (epseudomarturoun), even though the substance of the claim (the next verse) contains a distorted version of something Jesus may actually have said (cf. John 2:19). The distortion, not the fabrication, makes it false witness.
58. The contrast between cheiropoiēton ('made with hands') and acheiropoiēton ('not made with hands') is theologically loaded. In the Septuagint, 'made with hands' often describes idols (Isaiah 2:18; 10:11). The charge distorts Jesus's words but ironically states a deep truth: through his death and resurrection ('three days'), a new temple — his risen body and the community of faith — will indeed replace the physical temple.
58. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 2:18 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
59. The repeated failure of witnesses to agree underscores the illegitimacy of the proceedings. By the Sanhedrin's own legal standards, there was no valid basis for conviction.
60. The high priest's frustration is evident — the witnesses have failed, so he intervenes directly. Standing 'in the midst' (eis meson) is an authoritative posture. His questions pressure Jesus to incriminate himself, since the external testimony has collapsed.
61. Jesus's silence fulfills Isaiah 53:7 ('He was oppressed and afflicted, yet he did not open his mouth'). The high priest's question combines two titles: 'the Christ' (ho Christos) and 'the Son of the Blessed One' (ho huios tou eulogētou). 'The Blessed One' (tou eulogētou) is a Jewish circumlocution for God, avoiding direct use of the divine name. This is the central question of Mark's entire Gospel.
61. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 53:7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
62. This is the climactic moment of Mark's Gospel. The 'messianic secret' — Jesus's persistent command to silence about his identity — is broken at the moment it will cost him his life. The response Egō eimi ('I am') is an unambiguous affirmation that also echoes the divine self-identification (Exodus 3:14; Isaiah 43:10). Jesus then combines Psalm 110:1 ('seated at the right hand') with Daniel 7:13 ('coming with the clouds'), fusing messianic kingship with the divine Son of Man. 'Power' (tēs dynamēs) is another circumlocution for God.
62. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalms 110:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
62. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 3:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
62. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 43:10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
62. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 7:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
63. Tearing garments (diarrēxas tous chitōnas) was the prescribed response to hearing blasphemy (cf. Mishnah Sanhedrin 7:5). The high priest's action declares that Jesus's words constitute blasphemy — a capital offense. The irony is that the garment-tearing may itself violate priestly regulations (Leviticus 21:10), though this point is debated.
63. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 21:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
64. The Greek blasphēmias ('blasphemy') technically refers to speech that dishonors God. The high priest interprets Jesus's messianic claim as blasphemous — either because claiming to be the Messiah was not itself blasphemous (it was not), or because the additional claim to sit at God's right hand was seen as equating himself with God. The unanimous verdict — pantes katekrinan ('all condemned') — means no dissenting voice is recorded (though Luke 23:51 notes Joseph of Arimathea's dissent).
65. The abuse fulfills Isaiah 50:6 ('I gave my back to those who struck me, and my cheeks to those who pulled out the beard; I did not hide my face from disgrace and spitting'). The blindfolding and demand to 'prophesy' ('tell us who hit you') mocks his prophetic claims. The cruel irony: at this very moment, Jesus's prophecy about Peter (v. 30) is being fulfilled in the courtyard below.
66. The word katō ('below') places Peter spatially beneath the room where Jesus is being tried — a physical detail with symbolic force. While Jesus stands before the council and speaks truth, Peter crouches below and lies. The challenger is a paidiskē ('servant girl') — the lowest-ranking person in the household, yet enough to break Peter's resolve.

67. The firelight that warms Peter also exposes him. The verb emblepsasa ('looked intently, fixed her gaze') suggests a careful, recognizing look. 'The Nazarene' (tou Nazarēnou) identifies Jesus by his hometown, which was considered insignificant (cf. John 1:46). The girl's statement is factual, not hostile — which makes Peter's reaction all the more revealing.
68. Peter's denial uses two verbs of non-knowledge: oida ('know') and epistamai ('understand'). The double denial is emphatic — he claims complete ignorance. Moving to the proaulion ('gateway, forecourt') is an attempt to distance himself from recognition. The rooster's first crow is the first warning, corresponding to Jesus's prediction of 'before the rooster crows twice' (v. 30). Some manuscripts omit the bracketed rooster crow here.
69. The Greek hē paidiskē ('the servant girl') with the article may indicate the same girl from verse 66, now broadening her accusation to the bystanders. The phrase ex autōn ('one of them') identifies Peter as part of Jesus's group — precisely the association he is trying to escape.
70. The imperfect ērneito ('he was denying, he kept denying') suggests ongoing, repeated denial. The bystanders identify Peter by his Galilean origin — Galilean Aramaic had a distinctive accent that was recognizable to Judeans (cf. Matthew 26:73). Peter's identity is written on his very speech, and no amount of denial can erase it.
71. The Greek anathematizein ('to invoke a curse, to place under anathema') means Peter calls down God's curse upon himself if he is lying — the strongest possible form of denial. The verb omnynai ('to swear an oath') adds a solemn oath to the curse. Peter refers to Jesus as 'this man' (ton anthrōpon touton) — refusing even to use his name. The escalation from simple denial (v. 68) to cursing and swearing (v. 71) traces Peter's descent.
72. The Greek epibalōn eklaien is difficult — epibalōn could mean 'having thrown himself down' (physical collapse), 'having set his mind on it' (reflection), or 'having begun' (bursting into tears). We render it 'broke down and wept,' which captures the emotional collapse. The imperfect eklaien ('he was weeping, he kept weeping') indicates sustained, ongoing grief — not a single outburst but a continuing flood of tears. Peter's story in Mark ends here in complete brokenness, with restoration implied only by the angel's specific mention of his name at the empty tomb (16:7).

Summary: Mark 15 narrates the Roman trial, crucifixion, death, and burial of Jesus. The chapter opens early in the morning as the Sanhedrin hands Jesus over to Pilate. After a brief interrogation, Pilate offers the crowd a choice between Jesus and Barabbas; they choose Barabbas and demand crucifixion. Roman soldiers mock Jesus with a purple robe and crown of thorns. Simon of Cyrene is pressed into carrying the cross. Jesus is crucified at Golgotha between two rebels, mocked by passersby and religious leaders, and cries out in Aramaic, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' He dies with a loud cry, the temple curtain tears from top to bottom, and a Roman centurion declares, 'Truly this man was the Son of God.' Women who followed Jesus from Galilee watch from a distance. Joseph of Arimathea buries Jesus in a rock-hewn tomb.

What Makes This Remarkable: The cry of dereliction (v. 34) — Jesus quoting Psalm 22:1 in Aramaic — is the most theologically disturbing utterance in the Gospels. Mark does not soften or explain it. The tearing of the temple curtain (v. 38) from top to bottom signals divine action opening access to God's presence. The centurion's confession (v. 39) is the first time in Mark that any human being calls Jesus 'Son of God' without being corrected or silenced — and it comes from a pagan executioner standing at the foot of the cross. The women named in verses 40–41 become the crucial witnesses who will connect the crucifixion to the empty tomb.

Translation Friction: The choice between Jesus and Barabbas involves a Passover release custom for which no extra-biblical evidence exists. Mark presents it as established practice; we render his account as given. The cry 'Eloi, Eloi' (v. 34) is Aramaic (Hebrew would be 'Eli, Eli' as in Matthew); the bystanders' confusion with Elijah may reflect genuine mishearing or may be Markan irony. The centurion's declaration can be translated 'the Son of God' or 'a son of God' — Greek lacks the indefinite article, and a Roman soldier might have meant 'a divine man' rather than making a Christian confession. The ambiguity may be intentional.

Connections: Psalm 22 pervades the chapter: the casting of lots for garments (v. 24; Ps 22:18), the mocking (vv. 29–32; Ps 22:7–8), and the cry of abandonment (v. 34; Ps 22:1). Isaiah 53 is present in Jesus's silence before accusers and his burial with the rich. The darkness at noon (v. 33) echoes Amos 8:9–10 ('I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight'). The torn curtain connects to the temple theme running through Mark 11–13.

¹As soon as it was morning, the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council. They bound Jesus, led him away, and handed him over to Pilate. ²Pilate asked him, "Are you the King of the Jews?" He answered him, "You say so." ³The chief priests accused him of many things. ⁴Pilate again asked him, "Have you no answer? See how many charges they bring against you." ⁵But Jesus made no further answer, so that Pilate was amazed. ⁶Now at the feast he used to release for them one prisoner whom they requested. ⁷A man called Barabbas was imprisoned with the rebels who had committed murder during the insurrection. ⁸The crowd came up and began to ask Pilate to do as he usually did for them. ⁹Pilate answered them, "Do you want me to release for you the King of the Jews?" ¹⁰For he perceived that it was out of envy that the chief priests had handed him over. ¹¹But the chief priests stirred up the crowd to have him release Barabbas for them instead. ¹²Pilate again said to them, "Then what shall I do with the man you call the King of the Jews?" ¹³They shouted back, "Crucify him!" ¹⁴Pilate said to them, "Why? What evil has he done?" But they shouted all the more, "Crucify him!" ¹⁵So Pilate, wishing to satisfy the crowd, released Barabbas for them and, after having Jesus flogged, handed him over to be crucified. ¹⁶The soldiers led him away inside the palace, that is, the praetorium, and they called together the whole battalion. ¹⁷They put a purple cloak on him and, twisting together a crown of thorns, they put it on him. ¹⁸And they began to salute him: "Hail, King of the Jews!" ¹⁹They struck his head with a reed and spit on him and knelt down in mock worship before him. ²⁰When they had mocked him, they stripped him of the purple cloak and put his own clothes on him. Then they led him out to crucify him. ²¹They compelled a passerby, Simon of Cyrene, who was coming in from the country — the father of Alexander and Rufus — to carry his cross. ²²They brought him to the place called Golgotha, which means Place of a Skull. ²³They offered him wine mixed with myrrh, but he did not take it. ²⁴And they crucified him and divided his garments among them, casting lots for them to decide what each should take. ²⁵It was the third hour when they crucified him. ²⁶The inscription of the charge against him read: "The King of the Jews." ²⁷And with him they crucified two rebels, one on his right and one on his left. ²⁸Those who passed by mocked him, shaking their heads and saying, "Ha! You who would destroy the temple and rebuild it in three days, ²⁹Indeed, save thyself, and come down from the cross. ³⁰In the same way the chief priests also mocked him among themselves with the scribes, saying, "He saved others; he cannot save himself. ³¹Let the Christ, the King of Israel, come down now from the cross, so that we may see and believe!" Those who were crucified with him also reviled him. ³²When the sixth hour came, darkness fell over the whole land until the ninth hour. ³³At the ninth hour Jesus cried out with a loud voice, "Eloi, Eloi, lema sabachthani?" — which means, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" ³⁴Some of the bystanders hearing it said, "Look, he is calling Elijah." ³⁵Someone ran and filled a sponge with sour wine, put it on a reed, and held it up to him to drink, saying, "Wait, let us see whether Elijah will come to take him down." ³⁶Then Jesus let out a loud cry and breathed his last. ³⁷And the curtain of the temple was torn in two, from top to bottom. ³⁸When the centurion who stood facing him saw that he breathed his last in this way, he said, "Truly this man was the Son of God." ³⁹There were also women looking on from a distance, among whom were Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James the younger and of Joses, and Salome. ⁴⁰When he was in Galilee, they followed him and served him, and there were many other women who had come up with him to Jerusalem. ⁴¹When evening had come, since it was the day of Preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath, ⁴²Joseph of Arimathea, a respected member of the council who was himself waiting for the kingdom of God, took courage and went to Pilate and asked for the body of Jesus. ⁴³Pilate was surprised that he was already dead. He summoned the centurion and asked him whether Jesus had already died. ⁴⁴When he learned from the centurion that Jesus was dead, he granted the body to Joseph. ⁴⁵He bought a linen shroud and, taking him down, wrapped him in the linen shroud and laid him in a tomb that had been cut out of the rock. Then he rolled a stone against the entrance of the tomb. ⁴⁶Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses saw where he was laid.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek prōi ('early morning') likely refers to the fourth watch (3-6 AM). The verb paredōkan ('handed over') is again the paradidōmi chain: God hands over the Son, Judas hands over Jesus to the authorities, and now the authorities hand him over to Rome. Each use of this verb links divine purpose to human action. Pontius Pilate served as prefect of Judea from AD 26-36.
2. The charge has been reformulated for Roman ears: the Sanhedrin's religious charge ('Christ, Son of the Blessed One,' 14:61) becomes a political charge ('King of the Jews'). Jesus's response sy legeis ('you say so') is ambiguous — it can be read as affirmation, deflection, or ironic agreement. It neither confirms nor denies in a way Pilate can use.
3. The imperfect katēgoroun ('were accusing, kept accusing') indicates a sustained barrage of charges. Mark does not specify the content, focusing instead on volume — 'many things' (polla). The chief priests function as prosecutors before the Roman governor.

4. Pilate's surprise reveals that silence before a Roman tribunal was highly unusual — defendants typically mounted vigorous defenses. The word posa ('how many, how great') emphasizes the volume of accusations. Pilate seems to be giving Jesus an opportunity to defend himself.
5. The Greek thaumazein ('to be amazed, to marvel') indicates that Jesus's silence is extraordinary. Isaiah 53:7 provides the theological background: 'He was oppressed and he was afflicted, yet he did not open his mouth; like a lamb that is led to the slaughter.' Jesus's silence is not passive but deliberate — a refusal to participate in a process whose outcome is already determined.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 53:7 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The imperfect apelyen ('he used to release') describes a recurring custom. No extra-biblical source confirms this practice, though Roman magistrates did sometimes grant amnesty. Mark presents it as an established Passover tradition — a feast celebrating liberation from bondage includes the liberation of a prisoner.
7. The name Barabbas (bar-abba) means 'son of the father' in Aramaic — an ironic contrast with Jesus, who is the Son of the Father. The stasiastōn ('rebels, insurrectionists') and stasis ('uprising, revolt') indicate that Barabbas was involved in armed political resistance against Rome. The crowd will choose the violent revolutionary over the peaceful messiah.
8. The crowd initiates the request — they come to Pilate expecting the customary release. The verb anabas ('having come up') suggests movement upward toward the praetorium. The crowd has not yet been prompted to choose between Jesus and Barabbas.
9. Pilate's use of the title 'King of the Jews' (ton basilea tōn Ioudaiōn) may be sarcastic, politically provocative, or an attempt to use popular support for Jesus to free him. The title will appear on the cross (v. 26), making the Roman charge visible to all.
10. The Greek phthonon ('envy, jealousy') is Pilate's assessment of the chief priests' motivation. Even a Roman governor could see that this was not about justice or theology but about threatened power. The verb eginōsken ('he knew, he perceived') implies ongoing awareness, not sudden insight.
11. The Greek aneseisan ('stirred up, incited, shook up') suggests active agitation. The chief priests work the crowd to ensure their preferred outcome. The people who shouted 'Hosanna' days earlier (11:9-10) are now manipulated into demanding the release of a murderer.
12. Pilate's question — 'What shall I do with...' — is extraordinary for a Roman governor. He defers the sentence to the mob, abdicating judicial responsibility. The phrase hon legete ('whom you call') distances Pilate from the title; he attributes it to the crowd rather than adopting it himself.
13. The Greek staurōson ('crucify!') is an aorist imperative — sharp, urgent, decisive. Crucifixion was Rome's penalty for slaves, rebels, and non-citizens. It was designed to be maximally painful and publicly humiliating. The crowd demands the most degrading form of execution available.
14. Pilate's question ti gar epoiēsen kakon ('what evil has he done?') implies he has found no basis for the death penalty. The adverb perissōs ('exceedingly, all the more') shows the crowd's intensity escalating beyond reason. The repetition of 'Crucify him!' without any stated crime reveals that this is a mob, not a judicial proceeding.
15. The Greek to hikanon poiēsai ('to do what was sufficient, to satisfy') reveals Pilate's motivation as political expediency, not justice. The verb phragellōsas ('having flogged') refers to the Roman flagellum — a whip with leather thongs embedded with bone or metal fragments. Roman flogging was so severe it sometimes killed the victim. The paradidōmi chain reaches its final human link: Pilate hands Jesus over to execution.
16. The praitōrion was the governor's official residence — likely either Herod's palace on the western hill or the Antonia Fortress adjacent to the temple. The speira ('cohort, battalion') was normally 600 soldiers, though the word could be used loosely for a smaller detachment. Mark explains the term for his non-Palestinian readers.
17. The purple cloak (porphyran) mocks royal attire — purple was the color of kings and emperors, and the soldiers drape Jesus in a parody of royal investiture. The akanthinon stephanon ('crown of thorns') is fashioned from a thorny plant common in Palestine. Whether intended primarily to cause pain or to mock a radiant crown (like those on Roman coins) is debated; both functions were likely served.
18. The greeting Chaire basileu tōn Ioudaiōn ('Hail, King of the Jews!') parodies the salute to the emperor: 'Ave, Caesar!' (Chaire, Kaisar). The soldiers mock Jesus by performing a coronation ritual in reverse — clothing, crowning, and acclaiming him as king, but in contempt rather than honor.
19. The reed (kalamō) may have served as a mock scepter before being used to strike. The triad of actions — striking, spitting, kneeling — is a grotesque inversion of royal honor. The verb prosekynoun ('worshiped, bowed down to') is the word used for genuine worship throughout the New Testament. Mark's readers would see the irony: the soldiers' mockery accidentally performs the truth.
20. The return of Jesus's own garments means the crowd watching the crucifixion procession would not have seen the mockery. The shift from indoor abuse to outdoor execution transitions the narrative from the private world of soldiers' cruelty to the public spectacle of crucifixion.
21. The Greek angareuousin ('they compel, conscript, press into service') is a Persian loanword for forced labor under military authority. Simon was from Cyrene, a city in modern Libya with a large Jewish community. Mark identifies him as 'the father of Alexander and Rufus' — a detail that only makes sense if these men were known to Mark's audience, suggesting they became part of the early Christian community (cf. Romans 16:13, which mentions a Rufus). The cross (stauros) that Simon carried was the horizontal beam (patibulum); the vertical post remained fixed at the execution site.
22. Golgotha is the Aramaic gulgulta ('skull'). The Latin equivalent is calvaria, from which 'Calvary' derives. The name may describe the skull-like shape of the rocky outcrop or may refer to its use as an execution site. Mark translates the Aramaic for his Greek-speaking audience. The site was outside the city walls (cf. Hebrews 13:12).

- 23. Wine mixed with myrrh (esmyrnismenon oionon) may have been offered as a mild narcotic to dull pain — a charitable practice attributed to Jerusalem's women in the Talmud (Sanhedrin 43a). Jesus's refusal to take it suggests a determination to face death with full consciousness. This may also fulfill his vow not to drink 'of the fruit of the vine' until the kingdom comes (14:25).
- 24. Mark narrates the crucifixion itself with stark brevity — three words in Greek: kai staurousin auton ('and they crucify him'). No description of the physical process is given. The division of garments fulfills Psalm 22:18 ('They divide my garments among them, and for my clothing they cast lots'), though Mark does not explicitly cite the psalm. A crucified person's possessions became the executioners' perquisite.
- 24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalms 22:18. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 25. The 'third hour' (hōra tritē) is approximately 9 AM by Jewish time-reckoning (counting from sunrise at approximately 6 AM). This creates a tension with John 19:14, which places Jesus still before Pilate at 'the sixth hour.' Various harmonization proposals exist; we render Mark's chronology as given.
- 26. Roman practice required a titulus — a placard stating the condemned person's crime — to be carried before or attached to the cross. The charge ho basileus tōn Ioudaiōn ('The King of the Jews') is political rather than religious. From Pilate's perspective, Jesus was executed for sedition — claiming kingship in Caesar's domain. From Mark's perspective, the inscription is ironically true.
- 27. The Greek lēstas ('rebels, bandits, insurrectionists') is the same word used in verse 48 and in 11:17. These were likely associates of Barabbas's insurrection (v. 7). The positioning — one on the right, one on the left — recalls James and John's request to sit at Jesus's right and left in his glory (10:37). Jesus told them they did not know what they were asking; the positions of honor in his 'glory' are occupied by criminals on crosses.
- 28. Verse 28 is not included in the SBLGNT critical text. It appears in later manuscripts and quotes Isaiah 53:12 ('he was numbered with the transgressors'). While the quotation is theologically apt, the verse is almost certainly a later scribal addition influenced by Luke 22:37. We note its absence from the earliest and best manuscripts.
- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 53:12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 29. The head-shaking (kinountes tas kephalas) fulfills Psalm 22:7 ('All who see me mock me; they hurl insults, shaking their heads'). The Greek eblasphēmoun ('reviled, blasphemed') is the same word used for the charge against Jesus — those who accused him of blasphemy now commit it themselves. The temple accusation from 14:58 has become street mockery.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 22:7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. The imperative sōson seauton ('save yourself!') is deeply ironic in light of 8:35 ('whoever wants to save their life will lose it'). The demand to 'come down from the cross' assumes that divine power should manifest as self-preservation. The entire Gospel has been arguing the opposite: divine power is revealed through self-giving suffering.
- 31. The phrase allous esōsen ('he saved others') is an unintended confession of Jesus's healing ministry. The taunt heauton ou dynatai sōsai ('he cannot save himself') states the theological truth Mark's Gospel has been building: the Messiah saves precisely by not saving himself. The paradox of the cross — power through powerlessness — is articulated by Jesus's enemies without their understanding it.
- 32. The demand 'that we may see and believe' (hina idōmen kai pisteusōmen) inverts the order Jesus requires: believing in order to see, not seeing in order to believe (cf. John 20:29). The title 'King of Israel' (basileus Israēl) is the Jewish form of the Roman charge 'King of the Jews.' Even the two co-crucified men join the mockery (synestaurōmenoi, 'those crucified with him') — in Mark, there is no penitent thief. Jesus is entirely alone.
- 33. The sixth to ninth hours are approximately noon to 3 PM. Darkness at midday echoes Amos 8:9 ('I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight'). The phrase eph' holēn tēn gēn could mean 'over the whole land' (of Israel) or 'over the whole earth.' The darkness is cosmic and theological — creation itself responds to the death of its creator.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Amos 8:9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. This is Psalm 22:1 in Aramaic (Eloi is Aramaic; Matthew's Eli is Hebrew). The cry is the only saying from the cross that Mark records. Whether Jesus is expressing genuine experience of divine abandonment, praying the entire psalm (which moves from lament to trust and praise by its end), or both, has been debated throughout Christian history. Mark does not soften the cry or explain it. The theological reality is presented without commentary: the Son of God experiences forsakenness.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalms 22:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. The confusion between 'Eloi' (My God) and 'Elijah' (Ēlian) may be genuine mishearing — especially by non-Aramaic speakers — or may be deliberate Markan irony. Jewish tradition held that Elijah would appear before the messianic age (Malachi 4:5). The bystanders' interpretation reduces the most profound theological cry in the narrative to a misidentified name.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Malachi 4:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. The sour wine (oxous, 'vinegar') was the cheap wine (posca) commonly drunk by soldiers and laborers — not a cruelty but possibly an act of rough compassion. The sponge on a reed echoes Psalm 69:21 ('for my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink'). The words 'let us see whether Elijah will come' may be mockery or genuine curiosity.

36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 69:21. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
37. The loud cry (phōnēn megalēn) before death is medically unusual — crucifixion typically ended in gradual asphyxiation, and the dying person would not have the strength for a loud shout. Mark may intend the cry to suggest that Jesus's death, though real, was not merely the result of physical exhaustion but a deliberate release. The Greek exepneusen ('breathed out, expired') is clinical and final.
38. The katapetasma ('curtain, veil') could refer to either the inner curtain separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place (the Holy of Holies), or the outer curtain visible from outside the temple. If the inner curtain, the tearing symbolizes direct access to God's presence; if the outer, it is a public sign visible to all. The direction 'from top to bottom' (ap' anōthen heōs katō) indicates divine action — God tears the curtain from heaven. The verb eschisthē ('was torn') uses the same root as the tearing of the heavens at Jesus's baptism (1:10, schizomenous), framing Jesus's ministry between two divine tearings.
39. The centurion (kentyriōn, a Latin loanword) is the first human being in Mark to call Jesus 'Son of God' (huios theou) without being rebuked or silenced. The messianic secret is finally broken — but by a pagan soldier at the foot of a cross, not by a disciple in a moment of glory. The Greek lacks the definite article: huios theou could mean 'the Son of God' or 'a son of God' ('a divine man'). Mark almost certainly intends the full Christian meaning, while acknowledging the centurion's limited understanding. What prompted this confession? Mark says it was seeing 'that he breathed his last in this way' (hoti houtōs exepneusen) — the manner of Jesus's death, not miracles or signs, revealed his identity.
40. The women are introduced for the first time in the narrative, yet they have been present all along (v. 41). Mark names three: Mary Magdalene (from Magdala, a town on the Sea of Galilee), Mary the mother of James and Joses (possibly Jesus's mother; cf. 6:3), and Salome (possibly the mother of James and John; cf. Matthew 27:56). These women become the crucial link between the crucifixion (they see where he dies), the burial (they see where he is laid, v. 47), and the empty tomb (they go to anoint him, 16:1).
41. The verbs ēkolouthoun ('they were following') and diēkonoun ('they were serving, ministering') are the same words used for discipleship throughout Mark. These women were disciples — following and serving Jesus from Galilee to Jerusalem. The imperfect tense indicates sustained, ongoing service. Mark reveals that Jesus's movement included a significant number of women disciples whose presence he had not previously mentioned.
42. The Greek paraskeuē ('Preparation') was the technical term for Friday, the day before the Sabbath, when work had to be completed before sunset. Mark explains the term for non-Jewish readers: 'the day before the Sabbath' (prosabbaton). The urgency is clear — burial must happen before sunset when Sabbath begins, and Jewish law prohibited leaving a body on a cross overnight (Deuteronomy 21:22-23).
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 21:22-23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. Joseph is described as euschēmōn bouleutēs ('a respected/prominent council member') — meaning he was a member of the Sanhedrin that had just condemned Jesus. The phrase prosdexomenos tēn basileian tou theou ('waiting for the kingdom of God') identifies him as sympathetic to Jesus's message. The Greek tolmēsas ('having taken courage, having dared') reveals that his request required bravery — he was risking his social position and political standing by publicly associating with a condemned criminal.
44. Crucifixion victims typically survived for days. That Jesus died in approximately six hours surprised even Pilate, who verified the death through the centurion — an official confirmation. The Greek ethaumasen ('was surprised, wondered') and the word palai ('already, some time ago') indicate that rapid death was unusual.
45. The Greek ptōma ('corpse, fallen body') is a harsher word than sōma ('body'), emphasizing the physical reality of death. The verb edōrēsato ('granted, gave as a gift') indicates an official release — Roman practice sometimes denied burial to the executed, so Pilate's permission was not automatic.
46. The sindōn ('linen cloth, shroud') is the same word used for the young man's garment in 14:51-52 — a possible literary connection. Rock-hewn tombs with rolling stones were typical of wealthy families in first-century Jerusalem. Joseph's tomb fulfills Isaiah 53:9 ('his grave was with the rich in his death'). The stone (lithon) was a large disk-shaped rock rolled along a groove to seal the entrance — it would require significant effort to move.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 53:9. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
47. The imperfect etheōroun ('they were watching, they were observing') indicates sustained attention — these women carefully noted the tomb's location. This detail is essential to the narrative: when they return on Sunday morning (16:1-2), they know exactly where to go. Their witness provides continuity between the crucifixion, burial, and empty tomb.

Summary: Mark 16 narrates the discovery of the empty tomb and, in the longer ending, the appearances of the risen Jesus and his commission to the disciples. Early on the first day of the week, three women come to anoint Jesus's body. They find the stone rolled away, a young man in a white robe who announces that Jesus has risen, and the command to tell the disciples — especially Peter — that Jesus is going ahead of them to Galilee. The original ending of Mark at verse 8 leaves the women fleeing in trembling and astonishment, saying nothing to anyone because they were afraid. The longer ending (verses 9-20) records appearances to Mary Magdalene, two disciples, and the eleven, followed by the Great Commission with signs accompanying believers, and Jesus's ascension.

What Makes This Remarkable: If Mark's Gospel originally ended at verse 8, it is one of the most daring conclusions in all literature — a story of good news that ends in silence and fear. The emptiness of the tomb is presented as evidence not through appearances or proofs but through absence. The young man's message (v. 7) specifically names Peter, the disciple who denied Jesus most shamefully — an implicit promise of restoration. The longer ending (vv. 9-20), though not from Mark's hand, became deeply influential in Christian practice and theology, particularly the commission to 'go into all the world' and the signs that accompany believers.

Translation Friction: The textual evidence is clear: Mark 16:9-20 does not appear in the two earliest and most reliable Greek manuscripts (Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus), and early church fathers (Clement of Alexandria, Origen) show no knowledge of it. Eusebius and Jerome both note its absence from the best manuscripts available to them. The vocabulary, style, and theology of vv. 9-20 differ markedly from the rest of Mark. However, the passage was widely known by the second century and became part of the received text. We include it with a textual note, as it has shaped Christian reading for centuries regardless of its origin.

Connections: The women's visit connects to 15:40, 47 (the same women who witnessed crucifixion and burial). The young man in white (v. 5) may connect to the young man who fled naked in 14:51-52 (now clothed). The message to 'go to Galilee' (v. 7) fulfills Jesus's promise in 14:28. The fear and silence of v. 8 contrasts with the Olivet Discourse command to 'stay awake' (13:37). The longer ending draws on traditions preserved in Luke 24, John 20, and early preaching summaries in Acts.

¹When the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome bought spices so that they might go and anoint him. ²Very early on the first day of the week, they went to the tomb when the sun had risen. ³They were saying to one another, "Who will roll away the stone for us from the entrance of the tomb?" ⁴Looking up, they saw that the stone had been rolled back — for it was very large. ⁵Entering the tomb, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, dressed in a white robe, and they were alarmed. ⁶He said to them, "Do not be alarmed. You seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified. He has been raised; he is not here. See the place where they laid him. ⁷But go, tell his disciples and Peter that he is going before you to Galilee. There you will see him, just as he told you." ⁸They went out and fled from the tomb, for trembling and astonishment had seized them. And they said nothing to anyone, for they were afraid. ⁹Now after he rose early on the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, from whom he had cast out seven demons. ¹⁰She went and told those who had been with him, as they mourned and wept. ¹¹But when they heard that he was alive and had been seen by her, they would not believe it. ¹²After this he appeared in another form to two of them as they were walking into the country. ¹³They went back and told the rest, but they did not believe them either. ¹⁴Afterward he appeared to the eleven themselves as they were reclining at table, and he rebuked them for their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they had not believed those who saw him after he had risen. ¹⁵And he said to them, "Go into all the world and proclaim the gospel to all creation. ¹⁶Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved, but whoever does not believe will be condemned. ¹⁷And these signs will accompany those who believe: in my name they will cast out demons; they will speak in new tongues; ¹⁸They will take up serpents. And if they drink any deadly thing, it will not hurt them. They will lay hands on the sick, then they will recover. ¹⁹So then the Lord Jesus, after he had spoken to them, was taken up into heaven and sat down at the right hand of God. ²⁰And they went out and preached everywhere, while the Lord worked with them and confirmed the message by the signs that accompanied it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The women waited until the Sabbath ended (Saturday evening) to purchase arōmata ('aromatic spices') for anointing the body — a task the anointing woman of 14:3-9 had already performed, though these women apparently did not know. The same three women from 15:40 maintain the chain of witness. Their intention to anoint presupposes they expect to find a dead body, not an empty tomb.
2. The Greek lian prōi ('very early') combined with anateilantos tou hēliou ('the sun having risen') places the visit at dawn on Sunday morning. The phrase tē mia tōn sabbatōn ('on the first of the sabbaths/week') uses the Semitic way of naming weekdays by counting from the Sabbath. This is the day Christians will later call 'the Lord's Day.'
3. The imperfect elegon ('they were saying') suggests an ongoing conversation during the walk. The stone (lithos) described in 15:46 was substantial — the women recognize they cannot move it themselves. Their practical concern reveals that they have no expectation of resurrection; they anticipate a sealed tomb containing a dead body.
4. The Greek anablepsasai ('having looked up') suggests the tomb was above them on a hillside, or that they lifted their eyes from the path. The passive apokeklystai ('had been rolled back') implies an agent without naming one — the passive of divine action. Mark adds the explanatory note 'for it was very large' (ēn gar megas sphodra), underscoring that human effort alone could not account for its removal.
5. The neaniskon ('young man') is the same word used in 14:51 for the man who fled naked at Jesus's arrest. If the connection is intentional, the one who fled in shame is now clothed in glory (stolēn leukēn, 'white robe') — a symbol of transformation. White robes are associated with heavenly beings throughout Jewish and Christian literature. The verb exethambēthēsan ('they were utterly alarmed, astonished') is the same strong word used for Jesus's distress in Gethsemane (14:33) — it denotes overwhelming emotion in the face of the numinous.
6. The announcement is structured in three parts: identification ('Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified'), proclamation ('he has been raised'), and evidence ('he is not here — see the place'). The passive ēgerthē ('he has been raised') attributes the resurrection to God's action — Jesus did not raise himself but was raised by the Father. The perfect participle ton estaurōmenon ('the crucified one') is significant: even risen, Jesus remains 'the crucified one.' The resurrection does not erase the crucifixion but vindicates the one who was crucified.
7. The specific mention of Peter — 'his disciples and Peter' (tois mathētais autou kai tō Petrō) — is unique to Mark and deeply significant. Peter, who denied Jesus three times, is singled out not for condemnation but for inclusion. The message assures him that his denial has not disqualified him from discipleship. The verb proagei ('he goes before you') fulfills 14:28 exactly. The phrase kathōs eipen hymin ('just as he told you') confirms that Jesus's predictions have been reliable throughout — his word is trustworthy.
8. If Mark's Gospel originally ended here, this is its final line. The Greek tromos ('trembling') and ekstasis ('astonishment, ecstasy, being beside oneself') describe the overwhelming response to a divine encounter. The double negative oudenī ouden ('nothing to no one, not a word to anyone') is emphatic. The final word — ephobounto gar ('for they were afraid') — is grammatically unusual (ending a book with the conjunction gar, 'for'), leading some to argue that the original ending was lost. Others argue that this abrupt, open ending is intentionally provocative: it leaves the reader to decide whether to be like the women (silent and afraid) or to proclaim what they have heard. The fear is not cowardice but numinous awe — the appropriate human response to the inbreaking of God.
9. TEXTUAL NOTE: Mark 16:9-20 (the 'Longer Ending') does not appear in the earliest and most reliable manuscripts, including Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus (4th century). Eusebius and Jerome attest that it was absent from most Greek copies known to them. The vocabulary, style, and content differ notably from Mark 1:1-16:8. Most scholars conclude that these verses were added by a later hand to provide resurrection appearances and a commission that Mark's abrupt ending at verse 8 seemed to lack. The passage was widely known by the mid-second century and became part of the received text tradition. We include it as a significant part of the manuscript tradition while noting its secondary status.
9. The introduction of Mary Magdalene with the explanatory note about seven demons (hepta daimonia) reads as though she has not been mentioned before — a sign of a different author. The tradition of her encounter with the risen Jesus is also preserved in John 20:11-18.
10. The phrase tois met' autou genomenois ('those who had been with him') is an unusual circumlocution for the disciples, not characteristic of Mark's style. Their mourning (penthousei) and weeping (klaiousin) reflect their grief at Jesus's death and their ignorance of the resurrection.
11. The Greek ēpistēsan ('they disbelieved, they refused to believe') introduces a theme of disbelief that runs through the longer ending (cf. vv. 13, 14). This stands in some tension with Mark's earlier narrative, where the disciples' problem was more often misunderstanding than outright refusal to believe.
12. This is a compressed summary of the Emmaus road narrative found in Luke 24:13-35. The phrase en hetera morphē ('in another form') explains why the two did not recognize Jesus — a detail Luke develops at greater length. The Greek agron ('country, countryside, field') corresponds to Luke's village of Emmaus.
13. The pattern of testimony met with disbelief continues. The Greek tois loipois ('the rest, the remaining ones') refers to the other disciples. The repeated refusal to believe builds toward the rebuke in verse 14.
14. The appearance to 'the eleven' (tois hendeka) reflects Judas's absence. The Greek ōneidisen ('rebuked, reproached') is a strong word. The compound sklērokardian ('hardness of heart') echoes Mark 3:5, 6:52, 8:17, and 10:5 — a major Markan theme applied here with particular force. Even after multiple testimonies, the disciples refused to believe until confronted directly by the risen Jesus.

15. The commission is universal in scope: ton kosmon hapanta ('the whole world') and pasē tē ktisei ('all creation'). The verb kēryxate ('proclaim, herald') is an aorist imperative — urgent and decisive. This parallels the commission in Matthew 28:19-20 and extends the gospel's reach beyond ethnic Israel to all humanity, and indeed to the created order itself.
16. The pairing of faith (pisteusas) and baptism (baptistheis) reflects early Christian practice where conversion was expressed through baptism. Note that the second clause mentions only disbelief — not the absence of baptism — as the basis for condemnation (katakristhēsetai). The passage attributes salvation to faith expressed in baptism, and condemnation to the refusal of faith.
17. The signs (sēmeia) listed here correspond to activities recorded in Acts: casting out demons (Acts 16:18), speaking in tongues (Acts 2:4; 10:46; 19:6). The phrase en tō onomati mou ('in my name') indicates that these signs derive their power from Jesus's authority, not from the practitioners themselves. The Greek glōssais kainais ('new tongues') has been interpreted as both foreign languages and ecstatic speech.
18. The handling of serpents corresponds to Paul's experience on Malta (Acts 28:3-6). Protection from poison has no direct parallel in Acts but reflects the broader theme of divine protection in the mission. Healing by laying on hands (cheiras epithēsousin) continues Jesus's own practice (Mark 5:23; 6:5; 8:23, 25). These signs are presented as accompaniments to mission, not as ends in themselves.
19. The title ho kyrios Iesous ('the Lord Jesus') is not characteristic of Mark (who typically uses 'Jesus' alone) and reflects later Christian usage. The ascension (anēlēphthē, 'was taken up') is described more fully in Luke 24:51 and Acts 1:9-11. The phrase ekathisen ek dexiōn tou theou ('sat down at the right hand of God') fulfills Psalm 110:1, which Jesus quoted in 12:36 and 14:62. The 'right hand' denotes the position of supreme honor and co-regency.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 110:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The final verse provides a summary of the apostolic mission. The Greek synergountos ('working together with') describes the Lord's ongoing partnership with the disciples in mission — he is not absent after the ascension but actively cooperating through signs. The verb bebaiontos ('confirming, establishing') indicates that the signs serve the word, not vice versa. The longer ending thus transforms Mark's story from an open, unsettling conclusion (v. 8) into a triumphant summary of the church's mission — a resolution that later generations clearly felt the Gospel needed.

Luke

Summary: Luke 1 opens with a formal literary prologue addressed to Theophilus, establishing Luke's method as careful, orderly investigation. The chapter then narrates two angelic birth announcements: Gabriel appears first to the priest Zechariah in the temple, declaring that his elderly wife Elizabeth will bear a son named John who will prepare the way of the Lord; then Gabriel appears to the virgin Mary in Nazareth, announcing that she will conceive by the Holy Spirit and bear a son named Jesus who will reign over David's throne forever. Mary visits Elizabeth, and the unborn John leaps in the womb. The chapter contains four major poetic passages: the Magnificat (Mary's song, vv. 46-55), the Benedictus (Zechariah's prophecy, vv. 68-79), and shorter hymnic passages in the angelic announcements.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's birth narratives are saturated with Old Testament echoes. Zechariah and Elizabeth recall Abraham and Sarah (aged, barren, promised a child). Gabriel's appearance in the temple connects to Daniel 8-9, where Gabriel also delivers prophetic messages about God's timing. Mary's Magnificat draws heavily on Hannah's prayer (1 Samuel 2:1-10), and Zechariah's Benedictus weaves together Davidic, Abrahamic, and prophetic covenant themes. The Greek in these hymnic sections is heavily Septuagintal — Luke appears to be deliberately imitating the style of the Greek Old Testament to signal that God's ancient promises are being fulfilled.

Translation Friction: The Greek of the prologue (vv. 1-4) is polished literary Koine, while the birth narratives shift to a markedly Semitic style, possibly reflecting Hebrew or Aramaic sources. We render both registers in natural modern English without flattening the distinction entirely. The Magnificat and Benedictus are rendered as poetry, preserving their hymnic structure. The phrase 'highly favored one' (kecharitomene, v. 28) has significant theological weight in different Christian traditions; we render the Greek transparently and note the range of meaning.

Connections: The Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 12, 15, 17) is explicitly invoked in both the Magnificat (v. 55) and Benedictus (vv. 72-73). The Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7) underlies Gabriel's promise to Mary (vv. 32-33). John's role as forerunner connects to Malachi 3:1 and 4:5-6 (Elijah's return). The priestly setting of Zechariah's vision connects to the temple theology of the Old Testament.

¹Since many have undertaken to compile a narrative of the events that have been fulfilled among us, ²Indeed as they handed down them to us, which from the beginning were eyewitnesses, and ministers of the word. ³Indeed, it was decided by me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write to you in order, most excellent Theophilus,. 4 Indeed, that you mightest know the certainty of those things, wherein you have been instructed. 5In the days of Herod, king of Judea, there was a priest named Zechariah, of the division of Abijah. His wife was from the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elizabeth. 6They were both righteous before God, walking blamelessly in all the commandments and regulations of the Lord. 7But they had no child, because Elizabeth was barren, and both were advanced in years. 8Now while Zechariah was serving as priest before God during his division's turn of duty, 9In keeping with to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he traveled into the temple of the Lord. 10And the whole assembly of the people was praying outside at the hour of the incense offering. 11Then an angel of the Lord appeared to him, standing to the right of the altar of incense. 12Zechariah was shaken when he saw him, and fear overwhelmed him. 13But the angel said to him, "Do not be afraid, Zechariah, because your prayer has been heard. Your wife Elizabeth will bear you a son, and you are to name him John. 14He will be a joy and delight to you, and many will rejoice at his birth. 15For he will be great before the Lord, and he must never drink wine or strong drink. He will be filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb, 16Numerous of the children of Israel will he turn to the Lord their God. 17He will go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of fathers toward their children and the disobedient to the wisdom of the righteous — to prepare a people made ready for the Lord." 18Zechariah said to the angel, "How can I be sure of this? For I am an old man, and my wife is advanced in years." 19The angel answered him, "I am Gabriel, who stands in the presence of God. I was sent to speak to you and to bring you this good news. 20Now listen: you will be silent and unable to speak until the day these things take place, because you did not believe my words, which will be fulfilled at their proper time." 21Meanwhile the people were waiting for Zechariah, and they were wondering at his delay in the sanctuary. 22When he came out, he was unable to speak to them, and they realized that he had seen a vision in the sanctuary. He kept making signs to them but remained unable to speak. 23When the days of his priestly service were completed, he went home. 24After those days his wife Elizabeth conceived, and she kept herself in seclusion for five months, saying, 25"This is what the Lord has done for me in the days when he looked on me, to take away my disgrace among people." 26Named nazareth,, and in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God to a city of Galilee. 27To a young woman pledged in marriage to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David. And the virgin's name was Mary. 28The angel came to her and said, "Greetings, favored one! The Lord is with you." 29But she was deeply troubled by his words and was wondering what kind of greeting this could be. 30The angel said to her, "Do not be afraid, Mary, for you have found favor with God. 31Listen: you will conceive in your womb and give birth to a son, and you are to name him Jesus. 32He will be great and will be called Son of the Most High, and the Lord God will give him the throne of his father David. 33He will reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there will be no end." 34Mary said to the angel, "How will this be, since I have not been intimate with a man?" 35The angel answered her, "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. Therefore the holy one to be born will be called the Son of God. 36And listen — your relative Elizabeth has also conceived a son in her old age. This is the sixth month for her who was called barren. 37For nothing will be impossible with God." 38Mary said, "Here I am, the servant of the Lord. Let it be done to me according to your word." And the angel departed from her. 39In those days Mary set out and hurried to a town in the hill country of Judah, 40Went into into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elisabeth. 41When Elizabeth heard Mary's greeting, the baby leaped in her womb, and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Spirit. 42She exclaimed with a loud cry, "Blessed are you among women, and blessed is the fruit of your womb! 43And why is this granted to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? 44For the moment the sound of your greeting reached my ears, the baby leaped for joy in my womb. 45Blessed is she who believed that what was spoken to her from the Lord would be fulfilled."

46And Mary said:

"My soul magnifies the Lord,

47My spirit has rejoiced in God my Saviour. 48Since he has regarded the low estate of his handmaiden — for, take notice, from henceforth all generations will call me blessed. 49Since he that is mighty has done to me remarkable things. And holy is his name.

⁵⁰His mercy extends to those who fear him, from generation to generation.

⁵¹He has shown strength with his arm;
he has scattered the proud in the thoughts of their hearts.

⁵²He has brought down rulers from their thrones and lifted up the humble.

⁵³He has filled the hungry with good things and sent the rich away empty.

⁵⁴He has helped his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy,

⁵⁵As he spoke to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his descendants for ever. ⁵⁶Mary stayed with Elizabeth for about three months and then returned to her home. ⁵⁷Now the time came for Elizabeth to give birth, and she bore a son. ⁵⁸Her neighbors and relatives heard that the Lord had shown great mercy to her, and they rejoiced with her. ⁵⁹On the eighth day they came to circumcise the child, and they were going to name him Zechariah after his father. ⁶⁰But his mother answered, "No! He is to be called John." ⁶¹They said to her, "There is no one among your relatives who has that name." ⁶²Then they made signs to his father, asking what he wanted the child to be named. ⁶³He asked for a writing tablet and wrote, "His name is John." And everyone was amazed. ⁶⁴Immediately his mouth was opened and his tongue was freed, and he began to speak, praising God. ⁶⁵Fear came upon all their neighbors, and throughout the entire hill country of Judea, all these events were being discussed. ⁶⁶All who heard these things stored them in their hearts, saying, "What then will this child become?" For the hand of the Lord was with him. ⁶⁷Then his father Zechariah was filled with the Holy Spirit and prophesied:

⁶⁸"Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel, for he has visited and redeemed his people.

⁶⁹He has raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David,

⁷⁰As he spoke by the lips of his sacred God's spokespersons, which have been since the world began:. ⁷¹That we should be saved from our opponents, and from the hand of all that despise us. ⁷²To perform the compassion promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant. ⁷³Indeed, the oath which he swore to our Father Abraham,. ⁷⁴That he would grant to us, that we while delivered out of the possession of our enemies may serve him without be afraid,. ⁷⁵In holiness and righteousness prior to him, every one of the days of our life.

⁷⁶And you, child, will be called a prophet of the Most High, for you will go before the Lord to prepare his ways, ⁷⁷To give knowledge of salvation to his those present by the remission of their sins,. ⁷⁸By way of the tender mercy of our God. Whereby the dayspring from on high has visited us,. ⁷⁹To provide radiance to them that take a seat in the dark and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace. ⁸⁰The child grew and became strong in spirit, and he was in the wilderness until the day of his public appearance to Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek epecheiresan ('have undertaken, have attempted') carries no negative connotation — Luke is not criticizing earlier efforts but acknowledging them. The verb peplerophoremenon ('fulfilled, accomplished, brought to completion') is stronger than the KJV's 'believed.' Luke views these events not merely as things believed but as things God has brought to fulfillment.

2. The Greek autoptai ('eyewitnesses') is a technical term — the root gives us the English 'autopsy' (seeing for oneself). Luke distinguishes himself from these original witnesses; he is a second-generation recipient. The phrase hyperetai tou logou ('servants of the word') may refer to a recognized role in the early church — those who faithfully transmitted the tradition.
3. The Greek parekolouthēkoti ('having followed closely, having investigated') implies active research, not passive reception — Luke has traced the tradition back to its sources. The adverb akribos ('accurately, carefully') emphasizes methodological rigor. Kratiste ('most excellent') is an honorific used for Roman officials (cf. Acts 23:26, 24:3, 26:25), suggesting Theophilus held some social status, though whether this is a real person or a symbolic name ('lover of God') is debated.
4. The Greek asphaleia ('certainty, security, reliability') suggests Theophilus has already received oral instruction (katechetes, 'been catechized, been taught') and Luke writes to provide a firm foundation. The verb katecheo is the root of 'catechism' — formal instruction in the faith.
5. The shift from polished literary Greek (vv. 1-4) to Septuagintal narrative style is immediate — egeneto ('it came about') echoes the Hebrew vayyehi. Zechariah's priestly division of Abijah was the eighth of twenty-four divisions (1 Chronicles 24:10). That Elizabeth is also of Aaronic descent means John will be of fully priestly lineage on both sides. Herod the Great reigned 37-4 BC, anchoring the narrative historically.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Chronicles 24:10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The Greek dikaioi ('righteous') and amemptoi ('blameless') together describe covenant faithfulness — not sinless perfection but faithful observance of the Torah. The distinction between entolais ('commandments') and dikaïomasin ('regulations, ordinances') may reflect the Torah's own distinction between different categories of law. This description echoes the characterization of Noah (Genesis 6:9) and Job (Job 1:1).

6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Job 1:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The barren-wife motif is one of the most significant patterns in the Old Testament: Sarah (Genesis 11:30), Rebekah (Genesis 25:21), Rachel (Genesis 29:31), the mother of Samson (Judges 13:2), and Hannah (1 Samuel 1:2). Luke signals that God is about to act in the same pattern — impossible circumstances overcome by divine intervention. The phrase probebekotes en tais hemerais ('advanced in their days') echoes the Septuagint description of Abraham and Sarah (Genesis 18:11).

8. Each priestly division served in the temple for one week, twice per year (plus the three pilgrimage festivals). The Greek hierateuein ('to serve as priest') is a technical term for performing temple duties. Luke places the divine encounter in the context of ordinary, faithful service.
9. The incense offering was performed on the golden altar in the Holy Place (Exodus 30:1-8), not in the Holy of Holies. The Greek naon ('sanctuary, inner temple') is distinguished from hieron ('temple complex'). Being chosen by lot for this duty was a once-in-a-lifetime honor for most priests, given the large number of priests and the twice-daily offering.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 30:1-8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The incense offering coincided with the time of prayer (cf. Psalm 141:2, 'Let my prayer rise as incense before you'). The people waited outside in the Court of Israel while the priest performed the rite inside. This public context heightens the significance of what Zechariah is about to experience privately.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 141:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The right side is the position of favor and honor in biblical symbolism (cf. Psalm 110:1). The Greek ophthe ('appeared') is a divine passive — the angel was made visible by God's will. The altar of incense stood before the veil separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (Exodus 30:6).

11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 30:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. The verb etarachthe ('was troubled, was disturbed') indicates deep agitation, not mild surprise. The phrase phobos epepesen ('fear fell upon') is a Septuagintal expression for the terrifying impact of divine encounter (cf. Genesis 15:12, where 'a deep dread fell upon Abram'). Fear in the presence of the divine is a consistent biblical response.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 15:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The phrase me phobou ('do not be afraid') is the standard divine reassurance formula (cf. Genesis 15:1, Isaiah 41:10). The name Ioannes (John) is the Greek form of Hebrew Yochanan, meaning 'the LORD is gracious.' The passive eisekousthe ('has been heard') implies God is the one who has heard — divine response to persistent prayer.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 15:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 41:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The Greek chara ('joy') and agalliasis ('exultation, great gladness') form an intensifying pair. Agalliasis is a stronger term used frequently in the Septuagint Psalms for worship-level joy. The promise that 'many will rejoice' extends beyond the family to a national scope — John's birth is not just personal good news but Israel-wide good news.
15. The prohibition against wine and strong drink (sikera, from the Hebrew shekar) echoes the Nazirite vow (Numbers 6:3) and the instructions for Samson's mother (Judges 13:4-5). John is set apart for God's service from before birth. The phrase 'filled with the Holy Spirit from his mother's womb' is extraordinary — prophetic endowment before birth, which will be demonstrated when Elizabeth's womb leaps at Mary's greeting (v. 41).
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 6:3 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Judges 13:4-5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The verb epistrepsei ('will turn') is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew shuv — the central verb of repentance and return. John's mission is one of turning Israel back to their covenant God. The phrase 'children of Israel' (huion Israel) is deliberately archaic, evoking the Old Testament covenant identity.
17. This is a direct allusion to Malachi 4:5-6, the final prophecy of the Old Testament: 'I will send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the LORD, and he will turn the hearts of fathers to their children.' Gabriel identifies John as the fulfillment of this four-hundred-year-old promise. The phrase 'spirit and power of Elijah' does not mean John is Elijah reincarnated but that he operates in the same prophetic tradition and with the same empowerment.
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Malachi 4:5-6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. Zechariah's question kata ti gnosomai touto ('by what will I know this?') closely echoes Abraham's question in Genesis 15:8 (LXX: kata ti gnosomai). Yet Abraham's question was met with a covenant ceremony, while Zechariah's is met with rebuke — perhaps because Zechariah asks after receiving angelic revelation inside the temple, a context that should have compelled faith rather than doubt.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 15:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. Gabriel's self-identification is both a rebuke and a credential: 'I stand in the presence of God' — the one doubting is speaking to someone who has come directly from God's throne room. Gabriel appears in the Old Testament only in Daniel 8:16 and 9:21, both times delivering prophetic revelation about God's eschatological timing. The verb euangelisasthai ('to bring good news') is the root of 'gospel' — this birth announcement is gospel proclamation.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 8:16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The Greek idou ('look, listen') introduces the consequence of disbelief. Zechariah's muteness is both sign and discipline — he asked for a sign and received one, though not the kind he wanted. The phrase eis ton kairon auton ('at their proper time') uses kairos, the Greek word for an appointed or decisive moment, not merely chronological time (chronos). God's timing is purposeful.
21. The incense ritual was brief; prolonged absence would cause concern. The verb ethaumazon ('were wondering, were amazed') carries a note of unease — the congregation senses something unusual has occurred. The imperfect tense suggests ongoing, growing wonder.

- 22. The Greek kophos can mean 'deaf' or 'mute' or both. The context (v. 62 suggests he is also deaf, since they make signs to him) indicates both senses may be intended. The verb dianeuein ('making signs, gesturing') paints a vivid scene of the frustrated priest trying to communicate what has happened. The people immediately recognize the signs of a prophetic vision — this was part of Israel's religious memory even after centuries without prophets.
- 23. The Greek leitourgias ('service, ministry') is a technical term for priestly duty — it gives us the English 'liturgy.' Zechariah faithfully completes his week of temple service despite his muteness before returning home, presumably to the hill country of Judea (cf. v. 39).
- 24. Elizabeth's five months of seclusion is unique to Luke and its purpose is debated. Possible reasons include: pious devotion and prayer during the miraculous pregnancy, avoidance of public scrutiny until the pregnancy was unmistakable, or simply a narrative device that allows the sixth month to align with Gabriel's visit to Mary (v. 26). The verb periekryben ('hid herself, kept in seclusion') is intensive.
- 25. Elizabeth's words echo Rachel's response to the birth of Joseph: 'God has taken away my reproach' (Genesis 30:23). Barrenness in the ancient world was a social stigma and was often interpreted as a sign of divine disfavor. The Greek oneidos ('reproach, disgrace') carries the weight of public shame. God's intervention removes not just the biological condition but the social stigma.
- 25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 30:23 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 26. The sixth month refers to the sixth month of Elizabeth's pregnancy, linking the two birth narratives. The scene shifts dramatically from the Jerusalem temple (center of Israel's worship) to Nazareth (an obscure village in Galilee, never mentioned in the Old Testament). This contrast is theologically significant — God's decisive act comes not in the religious capital but in an insignificant town.
- 27. Luke repeats parthenos ('virgin') twice in one verse, emphasizing Mary's virginal status. The phrase ex oikou Dauid ('of the house of David') most naturally modifies Joseph, establishing the Davidic lineage through which Jesus will be the legal heir to David's throne. The name Mariam is the Greek form of the Hebrew Miriam.
- 28. The Greek kecharitomene ('favored one, graced one') is a perfect passive participle of charitoō ('to bestow grace upon'). It indicates Mary has been and continues to be the recipient of God's grace. The Latin Vulgate rendered this gratia plena ('full of grace'), which shaped Catholic theology of Mary. The Greek itself simply indicates that God has graciously chosen her for this role. The KJV addition 'blessed art thou among women' is not in the earliest manuscripts of this verse (it appears in v. 42 from Elizabeth's mouth) and is omitted in the SBLGNT.
- 29. The verb dietarachthe ('was deeply troubled, was thoroughly perplexed') is an intensified form — stronger than Zechariah's tarachthe in v. 12. Notably, Mary is troubled not by the angel's appearance but by his words (epi to logo). She is pondering the theological significance of the greeting, not merely frightened. The imperfect dielozizeto ('was considering, kept wondering') suggests extended reflection.
- 30. The phrase 'found favor with God' (heures charin para to theo) echoes the Old Testament idiom used of Noah (Genesis 6:8), Moses (Exodus 33:12-17), and others whom God chose for significant roles. The word charis ('favor, grace') connects to kecharitomene in v. 28 — the same grace-root appears in both the angel's greeting and his reassurance.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 6:8 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 33:12-17 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 31. The announcement follows the pattern of Old Testament birth oracles: conception, birth, naming (cf. Genesis 16:11, Isaiah 7:14, Judges 13:3-5). The name Iesous (Jesus) is the Greek form of the Hebrew Yeshua ('the LORD saves'). The verb kaleseis ('you will call') — the naming is given to Mary, not to Joseph as in Matthew 1:21, though both parents are involved in the naming.

- 31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Judges 13:3-5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 32. The title 'Son of the Most High' (huios hypsistou) draws on the divine sonship language of the Davidic covenant: 'I will be his father, and he shall be my son' (2 Samuel 7:14). 'Most High' (hypsistos) is a title for God used frequently in the Psalms (Psalm 7:17, 9:2, 21:7, 46:4, 47:2, 50:14). The promise of 'the throne of David his father' directly invokes the Davidic covenant of 2 Samuel 7:12-16 — an eternal dynasty that many believed had been interrupted by the exile.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Samuel 7:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 7:17. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

33. The phrase eis tous aionas ('into the ages, forever') echoes the 'forever' (olam) language of the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7:13, 16). 'The house of Jacob' uses the patriarch's name for Israel, emphasizing covenant continuity. The declaration 'of his kingdom there will be no end' echoes Daniel 7:14, where the Son of Man receives 'an everlasting dominion that will not pass away.' Gabriel's language weaves together Davidic and Danielic messianic expectations.
33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Samuel 7:13 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7:14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
34. Mary's question differs crucially from Zechariah's (v. 18). Zechariah asked 'How can I be sure?' (requesting proof); Mary asks 'How will this happen?' (requesting understanding of the mechanism). The phrase andra ou ginosko ('I do not know a man') uses ginosko in its sexual sense, corresponding to the Hebrew yada. Unlike Zechariah, Mary is not rebuked — her question is met with explanation rather than punishment.
35. The verb episkiasei ('will overshadow') recalls the cloud of God's presence overshadowing the tabernacle (Exodus 40:35, LXX uses the same verb). The language is theophanic, not sexual — God's creative, sheltering presence will bring about the conception. The parallel structure ('Holy Spirit / power of the Most High') is synonymous parallelism, a Hebrew poetic device. 'Son of God' (huios theou) here moves beyond the Davidic covenant title of v. 32 to a more direct claim about divine origin.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 40:35 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
36. The Greek syggenis ('relative, kinswoman') does not specify the exact relationship — the KJV's 'cousin' is too specific. This kinship between Mary and Elizabeth creates a connection between the priestly family (Elizabeth, descendant of Aaron) and the Davidic family (Mary, through Joseph's lineage). Elizabeth's pregnancy serves as a confirmatory sign for Mary, though Mary did not ask for one.
37. This echoes Genesis 18:14 (LXX), where God says to Abraham regarding Sarah's promised pregnancy: 'Is anything impossible with God?' The Greek rhema ('word, thing, matter') carries the double sense of both 'word' and 'deed' — God's word and God's act are one. What God speaks, he accomplishes.
37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 18:14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
38. Mary's response doule kyriou ('servant/slave of the Lord') is a title of honor in the Old Testament — Moses, David, and the prophets are called 'servants of the LORD.' The optative genoito ('let it be, may it happen') expresses willing consent, not passive resignation. Mary actively submits to God's plan. Her response contrasts sharply with Zechariah's doubt — she accepts the impossible on the basis of God's word alone.
39. The Greek meta spoudes ('with haste, with urgency') suggests eagerness rather than anxiety — Mary rushes to see the sign Gabriel mentioned. The hill country of Judah is south of Jerusalem, a journey of roughly 80-100 miles from Nazareth in Galilee, requiring several days of travel. The traditional identification is Ein Karem, west of Jerusalem.
40. The verb espasato ('greeted') is a standard greeting verb, but in context it triggers the extraordinary response of vv. 41-45. Mary's greeting becomes the catalyst for prophetic revelation — the sound of her voice causes the Spirit-filled response in both the unborn John and his mother.
41. The verb eskirtesen ('leaped, jumped for joy') is used in the Septuagint for joyful leaping (cf. Malachi 4:2, Genesis 25:22). This fulfills the angel's promise that John would be 'filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb' (v. 15). The unborn John's response to the presence of the unborn Jesus is Luke's first indication of Jesus's significance — recognized even before birth.
41. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Malachi 4:2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
41. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 25:22. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
42. The verb anephonesen ('cried out, exclaimed') with krauge megale ('a great shout') indicates Spirit-empowered prophetic speech, not casual conversation. 'Blessed among women' (eulogemene su en gynaixin) echoes the praise given to Jael in Judges 5:24 — a woman who played a decisive role in God's deliverance of Israel. 'Fruit of the womb' is a Semitic idiom for a child (cf. Deuteronomy 7:13, 28:4).
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Judges 5:24. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 7:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. Elizabeth's question pothen moi touto ('from where is this to me?') echoes David's response when the ark of the covenant was brought to him: 'How can the ark of the Lord come to me?' (2 Samuel 6:9). The parallel suggests that Mary, carrying Jesus, is analogous to the ark carrying God's presence. The title 'my Lord' (tou kyriou mou) applied to the unborn Jesus is a remarkable christological confession — Elizabeth recognizes the child Mary carries as her Lord.

43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Samuel 6:9 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. Elizabeth interprets her baby's movement as joyful recognition — eskirtesen en agalliasai ('leaped with exultation'). The word agalliasis ('exultation, great joy') is the same term used in v. 14 for the joy John would bring. John's prophetic role — pointing to Jesus — begins in the womb.
45. The Greek makaria ('blessed, happy, fortunate') pronounces a blessing on Mary's faith. The contrast with Zechariah's unbelief (v. 20) is implicit — Mary believed and is blessed; Zechariah doubted and was struck mute. The noun teleiosis ('fulfillment, completion, accomplishment') emphasizes that God's words will reach their intended completion.
46. The Magnificat (vv. 46-55) is traditionally named from the Latin translation of megalynei ('magnifies'). This hymn draws extensively on Hannah's prayer in 1 Samuel 2:1-10, which also celebrated God's reversal of the powerful and the lowly. 'My soul magnifies' means 'my whole being declares the greatness of' — the verb megalyno means to make great, to enlarge, to declare the greatness of someone.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Samuel 2:1-10. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
47. The parallel 'my soul / my spirit' is synonymous parallelism — Hebrew poetic form in Greek garb. The aorist egalliasen ('rejoiced') alongside the present megalynei ('magnifies') may express a past moment of joy that continues into the present. 'God my Savior' (to theo to soteri mou) echoes Habakkuk 3:18 and Psalm 24:5 (LXX). Mary identifies God specifically as her Savior.
47. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Samuel 2:1-10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

47. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 24:5. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
48. The Greek tapeinosin ('humble state, low position') echoes Hannah's prayer — God attends to the lowly. Mary's self-designation as doule ('servant, slave') repeats her response in v. 38. The prophecy 'all generations will call me blessed' (makariouein me pasai hai geneai) has been remarkably fulfilled across two millennia of Christian tradition.
48. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Samuel 2:1-10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
49. The title ho dynatos ('the Mighty One, the Powerful One') echoes Zephaniah 3:17 and Psalm 24:8. 'Holy is his name' (hagion to onoma autou) echoes Psalm 111:9 (LXX). The structure shifts from personal testimony (what God has done for me) to universal declaration (God's character and actions in history).
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Samuel 2:1-10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Zephaniah 3:17. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.

49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 111:9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
50. The Greek eleos ('mercy') here corresponds to the Hebrew chesed in the Septuagint tradition, though the Magnificat uses the simpler term rather than the full covenantal weight of chesed. 'Those who fear him' (tois phoboumenois auton) refers to reverent awe and covenant faithfulness, not terror. 'From generation to generation' (eis geneas kai geneas) echoes Psalm 103:17.
50. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Samuel 2:1-10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
50. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 103:17 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
51. The 'arm of the LORD' is a consistent Old Testament metaphor for divine power in action, especially in the Exodus (Exodus 6:6, Deuteronomy 4:34, Isaiah 51:9). The aorist tense epoiesen ('he has done') may be a 'prophetic aorist' — speaking of future divine acts as though already accomplished. 'Scattered the proud' (dieskorpisen hyperephanous) draws on the theme of God humbling the arrogant (cf. Psalm 89:10, Isaiah 2:12-17).

52. This is the central reversal theme of the Magnificat, directly paralleling Hannah's song: 'The LORD makes poor and makes rich; he brings low, he also exalts' (1 Samuel 2:7). The Greek dynastas ('rulers, those in power') and tapeinous ('the lowly, the humble') form a deliberate contrast. Mary, a peasant girl from Nazareth, embodies the humble whom God exalts.
52. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Samuel 2:1-10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
53. The reversal continues: hungry filled, rich emptied. This echoes 1 Samuel 2:5 ('those who were full hire themselves out for bread, but those who were hungry cease to hunger'). Luke's Gospel will develop this theme extensively — the Beatitudes (6:20-26), the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (16:19-31), and Jesus's teaching on wealth throughout.
53. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Samuel 2:1-10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
54. The verb antelabeto ('has helped, has come to the aid of') implies taking someone by the hand to support them. Israel is called God's pais ('servant, child'), echoing Isaiah's servant language (Isaiah 41:8-9, 'you, Israel, my servant'). 'In remembrance of his mercy' (mnesthenai eleous) means God is acting because he remembers his covenant commitment — divine memory in the Old Testament is always linked to covenant action.

55. The Magnificat concludes with explicit reference to the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 12:1-3, 17:7-8, 22:17-18). The Greek sperma ('seed, offspring') is the same term used in the Septuagint for the covenant promises to Abraham. Mary understands the child she carries as the fulfillment of promises made to Abraham — a covenant arc spanning two thousand years. The phrase eis ton aiona ('forever, into the age') corresponds to the Hebrew olam.
55. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Samuel 2:1-10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
55. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 12:1-3 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
56. Three months would bring Elizabeth to full term (she was in her sixth month when Mary arrived, v. 26). Luke does not explicitly state whether Mary was present for John's birth — the narrative leaves this ambiguous. The phrase hos menas treis ('about three months') with the approximating hos suggests Luke is reporting a round number rather than an exact duration.
57. The phrase eplesthe ho chronos ('the time was fulfilled') echoes Genesis 25:24 (Rebekah) and uses the language of fullness and completion — God's timing has reached its appointed moment. The narrative moves swiftly and simply, as is typical of biblical birth accounts.
57. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 25:24. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
58. The verb emegalynen ('had made great, had magnified') echoes Mary's megalynai ('magnifies') in v. 46 — the same root appears in the community's recognition of God's mercy toward Elizabeth. The Greek eleos ('mercy') again corresponds to the Hebrew chesed. The communal rejoicing fulfills the angel's promise in v. 14 that 'many will rejoice at his birth.'
59. Circumcision on the eighth day follows the command of Genesis 17:12 and Leviticus 12:3. The naming at circumcision was customary practice. The imperfect ekalon ('they were calling, they were going to name') indicates an attempt that will be interrupted — the community assumed the child would follow the common pattern of being named after his father.
59. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 17:12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
59. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 12:3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
60. Elizabeth's emphatic ouchi ('No!') and her knowledge of the divinely appointed name is striking — Zechariah has been mute and presumably unable to communicate the angel's instructions in detail. Whether she learned the name from Zechariah through written communication or through her own Spirit-filled insight (v. 41) is not stated. Her insistence overrides social convention.
61. The community's objection reveals the social expectation that names should stay within the family. The Greek syggeneia ('kindred, family, relatives') emphasizes the clan identity system. Naming a child outside the family's traditional names was unusual and would require explanation.
62. That they make signs (enenuon, 'were gesturing') to Zechariah rather than simply speaking to him suggests he was deaf as well as mute — the Greek kophos in v. 22 can mean both. This detail confirms that the affliction was comprehensive, making Zechariah's restoration all the more dramatic.

63. The Greek pinakidion ('writing tablet') was a small wax-coated board used for notes. Zechariah's written confirmation of Elizabeth's declaration — without any prior consultation possible given his deafness — demonstrates divine orchestration. His phrasing 'his name is John' (Ioannes estin onoma autou) uses the present tense 'is' rather than 'shall be,' indicating the name has already been divinely assigned.
64. The passive aneoichthe ('was opened') indicates divine action — God removes the discipline at the moment of obedient faith. Zechariah's first words after months of silence are praise (eulogon ton theon, 'blessing God'). The verb elalei (imperfect, 'he was speaking, he began to speak') suggests continuous speech — the dam breaks and words pour out.
65. The 'fear' (phobos) that comes upon the community is reverential awe in the presence of the divine — the same response as Zechariah's in v. 12. The imperfect passive dialaetto ('were being discussed, were being talked about') indicates ongoing, widespread conversation. The phrase panta ta remata tauta ('all these words/events') uses rhema in its Semitic sense of both 'word' and 'event.'
66. The phrase ethento en te kardia auton ('placed in their hearts') echoes Mary's response in 2:19 and 2:51 — treasuring events in the heart is Luke's motif for those who are pondering God's actions. 'The hand of the Lord was with him' (cheir kyriou en met autou) is an Old Testament expression for divine empowerment and protection (cf. 1 Samuel 5:6, 2 Kings 3:15, Ezra 7:9).

67. Like Elizabeth (v. 41), Zechariah is filled with the Holy Spirit for prophetic speech. The verb epropheteusen ('prophesied') identifies the Benedictus (vv. 68-79) as Spirit-inspired prophecy, not merely personal praise. After months of enforced silence, Zechariah's first extended speech is prophetic proclamation.
68. The Benedictus (vv. 68-79) opens with a traditional Jewish blessing formula: eulogetos kyrios ('blessed be the Lord'), corresponding to the Hebrew baruk YHWH. The verb epeskepsato ('has visited') carries the sense of God paying attention, inspecting, and acting on behalf of his people (cf. Exodus 4:31, Ruth 1:6). The noun lytrosis ('redemption') is liberation through the payment of a ransom — language rooted in the Exodus and in the go'el (kinsman-redeemer) tradition.

68. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Ruth 1:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
69. The 'horn of salvation' (keras soterias) is a metaphor drawn from the powerful horns of animals — it signifies strength and power to save (cf. Psalm 18:2, 2 Samuel 22:3). 'In the house of David his servant' identifies this salvation as fulfillment of the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7). Zechariah, a priest, celebrates God's act through the royal line — priestly and royal streams converge in this moment.
69. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 18:2. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
69. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Samuel 22:3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
69. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Samuel 7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
70. The phrase ap aionos ('from of old, from the age, since ancient times') emphasizes the long-standing nature of God's prophetic promises. The prophets are described as God's mouthpiece — 'through the mouth of' (dia stomatos) indicates that the words were God's, spoken through human agents. This is Luke's articulation of prophetic inspiration.
71. The language of salvation from enemies (soterian ex echthron) echoes the Psalms of deliverance (Psalm 18:3, 17; 106:10). In Zechariah's immediate context, the 'enemies' would include Roman occupation and Herodian oppression, but the Benedictus will soon reveal a deeper spiritual dimension to this salvation (v. 77). The phrase is deliberately broad enough to encompass both political and spiritual deliverance.
71. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 18:3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
72. The Greek eleos ('mercy') here carries the force of the Hebrew chesed — covenantal mercy shown to the fathers. The Greek diathekes ('covenant') translates the Hebrew berit. The phrase 'remember his holy covenant' does not mean God had forgotten but that he is now acting on what he has always remembered — divine remembering is covenant activation (cf. Genesis 8:1, Exodus 2:24).
72. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 8:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

- 72. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 2:24. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 73. The reference to God's oath (horkon) to Abraham points to Genesis 22:16-18, where God swears by himself (since there is no one greater to swear by) after the near-sacrifice of Isaac. This is the most solemn form of divine commitment in the Old Testament — an oath-bound covenant. The author of Hebrews will later develop this same point (Hebrews 6:13-18).
- 73. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 22:16-18 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 74. The verb latreuein ('to serve, to worship') is the Septuagint's standard term for priestly or liturgical service to God. The purpose of deliverance is not mere freedom but worship — Israel is rescued from enemies so that they can serve God. This echoes the Exodus pattern: 'Let my people go so that they may serve me' (Exodus 7:16, 8:1, 9:1). Rescue is the means; worship is the goal.
- 74. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 7:16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 75. The pair hosioteiti kai dikaiosyne ('holiness and righteousness') describes the complete character of covenant faithfulness — devotion toward God (holiness) and right conduct toward others (righteousness). The phrase 'all our days' (pasais tais hemerai hemon) envisions a lifelong pattern, not momentary piety.
- 76. Zechariah now turns from God's covenant faithfulness (vv. 68-75) to his own son's role. 'Prophet of the Most High' (prophetes hypsistou) parallels the title 'Son of the Most High' given to Jesus in v. 32. John's role is defined by the phrase from Malachi 3:1 and Isaiah 40:3 — the forerunner who prepares the way. The ambiguity of kyrios ('Lord') is significant — it could refer to God or to the Messiah. In context, it likely refers to Jesus, making Zechariah's prophecy a remarkable theological claim.
- 76. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Malachi 3:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 76. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 40:3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 77. Here Zechariah redefines the 'salvation' he has been celebrating. After the martial language of vv. 71 and 74 (enemies, deliverance), the climactic definition is: salvation through forgiveness of sins (en aphesei hamartion). The Greek aphesis ('release, forgiveness, pardon') is the Septuagint word for the liberation of the Jubilee year (Leviticus 25:10) — forgiveness is portrayed as release from bondage.
- 77. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 25:10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 78. The Greek splanchna eleous ('bowels/depths of mercy') is intensely physical — splanchna refers to the internal organs, the seat of deepest emotion in ancient thought. The word anatole ('rising, dawn, dayspring') can mean either 'sunrise' or 'branch/shoot' (cf. Jeremiah 23:5, Zechariah 3:8, where the Hebrew tsemach, 'branch,' is rendered anatole in the Septuagint). The ambiguity may be intentional — the coming one is both the Messianic Branch and the dawning light.
- 78. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 23:5 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 78. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Zechariah 3:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 79. This verse echoes Isaiah 9:2 ('the people who walked in darkness have seen a great light') and Psalm 107:10 ('those who sat in darkness and in the shadow of death'). The Greek skia thanatou ('shadow of death') translates the Hebrew tsalmaveth, the deep darkness of Sheol and despair. The Benedictus concludes with eirene ('peace'), corresponding to the Hebrew shalom — not merely absence of conflict but the fullness of well-being that comes when God's covenant purposes are fulfilled.
- 79. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 9:2. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 79. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 107:10. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 80. This summary verse parallels the growth notices for Samuel (1 Samuel 2:26) and will be echoed for Jesus (2:40, 52). The phrase en tais eremois ('in the wilderness areas') suggests John lived in the Judean desert, perhaps near the Dead Sea, before beginning his public ministry. The noun anadeixeos ('public appearance, showing forth, commissioning') occurs only here in the New Testament and suggests a formal appointment or public presentation — John's ministry did not begin gradually but with a definitive public emergence.
- 80. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Samuel 2:26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

Summary: Luke 2 narrates the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem during a Roman census under Augustus, the angelic announcement to shepherds, the presentation of the infant Jesus at the Jerusalem temple where Simeon and Anna recognize him as the promised Messiah, and a childhood episode where the twelve-year-old Jesus is found teaching in the temple. The chapter contains the Gloria in Excelsis (the angels' song, v. 14) and the Nunc Dimittis (Simeon's prayer, vv. 29-32), both rendered as poetry.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke alone sets the birth of Jesus within the framework of Roman imperial history — the census of Augustus becomes the mechanism by which Davidic prophecy is fulfilled (Micah 5:2). The announcement comes to shepherds, the lowest rung of society, not to priests or rulers. Simeon's Nunc Dimittis introduces the universal scope of salvation ('a light for revelation to the Gentiles') alongside its Jewish fulfillment ('glory for your people Israel'). Anna, one of only a few named female prophets in the Bible, confirms Simeon's testimony. The chapter ends with the only canonical account of Jesus's childhood.

Translation Friction: The census under Quirinius (v. 2) presents a well-known historical difficulty — Quirinius's known census occurred in AD 6, after Herod's death (4 BC). Scholars have proposed various solutions; we render the Greek as given without harmonizing. The phrase 'firstborn son' (v. 7) describes birth order, not a claim about subsequent children. The 'manger' (phatne) could refer to a feeding trough or an animal stall. We render transparently and note the range.

Connections: The Bethlehem birth fulfills Micah 5:2. The shepherds connect to David's own origins as a Bethlehem shepherd (1 Samuel 16). Simeon's language draws on Isaiah 42:6, 49:6 (light to the nations), and Isaiah 52:10 (salvation before all peoples). The temple presentation follows Exodus 13:2, 12 and Leviticus 12:1-8. Jesus in the temple at age twelve anticipates his adult ministry and echoes Samuel's temple childhood (1 Samuel 2-3).

¹In those days a decree went out from Caesar Augustus that the whole empire should be registered. ²This was the first registration, taken when Quirinius was governing Syria. ³So everyone went to be registered, each to his own city. ⁴Joseph also went up from Galilee, from the city of Nazareth, to Judea, to the city of David called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and family of David, ⁵Indeed, to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being remarkable with child. ⁶While they were there, the time came for her to give birth. ⁷She gave birth to her firstborn son, wrapped him in strips of cloth, and laid him in a feeding trough, because there was no room for them in the guest quarters. ⁸In that same region there were shepherds living out in the fields, keeping watch over their flock by night. ⁹An angel of the Lord stood before them, and the glory of the Lord shone around them, and they were terrified. ¹⁰The angel said to them, "Do not be afraid, for I bring you good news of great joy that will be for all the people. ¹¹For today in the city of David a Savior has been born for you, who is Christ the Lord. ¹²And this will be the sign for you: you will find a baby wrapped in strips of cloth and lying in a feeding trough." ¹³And suddenly there appeared with the angel a multitude of the heavenly army, praising God and saying,

¹⁴"Glory to God in the highest heaven, and on earth peace among those on whom his favor rests."

¹⁵When the angels had gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said to one another, "Let us go over to Bethlehem and see this thing that has happened, which the Lord has made known to us." ¹⁶They hurried off and found Mary and Joseph, and the baby lying in the feeding trough. ¹⁷When they had seen this, they made known what had been told them about this child. ¹⁸And all who heard it were amazed at what the shepherds told them. ¹⁹But Mary treasured all these things, pondering them in her heart. ²⁰The shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for everything they had heard and seen, just as it had been told them. ²¹When eight days had passed and it was time for his circumcision, he was named Jesus — the name given by the angel before he was conceived in the womb. ²²When the time required for her purification as the law of Moses required was completed, they brought him to Jerusalem, to dedicate him to the Lord;. ²³(As it is written in the law of the Lord, Every male that openeth the womb will be known as holy to the Lord;). ²⁴Or two young pigeons, to offer a sacrifice

according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtledoves. ²⁵Now there was a man in Jerusalem named Simeon. This man was righteous and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel, and the Holy Spirit was upon him. ²⁶It had been revealed to him by the Holy Spirit that he would not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ. ²⁷Guided by the Spirit, he came into the temple courts. When the parents brought in the child Jesus to do for him what was customary under the law, ²⁸Simeon took him in his arms and blessed God, saying,

²⁹"Now, Master, you are releasing your servant in peace,
according to your word,

³⁰Because mine eyes have seen your salvation,. ³¹Which you have prepared before the face of all people. ³²A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of your those present Israel. ³³His father and mother were amazed at what was being said about him. ³⁴Then Simeon blessed them and said to Mary his mother, "This child is destined for the falling and rising of many in Israel, and to be a sign that will be opposed — ³⁵(Yea, a sword will pierce by way of your own soul also,) that the thoughts of numerous hearts may be revealed. ³⁶There was also a prophetess named Anna, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher. She was very advanced in years, having lived with her husband for seven years after her marriage, ³⁷She was a widow of concerning fourscore and four years, which departed not from the sanctuary, but served God with fastings and prayers after dark and time. ³⁸Coming up at that very hour, she began to give thanks to God and to speak about him to all who were waiting for the redemption of Jerusalem. ³⁹When they had completed everything required by the law of the Lord, they returned to Galilee, to their own city of Nazareth. ⁴⁰The child grew and became strong, being filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon him. ⁴¹His parents went to Jerusalem every year for the Festival of Passover. ⁴²When he was twelve years old, they went up according to the custom of the festival. ⁴³After the days of the festival were completed, as they were returning, the boy Jesus stayed behind in Jerusalem, but his parents did not know it. ⁴⁴Assuming he was in the caravan, they traveled a day's journey and then began looking for him among their relatives and acquaintances. ⁴⁵When they did not find him, they returned to Jerusalem, searching for him. ⁴⁶After three days they found him in the temple, sitting among the teachers, listening to them and asking them questions. ⁴⁷All who heard him were astonished at his understanding and his answers. ⁴⁸When his parents saw him, they were overwhelmed. His mother said to him, "Child, why have you treated us like this? Your father and I have been searching for you in great distress." ⁴⁹He said to them, "Why were you searching for me? Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house?" ⁵⁰But they did not understand what he said to them. ⁵¹Then he went down with them and came to Nazareth and was obedient to them. And his mother treasured all these things in her heart. ⁵²And Jesus grew in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and people.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek oikoumene ('the inhabited world') refers in practice to the Roman Empire. The verb apographesthai ('to be registered, to be enrolled') refers to a census for taxation purposes, not taxation itself — the KJV's 'taxed' is misleading. Luke frames the birth of the true King within the imperial machinery of a false one — Augustus claimed divine titles (son of god, savior, bringer of peace) that Luke will attribute to Jesus.
2. The Greek haute apographe prote ('this registration was the first') could also be rendered 'this registration took place before Quirinius was governing Syria' (taking prote as 'before' with a genitive absolute, as in John 15:18). The standard reading identifies this as the first of its kind under Quirinius. The historical difficulty — Quirinius's documented census was in AD 6-7, after Herod's death — remains unresolved among scholars. Luke may be referring to an earlier administrative role of Quirinius not otherwise attested.
3. Registration at one's ancestral city (rather than place of residence) reflects either a Jewish or Egyptian census practice — Roman censuses typically registered people where they lived. Luke presents this as the mechanism by which Joseph, a Galilean resident, must travel to Bethlehem, fulfilling the Davidic birthplace prophecy.
4. The verb anebe ('went up') is geographically literal — Bethlehem is at a higher elevation than Nazareth, and one always 'goes up' to Judea from Galilee. 'City of David' (polin Daudid) identifies Bethlehem as David's birthplace (1 Samuel 16:1, 17:12), distinct from Jerusalem, which is also called 'the city of David' (2 Samuel 5:7). Luke establishes Davidic lineage through Joseph, the legal father.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Samuel 16:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Samuel 5:7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.

5. The Greek emnesteuomene ('pledged in marriage, betrothed') is the same term used in 1:27. Luke does not say 'his wife' here (some manuscripts add gynaiki, 'wife,' but the SBLGNT does not include it). The phrase ouse enkuo ('being pregnant') states the fact directly. The journey from Nazareth to Bethlehem — approximately 80-90 miles — would have been arduous for a woman near full term.
6. The phrase eplesthesan hai hemera ('the days were fulfilled') uses the same fullness-of-time language seen in 1:57 for Elizabeth. The narrative is compressed — Luke does not specify how long they had been in Bethlehem before the birth. God's timing moves through the machinery of Roman bureaucracy to fulfill ancient prophecy.
7. The Greek prototokos ('firstborn') is a legal and cultural designation indicating rights and status, not necessarily implying subsequent children. The verb esparganosen ('wrapped in swaddling bands') describes the ancient practice of tightly wrapping a newborn in strips of cloth. The Greek phatne ('manger, feeding trough') is where animals eat — the word itself emphasizes the humble circumstances. The Greek katalyma ('guest room, lodging') is not the word for a commercial inn (pandocheion, which Luke uses in 10:34); it likely refers to the guest room of a private home, which was already occupied.
8. The Greek agraoulountes ('living in the fields, camping out') indicates these shepherds were sleeping outdoors with their flocks, not merely working during the day. Shepherds occupied one of the lowest social positions — they were considered unreliable as legal witnesses and were often suspected of grazing their flocks on others' land. That God's announcement comes to them first is theologically significant for Luke's Gospel, which consistently elevates the lowly.
9. The verb epeste ('stood before, appeared suddenly') indicates a sudden, startling appearance. The 'glory of the Lord' (doxa kyriou) is the visible manifestation of God's presence — the same term used for the cloud that filled the tabernacle (Exodus 40:34) and Solomon's temple (1 Kings 8:11). The phrase ephobethesav phobon megan (literally 'they feared a great fear') is a Semitic intensifying construction indicating extreme terror.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 40:34. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Kings 8:11. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The verb euangelizomai ('I bring good news, I announce gospel') is the same verb used of Gabriel's announcement to Zechariah (1:19). The 'great joy' (charan megalen) echoes the joy theme from chapter 1 (1:14, 44, 47). 'All the people' (panti to lao) in context refers primarily to Israel, though Luke's Gospel will extend this joy to all nations.
11. Three titles are stacked: soter ('Savior'), christos ('Christ/Messiah'), and kyrios ('Lord'). Each would have carried enormous weight. 'Savior' was a title used for Augustus Caesar; 'Christ' is the Greek form of Hebrew mashiach; 'Lord' (kyrios) is the Septuagint's standard rendering of YHWH. The combination 'Christ the Lord' (christos kyrios) is unique in the New Testament and may echo the Psalms of Solomon 17:32, a Jewish messianic text. The announcement to shepherds in the city of David is richly ironic — David was himself a shepherd from Bethlehem.
12. The 'sign' (semeion) is deliberately humble — not a cosmic portent but a baby in a feeding trough. The sign confirms the message by its very ordinariness combined with its specificity. The juxtaposition of the exalted titles (Savior, Christ, Lord) with the humble sign (a wrapped infant in an animal's feeding trough) is one of the most powerful contrasts in the New Testament.
13. The Greek stratias ouraniou ('heavenly army, heavenly host') is a military term — these are not gentle cherubs but the army of heaven. The same phrase is used in the Septuagint for the 'host of heaven' (tseva hashamayim) that surrounds God's throne. Their appearance 'suddenly' (exaiphnes) emphasizes the supernatural character of the event.
14. The Gloria in Excelsis is structured in two parallel lines: heaven/earth, God/humanity. The Greek en anthropois eudokias ('among people of [his] favor/good pleasure') follows the SBLGNT reading with the genitive eudokias rather than the nominative eudokia. This means 'among those whom God favors' rather than 'good will toward people.' The Dead Sea Scrolls use similar language — 'sons of his good pleasure' (benei retsono). 'Peace' (eirene) corresponds to the Hebrew shalom — the full vision of wholeness and flourishing that the Messiah brings.
15. The Greek rhema ('word, thing, event') again carries the dual meaning of word and event — what God has spoken has become an event they can go and see. The shepherds' immediate response echoes the pattern of faith-in-action seen in Mary (1:38) and Joseph (Matthew 1:24). The verb egnorisen ('has made known, has revealed') emphasizes that this is divine disclosure, not human discovery.
16. The verb speusantes ('having hurried') shows the urgency of their response — like Mary's haste to visit Elizabeth (1:39). The verb aneuran ('found, discovered after searching') suggests some effort was required to locate them. The order 'Mary and Joseph' places Mary first, consistent with Luke's emphasis on her role throughout the birth narrative.
17. The shepherds become the first evangelists — they 'made known' (egnorisan) the message, using the same verb used of God's disclosure to them (v. 15). The pattern is clear: God reveals, recipients believe, and believers proclaim. The shepherds are transformed from passive recipients of a message to active proclaimers of it.
18. The verb ethaumasas ('were amazed, were astonished') describes the natural response to extraordinary news. Luke frequently notes the amazement of crowds (cf. 1:63, 4:22, 8:25, 9:43, 11:14). The response is wonder but not yet faith — amazement is a starting point, not an endpoint.
19. The verb syneterei ('was keeping safe, was treasuring') implies careful preservation. The verb syballousa ('pondering, putting together, comparing') suggests active reflection — Mary is connecting the dots between Gabriel's announcement, Elizabeth's prophecy, and now the shepherds' report. This verse (and its parallel in v. 51) has been seen as a possible indication that Luke's source for the birth narrative was Mary herself.

- 20. The phrase 'just as it had been told them' (kathos elalethe pros autois) confirms the exact fulfillment of the angelic sign — they found everything precisely as described. The shepherds' response of glorifying and praising God becomes a model for the proper response to encountering God's salvation in Luke's Gospel.
- 21. As with John (1:59), circumcision and naming occur on the eighth day (Genesis 17:12, Leviticus 12:3). Luke emphasizes that the name was divinely given (through the angel, 1:31) before conception — the child's identity and mission were established before his existence. The name Iesous (Jesus/Yeshua, 'the LORD saves') is now formally conferred.

- 21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Leviticus 12:3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 22. The SBLGNT reads auton ('their') rather than autes ('her'), though the purification ritual in Leviticus 12 applies specifically to the mother. Luke may use 'their' to include the family's broader obligation or to connect the purification with the presentation of the firstborn. The purification period for a male child was forty days (Leviticus 12:2-4). 'Present him to the Lord' reflects Exodus 13:2, 12 — every firstborn male belongs to God.
- 22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 13:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 23. This quotation draws on Exodus 13:2, 12, 15. The phrase 'opens the womb' (dianoigon metran) is the standard biblical idiom for a firstborn child. The consecration of the firstborn to God commemorates the Passover, when God spared Israel's firstborn in Egypt. The irony for Luke's reader is rich — this child who is 'called holy to the Lord' is in fact the Lord's own Son.
- 23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 13:2 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 24. The offering of birds rather than a lamb (Leviticus 12:8) is the provision for families too poor to afford the standard offering of a lamb plus a pigeon. This detail quietly establishes the family's economic status — Jesus is born into poverty. The same law that allows the poor person's offering is the one Mary and Joseph follow, and Luke notes it without comment.
- 24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 12:8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 25. Simeon is described with four characteristics: dikaios ('righteous' — covenant faithfulness), eulabes ('devout, reverent' — careful in religious observance), prosdechomenos paraklesis tou Israel ('waiting for the consolation of Israel' — messianic expectation), and Spirit-empowered. 'The consolation of Israel' (paraklesis tou Israel) draws on Isaiah 40:1 ('Comfort, comfort my people') — the promised end of exile and restoration of God's people.
- 25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 40:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 26. The Greek kechrematismenon ('had been divinely warned, had received an oracle') is a technical term for divine communication, often through dreams or oracles. 'The Lord's Christ' (ton christon kyriou) corresponds to the Hebrew mashiach YHWH ('the LORD's anointed'), the specific title for the Davidic king chosen by God (cf. 1 Samuel 24:6, 26:9, 2 Samuel 1:14). Simeon has received a personal promise that he will live to see the Messiah.
- 26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Samuel 24:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Samuel 1:14. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 27. The phrase en to pneumati ('in the Spirit, by the Spirit') indicates Spirit-directed action — Simeon did not come to the temple by coincidence but by divine leading. Luke calls Joseph and Mary 'the parents' (tous goneis), a natural designation that does not contradict the virgin birth but reflects the social and legal reality. The meeting appears coincidental but is orchestrated by the Spirit.
- 28. The verb edexato ('received, took, welcomed') combined with 'into his arms' (eis tas ankalas) creates a tender image — an elderly man cradling a newborn. His first response is to bless God (eulogesen ton theon), not to bless the child, acknowledging that this moment is God's gift to him.
- 29. The Nunc Dimittis (vv. 29-32), named from the Latin 'now you dismiss,' is Simeon's prayer of departure. The address despota ('Master, Sovereign') is stronger than kyrios — it implies absolute authority, as of a master over a slave. The verb apolyeis ('you are releasing, you are dismissing') uses language of freeing a slave or sentinel from duty. Simeon views his life as a watch that is now fulfilled — he can die in peace because he has seen what God promised.
- 30. The Greek soterion ('salvation, saving act') is not abstract — Simeon has seen it embodied in a six-week-old infant. The phrase echoes Isaiah 52:10, 'All the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.' What Simeon holds in his arms is what Isaiah prophesied the nations would witness.

- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 52:10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 31. The phrase kata prosopon panton ton laon ('before the face of all peoples') is crucial — the plural 'peoples' (laon) extends salvation beyond Israel to all nations. This universalism echoes Isaiah 52:10 and prepares for the explicit statement in the next verse. Simeon's horizon is not merely Jewish but global.
- 31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 52:10. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 32. The two parallel lines define salvation's dual scope: 'light for revelation to the Gentiles' (drawing on Isaiah 42:6 and 49:6, the Servant Songs) and 'glory to your people Israel.' The Greek ethnon ('nations, Gentiles') is placed first — a striking priority in a Jewish prayer. The 'light' imagery echoes Isaiah 9:2 and the Benedictus (1:78-79). Luke's Gospel will develop both dimensions — salvation for Israel and salvation for all nations.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 42:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 9:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The SBLGNT reads ho pater autou ('his father') rather than 'Joseph,' which some manuscripts substitute to protect the doctrine of the virgin birth. Luke uses 'father' naturally to describe Joseph's social and legal role. The imperfect thaumazontes ('were amazed, kept marveling') suggests ongoing astonishment — each new revelation about their child adds to their wonder.
- 34. After the joyful Nunc Dimittis, Simeon's tone darkens. The Greek ptosin kai anastasin ('falling and rising') indicates that this child will be a dividing figure — some will stumble and fall because of him, others will be raised up. The order (falling before rising) may be deliberate. 'A sign opposed' (semeion antilegomenon) foreshadows the rejection Jesus will face. Simeon addresses Mary specifically, not Joseph — the next verse will explain why.
- 35. The Greek rhomphaia ('sword, large sword') is not the common machaira but a large, broad sword — the imagery is of devastating penetration. This is traditionally understood as a prophecy of Mary's suffering at the cross (John 19:25-27). The purpose clause 'so that thoughts of many hearts may be revealed' indicates that Jesus's ministry and its opposition will force people to reveal their true loyalties — he will expose what is hidden in human hearts.
- 36. Anna (Greek form of the Hebrew Hannah) is one of the few women in the Bible explicitly called a 'prophetess' (prophetis), joining Miriam (Exodus 15:20), Deborah (Judges 4:4), Huldah (2 Kings 22:14), and Isaiah's wife (Isaiah 8:3). Her tribe, Asher, was one of the ten 'lost' northern tribes — her presence in Jerusalem shows that not all Israelites of the northern tribes were lost. Luke provides remarkably detailed biographical information, emphasizing her as a credible witness.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 15:20. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Judges 4:4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Kings 22:14. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 8:3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 37. The phrase heos eton ogdoekonta tessaron could mean 'a widow for eighty-four years' (making her about 105 years old) or 'a widow until the age of eighty-four.' Either reading depicts extraordinary longevity and devotion. 'Never left the temple' (ouk aphistato tou hierou) is likely a hyperbole for constant attendance rather than literal residence. Her worship of fasting and prayer 'night and day' identifies her as a living embodiment of the faithful remnant who waited for God's redemption.
- 38. The phrase aute te hora ('at that very hour') emphasizes the providential timing — Anna arrives at precisely the right moment. The verb anthomologeito ('was giving thanks, was praising') is a compound form intensifying the thanksgiving. Those 'waiting for the redemption of Jerusalem' (prosdchomenois lutrosin Ierousalem) parallels those 'waiting for the consolation of Israel' (v. 25) — a circle of faithful Jews who held to the messianic hope. The noun lutrosin ('redemption') echoes Zechariah's Benedictus (1:68).
- 39. Luke compresses the narrative significantly — Matthew's account includes the visit of the magi and the flight to Egypt between the temple presentation and the return to Nazareth. Luke does not mention these events, nor does he explicitly contradict them; he simply moves from one episode to the next. The emphasis on completing 'everything required by the law' (panta ta kata ton nomon) underscores the family's faithful Torah observance.
- 40. This growth summary parallels the one for John (1:80) and echoes Samuel's growth (1 Samuel 2:26). The SBLGNT does not include 'in spirit' (pneumati), which appears in some manuscripts, likely imported from 1:80. The phrase 'filled with wisdom' (pleroumenon sophia) is distinctive — where John grew strong 'in spirit,' Jesus grows in 'wisdom.' The grace of God (charis theou) covering the child echoes the favored-one language of Mary's own calling (1:28).

- 40. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Samuel 2:26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 41. The Torah required all Israelite males to appear before the Lord three times a year: at Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles (Exodus 23:14-17, Deuteronomy 16:16). That Mary also went reflects pious devotion beyond the legal minimum. The imperfect eporeuonto ('used to go, went regularly') indicates habitual practice.
- 41. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 23:14-17. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 41. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 16:16. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 42. Age twelve was significant in Jewish tradition — it was the year before a boy assumed full responsibility for Torah observance (later formalized as bar mitzvah at thirteen). Luke may include this specific age to mark the transition from childhood to religious maturity, setting the stage for Jesus's remarkable interaction in the temple.
- 43. The Passover festival lasted seven days (Exodus 12:15). The verb hupemeinen ('stayed behind, remained') suggests a deliberate act on Jesus's part, not an accident. Large pilgrim caravans traveled together, and children could easily be assumed to be with other family members — the parents' ignorance is plausible and not negligent.
- 43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 12:15 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 44. The Greek synodia ('caravan, traveling company') was the standard mode of pilgrimage travel — large groups from the same region would travel together for safety. A day's journey was roughly 20-25 miles. The search among relatives and acquaintances (syggenesin kai tois gnostois) reflects the extended family and community network that traveled together.
- 45. The return trip adds another day, meaning at least two full days pass before they find Jesus (a day's travel out, a day's travel back, then the search in Jerusalem on the third day, v. 46). The verb anazetountes ('searching for, seeking diligently') is intensive — this is an anxious, determined search.
- 46. The 'three days' (meta hemeras treis) may foreshadow the three days between crucifixion and resurrection — a pattern Luke's reader might notice retrospectively. The scene of a twelve-year-old 'sitting among the teachers' (kathemenon en meso ton didaskalon) in the temple depicts the posture of a student in a rabbinical discussion. Jesus is both listening and asking — the ancient pedagogical method of learning through dialogue. The 'teachers' (didaskalon) were likely scribes and scholars who gathered in the temple courts.
- 47. The verb existanto ('were amazed, were astounded') is stronger than the earlier ethaumasas (v. 18) — it implies being beside oneself with astonishment. The combination of synesis ('understanding, comprehension, insight') and apokriseis ('answers, responses') shows Jesus was not merely asking precocious questions but demonstrating a depth of comprehension that stunned the scholars.
- 48. Mary's address teknon ('child') expresses both tenderness and maternal authority. The verb odynomenoi ('in distress, in anguish') is a strong word — the same root is used for the agony of the rich man in Hades (16:24-25). Mary's reference to 'your father' (ho pater sou) sets up Jesus's response, which will redefine the word 'father.'
- 49. These are the first recorded words of Jesus in Luke's Gospel. The phrase en tois tou patros mou ('in the things/house of my Father') is ambiguous — it can mean 'in my Father's house' (referring to the temple) or 'about my Father's affairs' (referring to his mission). Both meanings may be intended. The key theological move is the implicit correction of Mary's 'your father': Jesus distinguishes between Joseph ('your father,' v. 48) and God ('my Father'). The verb dei ('it is necessary, must') introduces Luke's theme of divine necessity — Jesus's life follows a divinely determined path.
- 50. The verb synekan ('understood, comprehended') indicates that even Mary and Joseph — who had received angelic revelations, heard Simeon's prophecy, and witnessed the shepherds' visit — did not fully grasp the implications of Jesus's words. Luke is honest about the gap between revelation received and revelation understood. Full understanding will come only later, in light of the resurrection.
- 51. The verb hypotassomenos ('being subject, being obedient') emphasizes that Jesus's extraordinary temple dialogue did not lead to rebellion against parental authority. The one who called God 'my Father' nevertheless submits to his earthly parents — a profound theological juxtaposition. Mary's treasuring (dieterei, 'was carefully keeping') echoes v. 19 and reinforces the sense that Luke's source may have been Mary's own recollections.
- 52. This closing summary echoes 1 Samuel 2:26 ('The boy Samuel continued to grow in stature and in favor with the LORD and with people'). The Greek proekopten ('was advancing, was progressing') implies steady development. The fourfold growth — wisdom (sophia), stature/age (helikia), favor with God (chariti para theo), favor with people (anthropois) — presents a fully human development. Luke's Gospel affirms both the divine identity and the genuine humanity of Jesus.

Summary: Luke 3 opens with an elaborate sixfold dating formula placing John the Baptist's ministry in precise historical context. John preaches a baptism of repentance in the wilderness, quoting Isaiah 40:3-5 at length. He delivers practical ethical teaching to crowds, tax collectors, and soldiers, and announces the coming of one greater than himself who will baptize with the Holy Spirit and fire. After Herod Antipas imprisons John, Luke narrates Jesus's baptism — the heavens open, the Spirit descends as a dove, and the Father's voice declares Jesus to be his beloved Son. The chapter concludes with Jesus's genealogy, traced backward from Joseph all the way to Adam and to God.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's dating formula (vv. 1-2) is the most precise chronological anchor in the Gospels, naming the Roman emperor, the regional governor, three tetrarchs, and two high priests. The Isaiah quotation (vv. 4-6) extends beyond Matthew and Mark to include 'all flesh shall see the salvation of God' — characteristically Lukan universalism. John's practical ethics (vv. 10-14) are unique to Luke and reveal a prophet concerned not just with repentance but with social justice. Luke's genealogy runs backward (from Jesus to Adam to God), contrasting with Matthew's forward genealogy (from Abraham to Jesus), and extends to all humanity through Adam rather than stopping at Abraham.

Translation Friction: Luke's genealogy differs significantly from Matthew's from David onward — Matthew traces through Solomon, Luke through Nathan. Various harmonization theories exist; we render the Greek as given without harmonizing. The phrase 'as was supposed' (hos enomizeto, v. 23) guards the virgin birth while presenting Joseph's legal lineage. The genealogy counts roughly seventy-seven generations, possibly echoing the Enoch traditions or the seventy nations of Genesis 10.

Connections: Isaiah 40:3-5 (the voice in the wilderness) connects to the Exodus tradition of God preparing a way through the desert. John's call to repentance connects to the prophetic tradition of Elijah, Amos, and Micah. The baptism scene echoes Israel's crossing of the Jordan and the anointing of kings. The genealogy through Adam connects Jesus to all humanity and to the creation narrative of Genesis 1-5.

¹In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, when Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea, Herod was tetrarch of Galilee, his brother Philip was tetrarch of the region of Iturea and Trachonitis, and Lysanias was tetrarch of Abilene, ²Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the message of God arrived to John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness. ³He went into the entire region around the Jordan, proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins, ⁴Indeed, as it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet of old and stated, The voice of one crying in the desert, Prepare you the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.

⁵Every valley will be filled in, and every mountain and hill will be made low.
The crooked will become straight, and the rough paths will be made smooth.

⁶All flesh will see the salvation of God. ⁷He said to the crowds coming out to be baptized by him, "You brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the coming wrath? ⁸Therefore produce fruit consistent with repentance. And do not begin saying to yourselves, 'We have Abraham as our father.' For I tell you, God is able to raise up children for Abraham from these stones. ⁹Even now the axe is laid at the root of the trees. Every tree that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire." ¹⁰The crowds asked him, "What then should we do?" ¹¹He answered them, "Whoever has two tunics should share with the one who has none, and whoever has food should do the same." ¹²Tax collectors also came to be baptized and said to him, "Teacher, what should we do?" ¹³He said to them, "Collect no more than what you have been authorized to collect." ¹⁴So soldiers also asked him, "What should we do?" He said to them, "Do not extort money from anyone by threats or false accusations, and be satisfied with your pay." ¹⁵As the people were filled with expectation and everyone was questioning in their hearts whether John might be the Christ, ¹⁶John answered them all, "I baptize you with water, but one who is more powerful than I is coming. I am not worthy to untie the strap of his sandals. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire. ¹⁷His winnowing fork is in his hand to clear his threshing floor and to gather the wheat into his barn, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire." ¹⁸So with many other exhortations he proclaimed the good news to the people. ¹⁹But Herod the tetrarch, who had been rebuked by John concerning Herodias, his brother's wife, and concerning all the evil things Herod had done, ²⁰Indeed, added yet this above all, that he locked away John in prison. ²¹Now when all the people had been baptized and Jesus also had been baptized and was praying, the heavens were opened, ²²The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice arrived from heaven, which stated, you are my Son, whom I love deeply. In you I am well pleased. ²³Jesus himself was about thirty years old when he began his ministry, being the son (as was supposed) of Joseph, the son of Heli, ²⁴Which was the son of Matthat, which was the son of Levi, which was the son of Melchi, which was the son of Janna, which was the son of Joseph,. ²⁵Which was the son of Mattathias, which was the son of Amos, which was the son of Naum, which was the son of Esli, which was the son of Nagge,. ²⁶Which was the son of Maath, which was the son of Mattathias, which was the son of Semei, which was the son of Joseph, which was the son of Juda,. ²⁷Which was the son of Joanna, which was the son of Rhesa, which was the son of Zorobabel, which was the son of Salathiel, which was the son of Neri,. ²⁸Which was the son of Melchi, which was the son of Addi, which was the son of Cosam, which was the son of Elmodam, which was the son of Er,. ²⁹Which was the son of Jose, which was the son of Eliezer, which was the son of Jorim, which was the son of Matthat, which was the son of Levi,. ³⁰Which was the son of Simeon, which was the son of Juda, which was the son of Joseph, which was the son of Jonan, which was the son of Eliakim,. ³¹Which was the son of Melea, which was the son of Menan, which was the son of Mattatha, which was the son of Nathan, which was the son of David,. ³²Which was the son of Jesse, which was the son of Obed, which was the son of Booz, which was the son of Salmon, which was the son of Naasson,. ³³Which was the son of Aminadab, which was the son of Aram, which was the son of Esrom, which was the son of Phares, which was the son of Juda,. ³⁴Which was the son of Jacob, which was the son of Isaac, which was the son of Abraham, which was the son of Thara, which was the son of Nachor,. ³⁵Which was the son of Saruch, which was the son of Ragau, which was the son of Phalec, which was the son of Heber, which was the son of Sala,. ³⁶Which was the son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad, which was the son of Sem, which was the son of Noe, which was the son of Lamech,. ³⁷Which was the son of Mathusala, which was the son of Enoch, which was the son of Jared, which was the son of Maleleel, which was the son of Cainan,. ³⁸Which was the son of Enos, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Luke's sixfold dating formula imitates the style of Old Testament prophetic introductions (cf. Isaiah 1:1, Jeremiah 1:1-3, Hosea 1:1) and Hellenistic historical writing. The fifteenth year of Tiberius would be approximately AD 28-29. The scope expands outward from the emperor to the local rulers, placing God's prophetic word within the structures of worldly power. 'Tetrarch' (tetraarchountos) literally means 'ruler of a quarter' — these were subordinate rulers under Roman authority.

1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Hosea 1:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. Technically only one high priest served at a time; Caiaphas held the office officially (AD 18-36), but Annas, his father-in-law who had served earlier (AD 6-15), retained enormous influence (cf. John 18:13, Acts 4:6). Luke names both to reflect the political reality. The phrase egeneto rhema theou epi Ioannen ('the word of God came upon John') is a classic prophetic call formula — the same language used for Elijah (1 Kings 17:2), Jeremiah (Jeremiah 1:4), and Ezekiel (Ezekiel 1:3). After centuries of prophetic silence, God speaks again.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 17:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Jeremiah 1:4. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Ezekiel 1:3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The phrase baptisma metanoias ('baptism of repentance') combines a ritual act (immersion in water) with its purpose (turning back to God). The Greek metanoia ('repentance, change of mind') corresponds to the Hebrew teshuvah — a turning, a return. 'For the forgiveness of sins' (eis aphesisin hamarton) indicates the goal or result of this repentance-baptism. John's baptism is preparatory, pointing forward to the one who will baptize with the Holy Spirit (v. 16).
4. The quotation is from Isaiah 40:3-5 (LXX). Luke quotes more of Isaiah than Matthew or Mark, extending to the universal climax in v. 6. In its original context, Isaiah 40 announced the end of Babylonian exile — God would make a highway through the desert to lead his people home. Luke sees John as the fulfillment of this prophetic voice. The 'way of the Lord' (ten hodon kyriou) in Isaiah refers to YHWH; Luke's application to Jesus carries a high christological claim.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 40:3-5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The imagery is of ancient road-building for a royal procession — filling valleys, leveling hills, straightening curves, and smoothing surfaces. The language operates on both literal and metaphorical levels: God is coming, and the landscape (both physical and spiritual) must be prepared. The reversal theme (valleys raised, mountains lowered) echoes the Magnificat's theme of the proud brought low and the humble lifted up (1:52).
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 40:3-5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. This final line of the Isaiah quotation is included only by Luke among the Synoptic Gospels. It is characteristically Lukan — 'all flesh' (pasa sarx) means all humanity, not just Israel. This universal vision connects to Simeon's prophecy (2:30-32) and anticipates the Gentile mission in Acts. The phrase to soterion tou theou ('the salvation of God') echoes Isaiah 52:10 and the Nunc Dimittis.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 40:3-5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 52:10. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. In Matthew 3:7, this denunciation is directed specifically at Pharisees and Sadducees; Luke directs it to 'the crowds' — a broader audience consistent with Luke's portrayal of John as a public preacher. 'Brood of vipers' (gennemata echidnon) is a devastating image — vipers fleeing a brush fire, scattering before the flames. The 'coming wrath' (mellouses orges) refers to eschatological judgment, which John sees as imminent.
8. The plural karpous ('fruits') in Luke (Matthew has the singular 'fruit') may emphasize the variety of righteous deeds expected. John attacks the presumption that ethnic descent from Abraham guarantees standing before God — a revolutionary claim that dismantles ethnic privilege. The wordplay between 'stones' (lithon) and 'children' (tekna) may reflect an Aramaic pun between avanim ('stones') and banim ('sons'), though the pun does not work in Greek.
9. The axe 'at the root' (pros ten rhizan) — not at the branches — indicates total destruction, not pruning. The present tenses ekkoptetai ('is being cut down') and balletai ('is being thrown') convey urgency: judgment is not merely future but already in process. The tree-and-fruit metaphor will recur throughout Luke's Gospel (6:43-44, 13:6-9).
10. This question — ti oun poiesomen ('what then should we do?') — will be asked three times (vv. 10, 12, 14), with each group receiving specific, practical instruction. This threefold dialogue is unique to Luke and reflects his characteristic interest in the practical outworking of repentance in daily life and social relationships.
11. The chiton ('tunic, inner garment') was a basic necessity, not a luxury. John is not asking for extraordinary sacrifice but for the sharing of essentials. The ethic is simple: if you have more than you need and your neighbor has less, share. This practical social ethic anticipates the economic themes that pervade Luke's Gospel (the rich fool, Lazarus and the rich man, Zacchaeus).
12. Tax collectors (telonai) were Jews who contracted with the Roman authorities to collect taxes, often extracting more than required and keeping the surplus. They were despised as collaborators and sinners. That they come to John for baptism is remarkable — Luke consistently shows tax collectors responding positively to God's message (5:27-32, 7:29, 15:1, 18:10-14, 19:1-10). Their address 'Teacher' (didaskale) shows respect for John's authority.
13. John does not tell the tax collectors to quit their profession — a surprising moderation. He calls them to practice their trade honestly. The Greek diatetagmenon ('what has been ordered, what has been appointed') refers to the official tax rate. The systemic corruption was not the tax itself but the overcharging. John's ethic addresses the specific temptation of each group.
14. The Greek strateuomenoi ('soldiers, those on military service') likely refers to Jewish soldiers serving under Herod Antipas rather than Roman legionaries. The verb diaseiete ('shake down, extort by intimidation') describes the common practice of soldiers using their power to extract money from civilians. The verb sykophantesete ('accuse falsely, blackmail') originally meant 'to inform on fig-smugglers' and came to mean malicious prosecution for personal gain. John again addresses the specific temptation of the group: abuse of power.
15. The verb prosdokontos ('were expecting, were in anticipation') indicates that messianic expectation was running high. The verb dialogizomenon ('were debating, were reasoning, were questioning') suggests internal deliberation. John's powerful preaching and moral authority raised the question that would require an explicit denial — was he the promised Messiah?

16. John's contrast is stark: water versus Holy Spirit and fire. The sandal-strap image places John below even the lowest slave — untying a master's sandals was considered too degrading for a Jewish slave. The phrase en pneumatī hagio kai pyri ('with the Holy Spirit and fire') is debated: does 'fire' refer to purifying judgment (v. 17), to the fire of Pentecost (Acts 2:3), or to both? The context of v. 17 suggests judgment, but Luke's later Pentecost narrative shows fulfillment in both senses.
17. The winnowing fork (ptyov) was used to toss harvested grain into the air; the heavier grain fell back to the threshing floor while the lighter chaff blew away. The metaphor depicts thorough separation — the coming one will distinguish genuine repentance from superficial compliance. 'Unquenchable fire' (pyri asbesto) intensifies the judgment theme. This agricultural image would have been immediately vivid to John's rural audience.
18. Luke's summary note is striking: even John's stern warnings about judgment constitute 'good news' (euangelizeto, 'he was gospeling'). The verb is the same one used for Gabriel's announcement to Zechariah (1:19) and the angel's announcement to the shepherds (2:10). Warning of judgment is gospel when it calls people to repentance and points them to the coming Savior.
19. Luke narrates Herod's imprisonment of John before Jesus's baptism, which is a literary rather than strictly chronological arrangement — Luke wants to conclude John's ministry before beginning Jesus's. Herod Antipas had married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother (Herod Philip). John's rebuke (elegchomenos, 'being reprov'd, being exposed') was a prophetic confrontation of royal sin in the tradition of Nathan confronting David (2 Samuel 12) and Elijah confronting Ahab (1 Kings 21).
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Samuel 12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Kings 21. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The verb prosetheken ('added') with epi pasin ('to all the rest, on top of everything') presents the imprisonment as the crowning act of Herod's wickedness. The verb katekleisen ('shut up, locked away') is emphatic. According to Josephus (Antiquities 18.5.2), John was imprisoned at the fortress of Machaerus east of the Dead Sea. Luke leaves the story here and does not narrate John's execution until it is reported later.
21. Luke's account of Jesus's baptism is notably brief and places it after John's imprisonment narrative (vv. 19-20), so John is not explicitly present. Luke uniquely adds that Jesus was 'praying' (proseuchomenou) at the moment of the heavenly revelation — prayer at key moments is a distinctive Lukan theme (5:16, 6:12, 9:18, 9:28-29, 11:1, 22:41-44). The opening of the heavens (aneochtenai ton ouranon) signals divine communication breaking through the barrier between heaven and earth (cf. Ezekiel 1:1, Isaiah 64:1).

22. Luke uniquely specifies somatiko eidei ('in bodily form') — the Spirit's descent was not merely a vision but a visible, physical manifestation. The heavenly voice combines Psalm 2:7 ('You are my Son') with Isaiah 42:1 ('my chosen, in whom my soul delights'), merging the royal Davidic identity with the Servant of the LORD. The second-person address 'You are' (su ei) makes this a personal declaration to Jesus, not merely an announcement to bystanders.

22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 42:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. The age of thirty echoes David's age when he began to reign (2 Samuel 5:4), Joseph's age when he entered Pharaoh's service (Genesis 41:46), and the age at which Levites began temple service (Numbers 4:3). The parenthetical hos enomizeto ('as was supposed, as was thought') guards the virgin birth — Joseph was the legal but not biological father. Luke's genealogy differs from Matthew's from David onward. Heli may be Mary's father, with the genealogy traced through her line, though this is debated.

24. The genealogy from this point to David (v. 31) is largely unattested in Old Testament records, representing either a lesser-known branch of the Davidic family or sources no longer extant. The names are rendered in their standard English forms where recognizable.
25. The names Amos and Nahum are shared with Old Testament prophets, though these are different individuals. Luke's genealogy contains several names with theophoric elements — names that incorporate references to God.
26. The repetition of names like Mattathias and Joseph within the genealogy is common in Jewish naming practice — families frequently reused ancestral names across generations.

- 27. Zerubbabel and Shealtiel appear in both Matthew's and Luke's genealogies, though the surrounding names differ. In 1 Chronicles 3:17-19, Shealtiel is the son of Jeconiah, while Luke makes him the son of Neri. This is one of the key points where the two genealogies diverge. Zerubbabel led the return from exile and rebuilt the temple (Ezra 3-6).

- 28. These names span the exilic and post-exilic period. The name Er ('watchful') appears in Genesis 38:3 as Judah's firstborn, though this is obviously a different individual. Many of these names are otherwise unattested in surviving records.

- 29. The Greek Iesou here is the same name as Jesus (Yeshua/Joshua). This ancestor shares the name that means 'the LORD saves.' The name Eliezer ('my God is help') is prominent in the Old Testament as Abraham's servant (Genesis 15:2) and Moses's son (Exodus 18:4).
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 15:2. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 18:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. The names Simeon, Judah, and Joseph echo the great patriarchal names. Their recurrence in the genealogy reflects the enduring practice of naming children after the ancestral heroes of Israel.
- 31. Here is the decisive divergence from Matthew's genealogy: Luke traces the line through Nathan, a son of David (2 Samuel 5:14, 1 Chronicles 3:5), while Matthew traces through Solomon. Nathan was David's son by Bathsheba (1 Chronicles 3:5) but not a king. If Luke traces Mary's lineage, both parents descend from David but through different sons — Joseph through Solomon (the royal line) and Mary through Nathan (a non-royal branch).

- 32. From David back to Nahshon, Luke's genealogy matches Matthew's and the Old Testament records (Ruth 4:18-22, 1 Chronicles 2:10-15). These are the ancestors familiar from the book of Ruth: Boaz the kinsman-redeemer, Obed the son of Ruth and Boaz, Jesse the father of David. The genealogy passes through the key figures of God's covenant faithfulness.

- 33. The SBLGNT includes Admin and Arni between Amminadab and Hezron, where Matthew has only Ram/Aram. This reflects a textual tradition with additional generations. Perez was the son of Judah and Tamar (Genesis 38), the beginning of the line that leads to David. The genealogy anchors in the patriarchal period with Judah, son of Jacob.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 38 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The patriarchal triad — Jacob, Isaac, Abraham — forms the backbone of Israel's covenant identity. Where Matthew's genealogy begins with Abraham, Luke passes through Abraham and continues backward. Abraham's father Terah and grandfather Nahor take the line into the pre-Abrahamic period (Genesis 11:24-26). Luke's genealogy is about to move beyond the covenant people into universal human ancestry.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 11:24-26. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. These names follow the genealogy of Genesis 11:10-26. Eber is traditionally considered the ancestor from whom the name 'Hebrew' derives. Peleg's name means 'division' — 'for in his days the earth was divided' (Genesis 10:25), traditionally associated with the Tower of Babel event.
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 11:10-26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. Luke includes Cainan between Arphaxad and Shelah, following the Septuagint text of Genesis 10:24 and 11:12-13. The Hebrew Masoretic Text does not include this generation. Shem ('name') is the ancestor of the Semitic peoples. Noah, the survivor of the flood, marks the genealogy's passage through the great judgment-and-renewal event of Genesis 6-9.
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 10:24. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.

36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 6-9. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
37. These names follow the genealogy of Genesis 5. Enoch is singled out in Genesis 5:24: 'Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him.' Methuselah is traditionally the longest-lived person in the Bible (969 years, Genesis 5:27). These antediluvian figures connect Jesus to the earliest epochs of human history.
37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 5. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
38. The genealogy reaches its theological climax: Adam, the son of God (tou theou). Where Matthew begins with Abraham (father of Israel), Luke ends with God (father of all humanity). This universal scope is characteristic of Luke's theology — Jesus is not only Israel's Messiah but the Savior of all humanity, descended from the first human whom God created. The phrase 'son of God' applied to Adam echoes Genesis 1:27 (created in God's image) and sets up a parallel with Jesus as 'Son of God' in a unique and ultimate sense. The genealogy thus frames Jesus's identity: he is both son of Adam (fully human, connected to all people) and Son of God (divinely begotten, announced by heaven).

Summary: Luke 4 narrates the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness, his programmatic sermon at the Nazareth synagogue (reading from Isaiah 61), his rejection and near-execution by his hometown, and the beginning of his Galilean ministry with healings and exorcisms in Capernaum. The Nazareth sermon functions as Luke's thesis statement for Jesus's entire ministry — good news to the poor, freedom for captives, sight for the blind, liberty for the oppressed.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke reorders the temptations (compared to Matthew), placing the temple temptation last and ending in Jerusalem — the city where Jesus's ministry will climax. The Nazareth sermon is placed at the very beginning of Jesus's public ministry in Luke (though Mark and Matthew place similar events later), functioning as a programmatic declaration. Jesus's reference to Elijah's ministry to a Sidonian widow and Elisha's healing of a Syrian leper (vv. 25-27) provokes murderous rage by implying God's favor extends to Gentiles — a preview of the central tension in Luke-Acts.

Translation Friction: The chronological placement of the Nazareth episode differs across the Synoptics. Luke appears to have moved it forward for theological-literary purposes. The phrase 'Today this scripture is fulfilled' (v. 21) makes an extraordinary claim. The demons' recognition of Jesus (vv. 34, 41) and Jesus's silencing of them raises questions about the 'messianic secret' motif.

Connections: The temptation narrative recapitulates Israel's wilderness testing (Deuteronomy 6-8), with Jesus succeeding where Israel failed. The Isaiah 61 quotation connects to the Jubilee tradition (Leviticus 25) — the 'year of the Lord's favor' is a Jubilee proclamation. The Elijah and Elisha references (vv. 25-27) connect to 1 Kings 17 and 2 Kings 5 and anticipate Luke's Gentile mission theme.

¹Jesus, full of the Holy Spirit, returned from the Jordan and was led by the Spirit in the wilderness ²Being forty days tempted of the devil. And at that time he did eat nothing — and when they were ended, he afterward hungered. ³The devil said to him, "If you are the Son of God, command this stone to become bread." ⁴Jesus answered him, "It is written: 'A person shall not live by bread alone.'" ⁵Then the devil led him up and showed him all the kingdoms of the world in an instant of time. ⁶The devil said to him, "I will give you all this authority and their glory, for it has been handed over to me, and I give it to anyone I wish. ⁷So if you worship before me, it will all be yours." ⁸Jesus answered him, "It is written: 'You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve.'" ⁹Then he led him to Jerusalem and set him on the pinnacle of the temple and said to him, "If you are the Son of God, throw yourself down from here, ¹⁰Since it is written, He will give his angels charge over you, to keep you: ¹¹In their hands they will bear you up, lest at any time you dash your foot opposed to a stone. ¹²Jesus answered him, "It is said: 'You shall not put the Lord your God to the test.'" ¹³When the devil had finished every temptation, he departed from him until an opportune time. ¹⁴Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit to Galilee, and a report about him spread through the entire surrounding region. ¹⁵He taught in their synagogues, and everyone praised him. ¹⁶He came to

Nazareth, where he had been raised. As was his custom, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day and stood up to read. ¹⁷The scroll of the prophet Isaiah was handed to him. He unrolled the scroll and found the place where it was written:

¹⁸"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to bring good news to the poor.
He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to set free the oppressed,

¹⁹Indeed, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord. ²⁰He rolled up the scroll, gave it back to the attendant, and sat down. The eyes of everyone in the synagogue were fixed on him. ²¹He began to say to them, "Today this Scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing." ²²All spoke well of him and were amazed at the gracious words coming from his mouth. They said, "Is this not Joseph's son?" ²³He said to them, "No doubt you will quote this proverb to me: 'Physician, heal yourself.' 'What we heard you did in Capernaum, do here in your hometown as well.'" ²⁴Then he said, "Truly I tell you, no prophet is accepted in his hometown. ²⁵But in truth I tell you, there were many widows in Israel in the days of Elijah, when the sky was shut for three years and six months and a severe famine came over all the land, ²⁶However, to none of them was Elias dispatched, save to Sarepta, a city of Sidon, to a woman that was a widow. ²⁷And there were many lepers in Israel in the time of the prophet Elisha, yet none of them was cleansed except Naaman the Syrian." ²⁸Everyone in the synagogue was filled with rage when they heard this. ²⁹They rose up, drove him out of the city, and led him to the edge of the hill on which their city was built, so that they could throw him off the cliff. ³⁰But he passed through the middle of them and went on his way. ³¹He went down to Capernaum, a city in Galilee, and was teaching them on the Sabbath. ³²They were astonished at his teaching, because his word carried authority. ³³In the synagogue there was a man who had the spirit of an unclean demon, and he cried out with a loud voice, ³⁴"Ha! What do you want with us, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come to destroy us? I know who you are — the Holy One of God!" ³⁵Jesus rebuked him: "Be silent and come out of him!" The demon threw the man down in the middle of them and came out of him without injuring him. ³⁶Amazement came over all of them, and they said to one another, "What is this word? He commands the unclean spirits with authority and power, and they come out!" ³⁷And reports about him went out to every place in the surrounding region. ³⁸He left the synagogue and entered Simon's house. Simon's mother-in-law was suffering from a high fever, and they asked him about her. ³⁹He stood over her and rebuked the fever, and it left her. Immediately she got up and began serving them. ⁴⁰As the sun was setting, all who had anyone sick with various diseases brought them to him, and he laid his hands on each one of them and healed them. ⁴¹Demons also came out of many people, crying out, "You are the Son of God!" But he rebuked them and would not allow them to speak, because they knew he was the Christ. ⁴²At daybreak he went out to a deserted place. The crowds were searching for him, and when they came to him, they tried to keep him from leaving them. ⁴³But he said to them, "I must proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God to the other cities also, because that is why I was sent." ⁴⁴And he continued preaching in the synagogues of Judea.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Luke emphasizes the Spirit's role with two references in one verse: Jesus is 'full of' (pleres) the Spirit and 'led by' (egeto en) the Spirit. The wilderness (eremos) connects to Israel's forty years of testing and to John's wilderness ministry. The passive voice 'was led' indicates divine initiative — the Spirit directs Jesus into the place of testing.
2. The forty days echo Moses's forty days on Sinai (Exodus 34:28), Elijah's forty days to Horeb (1 Kings 19:8), and Israel's forty years in the wilderness. The Greek peirazomenos ('being tempted, being tested') uses the present participle, suggesting ongoing testing throughout the entire period, not just the three specific temptations. The Greek diabolos ('devil, slanderer, accuser') translates the Hebrew satan.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 34:28. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 19:8. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

3. The conditional ei ('if') is a first-class condition in Greek, not expressing doubt but assuming the premise: 'Since you are the Son of God...' The temptation is not about proving identity but about using divine power for personal comfort outside the Father's will. Luke has the singular 'stone' and 'bread' where Matthew has the plural — a minor variation. The temptation echoes Israel's demand for bread in the wilderness (Exodus 16).
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 16 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 8:3. The SBLGNT text ends the quotation at 'bread alone' without including the second half ('but by every word that comes from the mouth of God'), which appears in some manuscripts imported from Matthew 4:4. Jesus responds to each temptation exclusively with Scripture from Deuteronomy 6-8 — the very chapters about Israel's wilderness testing. Where Israel failed, Jesus succeeds by holding to God's word.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 8:3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 6-8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. Luke's order places this temptation second (Matthew places it third). The SBLGNT does not include 'to a high mountain' (which appears in Matthew and in some Luke manuscripts). The phrase en stigme chronou ('in a point/instant of time') is unique to Luke and suggests a supernatural vision rather than a physical vantage point. The Greek oikoumenes ('of the inhabited world') is the same term used for the Roman Empire in 2:1.
6. The devil's claim — that worldly authority 'has been handed over' (paradedotai) to him — is a theological assertion that Jesus does not dispute. The passive voice implies God permitted this transfer (cf. Job 1-2, where Satan operates within divine permission). The temptation offers a shortcut to universal rule without the cross. The Greek exousia ('authority, power') is the same word Jesus will use for his own authority throughout the Gospel.
6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Job 1-2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. The Greek proskynesēs ('worship, bow down before') is the verb used for worship of God throughout the Septuagint and New Testament. The devil demands the one thing that belongs exclusively to God — worship. This is the most direct and naked of the three temptations: it explicitly asks Jesus to transfer his allegiance from God to Satan in exchange for earthly power.
8. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 6:13. The SBLGNT does not include 'Get behind me, Satan' (which appears in Matthew and some Luke manuscripts). The Deuteronomy passage is from the Shema context — the foundational confession of Israel's exclusive loyalty to God. The verb latreusis ('serve, render religious service') is the same verb used by Zechariah for the goal of redemption (1:74). Worship and service belong to God alone.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 6:13 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. Luke places the temple temptation last (third), ending in Jerusalem — the city that will be the climax of Jesus's story. The Greek pterygion ('pinnacle, wing, highest point') of the temple may refer to the southeastern corner of the temple platform, which towered over the Kidron Valley. The temptation is to force God's hand — to compel a miraculous rescue that would prove sonship publicly.
10. The devil now quotes Scripture — Psalm 91:11-12. This is a psalm of divine protection for the righteous. The devil's use of Scripture demonstrates that quoting the Bible does not guarantee correct application. The citation is accurate but the application is twisted — Psalm 91 promises divine protection for those who trust God, not for those who recklessly test him.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalms 91:11-12 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The quotation from Psalm 91:12 continues. Notably, the devil omits the phrase 'in all your ways' from Psalm 91:11 — a significant omission that changes the meaning. The psalm promises protection for those walking in God's appointed ways, not for those deliberately seeking danger. The devil's exegesis is selective and misleading.
11. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 91:11-12. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
12. Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 6:16, which specifically references Israel's testing of God at Massah (Exodus 17:1-7), where Israel demanded that God prove himself. The verb ekpeiraseis ('test, put to the test') is stronger than the simple peirazo — it implies testing with the intent to provoke or to force God's hand. Jesus completes the Deuteronomy trilogy (8:3, 6:13, 6:16), demonstrating mastery of the very scriptures that defined Israel's failure.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 6:16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 17:1-7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The phrase achri kairou ('until an opportune time, until the right moment') is ominous — the devil has not been defeated permanently but has withdrawn temporarily. Luke will identify the devil's return at 22:3, when Satan enters Judas. The word kairos ('opportune moment') rather than chronos ('duration of time') suggests the devil is watching for the strategically right moment to attack again.

14. The threefold Spirit reference in the temptation narrative (4:1a, 4:1b, 4:14) shows progression: full of the Spirit, led by the Spirit, returning in the power of the Spirit. Jesus emerges from the testing with the Spirit's power demonstrated and confirmed. The Greek pheme ('report, fame, rumor') indicates Jesus's reputation is already spreading before Luke narrates any specific ministry.
15. The imperfect edidasken ('was teaching, kept teaching') indicates ongoing activity across multiple synagogues. The verb doxazomenos ('being glorified, being praised') creates an ironic contrast with what is about to happen in Nazareth — universal praise will give way to murderous rejection. Luke sets up the Nazareth scene by first noting the positive reception elsewhere.
16. The phrase kata to ethos auto ('as was his custom') indicates Jesus had a regular practice of synagogue attendance — this was not his first visit as an adult. The phrase 'where he had been raised' (hou en tethrammenos) connects to the childhood narrative of chapter 2. Standing to read was the posture for reading Scripture; sitting was the posture for teaching (v. 20). Luke provides the most detailed description of a synagogue service in the New Testament.
17. The Greek biblion ('scroll, book') refers to a physical scroll; 'unrolled' (anaptuxas) is the literal action. Whether Jesus chose this passage or it was the assigned reading for that Sabbath is debated — the verb heuren ('found') could support either deliberate seeking or providential coincidence. The Isaiah scroll would have been one of the most prominent scrolls in any synagogue.
18. The quotation is from Isaiah 61:1-2 with a line from Isaiah 58:6 ('to set free the oppressed') inserted. The verb echrisen ('anointed') is the verbal root of Christos ('Christ/Anointed One') — Jesus reads a passage about anointing and will claim it as his own identity. 'Good news to the poor' (euangelisasthai ptochois) is Luke's signature theme. The four activities — good news to the poor, release to captives, sight to the blind, freedom for the oppressed — define Jesus's mission programmatically.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 61:1-2 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 58:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The 'year of the Lord's favor' (eniauton kyriou dektion) alludes to the Jubilee year (Leviticus 25), when debts were cancelled, slaves freed, and ancestral land returned. Isaiah 61 reinterprets the Jubilee eschatologically — the ultimate release, the final restoration. Critically, Jesus stops reading mid-verse. Isaiah 61:2 continues with 'and the day of vengeance of our God,' which Jesus deliberately omits. The omission is theologically significant — Jesus announces favor, not vengeance.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 61:1-2. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 25. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. Jesus sits down to teach — the seated posture of a rabbi delivering instruction. The verb atenizontes ('gazing intently, staring fixedly') conveys intense anticipation. The entire congregation senses that something significant is about to happen. The dramatic pause between sitting and speaking heightens the tension Luke is building.
21. The word semeron ('today') is one of the most important words in Luke's Gospel (cf. 2:11, 5:26, 19:5, 9, 23:43). It declares that the ancient prophecy has moved from promise to fulfillment in the present moment. The perfect tense peplerōtai ('has been fulfilled') indicates completed action with ongoing results — the fulfillment has happened and continues to be in effect. 'In your hearing' (en tois osin hymon, literally 'in your ears') emphasizes that they are eyewitnesses to the fulfillment event.
22. The initial reaction is positive — the congregation speaks well (emarturoun, 'bore witness, testified favorably') of Jesus and marvels at his 'words of grace' (logois tes charitos). But the question 'Is this not Joseph's son?' contains the seed of rejection: they know his ordinary origins and struggle to reconcile them with extraordinary claims. The shift from admiration to hostility (vv. 28-29) will be triggered by Jesus's own provocative words.
23. Jesus anticipates their demand — perform miracles here like you did in Capernaum. The proverb 'Physician, heal yourself' (iatre, therapeuson seauton) was a common ancient maxim meaning 'prove your claims on your own turf first.' This implies Jesus had already been active in Capernaum before the Nazareth visit, even though Luke places this scene first in his narrative — another indication of Luke's theological rather than strictly chronological arrangement.
24. The phrase amen lego hymin ('truly I tell you') is a solemn introductory formula unique to Jesus in the Gospels — no rabbi or prophet before him used 'amen' to introduce rather than conclude a statement. Jesus identifies himself as a prophet and simultaneously predicts his rejection. The word dektos ('accepted, welcome') echoes the 'acceptable year' (eniauton dektion) of v. 19 — the same root word. The year is acceptable; the prophet is not.
25. Jesus introduces two Old Testament precedents that will enrage his audience. The 'three years and six months' specification matches James 5:17 but exceeds the 1 Kings 18:1 reference to 'the third year.' The detail may come from Jewish tradition. The point is building: even in Elijah's day, God's prophet was rejected by Israel and sent instead to a Gentile.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Kings 18:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. The reference is to 1 Kings 17:8-24. Zarephath was in Phoenician territory — Gentile land. The scandalous implication is clear: God bypassed all the widows of Israel and sent his prophet to a Gentile woman. This is not just a historical anecdote but a prophetic pattern that Jesus is about to repeat — his ministry will extend beyond Israel's borders.

26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Kings 17:8-24. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The reference is to 2 Kings 5:1-14. Naaman was a commander of the Syrian army — not just a Gentile but an enemy military officer. Jesus's point is devastating: God's grace is not bound by ethnic boundaries, and when Israel rejects God's prophet, God sends that prophet's healing power to Israel's enemies. This is the statement that transforms admiration into rage (v. 28).
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Kings 5:1-14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. The verb eplesthesan ('were filled') is the same word used for being 'filled with the Holy Spirit' (1:15, 41, 67) — here the filling is with thymos ('rage, fury, wrath'). The transition from 'all spoke well of him' (v. 22) to 'all were filled with rage' is abrupt and total. The trigger is clear: Jesus's implication that God's grace extends to Gentiles, especially when Israel proves unfaithful.
29. The mob action — expulsion from the city and attempted execution — mirrors the pattern of rejected prophets. Nazareth sits on a ridge with steep slopes. The verb katakremisai ('to throw down a cliff, to hurl headlong') describes a form of execution. The attempt to kill Jesus at the very beginning of his ministry foreshadows the crucifixion — rejection by his own people leading to his death outside the city.
30. The manner of Jesus's escape is left unexplained — whether by natural means (the crowd's hesitation, his composure) or supernatural intervention. The brevity of the statement (seven Greek words) is striking after the dramatic buildup. Jesus is untouchable until his appointed hour (cf. John 7:30, 8:59). The verb eporeueto ('was going on his way') uses the imperfect, suggesting calm, deliberate movement — not panicked flight.
31. The verb katelton ('went down') is geographically accurate — Capernaum sits on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, significantly lower than Nazareth in the hills. Capernaum becomes Jesus's base of operations in Galilee, replacing the hometown that rejected him. The imperfect 'was teaching' (en didaskon) indicates regular, ongoing instruction.
32. The Greek exousia ('authority, power') is a key Lukan term. Unlike the scribes who taught by citing rabbinic precedent, Jesus taught with inherent authority — his word itself carried weight. The verb exeplessonto ('were astonished, were struck with amazement') indicates the teaching made a deep impact. The contrast with Nazareth is implicit: in Capernaum, Jesus's authority is recognized; in Nazareth, it was rejected.
33. Luke's phrase pneuma daimoniou akathartou ('spirit of an unclean demon') is fuller than Mark's 'unclean spirit.' The encounter takes place in the synagogue — the sacred space is not immune to demonic presence. The loud cry (anekraxen phone megale) disrupts the worship setting. Luke presents exorcism as a core component of Jesus's ministry alongside teaching.
34. The interjection ea ('ha!' or 'leave us alone!') expresses alarm. The phrase ti hemin kai soi ('what to us and to you?') is a Semitic idiom meaning 'what business do you have with us?' The demon uses the plural 'us' (hemin, hemas), possibly speaking for all demons. The title 'the Holy One of God' (ho hagios tou theou) is a correct identification — the demons know exactly who Jesus is. In the ancient world, knowing and speaking someone's name was believed to give power over them; the demon attempts to control Jesus by identifying him.
35. The verb phimotheti ('be muzzled, be silenced') is a strong command — the same verb used for muzzling an animal. Jesus refuses the demon's identification not because it is wrong but because the testimony of demons is not the appropriate source for revealing his identity. The detail 'without injuring him' (meden blapsan auton) shows Jesus's protective concern for the man even during the dramatic exorcism.
36. The Greek thambos ('amazement, astonishment, wonder') is a stronger reaction than the earlier 'astonishment' at his teaching (v. 32). The combination of exousia ('authority') and dynamis ('power') represents both the right and the ability to command — Jesus has both the divine authorization and the supernatural power to cast out demons. The crowd recognizes that teaching authority (v. 32) and power over demons (v. 36) are manifestations of the same logos ('word').
37. The Greek echos ('sound, report, echo') suggests the news reverberates outward like sound waves. The verb exeporeueto (imperfect, 'kept going out') indicates ongoing, expanding fame. This echoes the summary of v. 14 and shows the growing impact of Jesus's combined ministry of teaching and healing.
38. Luke introduces Simon (Peter) without prior explanation — the reader is assumed to know who Simon is, or Luke treats his first mention as sufficient introduction. Luke the physician uses medical language: pyreto megalo ('a great/high fever'). The verb synechomene ('held fast, gripped, suffering from') suggests the fever's oppressive hold on her. That 'they asked him about her' indicates the household's trust in Jesus's power to heal.
39. Luke uniquely describes Jesus rebuking (epetimesen) the fever — the same verb used for rebuking the demon (v. 35). This suggests Luke views the fever as having a spiritual dimension or at least shows Jesus exercising the same authority over disease as over demons. The immediate recovery (parachrona, 'at once') and her ability to serve (diekonei, 'was serving, was ministering') demonstrate the completeness of the healing — no recovery period needed.
40. The timing 'as the sun was setting' (dynontos tou heliou) marks the end of the Sabbath — people waited until the Sabbath restrictions on carrying burdens were lifted before bringing the sick. Luke uniquely notes that Jesus laid hands 'on each one' (heni hekasto) — individual, personal attention to every sick person, not a mass healing from a distance. This detail reflects Luke's interest in Jesus's compassionate engagement with individuals.
41. The demons' confession 'You are the Son of God' (su ei ho huios tou theou) is theologically correct but procedurally inappropriate. Jesus silences them (ouk eia auta lalein, 'he was not permitting them to speak') because the messianic identity must be revealed on God's timetable and through proper channels, not through demonic proclamation. Luke explains the reason plainly: 'because they knew he was the Christ' (edeisan ton christon auton einai).

42. Jesus's withdrawal to a 'deserted place' (eremon topon) for prayer is a Lukan pattern (5:16, 6:12, 9:18, 28). The verb kateichon ('were holding back, were restraining') is strong — the crowds physically tried to prevent him from leaving. Their desire to keep him reflects the attractiveness of his healing ministry, but Jesus will redirect their attention to the broader mission.
43. The verb dei ('it is necessary, I must') again expresses divine necessity — Jesus's mission is not self-determined but divinely appointed. The phrase euangelisasthai ten basileian tou theou ('to proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God') is Luke's summary of Jesus's core message. 'The kingdom of God' (he basileia tou theou) is the central concept of Jesus's teaching — God's rule breaking into the present world. The passive apestalen ('I was sent') identifies Jesus as one sent by God, a prophetic self-understanding.
44. The SBLGNT reads 'Judea' (Ioudaias) rather than 'Galilee' (Galilaias, found in many manuscripts). Luke may use 'Judea' in the broader sense of 'the land of the Jews' (i.e., all of Palestine), which is attested elsewhere in Luke-Acts (cf. 6:17, 7:17, 23:5, Acts 10:37). The imperfect periphrastic kerisson ('was preaching, continued preaching') emphasizes the ongoing nature of Jesus's synagogue ministry.

Summary: Luke 5 narrates the miraculous catch of fish and the calling of Simon Peter, James, and John; the healing of a man with leprosy; the healing of a paralytic lowered through a roof (with Jesus's claim to forgive sins); the calling of the tax collector Levi and the banquet at his house; and a series of confrontations about fasting and new wine. The chapter establishes the pattern of Jesus's ministry: miraculous power, radical inclusion, and escalating conflict with religious authorities.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's call of Peter is far more detailed than Mark's or Matthew's — it includes the miraculous catch that overwhelms professional fishermen and Peter's profound response: 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, Lord.' This is a classic theophany response (cf. Isaiah 6:5). The paralytic story introduces the first explicit controversy about Jesus's authority to forgive sins — the Pharisees correctly identify this as a divine prerogative, which is precisely Jesus's point. Levi's banquet scandalizes the religious establishment by putting Jesus at table with 'sinners.'

Translation Friction: The chronological relationship between the call narratives in Luke 5 and those in Mark 1/Matthew 4 is debated — Luke places the call after a miracle, while Mark and Matthew place it as an immediate response to Jesus's command. The roof-opening scene differs between Mark ('dug through') and Luke ('through the tiles'), likely reflecting different audiences' familiarity with different building styles.

Connections: Peter's call echoes the prophetic call narratives (Isaiah 6, Jeremiah 1, Ezekiel 1-3) — encounter with the divine, awareness of unworthiness, commissioning for mission. The leper's cleansing fulfills the Isaiah 61 program (4:18-19). The paralytic scene raises the Christological question of divine authority. The new-wine parable points to the incompatibility of Jesus's movement with existing religious structures.

¹Now it happened that while the crowd was pressing in on him to hear the word of God, he was standing beside the lake of Gennesaret. ²He saw two boats moored at the edge of the lake; the fishermen had gotten out of them and were washing their nets. ³He got into one of the boats, which was Simon's, and asked him to put out a little from the shore. Then he sat down and taught the crowds from the boat. ⁴When he had finished speaking, he said to Simon, "Put out into the deep water, and let down your nets for a catch." ⁵Simon answered, "Master, we worked hard all night and caught nothing. But at your word, I will let down the nets." ⁶When they had done this, they enclosed such a large number of fish that their nets began to tear. ⁷They signaled to their partners in the other boat to come and help them. They came, and they filled both boats so full that they began to sink. ⁸When Simon Peter saw this, he fell at Jesus's knees, saying, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, Lord!" ⁹For astonishment had seized him and all who were with him at the catch of fish they had taken, ¹⁰James and John, Zebedee's sons and Simon's fishing partners, were equally amazed. But Jesus told Simon, "Don't be afraid. From now on, you will be catching people." ¹¹When they had brought the boats to shore, they left everything and followed him. ¹²While he was in one of the cities, there was a man covered with leprosy. When he saw Jesus, he fell on his face and begged him, "Lord, if you are willing, you can make me clean." ¹³He stretched out his hand and touched him, saying, "I am willing. Be clean." And immediately the leprosy left him. ¹⁴He ordered him to tell no one: "Go, show yourself to the priest, and make the offering for your cleansing that Moses commanded, as a testimony to them." ¹⁵But the word about him spread even more, and large crowds gathered to listen and to be healed of their illnesses. ¹⁶But he would withdraw to deserted places and pray. ¹⁷On one of those days, as he was teaching, Pharisees and teachers of the law were sitting nearby. They had come from every village of Galilee and Judea and from Jerusalem. And the power of the Lord was present for him to heal. ¹⁸Then some men came carrying on a stretcher a man who was paralyzed, and they were trying to bring him in and set him before Jesus. ¹⁹Finding no way to bring him in because of the crowd, they went up on the roof and lowered him on his stretcher through the tiles into the middle of the crowd, right in front of Jesus. ²⁰When he saw their faith, he said, "Friend, your sins are forgiven you." ²¹The scribes and the Pharisees began to question this, saying, "Who is this who speaks blasphemy? Who can forgive sins but God alone?" ²²But Jesus, knowing their thoughts, responded to them, "Why are you questioning in your hearts? ²³Which is easier to say: 'Your sins are forgiven you,' or to say, 'Get up and walk'? ²⁴But so that you may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins" — he said to the paralyzed man — "I say to you, get up, pick up your stretcher, and go home." ²⁵Immediately he stood up before them, picked up what he had been lying on, and went home, glorifying God. ²⁶As astonishment seized all of them, and they glorified God. Filled with awe, they said, "We have seen extraordinary things today!" ²⁷After this he went out and saw a tax collector named Levi sitting at the tax booth, and he said to him, "Follow me." ²⁸And leaving everything behind, he got up and followed him. ²⁹Then Levi hosted a great banquet for Jesus at his house, and there was a large crowd of tax collectors and others reclining at table with them. ³⁰The Pharisees and their scribes complained to his disciples, "Why do you eat and drink with tax collectors and sinners?" ³¹Jesus answered them, "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. ³²I have not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance." ³³They said to him, "The disciples of John fast frequently and offer prayers, and so do the disciples of the Pharisees, but yours eat and drink." ³⁴Jesus said to them, "Can you make the wedding guests fast while the bridegroom is with them? ³⁵And then will they fast at that time, but the days will come, when the bridegroom will be taken away from them. ³⁶He also told them a parable: "No one tears a patch from a new garment and puts it on an old garment. Otherwise, the new garment would be torn, and the patch from the new would not match the old. ³⁷And no one puts new wine into old wineskins. Otherwise, the new wine will burst the skins — the wine will be spilled and the skins will be ruined. ³⁸Rather, new wine must be put into fresh wineskins. ³⁹And no one who drinks old wine wants new, for he says, 'The old is good enough.'"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The 'lake of Gennesaret' is the Sea of Galilee, named here after the fertile plain on its northwestern shore. Luke consistently calls it a 'lake' (limne) rather than 'sea' (thalassa) as in Mark and Matthew — a more geographically precise term, as it is a freshwater lake. The crowd 'pressing in' (epikeisthai, 'pressing upon, crowding') demonstrates the intensity of the response to Jesus's teaching.
2. The 'boats' (ploia) were fishing boats typical of the Sea of Galilee — roughly 26 feet long based on archaeological finds. Washing nets after fishing was standard maintenance to remove debris and prevent rotting. The detail places the scene after an unsuccessful night of fishing (v. 5 will confirm this). The fishermen's ordinary work becomes the setting for an extraordinary encounter.
3. Jesus uses Simon's boat as a floating pulpit — the water would create a natural amphitheater for his voice to carry to the shore. He sits to teach (the posture of a rabbi, as in 4:20). This practical use of Simon's boat precedes the command that will change Simon's life. Jesus first enters Simon's ordinary world before calling him to an extraordinary one.
4. The shift from singular ('put out' — epanagage, addressed to Simon as captain) to plural ('let down your nets' — chalasate, addressed to the crew) is natural: Simon steers the boat; everyone lowers the nets. The command to fish in deep water during daylight contradicts professional fishing practice — Galilean fishermen worked at night in shallow water. Jesus, a carpenter, tells professional fishermen how to fish.
5. Simon's address epistata ('master, chief, commander') is a Lukan term (used six times in Luke, nowhere else in the NT) that acknowledges authority without necessarily implying belief in divinity. His statement 'we worked hard all night and caught nothing' (di holes nyktos kopiasantes ouden elabomen) establishes the futility of human effort. His willingness to obey 'at your word' (epi de to remati sou) despite professional judgment is the first step of faith.
6. The verb synekleisan ('enclosed, caught, trapped') emphasizes the overwhelming quantity. The imperfect diērresseto ('were tearing, began to tear') indicates the nets were in the process of breaking — an ongoing struggle with an impossible abundance. The catch exceeds what human equipment can contain. This is the pattern of divine provision: superabundance beyond expectation (cf. the feeding of the five thousand, 9:10-17).
7. The verb kateneusan ('beckoned, signaled') suggests they were too far from shore or too overwhelmed to shout. The partners (metochois) in the other boat are identified as James and John in v. 10. Two fully loaded fishing boats beginning to sink (bythizesthai, 'to be submerged') paints a vivid picture of abundance threatening to overwhelm. The miracle exceeds all practical capacity.

8. This is the first time Luke uses the full name 'Simon Peter' (Simon Petros). Peter's response is a classic theophany reaction — when Isaiah sees God's glory, he cries 'Woe to me! I am a man of unclean lips' (Isaiah 6:5). Peter recognizes that the miracle reveals divine presence and that divine holiness exposes human sinfulness. The address kyrie ('Lord') here carries more weight than epistata in v. 5 — Peter's understanding of who Jesus is has deepened in the space of one miracle.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 6:5 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The verb periaschen ('had seized, had gripped, had surrounded') is a strong term — amazement doesn't just come upon them but seizes and encircles them. The reaction is collective — Peter, his crew, and everyone present is overwhelmed. These are professional fishermen who know what is natural and what is not.
10. James and John are introduced as business partners (koinonoi, 'partners, sharers') with Simon. Jesus's 'Do not be afraid' (me phobou) echoes the divine reassurance given to Abraham (Genesis 15:1), Moses (Numbers 21:34), and others who encounter God. The verb zogron ('catching alive, taking alive') means literally 'to capture alive' — used in the Septuagint for taking prisoners alive (cf. 2 Timothy 2:26). The metaphor transforms fishermen into rescuers of people.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 21:34 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The phrase aphentes panta ('having left everything') is radical — they abandon boats, nets, the miraculous catch itself, their livelihood. Luke emphasizes the totality of their response more than Mark's account. The verb ekolouthēsan ('followed') is the standard term for discipleship — it implies not just physical movement but life commitment. This is the first formal calling of disciples in Luke's narrative.
12. Luke intensifies Mark's description with pleres lepras ('full of, covered with leprosy'), indicating an advanced case. 'Leprosy' (lepra) in the Bible covers a range of skin diseases, not just modern Hansen's disease. The man's approach violates Levitical quarantine laws (Leviticus 13:45-46) — he should not be in the city or near people. His statement is remarkable theology: he has no doubt about Jesus's ability ('you can'), only about his willingness ('if you are willing'). He addresses Jesus as kyrie ('Lord').
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 13:45-46. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The touch (hepsato) is extraordinary — touching a leper made a person ritually unclean (Leviticus 13-14). Instead of Jesus becoming unclean through contact, the man becomes clean through Jesus's touch. The direction of contamination is reversed by Jesus's holiness. The command katharisthēti ('be cleansed') is an aorist passive imperative — a single, decisive act of cleansing. The response is instantaneous (eutheos, 'immediately').
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 13-14 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. Jesus commands compliance with Leviticus 14:1-32 — the elaborate priestly ritual for certifying that a leper has been cleansed. This included examination by the priest, two birds, cedar wood, scarlet yarn, hyssop, and a series of offerings over eight days. The phrase eis martyron autois ('as a testimony to them') is ambiguous — testimony to the priests that a genuine healing has occurred, or testimony against them if they reject it. Jesus affirms the Mosaic law even while transcending it.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 14:1-32. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. Despite the command to silence, the report (logos, 'word') spreads 'even more' (mallon). The crowds come for two things: hearing (akouein) and healing (therapeuesthai) — the twin pillars of Jesus's ministry. Luke consistently presents teaching and healing as inseparable aspects of the kingdom's arrival.
16. The imperfect periphrastic en hypochoron ('was withdrawing, would withdraw') indicates habitual practice — this was Jesus's regular pattern, not a single event. The connection between ministry demands and prayerful withdrawal is a consistent Lukan theme. Jesus's power comes through dependence on the Father, maintained through regular prayer.
17. Luke uniquely notes that Pharisees and nomodidaskaloi ('teachers of the law, experts in Torah') had gathered from across the land — this is an official observation, not a casual visit. The phrase dynamis kyriou en eis to iasthai auton ('the power of the Lord was present for him to heal') is a distinctive Lukan note — the Lord's healing power is specifically present in this moment, suggesting that divine power operates in particular moments rather than as a constant, automatic capacity.
18. The Greek paralelymenos ('having been paralyzed') is a perfect passive participle indicating an established, ongoing condition. The verb ezetoun ('were seeking, were trying') shows persistent effort — they did not give up when access was blocked. Luke does not specify the number of carriers (Mark says four, Mark 2:3). Their faith-in-action — bringing the paralyzed man to Jesus despite obstacles — is about to be commended.
19. Luke says 'through the tiles' (dia ton keramon) where Mark says they 'dug through' the roof (Mark 2:4). Palestinian roofs were typically made of wooden beams covered with branches and packed earth, which could be dug through; Luke may be adapting the description for a Gentile audience familiar with tiled roofs. The Greek klinidion ('small bed, stretcher') is a diminutive, emphasizing the improvised nature of the arrangement.

- 20. Jesus sees 'their faith' (ten pistin auton) — the plural 'their' includes both the paralyzed man and his friends. Faith in this context is demonstrated through action, not verbal confession. The address anthrope ('man, friend') is a Lukan distinctive (cf. 12:14, 22:58, 60). The declaration apheontai soi hai hamartiai sou ('your sins have been forgiven you') is a divine passive — God is the implied agent of the forgiveness. Jesus speaks what only God can do.
- 21. The religious leaders' theological logic is impeccable: only God can forgive sins (cf. Isaiah 43:25, 'I, even I, am the one who blots out your transgressions'). Their conclusion — that Jesus is blaspheming by claiming a divine prerogative — is correct if Jesus is merely human. The question 'Who is this?' (tis estin houtos) is the central christological question of Luke's Gospel. Jesus will answer it not by withdrawing the claim but by demonstrating the authority behind it.
- 21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 43:25. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 22. The verb epignous ('having known, having perceived') indicates supernatural knowledge of their internal reasoning — they have not spoken their objection aloud. Jesus knows their dialogismous ('thoughts, deliberations, reasonings'). This itself is a divine attribute (cf. 1 Kings 8:39, 'you alone know the hearts of all people'; Jeremiah 17:10, 'I the LORD search the heart').
- 22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 8:39. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Jeremiah 17:10. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 23. The question is a rhetorical trap for the critics. To say 'your sins are forgiven' is easier because it cannot be verified or falsified — no one can see whether forgiveness has actually occurred. To say 'get up and walk' is harder because it can be immediately tested. Jesus will do the harder, verifiable thing to prove the authority behind the easier, invisible thing.
- 24. This is the first use of 'Son of Man' (ho huios tou anthropou) in Luke. The title draws on Daniel 7:13-14, where 'one like a son of man' receives authority, glory, and an everlasting kingdom from the Ancient of Days. Jesus claims that this heavenly authority operates 'on earth' (epi tes ges) — the divine prerogative of forgiveness is being exercised here and now. The sentence breaks mid-thought as Jesus turns from the critics to the patient — Luke preserves the dramatic pause.
- 24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 7:13-14. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 25. The adverb parachrona ('immediately, at once') emphasizes the instantaneous nature of the healing. The man does exactly what Jesus commanded — stands, picks up the stretcher, goes home — demonstrating both the completeness of the healing and the authority of Jesus's word. His response of 'glorifying God' (doxazon ton theon) is the proper recognition that divine power has been at work.
- 26. The Greek ekstasis ('astonishment, amazement, ecstasy') is the root of the English 'ecstasy' — a state of being outside oneself with wonder. The crowd is simultaneously amazed, glorifying God, and filled with phobos ('fear, awe'). The word paradoxa ('extraordinary things, things contrary to expectation') gives us the English 'paradox' — they have witnessed things that defy normal categories. The word semeron ('today') echoes the programmatic 'today' of 4:21.
- 27. Levi (identified as Matthew in Matthew 9:9) is sitting at his telonion ('tax booth, toll station'), likely a customs post on a trade route near Capernaum. Tax collectors were despised as collaborators with Rome and presumed cheaters. Jesus's invitation 'Follow me' (akolouthei moi) is the same simple, authoritative command that called the fishermen. Jesus does not ask Levi to reform first and then follow — the call comes to him in the midst of his despised occupation.
- 28. Like the fishermen (v. 11), Levi leaves 'everything' (panta). For a tax collector, this means abandoning a lucrative position — unlike fishing, the tax-collection franchise could not be easily resumed once abandoned. The imperfect ekolouthei ('was following, began to follow') may indicate the beginning of ongoing discipleship.
- 29. Levi's response to his call is immediate hospitality — a 'great banquet' (dochen megalen) that introduces Jesus to Levi's social network. The verb katakeimenoi ('reclining') indicates a formal Greco-Roman banquet setting where diners reclined on couches. The guest list — tax collectors and 'others' (presumably those outside respectable society) — will provoke the criticism of v. 30. Table fellowship in the ancient world implied acceptance and social equality among the diners.
- 30. The verb egongyzon ('were grumbling, were complaining') is the same word used for Israel's grumbling against Moses in the wilderness (Exodus 15:24, 16:2 LXX) — Luke may be drawing the parallel. The complaint is directed at the disciples rather than at Jesus directly. 'Tax collectors and sinners' (telonon kai hamartolon) is a stock phrase for the socially and religiously marginalized. The offense is table fellowship — eating with someone implied approval and solidarity.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 15:24 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 31. Jesus responds with a proverb that reframes the situation entirely. The Greek hugiainontes ('the healthy, those who are sound') and kakos echontes ('those having it badly, the sick') draw from medical vocabulary — fitting for Luke's audience. The proverb is both an explanation (I go where the need is) and a subtle challenge to the Pharisees (are you sure you're as healthy as you think?).

32. The verb elelitha ('I have come') implies purpose and mission — Jesus has come from somewhere (heaven) for a specific reason. The phrase eis metanoian ('to repentance') is added by Luke (Mark 2:17 lacks it), making the purpose explicit: Jesus seeks sinners not to condone their sin but to call them to transformation. Whether 'the righteous' (dikaiois) is said with irony (no one is truly righteous) or seriously (some are already in right relationship with God) is debated.
33. The complaint shifts from who Jesus eats with (v. 30) to the fact that his disciples eat at all rather than fasting. John's disciples and the Pharisees' disciples fasted 'frequently' (pykna) — the Pharisees fasted twice a week (Monday and Thursday, cf. 18:12). The contrast between fasting (religious austerity) and eating and drinking (celebration) sets up Jesus's response about the bridegroom.
34. The phrase huios tou nymphonos ('sons of the bridal chamber,' i.e., wedding guests, attendants of the bridegroom) is a Semitic idiom. The bridegroom image for God's relationship with his people has deep Old Testament roots (Isaiah 54:5, 62:5, Hosea 2:16-20). Jesus implicitly identifies himself as the bridegroom — a divine role. A wedding is a time of celebration, not fasting; Jesus's presence inaugurates a time of joy.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 54:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Hosea 2:16-20. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
35. The verb aparthē ('will be taken away') is a violent term — it suggests forcible removal, not voluntary departure. This is the first oblique reference to Jesus's death in Luke's Gospel. The passive voice implies others will take him away. The future fasting 'in those days' (en ekeinaiis tais hemeraiis) points to the period after the crucifixion. The statement subtly moves from the present joy of Jesus's ministry to the future sorrow of his death.
36. Luke's version of the patch parable is more elaborate than Mark's. Luke uniquely adds that the new garment would be ruined by cutting it — double loss. The point is not simply that new and old are incompatible but that trying to combine them destroys both. Jesus's movement is not a patch on existing religious structures but something entirely new.
37. New wine continues to ferment and expand; old wineskins have lost their elasticity. The metaphor drives home the same point as the patch parable: Jesus's message and movement cannot be contained within the old structures. The 'new wine' represents the kingdom of God breaking in; the 'old wineskins' represent the existing religious frameworks. Both the wine (the message) and the skins (the structure) are lost if forced together.
38. The verbal adjective bleteon ('must be put') expresses necessity — this is not optional but required. The new reality Jesus brings demands new forms to contain it. Luke does not include 'and both are preserved' (found in some manuscripts), keeping the focus on the necessity of the new.
39. This verse is unique to Luke and adds a surprising coda. The Greek chrestos ('good, pleasant, useful') — some manuscripts read chrestoteros ('better') — describes the old wine's appeal. The saying acknowledges a psychological reality: people prefer what they're accustomed to. The religious establishment will not readily embrace the new because the old system seems satisfactory. This verse may express gentle irony about the Pharisees' resistance or may acknowledge that the transition from old covenant to new is genuinely difficult.

Summary: Luke 6 contains two Sabbath controversies (grain-picking and healing a withered hand), the choosing of the Twelve apostles after a night of prayer, and the Sermon on the Plain — Luke's parallel to Matthew's Sermon on the Mount. The sermon includes four blessings and four woes, teaching on loving enemies, not judging, and the parable of the two foundations. This chapter establishes Jesus's ethical teaching and the formation of his core community.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's Beatitudes differ significantly from Matthew's. Luke has four blessings and four corresponding woes (Matthew has eight/nine blessings and no woes). Luke's blessings are addressed in the second person ('Blessed are you who are poor') rather than Matthew's third person ('Blessed are the poor in spirit'). Luke's version appears more concrete and socioeconomic — 'poor' rather than 'poor in spirit,' 'hungry now' rather than 'hungry for righteousness.' The 'love your enemies' teaching (vv. 27-36) is the most radical ethical instruction in the Gospels.

Translation Friction: The relationship between Luke's Sermon on the Plain and Matthew's Sermon on the Mount is debated — whether they are different versions of the same event, different events with overlapping material, or literary compositions drawing on a common source. We render Luke's Greek text as given without harmonizing with Matthew.

Connections: The Sabbath controversies connect to Exodus 20:8-11 and Deuteronomy 5:12-15, with Jesus reinterpreting Sabbath in light of its original humanitarian purpose. The Beatitudes echo the Magnificat's reversal theme (1:46-55) and Hannah's prayer (1 Samuel 2:1-10). The 'love your enemies' teaching connects to Leviticus 19:18 while radically extending it. The two-foundations parable echoes Ezekiel 13:10-16 and Proverbs 10:25.

¹On a Sabbath, as Jesus was passing through the grain fields, his disciples were picking heads of grain, rubbing them in their hands, and eating them. ²Some of the Pharisees said, "Why are you doing what is not permitted on the Sabbath?" ³Jesus answered them, "Have you not even read what David did when he and his companions were hungry? ⁴He entered the house of God, took the bread of the Presence and ate it, and gave some to his companions — bread that only the priests are permitted to eat." ⁵Then he said to them, "The Son of Man is lord of the Sabbath." ⁶On another Sabbath he entered the synagogue and was teaching. A man was there whose right hand was withered. ⁷The scribes and the Pharisees were watching him closely to see whether he would heal on the Sabbath, so that they might find a charge to bring against him. ⁸But he knew their thoughts and said to the man with the withered hand, "Get up and stand in the middle." He got up and stood there. ⁹Jesus said to them, "I ask you: is it lawful on the Sabbath to do good or to do harm, to save a life or to destroy it?" ¹⁰After looking around at all of them, he said to him, "Stretch out your hand." He did so, and his hand was restored. ¹¹But they were filled with fury and began discussing with one another what they might do to Jesus. ¹²In those days he went out to the mountain to pray, and he spent the whole night in prayer to God. ¹³When day came, he called his disciples and chose twelve of them, whom he also named apostles: ¹⁴Simon, whom he also named Peter, and Andrew his brother, and James and John, and Philip and Bartholomew, ¹⁵Matthew and Thomas, James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon called Zelotes, ¹⁶Judas the brother of James, and Judas Iscariot, which also was the traitor. ¹⁷He came down with them and stood on a level place. A large crowd of his disciples was there, along with a great multitude of people from all Judea and Jerusalem and the coastal region of Tyre and Sidon, ¹⁸They that were vexed with unclean spirits — then they were healed. ¹⁹The whole crowd sought to touch him — for there traveled virtue out of him, and healed them all.

²⁰Then he looked up at his disciples and said:

"Blessed are you who are poor,
for yours is the kingdom of God.

²¹Blessed are you who are hungry now,
for you will be satisfied.
Blessed are you who weep now,
for you will laugh.

²²Blessed are you when people hate you, and when they exclude you and insult you and reject your name as evil on account of the Son of Man. ²³Rejoice in that day and leap for joy, for your reward is great in heaven. For their ancestors treated the prophets in the same way.

²⁴But woe to you who are rich, for you have already received your comfort.

²⁵Woe to you who are full now, for you will be hungry.
Woe to you who laugh now,
for you will mourn and weep.

²⁶Woe to you when all people speak well of you, for their ancestors treated the false prophets in the same way.

²⁷"But I say to you who are listening: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, ²⁸Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which maliciously use you. ²⁹To the one who strikes you on the cheek, offer the other also, and from the one who takes your cloak, do not withhold your tunic either. ³⁰Give to everyone who asks you, and from the one who takes what is yours, do not demand it back. ³¹Treat others the way you want them to treat you. ³²If you love those who love you, what credit is that to you? Even sinners love those who love them. ³³And if you do good to those who do good to you, what credit is that to you? Even sinners do the same. ³⁴And if you lend to those from whom you expect to receive back, what credit is that to you? Even sinners lend to sinners to get back the same amount. ³⁵But love your enemies, do good, and lend expecting nothing in return. Then your reward will be great, and you will be children of the Most High, for he is kind to the ungrateful and the wicked. ³⁶Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful. ³⁷"Do not judge, and you will not be judged. Do not condemn, and you will not be condemned. Forgive, and you will be forgiven. ³⁸Give, and it will be given to you — a good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over, will be poured into your lap. For the measure you use will be measured back to you." ³⁹He also told them a parable: "Can a blind person guide a blind person? Will they not both fall into a pit? ⁴⁰A disciple is not above the teacher, but everyone who is fully trained will be like the teacher. ⁴¹Why do you see the speck in your brother's eye, but do not notice the log in your own eye? ⁴²How can you say to your brother, 'Brother, let me take the speck out of your eye,' when you yourself do not see the log in your own eye? You hypocrite! First take the log out of your own eye, and then you will see clearly to take the speck out of your brother's eye. ⁴³"No good tree produces bad fruit, nor does a bad tree produce good fruit. ⁴⁴Each tree is known by its own fruit. People do not gather figs from thornbushes, or pick grapes from a bramble bush. ⁴⁵The good person out of the good treasure of the heart produces good, and the evil person out of evil treasure produces evil. For out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaks. ⁴⁶"Why do you call me 'Lord, Lord,' and not do what I tell you? ⁴⁷Everyone who comes to me and hears my words and acts on them — I will show you what that person is like. ⁴⁸That person is like someone building a house who dug deep and laid the foundation on rock. When a flood came, the river burst against that house but could not shake it, because it had been well built. ⁴⁹But the one who hears and does not act is like someone who built a house on the ground without a foundation. When the river burst against it, it collapsed immediately, and the destruction of that house was great."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The SBLGNT reads simply en sabbato ('on a Sabbath') without the textually difficult deuteroproto ('second-first') found in some manuscripts and reflected in the KJV. The disciples' actions — picking grain (etillon) and rubbing it (psochontes) — would have been considered reaping and threshing under strict Pharisaic Sabbath interpretation. Deuteronomy 23:25 permitted eating from a neighbor's field by hand; the issue was not theft but Sabbath work.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 23:25. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The Greek exestin ('it is permitted, it is lawful') refers to halakhic legal interpretation — the Pharisees' oral tradition had elaborated thirty-nine categories of forbidden Sabbath work. The accusation is specific: the disciples are violating the Sabbath by performing agricultural labor. The Pharisees address 'you' (plural), including Jesus as responsible for his disciples' behavior.
3. Jesus's opening 'Have you not even read?' (oude touto anegnote) is a pointed challenge to the Pharisees' biblical expertise. The appeal to David's precedent (1 Samuel 21:1-6) is a brilliant rhetorical move: if David, the greatest king, could supersede the letter of the law when necessity demanded, how much more can the Son of David? The parallel is: David was hungry and broke the bread law; the disciples are hungry and break the Sabbath law.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 1 Samuel 21:1-6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The 'bread of the Presence' (artos tes protheseos, literally 'bread of the setting-forth') refers to the twelve loaves placed before God in the tabernacle and renewed weekly (Leviticus 24:5-9, Exodus 25:30). Only priests could eat the old loaves. David's action in 1 Samuel 21:1-6 established a principle: human need can take precedence over ritual restriction. Jesus does not argue that the Sabbath law is wrong but that its application must serve human well-being.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 24:5-9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 25:30. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Samuel 21:1-6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The claim is extraordinary: the Son of Man is kyrios ('lord, master, sovereign') of the Sabbath — the day God himself instituted (Genesis 2:2-3, Exodus 20:8-11). If Jesus is lord of the Sabbath, he has authority to determine its proper observance. Luke does not include Mark's statement 'The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath' (Mark 2:27), going directly to the christological claim.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 2:2-3 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 20:8-11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

6. Luke specifies 'the right hand' (he dexia) — a detail absent from Mark and Matthew. The right hand was considered the hand of power, skill, and blessing; its loss was particularly disabling. The Greek xera ('dry, withered, atrophied') indicates a chronic condition, not an acute injury. The scene is set for another Sabbath confrontation.
7. The verb pareterounto ('were watching closely, were observing carefully') suggests hostile surveillance. Luke reveals their intent: not to learn or to wonder but to 'find a charge' (heurōsin kategorein) — legal language for building a case. The healing has not yet occurred, but the opposition has already decided on their conclusion.
8. Again Jesus demonstrates knowledge of internal thoughts (edei tous dialogismous auton, cf. 5:22). Rather than avoiding the confrontation, Jesus makes it public — placing the man 'in the middle' (eis to meson) forces everyone to see the human need that stands at the center of the Sabbath debate. The man's obedient response sets the stage for the healing.
9. Jesus reframes the question entirely. The Pharisees asked whether healing was permitted; Jesus asks whether doing good or doing harm is permitted. The verbs agathopoesai ('to do good') and kakopoesai ('to do harm') create a stark binary — if healing is forbidden, then refusing to heal when one can is doing harm. The Sabbath, meant for human flourishing, becomes an instrument of suffering when its observance prevents mercy. Jesus forces the opposition to choose between their interpretation and basic human compassion.
10. The verb periblepsamenos ('having looked around at') describes a deliberate, sweeping gaze — Jesus looks each opponent in the eye before acting. The command 'stretch out your hand' (ekteinon ten cheira sou) requires the man to do what he cannot do — and in the act of obedience, ability is given. The passive apekatestathē ('was restored') is a divine passive — God restores through Jesus's command.
11. The Greek anoias ('madness, fury, senselessness') indicates an irrational rage — literally 'without mind.' They are 'filled' (eplesthesan) with it, as others have been 'filled' with the Holy Spirit. Luke presents two types of fullness: Spirit-filled praise and fury-filled plotting. Their discussion about 'what they might do to Jesus' (ti an poiesian to Iesou) is the beginning of the conspiracy that will lead to the cross.
12. The verb dianyktereoun ('spending the whole night') appears only here in the New Testament. Jesus's all-night prayer precedes the appointment of the Twelve — the most consequential leadership decision of his ministry is preceded by the most extended prayer Luke records. The phrase en te proseuche tou theou ('in the prayer of God') could mean 'in prayer to God' or possibly 'in a house of prayer dedicated to God.' The former is more likely.
13. The verb exelexamenos ('having chosen, having selected') indicates deliberate, Spirit-informed selection from a larger group of disciples. The title apostolous ('apostles, sent ones') from the verb apostello ('to send') defines their role: they are commissioned representatives, sent with the authority of the one who sends them. The number twelve corresponds to the twelve tribes of Israel — the apostles represent the reconstituted people of God.
14. Simon receives the name Petros ('Peter,' from petra, 'rock'). This renaming echoes the Old Testament pattern of God renaming those he commissions for special roles (Abram to Abraham, Jacob to Israel). Andrew and Simon are brothers; James and John are brothers (sons of Zebedee, 5:10). The list is arranged in pairs, a pattern that may reflect mission practice (cf. 10:1, sent 'two by two').
15. Matthew is identified with Levi the tax collector (5:27-28) by tradition. Thomas (from Aramaic te'oma, 'twin') will later be known for his doubt and his confession (John 20:24-28). James son of Alphaeus is distinguished from James son of Zebedee. Simon 'the Zealot' (zeoloten) indicates either membership in the Zealot political movement opposing Rome or simply religious zeal. The group includes a former tax collector (Roman collaborator) and a zealot (anti-Roman nationalist) — an extraordinary combination.
16. Two men named Judas (Ioudas) are listed. 'Judas of James' (Ioudan Iakobou) is called 'son of James' by most interpreters (though 'brother of James' is possible; the KJV chooses 'brother'). Judas Iscariot — whose surname may mean 'man of Kerioth' (a Judean town) or may derive from the Latin sicarius ('dagger-man') — is identified proleptically as prodotes ('traitor, betrayer'). Luke names the end from the beginning.
17. The Greek topou pedinou ('a level/flat place') gives this sermon its traditional name, 'Sermon on the Plain,' distinguishing it from Matthew's 'Sermon on the Mount.' Jesus has come down from the mountain (v. 12) to level ground. The audience includes people from Tyre and Sidon — Gentile territory — consistent with Luke's universal scope. The crowd includes 'disciples' (mathetōn, a larger group than the Twelve) and 'the people' (laou, the general population).
18. Luke distinguishes between those with diseases (nosōn, physical illness) and those troubled by unclean spirits (pneumatōn akathartōn) — different conditions requiring different interventions, though both are resolved by Jesus's power. The verb etherapeuonto ('were being healed, were cured') is in the imperfect, suggesting ongoing healing activity.
19. The verb ezetoun ('were seeking, were trying') shows the crowd's desperate urgency. The Greek dynamis ('power') literally 'was going out from him' (par autou exercheto) — Luke depicts healing power as a tangible force that radiates from Jesus's person. This same concept appears in the story of the woman who touched his garment (8:46). The universal scope — 'healing everyone' (iato pantas) — demonstrates the comprehensive nature of Jesus's restorative power.
20. Luke's Beatitudes are addressed directly to the disciples in the second person ('you who are poor') rather than Matthew's third person ('the poor in spirit'). The Greek ptochoi ('poor, destitute, beggars') without Matthew's qualifying 'in spirit' (to pneumati) refers primarily to material poverty, though spiritual poverty is not excluded. Luke's Jesus consistently champions the economically poor (1:52-53, 4:18, 7:22, 14:13, 16:19-31). The kingdom of God belongs to the poor — not as a future reward for suffering but as a present reality of divine reversal.

21. Luke adds nyn ('now') twice, creating a temporal contrast between present suffering and future reversal. The Greek chortasthesesthe ('you will be satisfied, you will be filled') was originally used for feeding animals to satisfaction — it implies complete, even excessive fullness. The verb gelasete ('you will laugh') is unique to Luke's Beatitudes — laughter as the reversal of weeping. The structure mirrors the Magnificat: God fills the hungry and satisfies those who mourn.
22. Four verbs describe escalating persecution: hate (misesōsin), exclude/separate (aphorisosin — possibly excommunication from the synagogue), insult/reproach (oneidisōsin), and reject/cast out your name (ekbalosin to onoma). The phrase 'on account of the Son of Man' (heneka tou huiou tou anthrōpou) specifies that the blessing applies specifically to persecution for loyalty to Jesus, not suffering in general.
23. The verb skirtesate ('leap for joy') is the same word used for the unborn John leaping in Elizabeth's womb (1:41, 44) — physical, exuberant joy. The persecuted are placed in the lineage of the prophets — to be rejected for God's sake is to share the fate of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Elijah. The 'great reward in heaven' (misthos polys en to ourano) does not mean a distant, immaterial compensation but the heavenly reality that already exists and will be fully revealed.
24. The four woes (vv. 24-26) are unique to Luke and mirror the four blessings exactly. The Greek ouai ('woe') is not a curse but a prophetic lament — 'how terrible for you.' The verb apechete ('you have received in full') is a commercial term used for receipts — the rich have been paid in full; there is no more coming. The Greek paraklesin ('comfort, consolation') is the same word used for the 'consolation of Israel' Simeon awaited (2:25). Those who have already found their consolation in wealth will not find it in God.
25. The reversal is exact: full now/hungry later mirrors hungry now/satisfied later (v. 21); laughing now/mourning later mirrors weeping now/laughing later (v. 21). The word nyn ('now') again marks the temporal dimension — present condition does not determine ultimate destiny. Luke's Jesus consistently warns that present prosperity can be spiritually dangerous when it becomes self-sufficient and indifferent to the suffering of others.
26. The fourth woe mirrors the fourth blessing. Universal popularity is a danger sign — the false prophets who told people what they wanted to hear were praised (cf. Jeremiah 5:31, Micah 2:11), while the true prophets who spoke God's uncomfortable word were persecuted (v. 23). If everyone speaks well of you, you may be telling people what they want to hear rather than what God says.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Jeremiah 5:31. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Micah 2:11. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The phrase 'to you who are listening' (hymn tois akouousin) narrows the audience to those willing to hear. The command agapate tous echthrous hymon ('love your enemies') is the most radical ethical demand in the Gospels. The Greek agapao is not an emotion but a deliberate choice to act for another's good — it can be commanded because it is about action, not feeling. 'Do good' (kalōs poieite) specifies what love looks like in practice.
28. Four commands form two pairs: love/do good (v. 27) and bless/pray (v. 28). 'Bless' (eulogeite) means to speak well of, to invoke God's favor upon — the opposite of their cursing. 'Pray for' (proseuchesthe peri) goes beyond words to intercessory action. The verb epereavonton ('those who mistreat, those who abuse') describes deliberate hostility. Jesus commands active good toward those who actively harm.
29. The slap on the cheek (siagona) was an insult rather than an assault — a backhanded slap was a gesture of contempt. Offering the other cheek is not passive acceptance of abuse but a refusal to retaliate that asserts dignity. Luke reverses the garment order from Matthew (Matthew says tunic then cloak; Luke says cloak then tunic). The himation ('outer cloak') was essential for warmth; the chiton ('inner tunic') was the basic garment. The teaching demands radical non-retaliation that goes beyond what is taken.
30. The command is sweeping: panti aitounti ('to everyone who asks') allows no exceptions. The verb apaitei ('demand back') implies legal recourse — do not sue for recovery. These are radical economic principles that prioritize relationship over property. They are not legal codes for civil government but principles for kingdom living that demonstrate trust in God's provision rather than self-protection.
31. The 'Golden Rule' appears in positive form here and in Matthew 7:12. The negative form ('do not do to others what you would not want done to you') was already known in Judaism — attributed to Rabbi Hillel (b. Shabbat 31a). Jesus's positive formulation is more demanding: it requires active initiative, not merely passive restraint. The Greek kathos thelete ('as you want') makes the standard one's own desires for good treatment.
32. The Greek charis ('credit, grace, thanks') is used here in the sense of 'what is remarkable or praiseworthy about that?' Luke uses 'sinners' (hamartoloi) where Matthew uses 'tax collectors' — both make the same point: reciprocal love requires no grace or moral distinction. Even those outside the covenant community practice reciprocal love. Jesus's ethic demands something qualitatively different.
33. The threefold repetition (love, vv. 32; do good, v. 33; lend, v. 34) drives the point home: every form of reciprocal virtue is practiced by people who make no claim to follow God. The standard for disciples must exceed the baseline of ordinary human reciprocity.
34. The Greek danisete ('lend') and the expectation of receiving ta isa ('equal amount, same amount back') describes ordinary commercial lending. This is not charity but investment. Jesus challenges the economic logic of reciprocity: kingdom economics gives without calculating return.
35. The phrase meden apelpizontes ('expecting nothing back, despairing of nothing') captures the radical nature of kingdom generosity. The motivation is not reciprocity but imitation of God — 'you will be children of the Most High' (esesthe huioi hypsistou). To be God's children means to act like God. And God's character is defined here as chrestos ('kind, good, gracious') toward tous acharistous kai ponerous ('the ungrateful and the wicked'). This is Luke's version of Matthew's 'perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect.'

36. Where Matthew 5:48 says 'be perfect' (teleioi), Luke says 'be merciful' (oiktirmones). The Greek oiktirmon ('compassionate, merciful') echoes the Hebrew rachum (from rechem, 'womb') — the deep, visceral compassion of a parent for a child. The standard is not abstract moral perfection but God's own compassionate character. This verse encapsulates the entire Sermon on the Plain.
37. Three prohibitions and three corresponding promises form a tight structure. The Greek krinete ('judge') means to pass sentence, to render a verdict — not to exercise discernment (which is required elsewhere). The verb katadikazete ('condemn') is even stronger — to pass a guilty verdict. The verb apolyete ('forgive, release, let go') is the same word used for forgiveness of sins (aphesis). Each human action triggers a divine response: how we treat others determines how God treats us.
38. The imagery is from the grain market: filling a container, pressing the grain down to remove air, shaking it to settle, and piling more until it overflows. God's return is not merely proportional but superabundant. The 'lap' (kolpon, literally 'bosom' or the fold of a garment used as a pocket) was where merchants received their measured goods. The proverb 'the measure you use will be measured back to you' (ho metro metreite antimetrethesetai hymin) applies to generosity, judgment, forgiveness, and all human dealings.
39. The parable is brief and proverbial. In Matthew 15:14, it is directed at the Pharisees; in Luke, the context suggests it applies to the disciples — those who would teach others must first be able to see clearly themselves. The rhetorical questions expect obvious answers: no, a blind guide cannot lead; yes, both will fall.
40. The Greek katertismenos ('fully trained, fully equipped, made complete') does not mean 'perfect' in the moral sense (as the KJV suggests) but 'fully formed' or 'thoroughly prepared.' The principle is that a student's goal is to become like the teacher. If the teacher is blind, the student will also be blind (v. 39). The positive implication: if Jesus is the teacher, the fully trained disciple will be like him.
41. The Greek karpheos ('speck, splinter, small piece of straw') contrasted with dokos ('beam, log, main structural timber') creates deliberate absurdist humor. The contrast is comically exaggerated to make a serious point about self-righteousness. The verb katanoeis ('notice, observe carefully, consider') implies that failure to see one's own faults requires willful inattention.
42. The term hypokrita ('hypocrite') originally meant 'actor' — one who plays a role. Jesus applies it to those who perform the role of moral adviser while ignoring their own greater faults. Note that Jesus does not forbid helping others with their faults — he says 'first' (proton) deal with your own, 'and then' (kai tote) you will see clearly to help. The goal is not indifference to others' faults but honest self-examination as the prerequisite for genuine helpfulness.
43. The Greek sapron ('rotten, worthless, bad') describes fruit that is spoiled and useless. The tree-and-fruit metaphor establishes a direct connection between inner character and outward behavior. The logic is: examine the fruit to know the tree, examine the behavior to know the heart.
44. The examples are common-sense observations from Palestinian agriculture. Figs (syka) come from fig trees, not from thornbushes (akanthōn). Grapes (staphylen) come from grapevines, not from bramble bushes (batou). The principle is self-evident: the nature of the source determines the nature of the product. Applied to human character, one's actions inevitably reveal one's inner condition.
45. The Greek thesauros ('treasure, storehouse') of the heart is the accumulated deposit of character, conviction, and disposition. The verb propherei ('brings forth, produces') indicates that speech and action emerge from this inner storehouse. The concluding proverb — 'out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaks' (ek perisseumatōs kardias lalei to stoma) — identifies speech as the most immediate revelation of the heart's condition.
46. The doubled kyrie kyrie ('Lord, Lord') indicates emphatic address — these are not casual followers but people who use the most respectful title. Yet verbal acknowledgment without corresponding obedience is empty. Jesus's challenge is directed at the gap between confession and conduct. The question is unanswerable — there is no good reason for the contradiction.
47. Three actions define the true disciple: coming to Jesus (erchomenos), hearing his words (akouon), and doing them (poion). All three are necessary — hearing without doing is insufficient (v. 49). Luke frames this as a comparison ('I will show you what that person is like'), introducing the parable of the two builders.
48. Luke's version emphasizes the effort of preparation: eskapsev kai ebathynen ('dug and went deep') — the builder deliberately dug down to bedrock rather than building on the surface. The flood (plemmys, a word unique to this passage in the NT) and the river's violent assault (proserexen, 'burst against, dashed against') represent the trials and crises of life. The house stands not because of the storm's weakness but because of the foundation's strength — dia to kalos oikodomesthai ('because it had been well built').
49. The contrast is not between two different storms but between two different foundations — choris themeliou ('without a foundation'). Both houses face the same crisis; the difference is entirely in the preparation. The collapse is immediate (euthys, 'at once') and total — to rhegma ('the destruction, the ruin, the crash') is catastrophic. Luke ends the sermon on this sobering note: hearing Jesus's words without obeying them leads not to a minor setback but to complete ruin.

Summary: Luke 7 presents three major episodes that reveal Jesus's authority and compassion across social boundaries. A Roman centurion in Capernaum displays extraordinary faith by asking Jesus to heal his servant with a word alone — faith Jesus declares unmatched in Israel. At Nain, Jesus raises a widow's only son from the dead, evoking the Elijah-Elisha prophetic tradition. When John the Baptist sends disciples to ask if Jesus is 'the one who is to come,' Jesus responds by pointing to the evidence of his ministry. The chapter concludes with a sinful woman anointing Jesus's feet at a Pharisee's dinner, provoking a parable about forgiveness and love.

What Makes This Remarkable: The centurion's faith is remarkable precisely because he is a Gentile who understands authority structures — he recognizes that Jesus commands illness the way a military officer commands soldiers. The raising at Nain has no parallel in Matthew or Mark and closely mirrors Elijah's raising of the widow's son at Zarephath (1 Kings 17:17-24). Jesus's reply to John's disciples (vv. 22-23) is a mosaic of Isaiah quotations (29:18-19, 35:5-6, 61:1) that implicitly identifies Jesus as the fulfillment of prophetic hope. The anointing scene demonstrates Luke's distinctive theology of forgiveness: the woman's great love is the evidence of great forgiveness already received, not its cause.

Translation Friction: The centurion story differs in detail from Matthew 8:5-13, where the centurion comes in person. Luke has him send intermediaries (Jewish elders, then friends), which many scholars consider the more historically precise account. We render Luke's text as it stands. The identity of the anointing woman is not specified — she is not Mary Magdalene (a later tradition) or Mary of Bethany (John 12). Luke calls her simply 'a woman in the city who was a sinner.'

Connections: The widow of Nain episode echoes 1 Kings 17:17-24 (Elijah) and 2 Kings 4:18-37 (Elisha). Jesus's words to John's disciples draw from Isaiah 29:18-19, 35:5-6, and 61:1-2. The parable of the two debtors (vv. 41-43) anticipates the parable of the unforgiving servant in Matthew 18:23-35. John the Baptist's question connects to his earlier testimony in Luke 3:15-17.

¹After he had finished all his words in the hearing of the people, he entered Capernaum. ²Now a centurion's servant, who was highly valued by him, was sick and about to die. ³When he heard about Jesus, he sent Jewish elders to him, asking him to come and save the life of his servant. ⁴When they came to Jesus, they urged him earnestly, saying, "He is worthy for you to do this for him, ⁵Since he loveth our nation, then he has built us a synagogue. ⁶Jesus went with them. When he was not far from the house, the centurion sent friends, saying to him, "Lord, do not trouble yourself, for I am not worthy to have you come under my roof. ⁷Therefore I did not even consider myself worthy to come to you. But say the word, and let my servant be healed. ⁸For I too am a man placed under authority, with soldiers under me. I say to one, 'Go,' and he goes, and to another, 'Come,' and he comes, and to my servant, 'Do this,' and he does it." ⁹When Jesus heard this, he marveled at him, and turning to the crowd following him, said, "I tell you, not even in Israel have I found such faith." ¹⁰And when those who had been sent returned to the house, they found the servant in good health. ¹¹Soon afterward, he went to a town called Nain, and his disciples and a large crowd went with him. ¹²As he drew near to the gate of the town, a dead man was being carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow. A large crowd from the town was with her. ¹³When the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her and said to her, "Do not weep." ¹⁴Then he came forward and touched the bier, and the bearers stood still. He said, "Young man, I say to you, arise." ¹⁵The dead man sat up and began to speak, and Jesus gave him to his mother. ¹⁶Fear seized them all, and they glorified God, saying, "A great prophet has risen among us!" and "God has visited his people!" ¹⁷And this report about him spread through all Judea and all the surrounding region. ¹⁸The disciples of John reported all these things to him. ¹⁹And John, summoning two of his disciples, sent them to the Lord, asking, "Are you the one who is to come, or should we expect someone else?" ²⁰When the men came to him, they said, "John the Baptist has sent us to you, asking, 'Are you the one who is to come, or should we expect someone else?'" ²¹In that very hour he healed many people of diseases and afflictions and evil spirits, and to many who were blind he gave sight. ²²And he answered them, "Go and tell John what you have seen and heard: the blind receive sight, the lame walk, lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have good news proclaimed to them. ²³And blessed is the one who is not offended by me." ²⁴When John's messengers had gone, Jesus began to speak to the crowds concerning John: "What did you go out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken by the wind? ²⁵What then did you go out to see? A man dressed in soft clothing? Those who wear splendid clothing and live in luxury are in royal palaces. ²⁶What then did you go out to see? A prophet? Yes, I tell you, and more than a prophet. ²⁷This is the one about whom it is written, 'Look, I send my messenger ahead of you, who will prepare your way before you.' ²⁸I tell you, among those born of women none is greater than John. Yet the one who is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he." ²⁹When all the people heard this, and the tax collectors too, they declared God righteous, having been baptized with John's baptism. ³⁰But the Pharisees and the lawyers rejected the purpose of God for themselves, not having been baptized by him. ³¹"To what then shall I compare the people of this generation, and what are they like? ³²They are like children sitting in the marketplace and calling to one another, 'We played the flute for you, and you did not dance; we sang a dirge, and you did not weep.' ³³For John the Baptist has come eating no bread and drinking no wine, and you say, 'He has a demon.' ³⁴The Son of Man has come eating and drinking, and you say, 'Look at him! A glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners!' ³⁵Yet wisdom is vindicated by all her children." ³⁶One of the Pharisees asked him to eat with him, and he went into the Pharisee's house and reclined at table. ³⁷And a woman of the city, who was a sinner, when she learned that he was reclining at table in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster flask of ointment. ³⁸Stood at his ankles behind him weeping, and started to wash his ankles with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment. ³⁹Now when the Pharisee who had invited him saw this, he said to himself, "If this man were a prophet, he would have known who and what sort of woman this is who is touching him — that she is a sinner." ⁴⁰Jesus answered him, "Simon, I have something to say to you." And he said, "Say it, Teacher." ⁴¹"A certain moneylender had two debtors. One owed five hundred denarii, and the other fifty. ⁴²When they could not pay, he graciously forgave them both. Now which of them will love him more?" ⁴³Simon answered, "I suppose the one to whom he forgave more." He said to him, "You have judged correctly." ⁴⁴Then turning toward the woman, he said to Simon, "Do you see this woman? I entered your house; you gave me no water for my feet, but she has wet my feet with her tears and wiped them with her hair. ⁴⁵You gave me no kiss, but from the time I came in she has not ceased kissing my feet. ⁴⁶You did not anoint my head with oil, but she has anointed my feet with ointment. ⁴⁷Therefore I tell you, her sins, which are many, are forgiven — for she loved much. But the one who is forgiven little, loves little." ⁴⁸Then he said to her, "Your sins are forgiven." ⁴⁹Then those who were at table with him began to say among themselves, "Who is this, who even forgives sins?" ⁵⁰And he said to the woman, "Your faith has saved you; go in peace."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse connects the Sermon on the Plain (chapter 6) to the narratives that follow. The phrase eis tas akoas tou laou ('in the hearing of the people') emphasizes the public nature of the teaching.
2. The word entimos ('valued, precious, honored') indicates this was no ordinary slave — the centurion had genuine affection for this servant. Luke uses doulos ('slave, servant') rather than Matthew's pais ('boy, servant, child').
3. Unlike Matthew's account where the centurion approaches directly, Luke has him send intermediaries — Jewish elders (presbyterous tōn Ioudaiōn). This may reflect the centurion's cultural sensitivity about a Gentile approaching a Jewish teacher, or Luke's interest in the relationship between this Roman and the Jewish community.
4. The Jewish elders vouch for the centurion's worthiness (axios) — a judgment that will be ironically reversed by the centurion's own words in verse 6. The elders' advocacy reveals an unusual relationship between this Roman officer and the local Jewish community.
5. A Roman centurion who loves (agapa) the Jewish nation and funds synagogue construction is a God-fearer — a Gentile sympathizer with Judaism who has not undergone full conversion. Such figures appear frequently in Luke-Acts (cf. Cornelius in Acts 10).
6. The centurion now sends a second delegation — friends (philous) — with a message of self-abasement. Where the elders said 'he is worthy' (axios, v. 4), the centurion says 'I am not worthy' (ouk hikanos). The concern about Jesus entering his house may reflect awareness of Jewish purity concerns about Gentile homes.
7. Luke uses pais ('servant, child') here rather than doulos ('slave') as in verse 2, suggesting the terms may be interchangeable for this relationship. The centurion's faith is in the authority of Jesus's word alone — no touch, no visit, no ritual required.

8. The centurion's reasoning is profound: he understands authority from the inside. Because he operates under the authority of Rome and exercises delegated authority over soldiers, he recognizes that Jesus operates under the authority of God and exercises delegated authority over illness. The 'how much more' logic is implicit — if a Roman officer's word commands obedience, how much more the word of one who commands on behalf of God.
9. The verb ethaumasēn ('marveled, was amazed') is striking — Jesus is rarely said to be amazed. That a Gentile soldier displays greater faith than anyone in Israel is a provocative declaration, anticipating Luke's consistent theme that outsiders often respond more readily than insiders (cf. the Samaritans, the prodigal's return).
10. Luke records the healing without narrating the moment — the messengers simply find the servant well (hygiainonta, 'in good health'). The healing has occurred at a distance, confirming the centurion's faith that Jesus's word alone is sufficient.
11. Nain is a small village about six miles southeast of Nazareth. This episode is unique to Luke. The detail that both disciples and a large crowd accompanied Jesus sets the stage for a public miracle with many witnesses.
12. Every detail heightens the pathos: the son is dead (tethnēkōs), he is her only son (monogenēs), and she is a widow (chēra). Without a son, a widow in the ancient world had no provider, no legal advocate, no social standing. The word monogenēs ('only-begotten, one-of-a-kind') is the same word John uses for Jesus (John 3:16). Two crowds converge at the town gate — one following Jesus, one following death.
13. Luke calls Jesus 'the Lord' (ho kyrios) — a title Luke uses in narrative more freely than the other Gospels. The verb esplanchnisthē ('had compassion') derives from splanchna ('intestines, bowels'), reflecting the ancient understanding that deep emotion was felt in the gut. Jesus initiates this miracle unprompted — no one asks him to intervene.
14. Touching a bier (soros, the open coffin or funeral stretcher) rendered a person ceremonially unclean (Numbers 19:11-16). Jesus's touch stops the procession. The command egerthēti ('arise, be raised') is the same verb used for resurrection throughout the New Testament. Jesus addresses the dead man directly — his word has authority even over death.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 19:11-16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The phrase 'gave him to his mother' (edōken auton tē mētri autou) directly echoes 1 Kings 17:23, where Elijah 'gave him to his mother' after raising the widow of Zarephath's son. Luke's readers would recognize the prophetic parallel. The detail that the young man began to speak confirms the reality of the restoration — he is not merely resuscitated but fully alive.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Kings 17:23 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The crowd's response identifies Jesus as a prophet — specifically a great prophet, evoking Elijah or the prophet like Moses promised in Deuteronomy 18:15. The verb epeskepsato ('has visited') is a key Lukan term (cf. 1:68, 78) meaning God has come to intervene on behalf of his people, echoing the Hebrew paqad.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 18:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The word logos ('word, report, account') indicates that the story of the Nain miracle becomes widely known. 'Judea' here may refer broadly to the land of the Jews rather than strictly to the southern province.
18. John the Baptist is in prison (Luke 3:19-20). His disciples serve as intermediaries, bringing news of Jesus's ministry. The phrase peri pantōn toutōn ('about all these things') refers to the centurion's healing and the raising at Nain.
19. John's question is startling from the one who identified Jesus at the Jordan (Luke 3:16). Whether it reflects genuine doubt in prison, a desire for his disciples' benefit, or a prophetic impatience that the kingdom has not yet arrived in the way he expected (cf. Luke 3:17, the 'winnowing fork'), is debated. The phrase 'the one who is to come' (ho erchomenos) was a recognized messianic title.
20. The repetition of the question emphasizes its weight. Luke records the full exchange, showing the messengers faithfully relaying John's exact words.
21. Luke inserts this summary of healing activity so that Jesus's response to John in the next verse is grounded in observable evidence. The verb echarisato ('gave as a gift, granted graciously') shares the root of charis ('grace') — sight is a gift of grace.
22. Jesus does not answer John's question directly but points to evidence drawn from Isaiah's prophecies: Isaiah 29:18-19 (deaf hear, blind see), Isaiah 35:5-6 (blind, deaf, lame), and Isaiah 61:1 (good news to the poor). The list forms a composite fulfillment citation. The final item — the poor receiving good news — is climactic, echoing Jesus's own programmatic statement in Luke 4:18.

- 23. The verb skandalisthē ('caused to stumble, take offense') is a warning: Jesus's ministry does not match the expected pattern of a conquering Messiah. The beatitude is gentle but pointed — even John may need to recalibrate his expectations. Jesus is the stumbling stone (skandalon) for those whose messianic hopes don't match his methods.
- 24. Jesus waits until John's messengers leave before publicly praising John — perhaps to spare John's dignity. The image of a reed shaken by the wind suggests weakness and vacillation. The answer is obviously 'No' — John is anything but weak-willed.
- 25. The contrast is between the desert prophet in rough garments and the courtier in fine robes. John is in Herod's prison, but he does not belong to Herod's world. Luke adds 'luxury' (tryphē) to Matthew's version, sharpening the contrast.
- 26. Jesus affirms John's prophetic identity but elevates him beyond it — John is 'more than a prophet' (perissoteron prophētou) because he is the forerunner who directly precedes the Messiah.
- 27. The quotation combines Exodus 23:20 and Malachi 3:1. In the original Malachi context, God sends his messenger before his own coming to the temple. By applying this to John as the forerunner of Jesus, the text implicitly identifies Jesus with the LORD whose coming Malachi announces.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Malachi 3:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 23:20. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. The SBLGNT omits 'prophet' (prophētēs) after 'John' — making the statement even more sweeping: no human born has been greater than John. Yet the kingdom of God introduces a new order in which even the least participant surpasses the greatest figure of the old order. This is not a diminishment of John but an exaltation of the kingdom.
- 29. The phrase edikaiōsan ton theon ('justified God, declared God righteous') is a remarkable expression — the people acknowledged that God's plan through John was right. Tax collectors (telōnai), despised as collaborators with Rome, are singled out as responsive to God's purposes.
- 30. The contrast is stark: sinners accepted God's plan; the religious experts rejected (ēthetēsan) it. The phrase boulēn tou theou ('the purpose/counsel of God') is a weighty theological term — the Pharisees are not merely declining a ritual but rejecting God's redemptive plan.
- 31. Jesus introduces a parable with a double rhetorical question — a common rabbinic teaching format. The phrase 'this generation' (tēs geneas tautēs) carries a negative connotation throughout the Gospels, suggesting stubbornness and spiritual obtuseness.
- 32. The image is of petulant children who refuse to play along regardless of the game proposed. Whether the game is a wedding (flute, dancing) or a funeral (dirge, weeping), they refuse to participate. This generation rejected both John's austerity and Jesus's celebration.
- 33. John's ascetic lifestyle — no bread, no wine — was consistent with prophetic and Nazirite traditions, but his critics dismissed it as demonic. The accusation 'He has a demon' is the most extreme form of rejection.
- 34. The accusation phagos kai oinopotēs ('glutton and drunkard') echoes the charge against a 'rebellious son' in Deuteronomy 21:20, which carried the death penalty. Jesus's critics may be implicitly making a capital accusation. The phrase 'friend of tax collectors and sinners' (philos telōnōn kai hamartōlōn) was intended as an insult but has become one of the most beloved descriptions of Jesus.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 21:20. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. The personification of Wisdom (sophia) echoes Proverbs 8-9. The meaning is that God's wisdom — expressed through both John's austerity and Jesus's celebratory presence — is proven right by its results ('children,' teknōn). Luke has 'all her children' where Matthew has 'her deeds' (Matthew 11:19).
- 35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Proverbs 8-9 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 36. Jesus accepts dinner invitations from Pharisees as well as sinners — he is not partisan in his associations. The verb kateklithē ('reclined') indicates a formal meal; diners reclined on couches, leaning on the left elbow with feet extending behind them — a detail essential for understanding the woman's approach in verse 38.
- 37. The woman is identified only as 'a sinner' (hamartōlos) — likely a euphemism for a prostitute, though Luke does not specify. She is not named, and there is no basis for identifying her with Mary Magdalene (a conflation dating to Pope Gregory I in 591 AD). The alabaster flask (alabastron) of myron ('perfumed ointment') was an expensive luxury item.
- 38. Because diners reclined with feet extending away from the table, she could approach his feet from behind without disrupting the meal. Every action is extravagant: tears as washing water, unbound hair as a towel (a Jewish woman letting down her hair in public was scandalous), repeated kissing (katephilei, imperfect tense indicating continuous action), and costly ointment on feet rather than head. The scene is an act of lavish, self-abandoning devotion.
- 39. The Pharisee's reasoning contains a double error: he assumes a prophet would (1) know the woman's character, and (2) refuse her touch. In fact, Jesus does know (as he will demonstrate), and his acceptance of her is precisely the prophetic act. The Pharisee is named Simon in verse 40.

40. Jesus 'answered' (apokritheis) the Pharisee's unspoken thought — demonstrating the very prophetic knowledge Simon doubted. By addressing Simon by name, Jesus personalizes the confrontation. Simon's polite response ('Teacher,' Didaskale) maintains social decorum.
41. A denarius (dēnariion) was approximately one day's wage for a laborer. The debts are therefore roughly 500 days' wages versus 50 — a tenfold difference. The parable is deceptively simple but contains the key to the entire scene.
42. The verb echarisato ('forgave graciously, granted as a favor') shares the root of charis ('grace'). Both debts are cancelled — forgiveness is complete in both cases. The question is about proportional response: who will be more grateful?
43. Simon's cautious 'I suppose' (hypolambanō) suggests he senses a trap. Jesus's confirmation — 'You have judged correctly' (orthōs ekrinas) — is both an affirmation and an ironic reversal: Simon has just pronounced the principle that condemns his own lack of hospitality.
44. Jesus physically turns toward the woman but speaks to Simon — forcing Simon to see her as a person, not a category. The threefold contrast (water/tears, kiss/kissing, oil/ointment) exposes Simon's failure of basic hospitality. Providing water for a guest's feet was a minimal courtesy.
45. A greeting kiss was standard hospitality. Simon neglected even this basic courtesy, while the woman's devotion has been continuous (ou dielipen, 'has not ceased') from the moment Jesus arrived.
46. The final contrast is the sharpest: Simon did not even provide basic olive oil (elaion) for Jesus's head; she provided expensive perfumed ointment (myron) for his feet. Anointing a guest's head was a sign of honor and welcome (cf. Psalm 23:5).
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 23:5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
47. The logic of the parable makes clear that her love is the result of forgiveness, not its cause. The Greek hou charin ('for which reason') and hoti ('because') indicate evidence, not causation: her great love demonstrates that she has already received great forgiveness. The sentence about 'the one forgiven little' is a subtle rebuke of Simon's self-righteousness.
48. Jesus now addresses the woman directly for the first time. The perfect tense apheōntai ('have been and remain forgiven') confirms a completed action — her forgiveness is not new but is now publicly declared.
49. The other guests raise the question that has been building since Luke 5:21: forgiving sins is a divine prerogative. Their question is left unanswered — Luke lets the implicit Christological claim stand without resolution, forcing the reader to answer for themselves.
50. The verb sesōken ('has saved') is the same word used for physical healing and spiritual salvation. The phrase poreuou eis eirēnēn ('go into peace') translates the Hebrew lekhi leshalom and is a benediction of wholeness — she departs not merely forgiven but restored to shalom.

Summary: Luke 8 opens with a summary of Jesus's itinerant ministry, naming the women who supported it financially. Jesus teaches the Parable of the Sower, explaining how different responses to God's word yield different outcomes. He then redefines family around obedience to God's word. Three dramatic miracles follow in rapid succession: Jesus calms a violent storm on the Sea of Galilee, delivers the Gerasene demoniac from a 'Legion' of unclean spirits, and — in an interwoven double narrative — heals a woman with a twelve-year hemorrhage while raising Jairus's twelve-year-old daughter from death.

What Makes This Remarkable: The named women in verses 1-3 are extraordinary in ancient literature: Mary Magdalene, Joanna (wife of Herod's steward Chuza), and Susanna are identified as financial patrons of Jesus's mission. Luke alone preserves this detail, showing that the movement was funded by women of means. The Gerasene demoniac episode is the most detailed exorcism in the Gospels, with the demons self-identifying as 'Legion' — a Roman military term carrying political undertones in occupied Palestine. The sandwiched miracle stories of Jairus's daughter and the hemorrhaging woman share the number twelve, linking the girl's age with the woman's years of suffering and creating a literary frame of restoration.

Translation Friction: The Gerasene/Gadarene/Gergesene location varies across manuscripts; the SBLGNT reads Gerasenes (Gerasenon). The herd of pigs raises questions about property destruction and Gentile territory. We render the Greek as given without harmonizing with the Markan or Matthean parallels. The phrase 'your faith has saved you' (he pistis sou sesoken se) in verse 48 uses sozo, which means both 'save' and 'heal' — a double meaning impossible to capture in a single English word.

Connections: The Parable of the Sower parallels Mark 4:1-20 and Matthew 13:1-23. The storm narrative echoes Psalm 107:23-30 and Jonah 1. The demoniac episode parallels Mark 5:1-20. The Jairus/hemorrhage double story parallels Mark 5:21-43. The women patrons anticipate the women at the cross and tomb (Luke 23:49, 55; 24:1-10).

¹Soon afterward, he traveled through every city and village, proclaiming and announcing the good news of the kingdom of God, and the twelve were with him, ²Specific women, which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary called Magdalene, out of whom traveled seven devils, ³Joanna the wife of Chuza Herod's manager, and Susanna, and numerous others, which served him of their substance. ⁴When a large crowd was gathering and people from every town were coming to him, he spoke by means of a parable: ⁵"A sower went out to sow his seed. And as he sowed, some fell along the path and was trampled underfoot, and the birds of the sky devoured it. ⁶Other seed fell on rock, and when it grew up, it withered because it had no moisture. ⁷Other seed fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up with it and choked it. ⁸And other seed fell into good soil, and when it grew up, it produced fruit a hundredfold." As he said these things, he called out, "The one who has ears to hear, let him hear." ⁹Then his disciples asked him what this parable meant. ¹⁰He said, "To you it has been given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but to the rest they are given in parables, so that seeing they may not see, and hearing they may not understand. ¹¹Now the parable is this — The seed is the message of God. ¹²The ones along the path are those who have heard; then the devil comes and takes away the word from their hearts, so that they may not believe and be saved. ¹³The ones on the rock are those who, when they hear, receive the word with joy. But these have no root; they believe for a time, and in a season of testing they fall away. ¹⁴As for what fell among the thorns, these are the ones who hear, but as they go on their way they are choked by the worries and riches and pleasures of life, and they do not bring fruit to maturity. ¹⁵But as for that in the good soil, these are the ones who, having heard the word, hold it fast in an honest and good heart, and bear fruit with endurance. ¹⁶"No one, after lighting a lamp, covers it with a jar or puts it under a bed, but puts it on a lampstand, so that those who enter may see the light. ¹⁷For nothing is hidden that will not become evident, nor anything concealed that will not be known and come to light. ¹⁸Pay attention, then, to how you hear. For whoever has, more will be given to him; and whoever does not have, even what he thinks he has will be taken from him." ¹⁹Then his mother and his brothers came to him, but they could not reach him because of the crowd. ²⁰He was told, "Your mother and your brothers are standing outside, wanting to see you." ²¹But he answered them, "My mother and my brothers are those who hear the word of God and do it." ²²One day he got into a boat with his disciples and said to them, "Let us cross over to the other side of the lake." So they set out. ²³As they were sailing, he fell asleep. A violent windstorm came down on the lake, and they were being swamped and were in danger. ²⁴They came and woke him, saying, "Master, Master, we are perishing!" And he got up and rebuked the wind and the surging waves, and they ceased, and there was a calm. ²⁵He said to them, "Where is your faith?" And they were afraid and marveled, saying to one another, "Who then is this, that he commands even the winds and the water, and they obey him?" ²⁶They sailed to the region of the Gerasenes, which is across from Galilee. ²⁷When he stepped out on land, a man from the city met him who had demons. For a long time he had worn no clothing and did not live in a house but among the tombs. ²⁸When he saw Jesus, he cried out and fell down before him and said with a loud voice, "What do you have to do with me, Jesus, Son of the Most High God? I beg you, do not torment me!" ²⁹For he had commanded the unclean spirit to come out of the man. For many times it had seized him, and he was kept under guard, bound with chains and shackles, but he would break the bonds and be driven by the demon into desolate places. ³⁰Jesus asked him, "What is your name?" He said, "Legion" — because many demons had entered him. ³¹And they were begging him not to command them to depart into the abyss. ³²Now a large herd of pigs was feeding there on the hillside, and they begged him to let them enter the pigs. And he gave them permission. ³³The demons came out of the man and entered the pigs, and the herd rushed down the steep bank into the lake and drowned. ³⁴When the herdsmen saw what had happened, they fled and reported it in the city and in the countryside. ³⁵Then people went out to see what had happened, and they came to Jesus and found the man from whom the demons had gone out, sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in his right mind. And they were afraid. ³⁶Those who had seen it told them how the demon-possessed man had been saved. ³⁷Then all the people of the surrounding region of the Gerasenes asked him to leave them, because they were gripped with great fear. So he got into the boat and returned. ³⁸The man from whom the demons had gone out begged to go with him, but Jesus sent him away, saying, ³⁹"Return to your home, and declare what God has done for you." And he went away, proclaiming throughout the whole city what Jesus had done for him. ⁴⁰When Jesus returned, the crowd welcomed him, for they were all expecting him. ⁴¹And there came a man named Jairus, who was a ruler of the synagogue. He fell at Jesus's feet and begged him to come to his house, ⁴²Since he had one only daughter, concerning twelve years of age, and she lay a dying. But as he traveled the people thronged him. ⁴³And a woman who had suffered from a discharge of blood for twelve years, who could not be healed by anyone, ⁴⁴Indeed, arrived behind him, and touched the border of his garment — and immediately her issue of blood stanchd. ⁴⁵Jesus said, "Who touched me?" When everyone denied it, Peter said, "Master, the crowds are surrounding you and pressing against you!" ⁴⁶But Jesus said, "Someone touched me, for I perceived that power had gone out from me." ⁴⁷When the woman saw that she had not escaped notice, she came trembling, and falling down before him, she declared in the presence of all the people the reason she had touched him and how she was immediately healed. ⁴⁸He said to her, "Daughter, your faith has saved you. Go in peace." ⁴⁹While he was still speaking, someone came from the synagogue ruler's house, saying, "Your daughter is dead; do not trouble the Teacher any longer." ⁵⁰But Jesus, hearing this, answered him, "Do not be afraid; only believe, and she will be saved." ⁵¹When he came to the house, he allowed no one to enter with him except Peter, John, and James, and the father and mother of the child. ⁵²Everyone was weeping and mourning for her, but he said, "Stop weeping, for she has not died but is sleeping." ⁵³And they laughed at him, knowing that she had died. ⁵⁴But taking her by the hand, he called out, saying, "Child, arise." ⁵⁵Her spirit returned, and she got up at once. And he directed that she be given something to eat. ⁵⁶Her parents were amazed, but he ordered them to tell no one what had happened.

1. The phrase euangelizomenos ten basileian tou theou ('announcing the good news of the kingdom of God') combines two verbs of proclamation — kerusson ('heralding') and euangelizomenos ('bringing good news'). Luke emphasizes the content of Jesus's preaching: the kingdom of God, not merely moral teaching.
2. Mary Magdalene is named first among the women, indicating her prominence. The 'seven demons' (daimonia hepta) denotes the severity of her former affliction, not moral failing — the text says nothing about sexual sin, a later tradition without biblical basis. 'Magdalene' identifies her hometown of Magdala on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee.
3. The verb diekonoun ('were serving, providing for') is the root of 'deacon/ministry.' These women were not passive followers but active financial supporters. Joanna's connection to Herod's court (Chuza was epitropos, a household manager or steward) means Jesus's movement had sympathizers within the ruling elite. Luke alone preserves this remarkable social detail.
4. The phrase dia parabolees ('by means of a parable') introduces Luke's version of the Sower. Luke compresses the parable material compared to Mark 4, but retains the core teaching about receptivity to God's word.
5. Luke adds the detail that the seed was 'trampled underfoot' (katepatethee), absent from Mark and Matthew. The sower broadcasts seed across all types of ground — ancient Palestinian farming practice involved sowing before plowing, so the different soil types would not yet be visible.
6. Luke uses ikmada ('moisture') where Mark has 'depth of earth' and 'root' — a slight difference in imagery but the same agricultural reality: thin soil over limestone bedrock, common in Palestine, allows quick germination but no sustained growth.
7. The verb apepnixan ('choked, strangled') is vivid — the thorns do not merely crowd the grain but suffocate it. Luke's symphueisai ('growing up together with') emphasizes that the competing growth was simultaneous.
8. Luke simplifies to a single yield — 'a hundredfold' (hekatontaplasiona) — whereas Mark gives thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold. A hundredfold yield was extraordinary in ancient agriculture, where tenfold was typical. The closing formula 'the one who has ears to hear' signals that the parable demands active interpretation.
9. Luke's version is simpler than Mark's, where the disciples ask about parables in general. Here they ask specifically about this parable's meaning.
10. The word mysteria ('mysteries') does not mean puzzles but divine secrets now being revealed to insiders. The Isaiah 6:9-10 allusion ('seeing they may not see') raises the difficult question of whether parables conceal or reveal — Luke softens Mark's harder formulation but retains the tension between revelation and hiddenness.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 6:9-10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. Luke identifies the seed as ho logos tou theou ('the word of God'), where Mark has simply 'the word.' Luke's version makes the divine origin of the message explicit.

12. Luke alone adds the purpose clause 'so that they may not believe and be saved' (hina mee pisteusantes sothōsin), making explicit what Mark leaves implicit: the stakes of receptivity to the word are salvation itself. Luke uses 'the devil' (ho diabolos) where Mark has 'Satan.'
13. Luke uses peirasmos ('testing, trial, temptation') where Mark has 'tribulation or persecution' — a broader term that encompasses both external persecution and internal spiritual trial. The verb aphistantai ('they fall away, withdraw') is the root of 'apostasy.'
14. Luke adds hēdonōn ('pleasures') to the thorns' identification — worries, riches, and pleasures form a three-pronged threat. The verb telesophorousin ('bring to maturity, bring to completion') is unique to Luke's version and implies that fruit-bearing requires sustained growth, not merely initial response.
15. The phrase kardia kalē kai agathē ('an honest and good heart') echoes Greek moral vocabulary — kalos kai agathos was the classical Greek ideal of nobility. Luke may be adapting the parable for a Hellenistic audience. The word hypomonē ('endurance, patient steadfastness') is a key virtue in Luke-Acts, emphasizing that fruitfulness requires perseverance.
16. The lamp saying follows naturally from the parable's theme of revelation. What is taught in parables is not meant to remain hidden permanently. Luke's version specifies 'those who enter' (hoi eisporuomenoi), possibly reflecting the setting of a house church where the lamp illuminates a room for newcomers.
17. The double negative ou mē ('certainly not') with the subjunctive gnōsthē ('be known') creates the strongest possible assurance: what is now hidden will without exception be revealed. This applies both to the mysteries of the kingdom and to human secrets.
18. Luke writes 'how you hear' (pōs akouete) where Mark has 'what you hear' — Luke stresses the manner of reception, not merely the content. The paradox of having and losing echoes the parable's logic: those who receive the word rightly gain more understanding, while those who receive it poorly lose even their initial grasp.
19. Luke softens Mark's account where Jesus's family comes to seize him thinking he is out of his mind (Mark 3:21). Luke omits the negative motivation entirely, presenting the family's arrival neutrally.
20. The notification sets up Jesus's redefinition of family in the next verse. The physical separation — they are 'outside' (exō) — becomes symbolic of the distinction between biological and spiritual kinship.
21. This saying redefines kinship around obedience to God's word — the same theme as the Sower parable. Luke connects hearing and doing (akouontes kai poiountes), a pair that will recur in 6:47-49 (the house on the rock) and 11:28. The saying does not reject biological family but subordinates it to the family formed by response to God's word.
22. Luke uses limnēs ('lake') rather than Mark's thalassēs ('sea') — geographically more accurate for the Sea of Galilee, which is a freshwater lake. The command to cross to 'the other side' moves them toward Gentile territory, where the Gerasene episode will take place.
23. The verb aphypnōsen ('he fell asleep') emphasizes Jesus's full humanity. The geography matters: the Sea of Galilee sits 700 feet below sea level, surrounded by hills through which winds funnel suddenly. The verb ekindyneuon ('they were in danger') is unique to Luke's account and underscores the life-threatening nature of the storm.
24. Luke uses epistatēs ('Master, overseer') — a title unique to Luke's Gospel — rather than Mark's 'Teacher.' The doubled address 'Master, Master' conveys urgency. Jesus 'rebuked' (epetimēsen) the storm with the same verb used for rebuking demons, suggesting the storm is treated as a hostile force. The sudden calm (galēnē) echoes Psalm 107:29.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 107:29. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The question 'Where is your faith?' implies the disciples should have trusted Jesus even during the storm. Their response combines fear (phobēthentes) and wonder (ethaumasan) — the typical human reaction to a theophany. The Old Testament reserves power over sea and storm for God alone (Job 38:8-11; Psalm 89:9; Psalm 107:29), so the question 'Who is this?' carries an implicit christological answer.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Job 38:8-11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 89:9 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
25. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 107:29 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
26. The SBLGNT reads Gerasēnōn ('Gerasenes'). Gerasa was a city of the Decapolis, predominantly Gentile territory. Luke clarifies the geography for his readers: it is 'across from Galilee' (antipera tēs Galilaias), on the eastern shore of the lake.
27. Luke describes three marks of the man's dehumanization: demon possession, nakedness, and habitation among the dead. Living in tombs would make him perpetually unclean under Jewish purity law. The detail 'from the city' (ek tēs poleōs) suggests he had once been part of normal society before his affliction drove him out.
28. The formula ti emoi kai soi ('what to me and to you?') is a Semitic idiom expressing incompatibility or protest. The demon recognizes Jesus as 'Son of the Most High God' (huie tou theou tou hypsistou) — 'Most High' (hypsistos) is the same title used of God in Genesis 14:18-22 and in Gabriel's announcement to Mary (Luke 1:32). The irony is that the demon correctly identifies Jesus while the disciples have just asked 'Who is this?'

- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 14:18-22 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 29. This parenthetical explains why the demon cried out — Jesus had already issued a command. The description of the man's superhuman strength in breaking chains and his being 'driven' (elauneto) into wilderness areas portrays total domination by the demonic power. The passive voice emphasizes the man's lack of agency.
- 30. A Roman legion comprised approximately five to six thousand soldiers. The name 'Legion' (Legiōn) is a Latin loanword in Greek, carrying military overtones that would resonate in Roman-occupied territory. The name also reveals how thoroughly the man's identity has been consumed — he no longer has a personal name, only the collective designation of his oppressors.
- 31. The abyssos ('abyss') is the place of confinement for evil spirits (cf. Revelation 9:1-2, 11; 20:1-3). Luke uses this term where Mark does not, reflecting Jewish apocalyptic belief that demons feared premature imprisonment. The demons recognize Jesus's authority to sentence them.
- 32. The presence of pigs confirms this is Gentile territory — pigs were unclean animals forbidden to Jews (Leviticus 11:7). The demons must ask Jesus's permission, demonstrating his absolute authority even over a legion of evil spirits. The verb epetrepsen ('he permitted') shows that Jesus controls the terms.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 11:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The verb hōrmēsen ('rushed, charged') is violent and sudden. The verb apepnigē ('drowned, were choked') is the same root used for the thorns 'choking' the seed in verse 7 — an ironic verbal connection. The destruction of the herd serves as visible proof that the demons have genuinely departed from the man.
- 34. The herdsmen's flight and report set up the confrontation between Jesus and the townspeople. They function as witnesses to both the loss of the pigs and the implied power of the exorcism.
- 35. The contrast is stunning: the man who was naked, chained, and living among the dead is now clothed (himatismenon), in his right mind (sōphronounta), and seated at Jesus's feet — the posture of a disciple. Each detail reverses his former condition. The townspeople's fear (ephobēthēsan) mirrors the disciples' fear after the storm, but leads to a different response.
- 36. Luke uses esōthē ('was saved') rather than merely 'was healed' — the verb sōzō carries both physical and spiritual dimensions. The man's deliverance is described as salvation, not simply a medical cure.
- 37. The entire population asks Jesus to leave — the only place in the Gospels where a community rejects Jesus's presence after witnessing a miracle. Their great fear (phobō megalō) is not reverence but terror, possibly compounded by the economic loss of the pigs. Jesus complies without protest, respecting their choice.
- 38. The man's desire to follow Jesus contrasts sharply with the townspeople's desire for Jesus to leave. 'To be with him' (einai syn autō) uses the language of discipleship. Unusually, Jesus refuses — in Gentile territory, the healed man himself will be the witness.
- 39. Jesus says 'what God has done for you'; the man proclaims 'what Jesus has done for him.' Luke lets the substitution stand without comment — the reader is left to draw the christological conclusion. The man becomes the first Gentile evangelist in Luke's narrative.
- 40. The contrast between the Gerasenes' rejection and the Galilean crowd's welcome is deliberate. The verb apedexato ('welcomed, received gladly') sets up the warm reception that frames the two miracle stories to follow.
- 41. Jairus (Iairos, from Hebrew Ya'ir, 'he enlightens') is named only in Luke and Mark. As archōn tēs synagōgēs ('ruler of the synagogue'), he was responsible for organizing worship services — a prominent community figure. His prostration before Jesus shows the desperation that overrides social status.
- 42. Luke emphasizes she is monogenēs ('only-begotten, one and only') — the same word used of Jesus in John's Gospel. She is about twelve years old — the same number of years the hemorrhaging woman has suffered (v. 43), creating a deliberate literary connection. The crowd 'pressing in' (synepnigon) sets up the interruption by the hemorrhaging woman.
- 43. The 'discharge of blood' (rhysei haimatos) made her perpetually unclean under Levitical law (Leviticus 15:25-27), excluding her from worship and social contact. For twelve years she has lived in isolation. Some manuscripts add 'who had spent all her livelihood on physicians' (paralleling Mark 5:26), but the SBLGNT omits this clause.
- 43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 15:25-27 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 44. The kraspedon ('fringe, tassel, border') refers to the tassels (Hebrew tzitzit) on the corners of a Jewish garment as commanded in Numbers 15:38-39. Her approach from behind reflects her awareness of her unclean status — touching someone would transmit impurity. Instead, Jesus's holiness flows outward and cleanses her. The adverb parachrēma ('immediately') is characteristic of Luke.
- 44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 15:38-39. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.

45. Jesus's question is not about information — he distinguishes between the crowd's jostling and one person's deliberate touch of faith. Peter's response, using epistatēs ('Master') again, expresses bewilderment: in such a crush, how could one touch be singled out?
46. The word dynamin ('power') is not 'virtue' in the modern English sense (as the KJV might suggest) but active healing energy. Jesus experiences the outflow of power — a remarkable detail suggesting that the healing was not merely willed but cost something.
47. Her trembling (tremousa) reflects fear — she had taken a social risk by touching someone while unclean. But Jesus forces a public declaration for her benefit: her healing must be witnessed by the community so that her social restoration is public, not merely private. She is healed in body but needs public vindication to be restored to community life.
48. The address 'Daughter' (Thygatēr) is extraordinary — it is both tender and restorative, publicly declaring her a member of the family of God. The phrase hē pistis sou sesōken se ('your faith has saved you') uses sōzō, which means both 'save' and 'heal.' The double meaning is intentional: physical healing and spiritual salvation converge. 'Go in peace' (poreuou eis eirēnēn) echoes the Hebrew shalom — complete well-being, not merely absence of conflict.
49. The timing is devastating — the interruption caused by the hemorrhaging woman's healing has cost Jairus precious minutes. The messenger's words 'do not trouble the Teacher' (mēketi skylle ton didaskalon) assume that death is beyond Jesus's power. The verb skyllō ('to trouble, bother, harass') suggests the messenger views further appeal as pointless.
50. Jesus responds to the death announcement with the same sōzō ('will be saved/made whole') used for the hemorrhaging woman. The command structure — 'Do not fear... only believe' — strips away every response except faith. Jairus has just witnessed the hemorrhaging woman's faith rewarded; now he must exercise the same trust in a more extreme situation.
51. The inner circle of Peter, John, and James witnesses the most significant miracles (also the Transfiguration, Luke 9:28). Luke reverses Mark's order, placing John before James — possibly reflecting John's greater prominence in the early church as known to Luke's audience.
52. The verb ekoptonto ('were mourning, beating their breasts') describes the loud, demonstrative mourning customary in ancient Jewish funerals. Jesus's statement that the girl is 'sleeping' (katheudei) is either a metaphor for death (as Paul uses in 1 Thessalonians 4:13-14) or a literal claim that she is not yet dead. Luke leaves the ambiguity intact.
53. The verb kategelōn ('were laughing scornfully') indicates mocking derision, not amusement. The mourners' certainty that she is dead sets up the miracle — there is no ambiguity about her condition in the minds of witnesses.
54. Jesus takes her hand — touching a corpse would normally render one unclean (Numbers 19:11), but as with the hemorrhaging woman, Jesus's power flows outward to restore rather than receiving contamination inward. Luke simplifies Mark's Aramaic talitha kum to the Greek hē pais egeire ('Child, arise'). The verb egeirō is the same word used for resurrection throughout the New Testament.
54. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 19:11. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
55. The phrase 'her spirit returned' (epstrepsen to pneuma autēs) is unique to Luke and confirms that she had genuinely died — her spirit had departed and now comes back. The command to give her food serves two purposes: it proves the resurrection is physical (a spirit does not eat) and it shows Jesus's practical compassion even in a moment of cosmic power.
56. The command to silence (the 'messianic secret') contrasts with the Gerasene demoniac, who was told to proclaim. In Jewish territory, public reports of raising the dead would provoke dangerous political attention. The parents' amazement (exestēsan, literally 'were beside themselves') is the appropriate response to witnessing death reversed.

Summary: Luke 9 is a pivotal chapter that marks the transition from Jesus's Galilean ministry to the journey toward Jerusalem. Jesus sends the Twelve on their first independent mission, feeds five thousand with five loaves and two fish, and elicits Peter's confession that he is the Christ. The chapter then introduces the cost of discipleship, reveals Jesus's glory at the Transfiguration, heals a demon-possessed boy, and repeatedly warns the disciples about his coming suffering. The chapter closes with three would-be followers who each face the radical demands of following Jesus.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke compresses an enormous range of material into this chapter, creating a deliberate theological arc: Jesus empowers the Twelve (vv. 1-6), the crowds respond (vv. 7-17), Peter confesses (vv. 18-20), and then Jesus immediately redefines messiahship through suffering (vv. 21-27). The Transfiguration (vv. 28-36) — unique in Luke for noting that Jesus was praying when it happened — confirms divine sonship just after the first passion prediction. Luke alone records that Moses and Elijah spoke with Jesus about his 'exodus' (exodon) that he was about to accomplish in Jerusalem, a word loaded with Old Testament resonance. The chapter's final section (vv. 51-62) sets Jesus's face toward Jerusalem, a journey that will occupy the next ten chapters of Luke's Gospel.

Translation Friction: The feeding of the five thousand is the only miracle recorded in all four Gospels, and Luke's version is the most compressed. Herod's perplexity about Jesus (vv. 7-9) is unique to Luke in its emphasis on Herod's desire to see Jesus — a thread that will not resolve until the passion narrative (23:8). The phrase 'set his face' (to prosōpon estērisen) in v. 51 echoes Isaiah's Servant Songs (Isaiah 50:7) and signals a decisive shift in the narrative structure. The Samaritan village's rejection (vv. 52-56) introduces the Samaritan theme that Luke will develop more fully than any other Gospel.

Connections: The feeding miracle echoes Elisha feeding a hundred men in 2 Kings 4:42-44. The Transfiguration connects to Moses on Sinai (Exodus 34) and Elijah on Horeb (1 Kings 19). Peter's confession parallels the Caesarea Philippi accounts in Matthew 16 and Mark 8, though Luke omits the geographic marker. The 'exodus' language at the Transfiguration ties Jesus's coming death to Israel's foundational deliverance event. The journey to Jerusalem beginning in v. 51 initiates Luke's distinctive 'Travel Narrative' (9:51-19:27).

¹He called the Twelve together and gave them power and authority over all demons, and to heal diseases. ²He sent them out to proclaim the kingdom of God and to heal the sick. ³He told them, "Take nothing for the journey — no staff, no bag, no bread, no money, and do not have two tunics each. ⁴Whatever house you enter, stay there and depart from there. ⁵Wherever people do not welcome you, as you leave that town, shake the dust off your feet as a testimony against them." ⁶So they set out and traveled through the villages, proclaiming the good news and healing people everywhere. ⁷Now Herod the tetrarch heard about everything that was happening, and he was perplexed because some were saying that John had been raised from the dead, ⁸Of some, that Elias had appeared. And of others, that one of the ancient God's spokespersons was risen again. ⁹Herod said, "I beheaded John. So who is this about whom I hear such things?" And he kept trying to see him. ¹⁰When the apostles returned, they reported to him everything they had done. He took them and withdrew privately to a town called Bethsaida. ¹¹But the crowds found out and followed him. He welcomed them, spoke to them about the kingdom of God, and healed those who needed healing. ¹²As the day began to decline, the Twelve came to him and said, "Send the crowd away so they can go to the surrounding villages and countryside to find lodging and food, because we are in a desolate place here." ¹³But he told them, "You give them something to eat." They said, "We have no more than five loaves and two fish — unless we are to go and buy food for all these people." ¹⁴For there were about five thousand men. He said to his disciples, "Have them sit down in groups of about fifty." ¹⁵They did so and had everyone sit down. ¹⁶Taking the five loaves and the two fish, he looked up to heaven, blessed them, broke them, and kept giving them to the disciples to set before the crowd. ¹⁷They all ate and were satisfied, and twelve baskets of leftover pieces were picked up. ¹⁸Once when Jesus was praying alone, the disciples were with him, and he asked them, "Who do the crowds say that I am?" ¹⁹They answered, "John the Baptist; others say Elijah; and still others, that one of the ancient prophets has risen." ²⁰He said to them, "But who do you say that I am?" Peter answered, "The Christ of God." ²¹He strictly warned them and commanded them to tell this to no one, ²²Declaring, the Descendant of Person must suffer numerous matters, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and legal experts, and be slain, and be raised the third day. ²³Then he said to them all, "If anyone wants to come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross daily, and follow me. ²⁴For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for my sake will save it. ²⁵For what does it profit a person to gain the whole world and yet lose or forfeit himself? ²⁶For whoever is ashamed of me and my words, the Son of Man will be ashamed of that person when he comes in his glory and the glory of the Father and of the holy angels. ²⁷But I tell you truly, there are some standing here who will not taste death until they see the kingdom of God." ²⁸About eight days after these words, he took Peter, John, and James and went up on the mountain to pray. ²⁹As he was praying, the appearance of his face changed, and his clothing became dazzling white. ³⁰And suddenly two men were talking with him — Moses and Elijah, ³¹They appeared in radiant glory and spoke about the departure he was about to carry out in Jerusalem. ³²Now Peter and those with him were heavy with sleep, but when they became fully awake, they saw his glory and the two men standing with him. ³³As they were departing from him, Peter said to Jesus, "Master, it is good for us to be here. Let us make three shelters — one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elijah" — not knowing what he was saying. ³⁴While he was saying this, a cloud came and overshadowed them, and they were afraid as they entered the cloud. ³⁵A voice came from the cloud, saying, "This is my Son, my Chosen One — listen to him!" ³⁶When the voice had spoken, Jesus was found alone. And they kept silent and told no one in those days anything of what they had seen. ³⁷The next day, when they had come down from the mountain, a large crowd met him. ³⁸Suddenly a man from the crowd cried out, "Teacher, I beg you to look at my son, for he is my only child. ³⁹A spirit seizes him, and he suddenly screams. It convulses him until he foams at the mouth, and it scarcely leaves him, battering him as it goes. ⁴⁰I begged your disciples to cast it out, but they could not." ⁴¹Jesus answered, "O faithless and twisted generation, how long must I be with you and put up with you? Bring your son here." ⁴²While the boy was still approaching, the demon threw him down and convulsed him. But Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit, healed the boy, and gave him back to his father. ⁴³Everyone was astonished at the majesty of God. But while they were all marveling at everything he was doing, he said to his disciples, ⁴⁴"Let these words sink into your ears: the Son of Man is about to be delivered into the hands of men." ⁴⁵But they did not understand this saying. It was concealed from them so that they could not grasp it, and they were afraid to ask him about it. ⁴⁶An argument arose among them about which of them was the greatest. ⁴⁷But Jesus, knowing the reasoning of their hearts, took a child and placed the child beside him. ⁴⁸He told them, "Whoever welcomes this child in my name welcomes me, and whoever welcomes me welcomes the one who sent me. For the one who is least among all of you — that person is great." ⁴⁹John responded, "Master, we saw someone casting out demons in your name, and we tried to stop him because he does not follow with us." ⁵⁰Jesus said to him, "Do not stop him, for whoever is not against you is for you." ⁵¹When the days were approaching for him to be taken up, he resolutely set his face to go to Jerusalem. ⁵²He sent messengers ahead of him. They went and entered a Samaritan village to prepare for his arrival, ⁵³Indeed, they did not accept him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem. ⁵⁴When the disciples James and John saw this, they said, "Lord, do you want us to call fire down from heaven to consume them?" ⁵⁵But he turned and rebuked them. ⁵⁶They traveled to another village. ⁵⁷As they were traveling along the road, someone said to him, "I will follow you wherever you go." ⁵⁸Jesus said to him, "Foxes have dens and birds of the sky have nests, but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head." ⁵⁹He said to another, "Follow me." But the man said, "Lord, let me first go and bury my father." ⁶⁰Jesus said to him, "Let the dead bury their own dead, but you go and proclaim the kingdom of God." ⁶¹Still another said, "I will follow you, Lord, but first let me say goodbye to those at my home." ⁶²Jesus said to him, "No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Luke distinguishes between dynamis ('power' — the ability to act) and exousia ('authority' — the right to act). This pairing is distinctive to Luke's account of the commissioning and emphasizes that the disciples operate with both divine capability and divine authorization.
2. The verb apostelein ('sent out') is the root of 'apostle' (apostolos). Luke uses the formal commissioning verb here, underscoring that this is an authorized mission, not a voluntary outing. The dual mandate — proclamation and healing — mirrors Jesus's own ministry pattern established in Luke 4:18-19.
3. Luke's version prohibits even a staff (rabdon), whereas Mark 6:8 allows one — a well-known discrepancy between the Synoptic accounts. The Greek pēran ('bag') refers to a traveler's knapsack or beggar's bag. The prohibition of provisions forces total dependence on God's provision through local hospitality, a radical trust that mirrors Israel's wilderness dependence on manna.
4. The instruction to remain in one house prevents the disciples from seeking better accommodations — moving from a poor host to a wealthier one. This preserves the dignity of the first household to offer hospitality and keeps the mission free from the appearance of self-interest.
5. Shaking dust from one's feet was a Jewish practice when leaving Gentile territory, symbolizing the removal of ritual impurity. Applied to Jewish towns, it is a prophetic warning: those who reject the kingdom's messengers place themselves outside the covenant community. The phrase eis martyron ('as a testimony') indicates a visible sign that will serve as evidence at the future judgment.
6. The participle euangelizomenoi ('proclaiming good news') is Luke's characteristic vocabulary — he uses this verb more than any other New Testament writer. The word carries the sense of announcing glad tidings, specifically the arrival of God's reign. 'Villages' (kōmas) rather than 'towns' or 'cities' suggests a rural, grassroots mission.
7. This is Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, who ruled Galilee and Perea as tetrarch (literally 'ruler of a quarter'). The verb diēporei ('was perplexed, was at a loss') is stronger than mere curiosity — it suggests genuine confusion and unease. Luke alone among the Synoptics emphasizes Herod's ongoing perplexity rather than his fear.

8. The three popular theories about Jesus — resurrected John, returned Elijah, or a risen ancient prophet — all frame him within prophetic categories. The expectation of Elijah's return was rooted in Malachi 4:5. Luke's phrase 'ancient prophets' (prophētēs tis tōn archaiōn) is distinctive and may reflect popular beliefs about eschatological prophetic return.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Malachi 4:5 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The emphatic egō ('I myself') in Herod's statement stresses personal responsibility and perhaps defensive anxiety. The imperfect ezētei ('kept trying, was seeking') indicates ongoing, unfulfilled desire — Herod will not actually see Jesus until the passion narrative (Luke 23:8), where this thread finally resolves. Luke plants a narrative seed here that will not bear fruit for fourteen chapters.
10. Luke uses 'apostles' (apostoloi) here rather than 'disciples,' the only time he uses this title in the narrative before Acts. The verb hypechōrēsen ('withdrew') suggests intentional retreat, possibly for rest after the mission or to avoid Herod's attention. Bethsaida was just outside Herod Antipas's jurisdiction, in the tetrarchy of Philip.
11. Despite seeking privacy, Jesus 'welcomed' (apodexamenos) the crowds — a gracious response that contrasts with the disciples' later suggestion to send them away (v. 12). Luke's note that Jesus both taught and healed reinforces the dual nature of his ministry: word and deed together constitute the kingdom's arrival.
12. The phrase hē hēmera ērxato klinein ('the day began to decline') is a literary expression for late afternoon. The word epistimon ('provisions, food') appears only here in the New Testament — it is a supply-chain term suggesting the practical concern behind the disciples' request. Luke's erēmō topō ('desolate place') evokes the wilderness, connecting this feeding to the manna narrative.
13. The emphatic hymeis ('you yourselves') places the responsibility squarely on the disciples, testing their faith and resourcefulness. The disciples' response reveals both their literal-mindedness and the absurdity of the situation from a human perspective. The five loaves would have been flat barley bread, the standard food of the poor.
14. The count of andres ('men') likely excludes women and children, following ancient Near Eastern counting conventions. The organized seating in groups of fifty echoes Moses' organization of Israel in the wilderness (Exodus 18:21, 25), reinforcing the new-exodus typology that runs through the feeding narrative.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 18:21. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The brief obedience statement — they simply did as instructed — mirrors the pattern of faithful response that Luke highlights throughout his Gospel. No objections, no further questions.
16. The sequence — took, blessed, broke, gave — anticipates the Last Supper (Luke 22:19) and the Emmaus meal (Luke 24:30). Luke's readers would recognize eucharistic echoes. The imperfect edidou ('kept giving') suggests a continuous action: the bread did not run out as he distributed it. The act of looking up to heaven before blessing follows standard Jewish mealtime prayer practice.
17. The verb echortasthēsan ('were satisfied, were filled') implies being fully fed, not merely having a taste. The twelve baskets (kophinoi) — one for each apostle — may symbolize God's provision for all twelve tribes of Israel. The kophinos was a distinctly Jewish wicker basket, different from the larger spuris used in the feeding of the four thousand.
18. Luke uniquely sets this pivotal scene in the context of prayer — kata monas ('alone') modified by the prayer participle. Luke consistently places major revelatory moments at times of prayer (baptism 3:21, Transfiguration 9:28-29, Gethsemane 22:41). The apparent paradox of being 'alone' yet 'with' the disciples likely means Jesus had been praying privately and the disciples then joined him, or that they were present but not praying.
19. The disciples relay the same three popular opinions reported in verses 7-8, forming a deliberate literary echo. These prophetic identifications, while honoring Jesus by placing him in exalted company, all fall short of the truth Peter is about to confess.
20. The emphatic hymeis ('but you') contrasts the disciples' personal knowledge with popular opinion. Peter's confession ton Christon tou theou ('the Christ of God') is more compact in Luke than in Matthew ('the Christ, the Son of the living God,' Matt 16:16). Luke's simpler form focuses on the messianic title itself — the Anointed One who belongs to God.
21. The verb epitimēsas ('rebuked, sternly warned') is the same word used for silencing demons (4:35, 41). The messianic secret motif — suppressing the Christ title — likely reflects the danger that popular messianic expectations (military deliverer, political king) would distort Jesus's mission before the cross redefines messiahship.
22. The word dei ('it is necessary, must') introduces divine necessity — this is not merely a prediction but a theological imperative rooted in God's plan. The title 'Son of Man' (ho huios tou anthrōpou) alludes to Daniel 7:13-14, where the 'one like a son of man' receives universal dominion. Jesus fuses this exalted figure with the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 — a combination his contemporaries did not expect. The three groups named — elders, chief priests, scribes — compose the Sanhedrin.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 7:13-14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.

23. Luke alone adds kath' hēmeran ('daily') to the cross-bearing command, transforming it from a one-time act of martyrdom into an ongoing pattern of self-renunciation. The address 'to them all' (pros pantas) extends the invitation beyond the Twelve to the entire crowd. For a first-century hearer, 'take up his cross' was not a metaphor — it evoked the Roman practice of forcing condemned prisoners to carry the crossbeam to the execution site.
24. The Greek psychē means both 'life' and 'soul,' and Jesus exploits this double meaning. The person who clings to physical life (self-preservation) loses their true self, while the one who surrenders their life for Jesus's sake discovers authentic life. The paradox is structurally chiasmic: save-lose / lose-save.
25. Luke's version has 'lose or forfeit himself' (heauton apolesys ē zēmiotheis) where Mark has 'his soul' — Luke makes it more personal and existential. The verb zēmioō ('to suffer loss, to forfeit') is a commercial term: the image is of a catastrophic business deal where the gains cannot compensate for what was surrendered.
26. The triple glory — his own, the Father's, and the angels' — is unique to Luke and creates a vision of overwhelming majesty. The verb epaischunthēsetai ('will be ashamed of') establishes a principle of reciprocity: present shame leads to future shame. Jesus speaks of the Son of Man in the third person, which may indicate a distinction between his present humble state and his future glorified state, or may simply be the idiom of the title.
27. The expression 'taste death' (geusōntai thanatou) is a Semitic idiom meaning 'experience death.' This saying has been interpreted variously as referring to the Transfiguration (which follows immediately), the resurrection, Pentecost, the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70, or the ongoing advance of God's reign. Luke's placement of this saying directly before the Transfiguration account may suggest he understood the Transfiguration as its primary fulfillment.
28. Luke says 'about eight days' where Mark and Matthew say 'after six days' — this is not a contradiction but reflects different counting conventions (Luke may include the bookend days). Luke uniquely notes that the purpose of ascending was prayer (proseuxasthai), consistent with his emphasis on Jesus at prayer before revelatory moments. Peter, John, and James form the inner circle present at key moments (also at Jairus's house, 8:51, and Gethsemane in Mark 14:33).
29. Luke says the 'appearance of his face changed' (to eidōs tou prosōpou autou heteron) rather than Mark's 'was transfigured' (metemorphōthē). Luke may avoid the Greek metamorphosis terminology because of its associations with pagan mythology for his Gentile audience. The adjective exastraptōn ('flashing like lightning, dazzling') suggests supernatural radiance, echoing the description of angels (Luke 24:4, Acts 1:10).
30. The phrase idou ('look, suddenly') marks the supernatural irruption. Moses represents the Law and Elijah the Prophets — together they embody the whole of Israel's Scripture bearing witness to Jesus. Both figures had unusual departures from earthly life: Moses was buried by God (Deuteronomy 34:6) and Elijah was taken up in a chariot of fire (2 Kings 2:11).
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 34:6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Kings 2:11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
31. This verse is unique to Luke and is theologically momentous. The word exodon ('departure, exodus') is loaded with Old Testament resonance — Jesus's death in Jerusalem is framed as a new exodus, a liberation event parallel to Israel's deliverance from Egypt. The verb plēroun ('to fulfill, accomplish') indicates that this death is not merely an ending but a completion of divine purpose. Moses, who led the first exodus, now discusses the second with Jesus.
32. The detail of the disciples' sleepiness is unique to Luke and foreshadows their sleeping in Gethsemane (Luke 22:45). The verb diagrēgorēsantes ('having become fully awake') is rare and emphatic — despite their drowsiness, they were fully alert when they witnessed the glory. Luke may include this detail to establish that the vision was not a dream.
33. Luke uses epistata ('master, commander') rather than Mark's 'rabbi,' reflecting Luke's Gentile readership. The word skēnas ('tents, tabernacles, shelters') may allude to the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot), when Israel commemorated God's dwelling with them in the wilderness. Peter's offer to build shelters, while well-intentioned, attempts to prolong and domesticate a revelatory moment. Luke's editorial note — 'not knowing what he was saying' — is a gentle correction of Peter's impulse.
34. The cloud (nephelē) recalls the pillar of cloud that guided Israel through the wilderness and the cloud of God's glory (kavod/doxa) that filled the tabernacle and temple (Exodus 40:34-35, 1 Kings 8:10-11). The verb epeskiazēn ('overshadowed') is the same verb used of the Holy Spirit overshadowing Mary (Luke 1:35), creating a connection between the incarnation and the Transfiguration. The disciples' fear at entering the cloud reflects the proper human response to divine presence.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 40:34-35. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 1 Kings 8:10-11. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
35. Luke's reading has ho eklelegmenos ('the Chosen One') where Matthew and Mark have ho agapētos ('the Beloved'). This variant is well attested in the SBLGNT and echoes Isaiah 42:1, the first Servant Song: 'my chosen one in whom my soul delights.' The command 'listen to him' (autou akouete) echoes Deuteronomy 18:15, where Moses predicts a prophet like himself whom God will raise up: 'you shall listen to him.' The voice thus identifies Jesus as both the Servant of Isaiah and the Prophet like Moses.

35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 18:15 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
36. The sudden disappearance of Moses and Elijah leaves Jesus alone — a visual demonstration of the voice's command to listen to him alone. The disciples' silence is voluntary in Luke (where in Mark 9:9, Jesus commands it), suggesting the experience was too overwhelming to articulate. The phrase 'in those days' implies they eventually did speak — Luke himself is reporting what they later testified.
37. Luke specifies 'the next day' (tē hexēs hēmera), a detail absent from Matthew and Mark. The descent from the mountain of glory to the chaos of the crowd below creates a deliberate contrast — from heaven's affirmation to earth's brokenness. The pattern echoes Moses descending from Sinai to find Israel in disorder (Exodus 32).
37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 32. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
38. The word monogenēs ('only, unique, one and only') is the same term used of Jesus in John's Gospel (John 1:14, 18; 3:16). Luke uses it three times for human children (here, 7:12, 8:42), each time heightening the pathos — this father's only hope is in peril. The verb deomai ('I beg, I plead') conveys desperate urgency.
39. The father's description is vivid and medically detailed: seizure (lambanei), sudden screaming (exaiphnēs krazei), convulsions (sparassei), foaming (aphrou), and physical damage (syntribon, 'crushing, bruising'). The symptoms described overlap with what modern medicine would classify as epileptic seizures, though Luke attributes the cause to a spirit (pneuma). The verb mogis ('scarcely, with difficulty') suggests the spirit is reluctant to release the boy even temporarily.
40. The disciples' failure is especially striking given that Jesus had delegated power and authority over all demons to them (v. 1). Their inability raises the question of what has gone wrong — a question Jesus addresses in the next verse with sharp disappointment.
41. The exclamation echoes Moses' frustration with Israel in Deuteronomy 32:5, 20 — the 'twisted generation' (genea diestrammenē) language comes directly from the Song of Moses. Jesus's exasperation is directed broadly at 'this generation,' not solely at the disciples. The rhetorical question 'how long?' expresses the pain of divine patience with unbelief, similar to God's lament in Numbers 14:11.
41. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 32:5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
41. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Numbers 14:11. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
42. The demon's violent attack as the boy approaches Jesus represents a last desperate assault. The verb apedōken ('gave back, restored') is tender — Jesus returns the child to his father as a gift, restoring the family unit that the demon had torn apart. This same verb was used when Elijah restored the widow's son (1 Kings 17:23 LXX), and Luke may intend the echo.
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 1 Kings 17:23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. The word megaleioteeti ('majesty, grandeur, greatness') appears only here and in Acts 19:27 and 2 Peter 1:16 in the New Testament. Luke's framing is significant: the crowd attributes the miracle to God's majesty, not to Jesus's personal power. Jesus immediately pivots from this moment of popular acclaim to another passion prediction — a jarring juxtaposition that Luke leaves unresolved.
44. The idiom thesthe eis ta ōta hymōn ('place into your ears') means 'listen carefully and remember.' The passive paradidosthai ('to be delivered, to be handed over') implies divine agency — God is the unstated subject who will deliver his Son. The wordplay between 'Son of Man' (huios tou anthrōpou) and 'hands of men' (cheiras anthrōpōn) creates an ironic contrast: the heavenly Man will be subjected to merely human power.
45. Luke presents a threefold failure: ignorance (ēgnooun), concealment (parakekalyimmenon), and fear (ephobounto). The passive 'it was concealed' (ēn parakekalyimmenon) suggests divine hiddenness — God has temporarily veiled the meaning. This is not merely intellectual failure but a divinely ordered inability that will persist until the resurrection opens their understanding (Luke 24:45). Their fear of asking reveals they sense the gravity of Jesus's words even without comprehending them.
46. The juxtaposition is brutal: Jesus has just predicted his death and the disciples immediately argue about rank. The word dialogismos ('reasoning, argument, dispute') can mean an internal thought or an external debate — the context suggests it became vocal, since Jesus responds to it. This scene exposes how thoroughly the disciples have misunderstood the nature of Jesus's messiahship.
47. Jesus's perception of their hearts (eidōs ton dialogismon tēs kardias autōn) demonstrates supernatural knowledge. The physical placement of the child 'beside him' (par' heautō) is a visual lesson: the child occupies the position of honor, the very position the disciples were arguing about.
48. Jesus establishes a chain of representation: child Jesus God. Welcoming the powerless is equivalent to welcoming God himself. The paradox 'the least is great' (ho mikroteros... houtos estin megas) directly inverts the disciples' argument. In the ancient world, children had no social status or power — they were the definitional 'least.' Jesus redefines greatness as service to those with nothing to offer in return.

49. John's concern is about institutional boundaries — 'he does not follow with us' (ouk akolouthei meth' hēmōn). The irony is sharp: the disciples who could not cast out the demon in verse 40 are trying to prevent someone who can. Luke uses epistata ('master') rather than Mark's didaskale ('teacher'), consistent with his pattern for the disciples' address of Jesus.
50. The principle 'whoever is not against you is for you' (hos gar ouk estin kath' hymōn hyper hymōn estin) appears to contradict Luke 11:23 ('whoever is not with me is against me'). The two sayings address different situations: here, the point is tolerance toward allies working outside the inner circle; in 11:23, the point is that neutrality toward Jesus himself is not possible. Jesus refuses to restrict God's work to his own followers' circle.
51. This verse marks the decisive turning point of Luke's Gospel, initiating the 'Travel Narrative' (9:51-19:27). The phrase to prosōpon estērisen ('set his face firmly') echoes Isaiah 50:7 (Servant Song): 'I have set my face like flint.' The word analēmpseōs ('taking up, ascension') encompasses not just the ascension but the entire complex of death-resurrection-ascension. Luke views these as a single redemptive event. Jesus moves toward his destiny with deliberate resolve, not reluctant submission.
51. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 50:7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
52. The phrase angelous pro prosōpou autou ('messengers before his face') echoes Malachi 3:1, where God sends a messenger before his face. The route through Samaria was the most direct path from Galilee to Jerusalem but was avoided by many Jews due to the Samaritan-Jewish hostility. Jesus's choice of this route is itself a statement.
52. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Malachi 3:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
53. The Samaritans' refusal is theological, not personal: they reject him because Jerusalem is his destination. The Samaritan-Jewish schism centered on rival worship sites — Mount Gerizim versus the Jerusalem temple (cf. John 4:20). A Jewish pilgrim traveling to Jerusalem represented everything the Samaritans opposed. The phrase 'his face was going toward Jerusalem' preserves the Semitic idiom of v. 51.
54. James and John's proposal alludes to Elijah calling fire from heaven on the soldiers of King Ahaziah (2 Kings 1:10-12) — a connection made explicit in some manuscripts though not in the SBLGNT. The irony is layered: they have just witnessed the Transfiguration with Elijah and now want to play Elijah themselves. Their desire for destructive judgment is precisely the kind of messianic power Jesus is rejecting by heading toward the cross.
54. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Kings 1:10-12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
55. The SBLGNT contains only the brief rebuke without the additional words found in some later manuscripts ('You do not know what spirit you are of' and 'The Son of Man came not to destroy lives but to save them'). While these additions express authentic Lukan theology, we follow the critical text. The physical turning (strapheis) suggests Jesus had been walking ahead and deliberately turned back to correct them.
56. The matter-of-fact simplicity of this verse contrasts sharply with the disciples' violent proposal. Jesus does not retaliate, does not curse the village, does not even complain — he simply moves on. This models the non-retaliatory ethic that will characterize his teaching in the Travel Narrative.
57. This begins a series of three encounters with would-be followers (vv. 57-62), each illustrating a different obstacle to discipleship. The first volunteer is enthusiastic but uninformed about the cost. Luke does not identify this person (Matthew 8:19 says 'a scribe'), keeping the encounter universal — any reader can see themselves here.
58. The contrast is between the most common animals (foxes, birds) and the Son of Man — even creatures with no social standing have shelter, but the one to whom Daniel 7 promises universal dominion lives as a homeless itinerant. The phrase 'birds of the sky' (ta peteina tou ouranou) is a Septuagint expression. Jesus does not refuse the volunteer but ensures he understands the cost.
58. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 7 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
59. Unlike the first volunteer, this person is called by Jesus but hesitates. Burying one's father was considered the most sacred obligation in Jewish culture — it took precedence over virtually all other religious duties, even Torah study and temple service (cf. Mishnah Berakhot 3:1). The request may mean the father has just died, or it may be an idiom for 'let me wait until my father dies and I've fulfilled my family obligations.'
60. This is one of the most shocking sayings in the Gospels. 'Let the dead bury their own dead' uses 'dead' in two senses: the spiritually dead can attend to the physically dead. The command to prioritize kingdom proclamation over the most sacred family duty would have been deeply offensive in first-century Jewish culture. Jesus is not callous — he is asserting that the kingdom's arrival creates an unprecedented urgency that relativizes even the most honored obligations.
61. The third encounter — unique to Luke — echoes Elisha's call by Elijah in 1 Kings 19:19-21, where Elisha asked to kiss his parents goodbye and Elijah permitted it. The request seems entirely reasonable, which makes Jesus's response in the next verse all the more startling. The verb apotaxasthai ('to say farewell, to take leave of') implies a formal departure, not a quick wave.
61. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Kings 19:19-21. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
62. The agricultural image is precise: a farmer plowing with a wooden plow and a team of oxen must look ahead to maintain a straight furrow. Looking backward produces a crooked line and wastes the field. The verb euthetos ('fit, suitable, useful') implies that backward-looking discipleship is not merely imperfect but useless for kingdom work. The implicit contrast with Elisha's call is significant: what Elijah permitted, Jesus does not — because the kingdom's demands exceed even the prophetic calling.

Summary: Luke 10 opens with Jesus sending out seventy-two disciples on a broader mission, paralleling but expanding the commissioning of the Twelve in chapter 9. The chapter contains the famous parable of the Good Samaritan — Jesus's answer to the question 'Who is my neighbor?' — which redefines love of neighbor by making a despised outsider the moral hero. The chapter closes with the contrasting portraits of Martha and Mary in Bethany, where Jesus affirms that attentive listening to his word is the 'one thing needed.' Between these memorable narratives, Jesus rejoices in the Spirit, pronounces blessings on the disciples for what they see and hear, and reveals the intimate mutual knowledge between Father and Son.

What Makes This Remarkable: The sending of the seventy-two (or seventy, depending on the manuscript tradition) likely alludes to the seventy elders of Israel (Numbers 11:16-25) or the seventy nations of Genesis 10, suggesting a mission that extends beyond Israel. The Good Samaritan parable is uniquely Lukan and is one of the most culturally influential stories in Western civilization. Its placement as the answer to 'Who is my neighbor?' transforms a question about the limits of obligation into a challenge about becoming the kind of person who shows mercy. The Mary and Martha story, also unique to Luke, elevates the role of women as disciples who learn at a rabbi's feet — a radical social claim in the first century.

Translation Friction: The number seventy-two versus seventy is a well-known textual variant; the SBLGNT reads seventy-two (hebdomekonta duo). The lawyer's question in v. 25 uses ekpeirazon ('testing'), a verb with hostile overtones, yet Jesus engages him seriously. The Samaritan parable would have been profoundly offensive to a Jewish audience — making a Samaritan the moral exemplar over a priest and a Levite was a deliberate provocation. The Martha/Mary episode has been read as privileging contemplation over action, but Luke's point is more nuanced: Martha's distraction (periespato) is the problem, not her service (diakonia) itself.

Connections: The commissioning echoes and expands the Twelve's mission (Luke 9:1-6). Jesus's rejoicing in the Spirit (v. 21) connects to his programmatic Spirit-anointing in Luke 4:18. The Good Samaritan parable reinterprets Leviticus 19:18 ('love your neighbor as yourself') and draws on the Samaritan theme Luke has been developing (9:52-56). The Mary/Martha story anticipates the theme of faithful hearing that runs through Luke's Travel Narrative. The woe oracles over Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum echo Old Testament prophetic judgment oracles.

¹After this the Lord appointed seventy-two others and sent them two by two ahead of him into every town and place where he himself was about to go. ²He told them, "The harvest is plentiful, but the workers are few. Therefore ask the Lord of the harvest to send out workers into his harvest. ³Go! I am sending you out like lambs among wolves. ⁴Carry no money bag, no traveler's bag, no sandals, and greet no one on the road. ⁵Whatever house you enter, first say, 'Peace to this house.' ⁶If a person of peace is there, your peace will rest on that person. But if not, it will return to you. ⁷Stay in that same house, eating and drinking what they provide, for the worker deserves his wages. Do not move from house to house. ⁸Whenever you enter a town and they welcome you, eat what is set before you. ⁹Heal the sick who are there and tell them, 'The kingdom of God has come near to you.' ¹⁰But whenever you enter a town and they do not welcome you, go out into its streets and say, ¹¹'Even the dust from your town that clings to our feet we wipe off against you. But know this: the kingdom of God has come near.' ¹²I tell you, on that day it will be more bearable for Sodom than for that town. ¹³"Woe to you, Chorazin! Woe to you, Bethsaida! For if the miracles done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes. ¹⁴But it will be easier for Tyre and Sidon on the day of judgment, than it will be for you. ¹⁵And you, Capernaum — will you be exalted to heaven? You will be brought down to Hades. ¹⁶Whoever listens to you listens to me, and whoever rejects you rejects me, and whoever rejects me rejects the one who sent me." ¹⁷The seventy-two returned with joy, saying, "Lord, even the demons submit to us in your name!" ¹⁸He said to them, "I was watching Satan fall from heaven like lightning. ¹⁹Look, I have given you authority to trample on snakes and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy, and nothing will harm you in any way. ²⁰Nevertheless, do not rejoice in this, that the spirits submit to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven." ²¹In that same hour he rejoiced in the Holy Spirit and said, "I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and intelligent and revealed them to infants. Yes, Father, for this was your gracious will. ²²All things have been handed over to me by my Father, and no one knows who the Son is except the Father, or who the Father is except the Son and anyone to whom the Son chooses to reveal him." ²³Then turning to the disciples privately, he said, "Blessed are the eyes that see what you see. ²⁴For I tell you that many prophets and kings desired to see what you see and did not see it, and to hear what you hear and did not hear it." ²⁵Then a legal expert stood up to test him, saying, "Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" ²⁶He said to him, "What is written in the Law? How do you read it?" ²⁷He answered, "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your strength, and with all your mind, and your neighbor as yourself." ²⁸He said to him, "You have answered correctly. Do this and you will live." ²⁹But wanting to justify himself, he said to Jesus, "And who is my neighbor?" ³⁰Jesus replied, "A man was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among robbers. They stripped him, beat him, and went away, leaving him half dead. ³¹By coincidence, a priest was going down that road, and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. ³²Likewise a Levite, when he came to the place and saw him, passed by on the other side. ³³But a Samaritan who was traveling came upon him, and when he saw him, he was moved with compassion. ³⁴He went to him and bandaged his wounds, pouring on oil and wine. Then he placed him on his own animal, brought him to an inn, and took care of him. ³⁵The next day he took out two denarii, gave them to the innkeeper, and said, 'Take care of him, and whatever more you spend, I will repay you when I come back.' ³⁶Which of these three do you think proved to be a neighbor to the man who fell among the robbers?" ³⁷He said, "The one who showed mercy to him." Jesus said to him, "Go and do likewise." ³⁸As they continued on their way, he entered a certain village, and a woman named Martha welcomed him into her home. ³⁹She had a sister called Mary, who sat at the Lord's feet and was listening to his word. ⁴⁰But Martha was distracted by all her preparations. She came to him and said, "Lord, don't you care that my sister has left me to serve alone? Tell her to help me!" ⁴¹The Lord answered her, "Martha, Martha, you are worried and upset about many things, ⁴²However, one thing is needful — and Mary has chosen that good part, which will not be taken away from her."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The textual variant between 'seventy' and 'seventy-two' (hebdomēkonta duo) is one of the most debated in Luke. The SBLGNT reads seventy-two. Seventy may allude to the elders appointed by Moses (Numbers 11:16-25), while seventy-two may reflect the number of nations in the Septuagint's version of Genesis 10, suggesting a universal mission scope. Sending in pairs follows the Old Testament principle that testimony requires two witnesses (Deuteronomy 19:15).

1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 19:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The harvest metaphor draws on Old Testament prophetic imagery where harvest represents God's gathering of people (cf. Joel 3:13, Isaiah 27:12). The verb ekbalē ('to throw out, to send out forcefully') is surprisingly strong — the same word used for casting out demons. God must thrust workers into the field; they will not go on their own initiative.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Joel 3:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 27:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The image of lambs (arnas) among wolves is more vulnerable than Matthew's 'sheep' (probata, Matt 10:16). Lambs are younger, weaker, more defenseless. The present tense apostellō ('I am sending') conveys immediacy. The mission is deliberately risky — Jesus does not promise safety but commissions them into danger.

4. The prohibition against greeting people on the road does not reflect rudeness but urgency — Near Eastern greetings were elaborate, time-consuming social rituals. Elisha gave the same instruction to Gehazi (2 Kings 4:29). The three prohibited items (purse, bag, sandals) strip the missionaries of all provision and self-sufficiency, forcing reliance on God's provision through hospitality.
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Kings 4:29. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The greeting eirēnē tō oikō toutō ('peace to this house') reflects the Hebrew shalom greeting. In this context, it is not merely a pleasantry but a performative blessing — the peace carried by the messengers of the kingdom is an actual spiritual reality that can rest on a household or return to the messenger (v. 6).
6. The Semitic expression huios eirēnēs ('son of peace') means a person characterized by peace, one who is receptive to the kingdom message. The concept of peace as a quasi-physical force that can 'rest on' someone or 'return' to the sender reflects the Hebrew understanding of a spoken blessing as having real power — a word once released either finds its target or comes back.
7. The principle 'the worker deserves his wages' (axios ho ergatēs tou misthou autou) establishes that hospitality for kingdom workers is not charity but fair compensation for spiritual labor. Paul quotes this saying as authoritative in 1 Timothy 5:18, placing it on the level of Scripture. The prohibition against moving between houses prevents the appearance of seeking luxury or playing hosts against each other.
8. The instruction to eat 'what is set before you' (ta paratithemena hymin) may have significance beyond mere hospitality — for Jewish missionaries entering Gentile or Samaritan homes, this could mean eating food not prepared according to Jewish dietary laws. If so, the instruction anticipates the breaking down of food boundaries that becomes explicit in Acts 10.
9. The combination of healing and proclamation demonstrates that the kingdom of God is not merely a verbal announcement but a present reality that transforms bodies and communities. The perfect tense ēngiken ('has come near, has arrived') indicates a completed approach — the kingdom is not distant but has reached their doorstep through the messengers' presence and power.
10. The public declaration in the streets (plateias, 'broad streets, public squares') transforms the rejection into a witnessed prophetic act. The messengers are not to slink away in shame but to make a formal, visible proclamation of judgment.
11. The dust-wiping gesture is more detailed here than in 9:5, with the addition of 'that clings to our feet' (ton kollēthenta hēmin ek tēs poleōs hymōn eis tous podas), emphasizing thoroughness of separation. The ironic twist is that the kingdom's nearness remains true regardless of the town's response — their rejection does not prevent God's reign from arriving, only their participation in it.
12. Sodom was the quintessential symbol of divine judgment in Jewish thought (Genesis 19). To say that any town's fate will be worse than Sodom's is the most severe warning imaginable. The logic is one of accountability: Sodom never received kingdom messengers with healing power, so rejecting such messengers incurs greater responsibility.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 19. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. Chorazin and Bethsaida were Galilean towns near Capernaum where Jesus had ministered extensively. Tyre and Sidon were Gentile coastal cities that the Old Testament prophets condemned (Isaiah 23, Ezekiel 26-28). The argument from lesser to greater is devastating: pagan cities under prophetic judgment would have repented if given what these Jewish towns received. Sackcloth and ashes were the traditional signs of mourning and repentance.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 23 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Ezekiel 26-28 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The phrase en tē krisei ('at the judgment') refers to the eschatological final judgment. Jesus implies graduated accountability — greater privilege brings greater responsibility and thus more severe judgment for rejection. The comparative anektoterōn ('more bearable, more tolerable') suggests degrees of judgment rather than a uniform outcome.
15. The language echoes Isaiah 14:13-15, the taunt against the king of Babylon who sought to ascend to heaven but was brought down to Sheol. Capernaum was Jesus's base of operations in Galilee (Luke 4:31) and had received more of his teaching and miracles than any other town. The Greek hadēs translates the Hebrew Sheol — the realm of the dead, not the later Christian concept of hell as a place of punishment.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 14:13-15 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. This verse establishes a chain of representation parallel to 9:48 but in the negative direction: messenger → Jesus → God. The verb athetōn ('rejects, sets aside, nullifies') is a legal term meaning to declare something invalid or to annul a contract. Rejecting the messengers is not merely a social offense but a rejection of divine authority. The sending language (ton aposteilanta me) affirms Jesus's own identity as the sent one of God.
17. The disciples' report focuses on demonic submission (hypotassetai, 'submit, are subject to') — the one result that most astonished them. Their joy is genuine but slightly misdirected, as Jesus will redirect their attention in v. 20. The phrase 'in your name' (en tō onomati sou) indicates they acted not by their own power but as authorized representatives of Jesus.

- 18. The imperfect etheōroun ('I was watching, I kept seeing') suggests Jesus was observing in real time as the disciples were on their mission. The imagery of Satan falling like lightning combines the speed and brilliance of a lightning strike with the finality of a fall. This may allude to Isaiah 14:12 (the fall of the 'morning star') or may describe a visionary experience of Satan's cosmic defeat being enacted through the disciples' mission.
- 18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 14:12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 19. The perfect tense dedōka ('I have given') indicates an accomplished and continuing gift. Snakes and scorpions function both literally (protection from physical danger) and symbolically (power over demonic forces, cf. the serpent of Genesis 3). The phrase pasan tēn dynamin tou echthrou ('all the power of the enemy') identifies Satan as 'the enemy' and declares his complete subordination to the authority Jesus delegates. The double negative ou mē ('by no means, absolutely not') is the strongest negation in Greek.
- 19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 3. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 20. Jesus redirects their joy from what they can do (power over spirits) to what God has done (inscribing their names in heaven). The perfect passive engegraptai ('have been written and remain written') indicates a permanent record. The image of names written in heaven draws on the Old Testament concept of God's book (Exodus 32:32-33, Daniel 12:1, Psalm 69:28). The point is that identity and security in God's eternal record matters more than spiritual power.
- 20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 32:32-33 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 12:1 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 69:28 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 21. Luke alone specifies that Jesus rejoiced 'in the Holy Spirit' (en tō pneumati tō hagiō), one of the rare moments where Jesus's own emotional experience is described in terms of the Spirit's activity. The verb ēgalliasato ('rejoiced greatly, exulted') denotes intense, exuberant joy. The prayer follows the Jewish todah (thanksgiving) form. The 'wise and intelligent' (sophōn kai synetōn) may refer to religious scholars whose learning becomes an obstacle, while 'infants' (nēpiois) represents the unlettered disciples whose openness allows revelation.
- 22. This verse, sometimes called the 'Johannine thunderbolt' because it sounds more like John's Gospel than the Synoptics, asserts mutual exclusive knowledge between Father and Son. The verb paredothē ('have been handed over') implies total delegation of authority. The claim of reciprocal knowing — only the Father knows the Son, only the Son knows the Father — places Jesus in a relationship with God that is unique and unparalleled. The Son's sovereign choice in revelation (boulētai, 'wills, chooses') makes him the sole mediator of knowledge of God.
- 23. The beatitude form (makarioi, 'blessed, fortunate, to be envied') frames the disciples' experience as a supreme privilege. The physical turning (straphēis) signals a shift from public prayer to private instruction. The emphasis on seeing (ophthalmoi... blepontes... blepete) highlights the revelatory nature of the disciples' experience — they are witnessing what centuries of faithful people longed to see.
- 24. Luke says 'prophets and kings' where Matthew 13:17 says 'prophets and righteous people' — Luke's version may be more pointed, since kings like David and Solomon, despite their power and privilege, never witnessed the messianic fulfillment. The disciples, simple Galileans, are more privileged than Israel's greatest leaders. The parallel structure (see/did not see, hear/did not hear) creates a chiasm of privilege and longing.
- 25. The nomikos ('legal expert, lawyer') was an expert in the Torah, not a secular attorney. The verb ekpeirazōn ('testing, putting to the test') carries hostile undertones — this is an attempt to trap Jesus, not a sincere inquiry (though Jesus transforms it into genuine teaching). The question about inheriting eternal life assumes that eternal life is an inheritance, something received from a prior relationship rather than earned — a covenant concept.
- 26. Jesus's counter-question is a classic rabbinic technique — answering a question with a question that directs the questioner back to Scripture. The double question ('what is written?' and 'how do you read?') distinguishes between the text itself and the interpreter's understanding of it. As a Torah expert, the lawyer should already know the answer.
- 27. The lawyer combines the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:5) with Leviticus 19:18, joining love of God with love of neighbor into a single commandment. In Luke's account, it is the lawyer who produces this synthesis (in Mark 12:29-31, Jesus gives it). The fourfold formula (heart, soul, strength, mind) slightly expands the Hebrew original, with 'mind' (dianoia) added to the traditional three, perhaps reflecting the Septuagint tradition.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 6:5. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 19:18. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. Jesus's response echoes Leviticus 18:5: 'Keep my statutes... by which, if a person does them, he will live.' The imperative 'do this' (touto poiei) shifts the conversation from theory to practice — knowing the right answer is not enough. The present tense poiei implies ongoing, habitual action, not a one-time performance.
- 28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Leviticus 18:5: — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

29. The phrase thelōn dikaiōsai heauton ('wanting to justify himself') reveals the lawyer's motivation — he seeks to define 'neighbor' narrowly enough that he can claim compliance. The question 'who is my neighbor?' asks for the limits of obligation: who can I legitimately exclude? Jesus's parable will invert the question entirely: instead of asking 'who qualifies as my neighbor?' the question becomes 'to whom am I willing to be a neighbor?'
30. The Jerusalem-to-Jericho road descended about 3,400 feet over roughly seventeen miles through desolate, rocky terrain notorious for banditry. The word lēstai ('robbers, bandits') denotes violent criminals, not petty thieves (kleptai). The victim is deliberately left unidentified — no name, no ethnicity, no social status — so that the story cannot be limited to any particular group. Stripped and half dead, the man's identity cannot be determined by his clothing or speech, making the response to him purely a matter of mercy versus indifference.
31. The phrase kata synkyrian ('by coincidence') is used only here in the New Testament and frames the encounters as unplanned — this is not a setup but a test of character in an unexpected moment. The priest's avoidance (antiparēlthen, 'passed by on the opposite side') may have been motivated by purity concerns: contact with a corpse would render him ritually unclean (Leviticus 21:1-3), and the man appeared to be dead. However, Jesus's parable implies no excuse is adequate when a life hangs in the balance.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Leviticus 21:1-3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The Levite's behavior mirrors the priest's — seeing (idōn) and passing by (antiparēlthen). The Levites were a secondary priestly class who served in the temple. Together, priest and Levite represent the religious establishment of Israel. The pattern of two religious figures failing creates the expectation that the third character will be an ordinary Israelite who succeeds — making the Samaritan identity in verse 33 a deliberate shock.
33. The word esplanchnisthē ('was moved with compassion, felt it in his guts') is one of the strongest emotional verbs in Greek — it refers to a visceral, gut-level response. In the Gospels, this verb is used primarily of Jesus himself (7:13, 15:20). The Samaritan sees the same wounded man the priest and Levite saw, but his seeing produces a fundamentally different response. For a first-century Jewish audience, making a Samaritan the hero would have been deeply offensive — Samaritans were considered heretical half-breeds (cf. John 4:9, 8:48).
34. The care is described in meticulous detail: approaching, bandaging, applying medicine (oil to soothe, wine to disinfect), mounting the man on his own animal (meaning the Samaritan walked), transporting him to an inn, and personally nursing him. Each action represents a personal cost — time, supplies, transportation, and the risk of being a Samaritan caring for a possibly Jewish stranger in hostile territory. The pandocheion ('inn') was a commercial establishment, not private hospitality.
35. Two denarii represented about two days' wages for a laborer and could cover roughly two weeks of lodging and food. The Samaritan's open-ended promise — 'whatever more you spend, I will repay' — represents an unlimited financial commitment to a stranger. The verb prosdapanēsēs ('spend in addition') indicates he expects the care to exceed the initial payment. The promise to return creates ongoing accountability.
36. Jesus's question brilliantly inverts the lawyer's original question. The lawyer asked 'who is my neighbor?' (who must I help?) — Jesus asks 'who proved to be a neighbor?' (who acted with mercy?). The question is no longer about the identity of the recipient but about the character of the responder. The verb gegonenai ('proved to be, became') suggests that being a neighbor is not a status but an action.
37. The lawyer cannot bring himself to say 'the Samaritan' — he answers with a circumlocution: 'the one who showed mercy' (ho poiēsas to eleos). The word eleos ('mercy, compassion') echoes the Septuagint's vocabulary for God's own compassion. Jesus's final command — 'go and do likewise' (poreuou kai sy poiei homoiōs) — turns the theological question into a practical mandate. The 'likewise' (homoiōs) means: be like the Samaritan. For a Jewish lawyer, this is a radical reorientation.
38. Luke does not name the village, though John 11:1 identifies Martha's home as Bethany, near Jerusalem. The verb hypedexato ('welcomed, received as a guest') indicates hospitality — Martha is the householder who opens her home. Luke places this domestic scene immediately after the Good Samaritan parable, creating a pairing: the parable teaches about active mercy, while the Martha/Mary story teaches about receptive listening. Both are needed.
39. The phrase parakathētheisa pros tous podas tou kyriou ('seated at the Lord's feet') is the technical posture of a rabbinic disciple — Paul describes himself as educated 'at the feet of Gamaliel' (Acts 22:3). For a woman to assume this posture was socially radical; women were not typically accepted as students of Torah. Luke presents Mary as a full disciple. The imperfect ēkouden ('was listening, kept listening') suggests sustained, absorbed attention.
40. The verb periespato ('was distracted, was pulled in different directions') suggests that Martha's many tasks were fragmenting her attention rather than centering it. The word diakonia ('service, ministry') is significant — it is the root of 'deacon' and is a valued activity in Luke-Acts. Martha's service is not condemned; her distraction is. Her complaint addresses Jesus rather than Mary directly, asking him to arbitrate — and her tone reveals frustration bordering on accusation: 'don't you care?' (ou meleī soi).
41. The double name 'Martha, Martha' (Martha Martha) is a form of address that conveys gentle concern and intimacy — compare 'Simon, Simon' (Luke 22:31) and 'Jerusalem, Jerusalem' (Luke 13:34). The two verbs merimnās ('you are anxious, worried') and thorybazē ('you are troubled, agitated') describe an internal state of fragmentation. Jesus does not criticize Martha's service but her anxiety — the inner turmoil that has overtaken her.
42. The phrase henos estin chreia ('one thing is necessary') is textually debated — some manuscripts read 'few things are necessary, or only one' (oligōn de estin chreia ē henos). The SBLGNT reading is the most concise. The word merida ('portion, share, part') may carry meal imagery — while Martha is busy with many dishes, Mary has chosen the one dish that matters. The passive 'will not be taken away' (ouk aphairethēsetai) implies divine protection of Mary's choice. Jesus affirms that attentive hearing of the word takes priority, though he does not condemn Martha's service itself.

Summary: Luke 11 centers on prayer, spiritual warfare, and confrontation with religious hypocrisy. The chapter opens with Jesus teaching the Lord's Prayer in its shorter Lukan form, followed by the parable of the persistent friend and the promise that God gives good gifts to those who ask. The middle section addresses the Beelzebul controversy — Jesus's defense against the charge that he casts out demons by demonic power — and includes the parable of the strong man and the warning about the return of unclean spirits. The chapter closes with a series of sharp woe pronouncements against the Pharisees and legal experts, attacking their obsession with external purity while neglecting justice and the love of God.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's Lord's Prayer is significantly shorter than Matthew's version (five petitions versus seven), likely reflecting an earlier or more compressed tradition. The prayer arises naturally from watching Jesus pray — a uniquely Lukan setting. The Beelzebul controversy is one of the most theologically charged episodes in the Gospels, as Jesus argues that his exorcisms are evidence that the kingdom of God has arrived. The six woes (three against Pharisees, three against lawyers) form one of the fiercest prophetic denunciations in the New Testament, echoing the 'woe' oracles of Isaiah and Amos. Luke's placement of these woes at a Pharisee's dinner table heightens the social tension dramatically.

Translation Friction: The differences between Luke's Lord's Prayer and Matthew's have generated extensive scholarly discussion. We render Luke's text as it stands without harmonizing with Matthew. The phrase 'your kingdom come' in some manuscripts is followed by a variant reading requesting the Holy Spirit, which reflects early liturgical practice but is not in the SBLGNT. The Beelzebul passage raises difficult questions about the 'unforgivable sin' (blasphemy against the Holy Spirit), though Luke's version is less explicit on this than Mark's. The woe pronouncements present Jesus in a confrontational prophetic mode that may surprise readers accustomed to 'gentle Jesus.'

Connections: The Lord's Prayer connects to Jesus's own prayer life (3:21, 5:16, 6:12, 9:18, 9:28-29). The Beelzebul controversy draws on Old Testament language about 'the finger of God' (Exodus 8:19). The sign of Jonah connects to the Jonah narrative and the repentance of Nineveh. The lamp saying (v. 33-36) echoes the same imagery in 8:16. The woes parallel Matthew 23 but in a different narrative context. The reference to Abel's blood to Zechariah's blood spans the Hebrew canon from Genesis to Chronicles.

¹He was praying in a certain place, and when he finished, one of his disciples said to him, "Lord, teach us to pray, just as John taught his disciples." ²He said to them, "When you pray, say: 'Father, let your name be held holy. Let your kingdom come. ³Give us each day our daily bread. ⁴Forgive us our sins, for we ourselves also forgive everyone indebted to us. And do not bring us into temptation.'" ⁵Then he said to them, "Suppose one of you has a friend, and you go to him at midnight and say, 'Friend, lend me three loaves of bread, ⁶Because a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set prior to him? ⁷And suppose the one inside answers, 'Don't bother me. The door is already locked and my children are with me in bed. I cannot get up and give you anything.' ⁸I tell you, even if he will not get up and give him anything because of their friendship, yet because of his shameless persistence he will get up and give him whatever he needs. ⁹So I say to you: Ask, and it will be given to you. Seek, and you will find. Knock, and it will be opened to you. ¹⁰For everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks it will be opened. ¹¹What father among you, if his son asks for a fish, will give him a snake instead? ¹²Or if he asks for an egg, will give him a scorpion? ¹³If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will the heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him!" ¹⁴He was casting out a demon that was mute. When the demon had gone out, the mute man spoke, and the crowds were amazed. ¹⁵But some of them said, "He casts out demons by Beelzebul, the ruler of demons." ¹⁶Others, testing him, demanded a sign from heaven. ¹⁷But he, knowing their thoughts, said to them, "Every kingdom divided against itself is laid waste, and a house divided against itself falls. ¹⁸If Satan is divided against himself, how will his kingdom stand? For you say that I cast out demons by Beelzebul. ¹⁹If I cast out demons by Beelzebul, by whom do your sons cast them out? Therefore they will be your judges. ²⁰But if I cast out demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you. ²¹When a strong man, fully armed, guards his own courtyard, his possessions are secure. ²²But when one stronger than he attacks and overpowers him, he takes away the full armor in which the strong man trusted and distributes his plunder. ²³Whoever is not with me is against me, and whoever does not gather with me scatters. ²⁴"When an unclean spirit goes out of a person, it passes through waterless places seeking rest, and finding none, it says, 'I will return to my house from which I came.' ²⁵When it arrives, it finds the house swept and put in order. ²⁶Then it goes and brings along seven other spirits more evil than itself, and they enter and settle there. And the final condition of that person becomes worse than the first." ²⁷As he was saying these things, a woman in the crowd raised her voice and said to him, "Blessed is the womb that bore you and the breasts that nursed you!" ²⁸But he said, "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and keep it!" ²⁹As the crowds were increasing, he began to say, "This generation is an evil generation. It seeks a sign, and no sign will be given to it except the sign of Jonah. ³⁰For just as Jonah became a sign to the people of Nineveh, so also will the Son of Man be to this generation. ³¹The queen of the South will rise at the judgment with the people of this generation and condemn them, because she came from the ends of the earth to hear Solomon's wisdom — and look, something greater than Solomon is here. ³²The people of Nineveh will stand up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, because they repented at the preaching of Jonah — and look, something greater than Jonah is here. ³³"No one lights a lamp and puts it in a hidden place or under a basket, but on a lampstand, so that those who enter may see the light. ³⁴Your eye is the lamp of your body. When your eye is healthy, your whole body is full of light. But when it is bad, your body is full of darkness. ³⁵Therefore be careful that the light in you is not darkness. ³⁶If then your whole body is full of light, with no part dark, it will be entirely full of light, as when a lamp with its rays gives you light." ³⁷While he was speaking, a Pharisee invited him to eat with him. So he went in and reclined at the table. ³⁸The Pharisee was surprised to see that he did not first wash before the meal. ³⁹The Lord said to him, "Now you Pharisees clean the outside of the cup and the dish, but inside you are full of greed and wickedness. ⁴⁰Fools! Did not the one who made the outside make the inside also? ⁴¹But give what is inside as charity, and then everything is clean for you. ⁴²But woe to you Pharisees! For you tithe mint and rue and every herb, but you neglect justice and the love of God. These you should have done without neglecting the others. ⁴³Woe to you Pharisees! For you love the best seats in the synagogues and the greetings in the marketplaces. ⁴⁴Woe to you! For you are like unmarked graves, and the people who walk over them do not realize it." ⁴⁵One of the legal experts answered him, "Teacher, when you say these things, you insult us too." ⁴⁶He said, "Woe to you legal experts as well! For you load people with burdens hard to bear, but you yourselves will not touch the burdens with one of your fingers. ⁴⁷Woe to you! For you build the tombs of the prophets, and your fathers killed them. ⁴⁸So you are witnesses and you approve of the deeds of your fathers, because they killed them and you build their tombs. ⁴⁹For this reason the wisdom of God said, 'I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they will kill and persecute,' ⁵⁰That the lifeblood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the present age, may be required of this generation. ⁵¹In deed, from the blood of Abel to the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple — truly I tell you, it will be required of this generation. ⁵²Woe to you legal experts! For you have taken away the key of knowledge. You did not enter yourselves, and you hindered those who were entering." ⁵³When he left there, the scribes and the Pharisees began to press him hard and to provoke him to speak about many things, ⁵⁴They watched him closely, trying to trap him into saying something they could use against him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Luke uniquely grounds the Lord's Prayer in Jesus's own practice of prayer — the disciples see him praying and want to learn. The reference to John the Baptist teaching his disciples to pray indicates that distinctive prayers functioned as community identity markers; rabbinic schools and prophetic movements each had their own prayer traditions. The request is not simply for words to say but for a way of approaching God that distinguishes Jesus's community.
2. Luke's address is simply Pater ('Father') without Matthew's 'Our Father who is in heaven.' The bare 'Father' may reflect the Aramaic Abba, the intimate family address that Jesus used for God. The aorist passive hagiasthētō ('let it be made holy, let it be sanctified') is a divine passive — the petition asks God to act to hallow his own name, to cause his holiness to be recognized and honored. Luke omits Matthew's 'your will be done on earth as in heaven,' though the petition is implicit in 'let your kingdom come.'

3. The word epiousios ('daily') is one of the rarest words in Greek — it appears almost nowhere outside the Lord's Prayer, and its exact meaning is debated. Possible meanings include: 'for the coming day' (from epi + ienai, 'for tomorrow'), 'necessary for existence' (from epi + ousia, 'for being'), or 'supersubstantial' (a patristic reading connecting it to spiritual nourishment). The present tense didou ('keep giving') with 'each day' (to kath' hēmeran) in Luke's version (versus Matthew's aorist dos, 'give today') emphasizes ongoing daily dependence, echoing the daily manna provision in the wilderness.
4. Luke uses hamartias ('sins') where Matthew has opheilēmata ('debts'). Luke's version then switches to debt language in the second clause (opheilonti, 'indebted to'), creating a mixed metaphor that reveals the underlying connection: sins are debts owed to God. The present tense aphiomen ('we forgive') indicates habitual practice, not a one-time act. Luke omits Matthew's final petition 'but deliver us from evil/the evil one.' The petition about temptation (peirasmon) asks not to be led into a situation of testing that could overwhelm faith — the same word will appear in Jesus's Gethsemane warning (22:40, 46).
5. This parable is unique to Luke. The scenario assumes a Palestinian village where hospitality is a communal obligation — a host who cannot provide for an unexpected guest would bring shame on the entire village. The midnight hour (mesonyktiou) heightens the inconvenience. Three loaves would constitute a modest meal for one person.
6. The traveler's arrival 'from a journey' (ex hodou) at midnight was common in the ancient Near East, where people traveled in the cooler night hours to avoid the heat. The host's confession 'I have nothing' (ouk echō) creates urgency — hospitality failure was a serious social disgrace in this culture.
7. The reply from inside paints a realistic picture of a one-room peasant house where the entire family slept on a raised platform or mat. Opening the door and getting bread would mean stepping over sleeping children, unbarring the door, and fumbling in the dark. The perfect tense kekleistai ('has been locked and remains locked') emphasizes the finality of the closure.
8. The key word anaideia has been traditionally translated 'importunity' or 'persistence,' but it literally means 'shamelessness, lack of shame.' The argument is from lesser to greater (qal wahomer): if a reluctant neighbor responds to shameless persistence, how much more will God — who is not reluctant — respond to persistent prayer? God is not the reluctant friend; the parable contrasts human reluctance with divine generosity.
9. The three imperatives (aiteite, zēteite, krouete) are all present tense, indicating continuous action: 'keep asking, keep seeking, keep knocking.' The escalating verbs suggest increasing effort and urgency. The divine passives (dothēsetai, 'it will be given'; anoigēsetai, 'it will be opened') indicate God as the agent. The promise is absolute in form, though the context (vv. 11-13) clarifies that God gives what is genuinely good.
10. The universal qualifier pas ('everyone') removes any limitation — the promise is not restricted to the pious, the worthy, or the experienced. The shift from imperative (v. 9) to indicative (v. 10) moves from command to assurance: this is not merely what you should do, but what actually happens. The present tenses (lambanei, heuriskei) describe a reliable pattern, not an occasional exception.
11. The SBLGNT text here differs from some manuscripts. Some include the bread/stone comparison found in Matthew 7:9, but the critical text begins with the fish/snake pair. The items are chosen for their visual similarity — a snake could resemble a fish, an egg could resemble a stone — making the substitution conceivable but cruel. The argument assumes that human fathers, despite their imperfection, would never deliberately harm their children.
12. The egg/scorpion pair is unique to Luke. A white scorpion with its tail curled could superficially resemble an egg. The escalation from snake (dangerous) to scorpion (deadly) heightens the absurdity — no parent would do this. The logic builds toward the climactic argument in verse 13.
13. Luke's version culminates with the Holy Spirit (pneuma hagion) where Matthew 7:11 has 'good things' (agatha). This is theologically significant: for Luke, the Holy Spirit is the supreme gift, the ultimate 'good thing' that encompasses all others. The acknowledgment of human evil (ponēroi hyparchontes, 'being evil by nature') is not rhetorical — it establishes the lesser-to-greater argument: even flawed humans give well; a perfect Father gives incomparably better. The phrase ho patēr ho ex ouranou ('the Father from heaven') is Luke's distinctive formulation.
14. The adjective kōphon ('mute, deaf') is applied to the demon rather than the man, suggesting the demon was the cause of the muteness. The immediate restoration of speech upon the demon's departure confirms this causation. The crowds' amazement (ethaumasan) is a typical response to Jesus's exorcisms, setting the stage for the divided reactions that follow.
15. Beelzebul (Beelzeboul) is derived from the name Baal-zebul ('lord of the flies') in 2 Kings 1:2, though the -zebul form may mean 'lord of the dwelling' or 'lord of the exalted place.' The accusation that Jesus works by the authority of Satan's chief officer is the most extreme charge his opponents could level — it acknowledges his power while attributing it to the worst possible source.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Kings 1:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The demand for a 'sign from heaven' (sēmeion ex ouranou) implies that an exorcism is not sufficient proof — they want a cosmic, undeniable display of divine power. The verb peirazontes ('testing') echoes the temptation narrative (4:2) and v. 25's description of the lawyer. Jesus will address this demand in vv. 29-32 with the sign of Jonah.
17. Jesus's knowledge of their thoughts (eidōs autōn ta dianōēmata) again demonstrates supernatural perception. The argument is logical: a kingdom at war with itself will collapse. The word erēmoutai ('is made desolate, is laid waste') echoes the prophetic language of national destruction. The 'house against house' (oikos epi oikon) may refer to families or to internal factions within a household.
18. The phrase 'his kingdom' (hē basileia autou) applies kingdom language to Satan — he has a counter-kingdom that opposes God's reign. Jesus accepts the premise that there is an organized demonic realm but argues that the Beelzebul hypothesis is internally incoherent: Satan would not authorize the destruction of his own forces.

19. The 'sons' (huiōi) refers to Jewish exorcists who were contemporaries of Jesus — exorcism was practiced within Judaism (cf. Acts 19:13-14, Josephus Antiquities 8.2.5). The argument is: if exorcism proves Satanic alliance, then your own exorcists stand condemned by the same logic. If their exorcisms are legitimate, then exorcism itself cannot be evidence of demonic power.
20. Luke preserves the phrase 'finger of God' (daktylō theou) where Matthew 12:28 has 'Spirit of God.' The 'finger of God' alludes directly to Exodus 8:19, where Pharaoh's magicians conceded that Moses' plagues were 'the finger of God' — a power they could not replicate. Jesus frames his exorcisms as a new exodus: God's finger is again at work, liberating people from bondage. The aorist ephthasen ('has come upon, has arrived') is decisive — the kingdom is not merely approaching but has already arrived.
21. The 'strong man' (ho ischyros) represents Satan. The phrase kathōplismenos ('fully armed, having armed himself completely') emphasizes thorough military preparedness. His 'courtyard' (aulēn) is his domain of control — the lives and territories under demonic oppression. The false 'peace' (eirēnē) of his possessions means the captives are secure only in the sense of being securely imprisoned.
22. The 'stronger one' (ischyroteros) is Jesus himself. The word panoplian ('full armor, complete suit of armor') includes every defensive weapon — the stronger one does not merely defeat the strong man but strips him completely bare. The verb diadidōsin ('distributes') implies the liberation of captives and the redistribution of what was stolen. Luke's version is more detailed than Mark's, emphasizing the totality of the victory.
23. This saying appears to contradict 9:50 ('whoever is not against you is for you'), but the contexts differ. Here the issue is personal allegiance to Jesus in the cosmic battle against evil — neutrality is impossible. In 9:50, the issue was tolerance toward others who work in Jesus's name. The gathering/scattering language (synagōn/skorpizei) uses shepherd imagery: Jesus gathers the flock, and anyone working at cross-purposes scatters it.
24. The 'waterless places' (anhydron topōn) reflect the Jewish belief that demons inhabited deserts and desolate regions (cf. Isaiah 13:21, 34:14; Baruch 4:35). The spirit's reference to the person as 'my house' (ton oikon mou) reveals a possessive claim — the demon considers the human being its property. The seeking of 'rest' (anapausin) parallels the wandering of unhoused spirits in Jewish demonology.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 13:21. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The perfect participles sesarōmenon ('swept clean') and kekosmēmenon ('put in order, decorated') describe a house that has been cleaned but not occupied. The critical point is what is absent: there is no new tenant, no positive spiritual presence filling the space. Exorcism without replacement — removal of evil without the filling of good — creates a dangerous spiritual vacuum.
26. Seven represents completeness — the reinfestation is total. The comparative ponērotera ('more evil') indicates escalation: the returned spirits are worse than the original. The verb katoikei ('settle, take up permanent residence') is stronger than temporary inhabitation — they intend to stay. The warning applies both to individuals and, by extension, to Israel: deliverance (exodus, exile's end) without genuine commitment to God leads to a worse condition than before.
27. This exchange is unique to Luke. The woman's praise honors Jesus indirectly by blessing his mother — a common Near Eastern form of expressing admiration for a person by praising the mother who raised him. The language is earthy and physical: koilia ('womb, belly') and mastoi ('breasts'). Jesus will redirect this biological blessing to a spiritual one.
28. The particle menoun ('indeed, rather, on the contrary') does not necessarily negate the woman's blessing but redirects and surpasses it. The true blessing is not biological connection to Jesus but hearing and obeying God's word. The participles akouontes ('hearing') and phyllassontes ('keeping, guarding, obeying') describe ongoing habitual action. This saying echoes Luke 8:21: 'My mother and brothers are those who hear the word of God and do it.'
29. The verb epathroisomenōn ('were gathering in addition, crowding together') indicates swelling numbers. Jesus addresses the sign-seekers from v. 16. The phrase genea ponēra ('evil generation') echoes Deuteronomy 1:35 and frames the present generation as comparable to the rebellious wilderness generation. The 'sign of Jonah' is explained differently in Matthew (three days in the belly of the fish = three days in the tomb); Luke's explanation in v. 30 focuses on Jonah himself as the sign.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 1:35. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. Luke's version does not specify how Jonah was a sign — whether through his preaching of judgment, his survival from the fish, or his person itself. The parallel simply states that as Jonah functioned as a sign to Ninevites, so Jesus functions as a sign to this generation. The Ninevites responded to Jonah with repentance (Jonah 3:5-10); the implication is that this generation is failing to respond to one far greater.
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jonah 3:5-10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
31. The 'queen of the South' is the Queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1-13), who traveled from southern Arabia to hear Solomon. The neuter pleion ('something greater'), not the masculine pleiōn ('someone greater'), is significant — Jesus may be referring to the kingdom of God rather than merely claiming personal superiority to Solomon. A pagan queen's pursuit of wisdom will stand as evidence against a generation that has God's wisdom in its midst and ignores it.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Kings 10:1-13. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.

- 32. Luke reverses Matthew's order, placing the Ninevites second for emphasis — they connect back to the sign of Jonah discussion. The verb metanoēsān ('repented, changed their minds') describes the complete turnaround of a pagan city. The repeated formula 'something greater than X is here' (pleion + genitive + hōde) establishes a pattern: if outsiders responded to lesser revelations, this generation has no excuse for rejecting the greater.
- 33. This lamp saying reappears in a different context (cf. 8:16). Here, following the sign-seeking discussion, the point is that Jesus's message is not hidden or cryptic — it is publicly displayed like a lamp on a stand. The problem is not insufficient evidence but refusal to see. The word kryptēn ('hidden place, cellar') is unique to Luke's version.
- 34. The adjective haplous ('single, healthy, generous') is contrasted with ponēros ('bad, evil, sick'). In the ancient world, the eye was understood as the organ that admits light into the body (like a window, not a camera). A 'single' or 'good' eye admits light; an 'evil' or 'diseased' eye blocks it. The metaphor also carries moral overtones — a 'good eye' in Jewish idiom meant generosity, while an 'evil eye' meant stinginess or envy.
- 35. The warning is paradoxical: what you think is light may actually be darkness. The verb skopei ('watch carefully, take heed') implies active vigilance. The danger is not simply lacking light but having a distorted perception that mistakes darkness for light — a more insidious condition because the person is unaware of their blindness.
- 36. The verse describes total illumination — no dark corners, no hidden areas. The comparison to a lamp's astrapē ('flash, radiance, lightning') suggests intense, penetrating brightness. The point is holistic spiritual perception: when the inner eye is healthy, the entire person is illuminated and can perceive God's truth clearly.
- 37. The verb aristēsē refers to the morning or midday meal, not dinner. Jesus accepts invitations from Pharisees on multiple occasions in Luke (7:36, 14:1), demonstrating willingness to engage with his critics. The verb anepesen ('reclined') describes the typical posture at a formal meal — reclining on one's left side on a couch.
- 38. The verb ebaptisthē (literally 'was baptized, was immersed') refers to the ritual hand-washing practiced by Pharisees before meals. This was not a matter of hygiene but of ritual purity — removing ceremonial contamination acquired through contact with common people or objects. The practice was a Pharisaic tradition, not a Torah commandment, which is precisely Jesus's point in what follows.
- 39. The cup and dish metaphor is brilliantly chosen at a dinner table. The word harpagēs ('greed, robbery, plunder') suggests that the contents of the Pharisees' clean cups were obtained through exploitation. The contrast between exōthen ('outside') and esōthen ('inside') establishes the external-versus-internal theme that drives all six woes.
- 40. The address aphrones ('fools, senseless ones') is sharp and direct. The theological argument is that God who created the exterior also created the interior — therefore both require purification. To clean only the outside is to ignore the Creator's concern with the whole person. The question expects the answer 'yes' — of course God made both.
- 41. This enigmatic verse has been interpreted variously. The phrase ta enonta ('the things within, the contents') likely refers to the contents of their cups and dishes — give away what you have as alms rather than hoarding it. When the inside (the heart's disposition toward generosity) is cleansed through charitable giving, the external purity rituals become genuinely meaningful rather than empty performance.
- 42. The first woe targets misplaced priorities. Tithing garden herbs (hēdyosmon, 'mint'; pēganon, 'rue') was an extreme extension of the tithing law — the Torah required tithes of grain, wine, and oil (Deuteronomy 14:22-23), but the Pharisees extended it to small garden herbs. Jesus does not condemn tithing itself (tauta edei poiēsai, 'these you should have done') but the neglect of weightier matters: justice (krisin) and the love of God (tēn agapēn tou theou). Luke's version uniquely includes 'the love of God' where Matthew has 'mercy and faithfulness.'
- 42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 14:22-23. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 43. The second woe targets the desire for public honor. The prōtokathedrian ('chief seat, front seat') in the synagogue was the bench facing the congregation, reserved for the most distinguished. The aspasous ('greetings') in the marketplace were elaborate public acknowledgments of status — being hailed with titles and deference. The verb agapate ('you love') ironically uses the same love-word that the previous verse said they neglect toward God.
- 44. The third woe compares the Pharisees to adēla mnēmeia ('unmarked, invisible graves'). Contact with a grave rendered a person ritually unclean for seven days (Numbers 19:16). The irony is devastating: the Pharisees who are obsessed with purity are themselves hidden sources of contamination. People who interact with them become spiritually defiled without knowing it. Matthew 23:27 uses the opposite image — whitewashed tombs that are visible but beautiful outside. Luke's version is sharper: these graves are invisible.
- 44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 19:16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 45. The nomikos ('legal expert') is distinct from the Pharisees — these were professional scholars of Torah law, whereas the Pharisees were a broader religious movement. The legal expert's complaint (hybrizeis, 'you insult, you treat shamefully') inadvertently invites Jesus to extend his critique to a second group, which he does in the next three woes.
- 46. The fourth woe (first against the lawyers) targets the imposition of religious obligations that the teachers themselves evade. The word phortia ('burdens, loads') refers to the accumulated legal rulings and interpretations that multiplied the Torah's requirements. The adjective dysbastakta ('hard to bear, oppressive') conveys crushing weight. The image of not touching with 'one finger' (heni tōn daktylōn) suggests they will not offer even minimal assistance in carrying the burdens they impose.

47. The fifth woe exposes an ironic complicity: building elaborate tombs for the prophets appears to honor them, but it actually serves as a monument to the violence of previous generations. The implied argument continues in the next verse — by building the tombs, they demonstrate solidarity with the killers, completing the cycle: the fathers killed, the sons build memorials, and both participate in the rejection of God's messengers.
48. The verb syneudokeite ('approve, consent to, share in the approval of') makes the charge explicit: tomb-building constitutes endorsement. The logic is sharp: the act of memorializing dead prophets while continuing to reject living ones reveals that the honor is for dead voices only. A dead prophet cannot challenge you; a living one can.
49. The phrase 'the wisdom of God said' (hē sophia tou theou eipen) is unique to Luke and its source is debated — it may be quoting a lost wisdom writing, or Jesus may be speaking as the Wisdom of God personified (cf. Proverbs 8), or Luke may be paraphrasing a saying that in Matthew 23:34 is spoken by Jesus directly ('I send you prophets'). The addition of 'apostles' (apostolous) alongside 'prophets' anticipates the early church's experience of persecution as described in Acts.
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Proverbs 8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
50. The passive ekzētēthē ('may be required, may be sought out, may be charged') uses judicial language — God will hold this generation accountable for the accumulated guilt of prophet-killing throughout history. The phrase apo katabolēs kosmou ('from the foundation of the world') extends the scope to all of human history. The logic is that this generation, by rejecting the final prophet and his messengers, brings the full weight of all previous rejections to a climax.
51. Abel's murder (Genesis 4) is the first murder in Scripture; Zechariah's (2 Chronicles 24:20-21) is the last in the Hebrew canon, which ends with Chronicles. Thus 'from Abel to Zechariah' spans the entire Old Testament from first book to last. Zechariah was killed 'between the altar and the sanctuary' (metaxy tou thysiastēriou kai tou oikou) — murdered in the temple precinct itself, the ultimate desecration. The identification is with Zechariah son of Jehoiada the priest.
51. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 4. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
51. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Chronicles 24:20-21. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
52. The sixth and final woe is perhaps the most devastating. The 'key of knowledge' (tēn kleida tēs gnōseōs) refers to the proper understanding of Scripture that the legal experts were supposed to teach. Instead of unlocking the Scriptures for people, they have removed the key — their interpretations block rather than facilitate understanding. Matthew 23:13 has 'you shut the kingdom of heaven' — Luke's version focuses on knowledge as the gateway. The double failure (they neither enter nor allow others to enter) makes them obstacles to the very truth they claim to teach.
53. The verb deinōs enechēin ('to press hard, to be bitterly hostile') describes intense antagonism. The word apostomatizein ('to provoke to speak, to cross-examine, to draw out statements') is rare and means to force someone to speak on specific topics — essentially trying to catch Jesus making incriminating statements. The shift from dinner conversation to hostile interrogation is abrupt and threatening.
54. The verb enedrevontes ('lying in ambush, setting a trap') is a hunting term — they are stalking Jesus like prey. The goal thēreusai ('to catch, to trap, to hunt') continues the predatory imagery. The phrase ek tou stomatos autou ('from his mouth') specifies that they want words they can use against him. This verse sets the stage for the escalating conflict that will dominate the rest of Luke's narrative.

Summary: Luke 12 is a sweeping discourse on anxiety, possessions, and readiness for judgment. Jesus warns against the leaven of the Pharisees (hypocrisy), assures the disciples that God values them more than sparrows, tells the parable of the rich fool who stores up wealth only to die that night, teaches about freedom from anxiety by pointing to ravens and lilies, urges readiness for the master's return through parables of watchful servants and a faithful steward, and warns that his coming brings not peace but division. The chapter closes with Jesus's frustration that the crowds can read weather signs but not the signs of the present time.

What Makes This Remarkable: The parable of the rich fool (vv. 13-21) is unique to Luke and encapsulates his distinctive concern about wealth — the man's soliloquy with his own soul is one of the most psychologically revealing passages in the Gospels. The anxiety discourse (vv. 22-34) parallels Matthew's Sermon on the Mount material but is placed in a different context, following the rich fool parable, which gives the teaching a sharper economic edge. Luke alone includes the promise 'Do not be afraid, little flock, for your Father has been pleased to give you the kingdom' (v. 32) — one of the most tender sayings attributed to Jesus. The fire/baptism/division sayings (vv. 49-53) present a startlingly combative Jesus who expects his mission to fracture families.

Translation Friction: The transition between the rich fool parable and the anxiety discourse creates tension: is material security wrong, or only anxiety about it? Jesus appears to condemn both storing up wealth (v. 21) and worrying about basic needs (vv. 22-31), which raises questions about the practical ethic being proposed. The 'fire on earth' and 'baptism' sayings (vv. 49-50) are cryptic and have been interpreted variously. The family division passage (vv. 51-53) draws on Micah 7:6 and challenges the common assumption that Jesus's message is primarily about peace and harmony.

Connections: The rich fool parable connects to the broader Lukan theme of wealth reversal (1:53, 6:20-26, 16:19-31, 18:18-30). The anxiety discourse parallels Matthew 6:25-34 but with distinctive Lukan additions. The faithful steward parable anticipates the parables of chapter 16. The fire and division sayings connect to John the Baptist's prophecy of fire-baptism (3:16). The weather signs passage echoes the prophetic tradition of discerning God's activity in current events.

¹Meanwhile, when a crowd of many thousands had gathered, so that they were trampling on one another, he began to say to his disciples first, "Watch out for the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. ²Nothing is concealed that will not be revealed, and nothing hidden that will not be made known. ³Therefore whatever you have said in the dark will be heard in the light, and what you have whispered in inner rooms will be proclaimed from the housetops. ⁴I tell you, my friends, do not fear those who kill the body and after that can do nothing more. ⁵But I will show you whom to fear: fear the one who, after killing, has authority to cast into Gehenna. Yes, I tell you, fear him! ⁶Are not five sparrows sold for two assaria? Yet not one of them is forgotten before God. ⁷Indeed, even the hairs of your head are all counted. Do not be afraid — you are worth more than many sparrows. ⁸I tell you, everyone who acknowledges me before people, the Son of Man will also acknowledge before the angels of God. ⁹But the one who denies me before people will be denied before the angels of God. ¹⁰Everyone who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven, but the one who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven. ¹¹When they bring you before the synagogues and the rulers and the authorities, do not worry about how or what you should say in your defense, or what you should speak. ¹²For the Holy Spirit will teach you in that very hour what you must say." ¹³Someone in the crowd said to him, "Teacher, tell my brother to divide the inheritance with me." ¹⁴But he said to him, "Friend, who appointed me as a judge or arbitrator over you?" ¹⁵Then he said to them, "Watch out! Guard yourselves against every kind of greed, because a person's life does not consist in the abundance of his possessions." ¹⁶He told them a parable, saying, "The land of a certain rich man produced abundantly. ¹⁷He reasoned to himself, 'What should I do, since I have no place to store my crops?' ¹⁸Then he said, 'This is what I will do: I will tear down my barns and build larger ones, and there I will store all my grain and my goods. ¹⁹And I will say to my soul, 'Soul, you have many good things stored up for many years. Relax, eat, drink, and celebrate.'" ²⁰But God said to him, 'Fool! This very night your soul is demanded of you. And the things you have prepared — whose will they be?' ²¹So it is with the one who stores up treasure for himself and is not rich toward God." ²²He said to his disciples, "Therefore I tell you, do not worry about your life, what you will eat, or about your body, what you will wear. ²³For life is more than food, and the body more than clothing. ²⁴Consider the ravens: they neither sow nor reap, they have no storeroom or barn, yet God feeds them. How much more valuable are you than birds! ²⁵And which of you by worrying can add a single hour to your life span? ²⁶If then you cannot do even this small thing, why do you worry about the rest? ²⁷Consider the lilies, how they grow: they neither toil nor spin. Yet I tell you, not even Solomon in all his glory was clothed like one of these. ²⁸If God so clothes the grass that is in the field today and tomorrow is thrown into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, you of little faith! ²⁹So do not keep striving for what you will eat and what you will drink, and do not be anxious. ³⁰For all the nations of the world pursue these things, and your Father knows that you need them. ³¹Instead, seek his kingdom, and these things will be added to you. ³²Do not be afraid, little flock, for your Father has been pleased to give you the kingdom. ³³Sell your possessions and give to the needy. Make for yourselves purses that do not wear out — an inexhaustible treasure in heaven, where no thief comes near and no moth destroys. ³⁴For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also. ³⁵"Stay dressed for action and keep your lamps burning, ³⁶Be like servants waiting for their master to return from a wedding banquet, ready to open the door for him the moment he arrives and knocks. ³⁷Blessed are those servants whom the master finds awake when he comes. Truly I tell you, he will dress himself for service, have them recline at the table, and come and serve them. ³⁸If he comes in the second watch, or even in the third, and finds them ready — blessed are those servants! ³⁹But know this: if the homeowner had known at what hour the thief was coming, he would not have let his house be broken into. ⁴⁰You also must be ready, because the Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not expect." ⁴¹Peter said, "Lord, are you telling this parable for us or for everyone?" ⁴²The Lord said, "Who then is the faithful and wise steward whom the master will put in charge of his household servants, to give them their food allowance at the proper time? ⁴³Blessed is that servant whom his master finds doing so when he comes. ⁴⁴Truly I tell you, he will put him in charge of all his possessions. ⁴⁵But if that servant says in his heart, 'My master is taking a long time in coming,' and begins to beat the male and female servants, and to eat and drink and get drunk, ⁴⁶That servant's master will come on a day he does not expect, at a time he does not know. The master will cut him off and assign him a place with the unfaithful. ⁴⁷That servant who knew his master's will but did not prepare or act according to his will shall receive a severe beating. ⁴⁸But the one who did not know, yet did things deserving punishment, will receive a light beating. From everyone who has been given much, much will be required; and from the one who has been entrusted with much, even more will be demanded. ⁴⁹"I came to cast fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled! ⁵⁰I have a baptism to undergo, and how distressed I am until it is completed! ⁵¹Do you think I came to bring peace on earth? No, I tell you, but rather division! ⁵²For from now on, five in one household will be divided, three against two and two against three. ⁵³Father will be divided against son and son against father, mother against daughter and daughter against mother, mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law and daughter-in-law against mother-in-law." ⁵⁴He also said to the crowds, "When you see a cloud rising in the west, you immediately say, 'A rainstorm is coming,' and so it happens. ⁵⁵And when the south wind blows, you say, 'It will be scorching hot,' and it happens. ⁵⁶Hypocrites! You know how to interpret the appearance of the earth and sky, but why do you not know how to interpret the present time? ⁵⁷"And why do you not judge for yourselves what is right? ⁵⁸For as you are going with your adversary to the magistrate, make an effort to settle with him on the way, or he may drag you before the judge, and the judge hand you over to the officer, and the officer throw you into prison. ⁵⁹I tell you, you will never get out until you have paid the very last penny."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word myriadōn ('myriads, tens of thousands') indicates an enormous crowd — Luke hyperbolically suggests tens of thousands. The crushing press (katapatein allēlous, 'trampling one another') creates a vivid physical scene. Despite the public setting, Jesus addresses the disciples 'first' (prōton), indicating priority of instruction. He defines the Pharisees' leaven specifically as hypocrisy (hypokrisis) — the disconnect between external appearance and internal reality, the theme of chapter 11's woes.
2. The perfect participle synkekalymmenon ('covered up, concealed') paired with the future passive apokalyphthēsetai ('will be uncovered, revealed') establishes an eschatological certainty: what hypocrisy hides, God's judgment will expose. The passive voice implies God as the agent of revelation.
3. The contrast between private speech (in darkness, whispered in inner rooms) and public exposure (in the light, proclaimed from rooftops) warns that hidden conversations will become public knowledge. The tameiois ('inner rooms, storerooms') were the most private spaces in a house. Housetops (dōmatōn) were flat roofs used as public gathering and proclamation spaces in the ancient Near East.
4. The address 'my friends' (tois philois mou) is uniquely Lukan and remarkably intimate — Jesus identifies the disciples as friends, not merely followers or students. The prohibition against fear of those who can only kill the body relativizes even death: physical destruction is the absolute limit of human power, and 'after that' (meta tauta) they are impotent.
5. The word geennan ('Gehenna') refers to the Valley of Hinnom (Hebrew ge-hinnom) south of Jerusalem, associated with child sacrifice to Molech (2 Kings 23:10) and later used as the city's burning garbage dump. It became a metaphor for divine judgment and destruction. The identity of 'the one' to fear is debated: most interpreters understand it as God, who alone has authority (exousian) beyond death. The emphatic repetition 'yes, I tell you, fear him' (nai legō hymin, touton phobēthēte) underscores the seriousness.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Kings 23:10 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. Luke has five sparrows for two assaria where Matthew (10:29) has two for one assarion — Luke's version implies a bulk discount (buy four, get one free), emphasizing even greater cheapness. An assarion was worth roughly one-sixteenth of a denarius, about ten minutes of a laborer's wage. The point is not that sparrows are valuable but that even the most commercially worthless creatures are individually known to God.
7. The perfect passive ērithmēntai ('have been counted and remain counted') indicates God's thorough, ongoing knowledge. The average human head has about 100,000 hairs — God's attention to detail is incomprehensibly minute. The argument moves from lesser to greater: if God does not forget sparrows, and if God counts your hairs, then your life is absolutely secure in his attention.
8. The verb homologēsē ('confess, acknowledge, declare openly') means to make a public declaration of allegiance. The phrase 'before the angels of God' (emprosthen tōn angelōn tou theou) envisions a heavenly courtroom scene where Jesus serves as advocate. The reciprocity is exact: public confession leads to heavenly acknowledgment.

9. The passive aparnēthēsetai ('will be denied') implies that God or the Son of Man is the agent of denial. The shift from active (the human denies) to passive (the person is denied) creates distance — the judgment is not vindictive but a natural consequence of the choice. Peter's threefold denial (Luke 22:54-62) will test this saying dramatically.
10. This is Luke's version of the 'unforgivable sin' saying. The distinction between speaking against the Son of Man (forgivable) and blaspheming the Holy Spirit (unforgivable) is difficult. One interpretation: rejecting the earthly Jesus out of ignorance or confusion is forgivable (as with Paul, who persecuted the church before his conversion), but willfully attributing the Holy Spirit's work to evil (the Beelzebul charge of 11:15) represents a hardened condition that places oneself beyond the reach of repentance.
11. Three venues of persecution are named: synagogues (Jewish religious courts), rulers (archas, civil authorities), and authorities (exousias, governing powers). The verb merimnēsēte ('do not worry, do not be anxious') is the same word Jesus will use in the anxiety discourse later in this chapter (v. 22). The threefold 'how or what... or what' (pōs ē ti apologēsēsthe ē ti eipēte) covers both strategy and content of their defense.
12. The promise that the Holy Spirit will provide words en autē tē hōra ('in that very hour') excludes advance preparation in favor of in-the-moment divine guidance. The verb didaxei ('will teach') makes the Spirit the true instructor. This promise is fulfilled repeatedly in Acts (4:8, 6:10, 7:55). The word dei ('must, it is necessary') implies divinely scripted testimony.
13. This interruption from the crowd shifts the discourse from persecution to possessions. Rabbis were commonly asked to mediate disputes, including inheritance matters. Under Jewish law, the eldest son received a double portion (Deuteronomy 21:17), and disputes over the remainder were common. The man wants Jesus to serve as an authoritative arbitrator.
13. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 21:17 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
14. The address anthrōpe ('man, sir, friend') is blunt but not hostile. Jesus's refusal to arbitrate echoes Moses' questioner in Exodus 2:14: 'Who made you a ruler and judge over us?' Jesus declines the role of legal mediator, not because the question is unimportant, but because it addresses the symptom (unfair division) rather than the disease (greed), which he will address in the next verse.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 2:14: See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The double imperative horate kai phylassesthe ('watch out and guard yourselves') conveys urgency. The word pleonexias ('greed, covetousness, desire for more') literally means 'the desire to have more.' The qualifier pasēs ('every kind of') broadens the warning beyond obvious avarice to include all forms of acquisitiveness. The principle that follows — life is not defined by possessions — directly contradicts the prevailing cultural assumption that wealth equals life, security, and value.
16. The parable is unique to Luke. The man is already rich (plousiou) before the bumper crop — the harvest creates surplus, not need. The verb euphorēsen ('produced well, bore good fruit') applies to the land, not the farmer: the productivity is a gift from the soil, not the man's achievement. This detail subtly undermines the man's later claim of ownership over what the land produced.
17. The internal monologue (diologizeto en heautō, 'reasoned within himself') reveals a man with no community — he consults no one, considers no one's needs, speaks only to himself. The possessive 'my crops' (tous karpous mou) begins a pattern of self-referential language that intensifies through the parable. His problem — too much abundance — is ironically a 'good' problem that reveals the poverty of his imagination.
18. The decisive 'this is what I will do' (touto poiēsō) shows a man who has resolved his dilemma entirely by himself. The solution — bigger barns — addresses only the storage problem. No thought is given to distribution, charity, or the community. The repeated possessives (mou, 'my') continue: my barns, my grain, my goods. The verb kathelō ('tear down, demolish') implies destruction of what was adequate in order to build something excessive.
19. The self-address to his own soul (tē psychē mou) is the climax of his isolation — his only conversation partner is himself. The four imperatives (anapauou, phage, pie, euphraiou: 'relax, eat, drink, celebrate') echo the philosophy of Ecclesiastes 8:15 and anticipate Paul's quotation of the Epicurean maxim in 1 Corinthians 15:32. The man assumes his future is secured by accumulated goods. The phrase 'many years' (etē polla) is about to be dramatically shortened.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Ecclesiastes 8:15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. God's direct speech is rare in Jesus's parables, making this intervention especially dramatic. The address aphrōn ('fool, senseless one') echoes Psalm 14:1: 'The fool says in his heart, there is no God.' The verb apaitousin ('they demand, they require back') uses the third person plural impersonally — 'they' may refer to angels of death or simply be a way of saying 'your life is being demanded.' The devastating question 'whose will they be?' (tini estai) exposes the futility of accumulation without God.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalm 14:1: — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The application distinguishes between storing up for oneself (thēsaurizōn heautō) and being 'rich toward God' (eis theon ploutōn). The phrase 'rich toward God' is unique and provocative — it suggests that true wealth is measured by one's relationship with God and generosity, not by accumulated possessions. The contrast implies that the two orientations are mutually exclusive: self-directed hoarding prevents God-directed richness.
22. The connecting phrase dia touto ('therefore, for this reason') links the anxiety teaching directly to the rich fool parable — because hoarding for oneself is foolish, worrying about material needs is equally misguided but from the opposite direction. The verb merimnate ('do not worry, do not be anxious') prohibits the kind of fretting that dominates one's thinking, not responsible planning. The two concerns (food for life, clothing for body) cover the basic necessities.

23. The argument is from greater to lesser: if God gave you the greater gift (life, a body), he will surely provide the lesser gift (food, clothing) that sustains it. The word psychē here means 'life' in the biological sense, not 'soul' in the metaphysical sense.
24. Luke specifies ravens (korakas) where Matthew has 'birds of the air.' Ravens were unclean animals under Jewish law (Leviticus 11:15), making the choice pointed: God provides even for unclean scavengers. The mention of 'storeroom or barn' (tameion oude apothēkē) directly echoes the rich fool's barns — the ravens have none and yet are fed. The argument from lesser to greater (if God feeds ravens, how much more you) invites trust.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 11:15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The word hēlikian can mean either 'stature' (height) or 'lifespan' (age). A cubit (pēchyn, roughly 18 inches) is absurd as an addition to height but makes more sense as a metaphor for a small unit of time added to one's life. Most modern interpreters prefer 'lifespan' — worrying cannot extend your life even slightly. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'no one.'
26. The word elachiston ('smallest, least, most trivial') frames extending one's life even slightly as the smallest imaginable accomplishment — and even that is beyond human power. The logical conclusion: if you cannot control the smallest thing, anxiety about larger matters is futile. This verse is unique to Luke.
27. The verb katanoēsate ('consider carefully, look closely at') invites sustained observation, not a glance. The lilies (krina) are likely wildflowers rather than cultivated lilies — common field flowers that require no human effort. The comparison with Solomon at the height of his royal splendor is hyperbolic and memorable: the most lavishly dressed king in Israel's history cannot match what grows wild in a field.
28. The dried grass and wildflowers were commonly used as fuel for bread ovens (klibanon) in Palestine. The contrast between their ephemeral existence (today alive, tomorrow fuel) and God's care for them makes the argument from lesser to greater even more powerful. The gentle rebuke oligopistoi ('you of little faith, you with small trust') appears four times in Matthew but only here in Luke. It implies that anxiety is a faith problem, not a planning problem.
29. The rare verb meteōrizethe ('do not be anxious, do not be in suspense, do not be tossed about') literally means 'to be raised up in the air' or 'to be suspended' — like a ship tossed on waves or a mind that cannot find solid ground. The image is of a person whose mind is constantly agitated, lifted and dropped by worry. This verb appears only here in the New Testament.
30. The phrase ta ethnē tou kosmou ('the nations of the world') refers to those who do not know God — their relentless pursuit of material security is understandable because they have no Father who provides. The disciples' situation is different: 'your Father knows' (hymōn ho patēr oiden) eliminates the need for anxious pursuit. Knowledge precedes provision — God knows before you ask.
31. Luke's shorter form — 'his kingdom' (tēn basileian autou) rather than Matthew's 'the kingdom of God and his righteousness' — focuses the command with singular clarity. The verb prostethēsetai ('will be added') implies that material provision comes as a byproduct of kingdom-seeking, not as a separate pursuit. The passive voice indicates God as the provider.
32. This verse, unique to Luke, is one of the most tender and reassuring sayings of Jesus. The diminutive 'little flock' (to mikron poimnion) acknowledges the disciples' smallness and vulnerability while the shepherd imagery implies Jesus's protective care. The verb eudokēsen ('has been pleased, has graciously decided') indicates that the kingdom is not earned by the flock's efforts but freely given by the Father's delight. The aorist tense suggests this decision has already been made.
33. The command to sell possessions (pōlēstate ta hyparchonta hymōn) is radical and specific to Luke's version. The metaphor shifts from earthly to heavenly economics: earthly purses (ballantia) wear out, but heavenly ones (mē palaïoumena, 'not growing old') endure. The word anekleipton ('unfailing, inexhaustible') describes a treasure that cannot be depleted. The threats of thief and moth represent loss through theft and slow decay — neither can touch heavenly investment.
34. This principle works in both directions: the heart follows the treasure, and where you invest reveals where your heart already is. The future tense estai ('will be') suggests that current investment decisions determine future heart orientation. This applies the rich fool's lesson positively: rather than storing up for yourself, invest in heaven and your heart will follow.
35. The image of girded loins (hai osphyes periezōsmenai) refers to tucking long robes into a belt for physical activity — the posture of a servant ready to work (cf. Exodus 12:11, Israel's posture at the first Passover). Combined with burning lamps, the image is of a household on alert, expecting the master's return at any moment.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 12:11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
36. The wedding feast (gamōn) could last days, making the master's return time genuinely uncertain. The verb analsē ('return, depart from') literally means 'to loose' or 'to break up' — to leave the feast. The emphasis on 'at once' (eutheōs) stresses instant readiness: no delay between knock and response. The parable envisions servants whose sole purpose is attentive waiting.
37. This verse contains one of the most astonishing reversals in Jesus's teaching. The master who returns does not sit down and demand service — he girds himself (perizōsetai, the servant's posture from v. 35) and serves his servants. This is a radical inversion of the master-servant relationship. The image anticipates Jesus washing the disciples' feet (John 13) and his self-description as 'one who serves' (Luke 22:27). The verb diakonēsei ('will serve, will minister') is the root of 'deacon.'

38. Luke uses the Jewish two-watch night system (second watch = roughly 10 PM to 2 AM; third watch = 2 AM to 6 AM) rather than the Roman four-watch system. The later the hour, the harder it is to stay awake, which increases the merit of readiness. The repeated 'blessed' (makarioi) reinforces that watchfulness itself is rewarded.
39. The metaphor shifts from master/servant to homeowner/thief. The word diorychthenai ('to be dug through') reflects first-century construction — mud-brick walls could be literally dug through by a burglar. The thief image for the Lord's return is deliberately jarring: Jesus comes like a thief only in the sense of unexpected timing, not in intent. The point is that unpredictability demands constant readiness.
40. The application identifies 'the master' and 'the thief' with the Son of Man — Jesus's preferred self-designation. The phrase hē hōra ou dokeite ('the hour you do not expect') makes the timing inherently unpredictable. Any attempt to calculate the moment is already a misunderstanding of the teaching: the point is perpetual readiness, not chronological calculation.
41. Peter's question is pragmatic: does this teaching about watchfulness apply only to the disciples (leaders) or to all followers? Jesus's answer (vv. 42-48) addresses both: it begins with the faithful steward (leadership responsibility) and ends with graduated accountability for all. Notably, Jesus never directly answers Peter's question — he tells another parable instead.
42. The word oikonomos ('steward, household manager') is the source of 'economy' — a steward managed the master's entire household. The sitometrion ('food ration, grain allowance') was the measured portion given to household servants at regular intervals. The steward's job is not to consume the master's resources but to distribute them faithfully. This parable addresses Peter's question by focusing on leadership responsibility.
43. The beatitude (makarios) rewards faithful action, not mere waiting. The participle poiounta ('doing') emphasizes ongoing activity — the blessed servant is found in the act of faithful service, not merely expecting the master's return.
44. The reward for faithful management of part is management of the whole. The promotion from household steward to manager of 'all possessions' (pasin tois hyparchousin autou) represents total trust. This principle of graduated authority — faithful in small things leads to responsibility for great things — runs throughout Jesus's parables (cf. 16:10, 19:17).
45. The internal reasoning ('says in his heart') mirrors the rich fool's self-dialogue. The servant's abuse of power takes two forms: violence against those under him (beating servants) and self-indulgence (eating, drinking, getting drunk). The perceived delay (chronizei, 'is taking a long time') becomes the excuse for both cruelty and excess. This is a warning to church leaders who exploit their position when accountability seems distant.
46. The verb dichotomēsei ('will cut in two, will cut to pieces') is shockingly violent — it may be literal (execution by bisection was practiced in the ancient world) or metaphorical for severe punishment. The phrase 'with the unfaithful' (meta tōn apistōn) — Luke's reading versus Matthew's 'hypocrites' — places the abusive steward among those who have no faith at all, the ultimate demotion from trusted insider to rejected outsider.
47. This verse begins a section unique to Luke that establishes the principle of graduated accountability. Knowledge increases responsibility: the servant who knew (gnous) the master's will and still disobeyed receives 'many blows' (darēsetai pollas, with plēgas implied). The double failure — neither preparing (hetoimasas) nor doing (poiasas) — covers both intention and action.
48. The principle of graduated accountability is stated twice: first negatively (more knowledge = more punishment for failure) and then positively in the famous maxim 'from everyone who has been given much, much will be required' (panti hō edothē poly, poly zētēthēsetai). The passive voices ('has been given,' 'has been entrusted') point to God as the giver. The progression from 'required' (zētēthēsetai) to 'demanded' (aitēsousin) intensifies the expectation.
49. This enigmatic saying is unique to Luke. The 'fire' (pyr) likely represents judgment, purification, or the crisis that Jesus's mission brings (cf. John the Baptist's prediction of fire-baptism, Luke 3:16). The phrase ti thelō ei ēdē anēphthē is debated — it could mean 'how I wish it were already burning!' (expressing eager anticipation) or 'what do I want, since it has already been kindled?' (acknowledging the process has begun). The former reading fits better with v. 50's longing.
50. The 'baptism' (baptisma) is a metaphor for his coming suffering and death — immersion in affliction (cf. Mark 10:38). The verb synechomai ('I am constrained, pressed, distressed') conveys intense inner pressure. The word telesthē ('be completed, be accomplished') echoes the cry from the cross: tetelestai ('it is finished,' John 19:30). Jesus experiences his approaching death not with resignation but with urgent tension — a desire for the crisis to come and be resolved.
51. Luke has 'division' (diameterismon) where Matthew 10:34 has 'a sword.' The word diameterismon ('division, separation, dissension') is more precise — the result of Jesus's coming is the splitting of communities and families along the fault line of faith. This saying appears to contradict the angels' announcement of 'peace on earth' (2:14), but the point is that the peace Jesus ultimately brings first creates a crisis of decision that divides.
52. The specific number five — an oddly precise detail — represents a typical household (parents, adult children, perhaps a grandparent or in-law). The uneven split (three versus two) means no neat halving — the division cuts irregularly through families, creating minority and majority factions within the same home.
53. The family relationships listed echo Micah 7:6, a prophetic text describing the breakdown of social order in the last days. Jesus applies this eschatological language to the present: the kingdom's arrival through his ministry is already creating the divisions that the prophets associated with the end times. The threefold pattern (father/son, mother/daughter, mother-in-law/daughter-in-law) covers three generations and both genders.
53. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Micah 7:6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

54. The weather signs are geographically specific to Palestine: clouds from the west (from the Mediterranean Sea) bring rain. Jesus uses familiar meteorological knowledge to expose a deeper failure of perception. The adverb eutheōs ('immediately') emphasizes how quickly people can read weather signs — the contrast with their inability to read 'the present time' (v. 56) is the point.
55. The south wind (noton) blew from the Negev desert and brought extreme heat (kausōn, 'burning heat, scorching wind'). These two weather patterns (western cloud = rain, southern wind = heat) were universally known in Palestine. The repeated kai ginetai ('and it happens') confirms their reliability as signs.
56. The address 'hypocrites' (hypokritai) returns to the chapter's opening theme (v. 1). The word kairon ('time, opportune moment, season') is distinct from chronos (mere chronological time) — kairos refers to a decisive moment pregnant with significance. Jesus's ministry is the kairos: the kingdom is arriving, judgment is approaching, and the crowds are as oblivious as a farmer who cannot read clouds. The verb dokimazein ('to test, to interpret, to discern') means to evaluate evidence and draw conclusions.
57. The phrase aph' heautōn ('from yourselves, on your own') implies that moral discernment should not require external prophetic signs — they have the capacity to judge what is right (to dikaion) if they would use it. This is a call to moral common sense, not just theological insight.
58. The parable functions as both practical legal advice and eschatological warning. The antidikos ('adversary, opponent in a lawsuit') represents those with claims against you. The phrase dos ergasian ('make an effort, do your best') urges proactive reconciliation before the matter reaches court. On the theological level: settle accounts before the final judgment, while there is still time. The chain of consequences (adversary magistrate judge officer prison) shows escalating severity that could have been avoided by early action.
59. The lepton ('penny, mite') was the smallest coin in circulation — worth about one-128th of a denarius. The double negative ou mē ('absolutely not, never') makes the sentence emphatic: escape is impossible until every fraction of the debt is paid. The warning reinforces the urgency of v. 58: settle now, because the consequences of inaction are total and inescapable.

Summary: Luke 13 opens with Jesus challenging the assumption that suffering indicates special sinfulness, using two contemporary tragedies — Pilate's massacre of Galilean worshipers and the collapse of the tower of Siloam — to call the entire nation to repentance. The parable of the barren fig tree extends the warning: Israel has been given one more season of grace. Jesus then heals a crippled woman on the Sabbath, provoking a confrontation with a synagogue ruler. The chapter continues with the parables of the mustard seed and leaven, followed by the sobering teaching about the narrow door. The chapter concludes with Jesus's defiance of Herod's threats and his lament over Jerusalem.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke 13 is uniquely Lukan in its opening section (vv. 1-9), which addresses theodicy — the question of why people suffer — with an answer that refuses the simplistic equation of suffering with personal sin. The healing of the bent-over woman (vv. 10-17) is unique to Luke and presents a woman who has been bound by Satan for eighteen years, framing illness as spiritual bondage and healing as liberation — a thoroughly Lukan emphasis. The lament over Jerusalem (vv. 34-35) is one of the most emotionally charged passages in the Gospels, revealing Jesus's grief over the city that kills its prophets.

Translation Friction: The historical incidents in vv. 1-5 (Pilate's massacre, the Siloam tower collapse) are not recorded outside Luke's Gospel but fit the known character of Pilate's brutal governance. The fig tree parable (vv. 6-9) raises questions about Israel's final chance — is the 'one more year' an offer of hope or a final warning? The narrow door saying (vv. 24-30) contains some of the most exclusive language in the Gospels, including 'I do not know where you come from' — a statement of relationship denial from the master, not merely ignorance.

Connections: The fig tree parable connects to Isaiah 5:1-7 (the Song of the Vineyard) and Micah 7:1. The Sabbath healing connects to Luke's pattern of Sabbath controversies (6:1-11, 14:1-6). The mustard seed and leaven parables parallel Matthew 13 and Mark 4. The narrow door teaching echoes Matthew 7:13-14 but with distinctive elements. The Jerusalem lament appears in Matthew 23:37-39 in a different narrative context. The Herod warning (vv. 31-33) is unique to Luke and continues the Herod thread from 9:7-9.

¹At that very time some people came and reported to him about the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mixed with their sacrifices. ²He answered them, "Do you think these Galileans were worse sinners than all other Galileans because they suffered these things? ³No, I tell you! But unless you repent, you will all perish in the same way. ⁴Or those eighteen on whom the tower in Siloam fell and killed them — do you think they were worse offenders than all the other people living in Jerusalem? ⁵No, I tell you! But unless you repent, you will all perish just as they did." ⁶Then he told this parable: "A man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard. He came looking for fruit on it and found none. ⁷He said to the gardener, 'Look, for three years now I have come looking for fruit on this fig tree and have found none. Cut it down! Why should it waste the soil?' ⁸But the gardener answered, 'Sir, leave it alone for one more year, until I dig around it and put on fertilizer. ⁹If it bears fruit next year, fine. But if not, you can cut it down.'" ¹⁰He was teaching in a synagogue on the Sabbath day. ¹¹A woman was there who had been disabled by a spirit for eighteen years. She was bent over and could not straighten up at all. ¹²When Jesus saw her, he called her over and said to her, "Woman, you are freed from your disability." ¹³Then he laid his hands on her, and immediately she straightened up and began glorifying God. ¹⁴But the synagogue ruler, indignant because Jesus had healed on the Sabbath, responded by saying to the crowd, "There are six days on which work should be done. Come on those days and be healed, and not on the Sabbath day." ¹⁵The Lord answered him, "Hypocrites! Does not each of you on the Sabbath untie his ox or donkey from the manger and lead it away to water it? ¹⁶Then should not this woman, a daughter of Abraham whom Satan has bound for eighteen long years, be released from this bondage on the Sabbath day?" ¹⁷When he said these things, all his opponents were put to shame, and the entire crowd rejoiced at all the glorious things being done by him. ¹⁸He said therefore, "What is the kingdom of God like, and what shall I compare it to? ¹⁹It is like a mustard seed that a man took and planted in his garden. It grew and became a tree, and the birds of the sky made nests in its branches." ²⁰Again he said, "What shall I compare the kingdom of God to? ²¹It is like leaven that a woman took and hid in three measures of flour until the whole batch was leavened." ²²He went through town after town and village after village, teaching as he made his way to Jerusalem. ²³Someone asked him, "Lord, are only a few being saved?" He said to them, ²⁴"Strive to enter through the narrow door, because many, I tell you, will try to enter and will not be able. ²⁵Once the master of the house gets up and shuts the door, you will stand outside knocking and saying, 'Lord, open to us!' But he will answer you, 'I do not know where you come from.' ²⁶Then you will begin to say, 'We ate and drank in your presence, and you taught in our streets.' ²⁷But he will say, 'I tell you, I do not know where you come from. Depart from me, all you workers of unrighteousness!' ²⁸There will be weeping and gnashing of teeth when you see Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, but you yourselves thrown out. ²⁹People will come from east and west, from north and south, and recline at the table in the kingdom of God. ³⁰And indeed, some who are last will be first, and some who are first will be last." ³¹At that same hour, some Pharisees came and said to him, "Get out and leave here, because Herod wants to kill you." ³²He said to them, "Go tell that fox, 'Look, I am casting out demons and performing healings today and tomorrow, and on the third day I will reach my goal.' ³³But I must keep going today, tomorrow, and the next day, because it is impossible for a prophet to perish outside Jerusalem. ³⁴"Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you — how often I have wanted to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, but you were not willing! ³⁵Look, your house is abandoned. I tell you, you will not see me until the time comes when you say, 'Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord!'"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This incident is unattested outside Luke but is consistent with Pilate's character as described by Josephus and Philo — he was notorious for violent suppression of perceived threats. The mixing of victims' blood 'with their sacrifices' (meta tōn thysiōn autōn) means Pilate's soldiers killed them in the act of offering temple sacrifices, a supreme desecration. The reporters likely expected Jesus to comment on the victims' sinfulness as an explanation for their fate.
2. Jesus directly challenges the assumption that suffering is proportional to sin (the retributive theology that Job's friends advocated). The comparative hamartōloi para pantas ('sinners beyond all') implies the question 'were they especially sinful?' Jesus's answer in the next verse is an emphatic no — but with a surprising turn.
3. Jesus refuses the theodicy question ('why did they suffer?') and redirects to repentance. The word homoiōs ('in the same way, likewise') is striking — it may mean 'similarly' (by violent, sudden death) rather than 'for the same reason.' Given that Jerusalem would be destroyed by Rome in AD 70, this warning may carry historical as well as spiritual weight. The verb metanoëte ('repent, change your mind and direction') is the fundamental demand of Jesus's ministry.
4. Jesus provides a second example, this time of accidental death rather than political violence, to make the same point from a different angle. The word opheiletai ('debtors, offenders, those who owe') frames sin as a debt — these eighteen did not owe God more than other Jerusalemites. The tower of Siloam was likely part of the construction project associated with the Pool of Siloam in southeast Jerusalem.

5. The repetition of the repentance call with the variant hōsautōs ('just as, in the same way') instead of homoiōs (v. 3) reinforces the universal application. The double example (political violence, accidental disaster) covers every category of unexpected death and strips away any excuse for complacency.
6. The parable is unique to Luke and extends the repentance theme. A fig tree in a vineyard was common in Palestine — the tree would benefit from the vineyard's cultivated soil. The owner's expectation of fruit is entirely reasonable. The fig tree in Old Testament prophecy often symbolizes Israel (Jeremiah 8:13, Hosea 9:10, Micah 7:1), and the vineyard itself is Israel's classic symbol (Isaiah 5:1-7).

6. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 5:1-7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
7. Three years represents a full probationary period — fig trees typically bear fruit within three years of planting. The verb katargei ('renders useless, wastes, makes unproductive') suggests the tree is not merely barren but actively depletes the soil of nutrients that could benefit other plants. The owner's frustration is justified: the tree is not just unproductive but counterproductive.
8. The gardener's intercession introduces a note of grace into a judgment parable. He does not argue the tree is healthy or that the owner is wrong — he asks for one more year (kai touto to etos, 'this year also') and promises intensive care: digging around the roots (skapsō, to aerate the soil) and adding kopria ('manure, fertilizer'). If the gardener represents Jesus or the prophetic mission, the plea is for one final period of intensive ministry before judgment falls.
9. The parable leaves the outcome open — the tree may yet bear fruit. The conditional structure (ean men... ei de mē ge) creates genuine suspense: the reprieve is real but not permanent. The verb ekkopseis ('you will cut it down') remains the default outcome if repentance (fruit) does not come. The parable thus offers both hope and warning: there is still time, but not unlimited time.
10. This is the last recorded instance of Jesus teaching in a synagogue in Luke's Gospel. The Sabbath setting establishes the context for the controversy that follows — healing on the Sabbath was a persistent flashpoint between Jesus and religious authorities (cf. 6:6-11, 14:1-6).
11. The phrase pneuma echousa astheneias ('having a spirit of weakness') attributes her condition to a spiritual cause, which Jesus later identifies as Satanic bondage (v. 16). The condition described — chronic severe kyphosis (forward curvature of the spine) — left her unable to look up. The eighteen years of suffering parallel the eighteen killed by the Siloam tower (v. 4), possibly an intentional literary connection.
12. Jesus initiates the encounter — the woman does not approach or ask for healing. The perfect passive apolelytai ('you have been freed, you are released') uses liberation language: the same verb is used for releasing prisoners. The tense indicates a completed action with continuing results — her freedom is already accomplished in Jesus's declaration, even before the physical touch in v. 13.
13. The laying on of hands (epethēken tas cheiras) is Jesus's characteristic healing gesture, conveying physical contact and personal compassion. The word parachrēma ('immediately, at once') is a favorite Lukan term for the instantaneous nature of Jesus's healings. The verb anōrthōthē ('was straightened, was restored to upright') is the physical reversal of her eighteen-year condition. Her response — glorifying God (edoxazen ton theon) — is the model response to divine healing in Luke's Gospel.
14. The synagogue ruler's anger (aganaktōn, 'being indignant, being outraged') is directed at the crowd rather than at Jesus directly — a passive-aggressive approach that avoids direct confrontation with a popular teacher. His reasoning is based on Exodus 20:9 (six days for work) and classifies healing as 'work' that violates Sabbath rest. The irony is devastating: he sees no urgency in liberating a woman who has been bound for eighteen years.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 20:9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. Jesus's argument is from lesser to greater (qal wahomer): if the Sabbath permits untying an animal from a manger for basic care, it certainly permits untying a human from eighteen years of bondage. The verb lyei ('untie, loose, release') deliberately echoes the liberation language of v. 12 (apolelytai) and v. 16 (lythēnai). The address 'hypocrites' (plural) indicts not just the synagogue ruler but all who share his reasoning.
16. The title 'daughter of Abraham' (thygatera Abraam) is remarkable — the parallel 'son of Abraham' is used for Zacchaeus (19:9), but this is the only place in the Gospels where a woman is called 'daughter of Abraham.' It affirms her full membership in the covenant community. The framing of her illness as Satanic bondage (edēsen ho satanas, 'Satan bound') connects healing to spiritual liberation — the Sabbath, a day of rest and freedom, is the perfect day to break Satan's chains. The word desmou ('bond, chain, imprisonment') makes the metaphor explicit.
17. The contrast between the opponents' shame (katēschynonto, 'were put to shame, were humiliated') and the crowd's joy (echairen) creates a split response. The adjective endoxois ('glorious, splendid, honorable') is applied to all of Jesus's works — not just this healing but the full pattern of his ministry. Luke presents Jesus's ministry as a source of public delight that his opponents cannot suppress.

18. The double question (tini homoia... tini homoiōsō) is a standard rabbinic formula for introducing a parable: 'to what shall I liken X?' The word oun ('therefore') connects these parables to the preceding healing — the kingdom of God is at work in the liberation of the bent-over woman, and these parables describe its nature.
19. The mustard seed (kokkō sinapeōs) was proverbially the smallest seed known to Palestinian agriculture. Luke says it was planted in a garden (kēpon) rather than a field (Mark's version), reflecting a Gentile horticultural context. The tree image with birds nesting in its branches alludes to Daniel 4:12 and Ezekiel 17:23, where a great tree sheltering birds represents a kingdom that provides refuge for many nations. The point is disproportionate growth: the kingdom begins insignificantly but becomes vast.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 4:12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Ezekiel 17:23. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. The repeated question introduces a second parable that complements the first. Where the mustard seed illustrates visible, external growth, the leaven illustrates invisible, internal transformation.
21. Three sata of flour is approximately forty pounds — enough bread for a large feast or community gathering (cf. Genesis 18:6, where Sarah uses this amount for divine visitors). The verb enekrypsen ('hid, concealed') emphasizes the leaven's invisibility — once mixed in, it disappears but transforms everything. Leaven usually carries negative associations in Jewish thought (corruption, sin), making Jesus's positive use of it provocative. The kingdom works like leaven: hidden, pervasive, and transformative from within.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 18:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. This travel notice reminds the reader of the journey framework established in 9:51. Luke periodically reorients the reader to the Jerusalem destination (cf. 9:51, 13:22, 17:11, 18:31, 19:11, 19:28). The phrase poreian poioumenos eis Ierousalēm ('making his journey toward Jerusalem') keeps the shadow of the cross over all the intervening teaching.
23. The question about the number of the saved (ei oligoi hoi sōzomenoi) was debated among Jewish teachers. Jesus characteristically refuses to answer the speculative question directly and instead issues a practical command — the issue is not how many will be saved but whether you will respond now.
24. The verb agōnizesthe ('strive, struggle, agonize, fight') is an athletic term — it describes the intense exertion of a competitor in a contest (the English 'agonize' comes from it). The 'narrow door' (stenēs thyras) suggests a door that requires effort and intentionality to pass through. The warning that many will 'seek' (zētēsousin) but 'not be able' (ouk ischysousin) implies that casual interest is insufficient — the door requires determined effort.
25. The image shifts from a narrow door to a closed door. The verb apokleisei ('shuts, locks') indicates finality — once locked, the door does not reopen. The phrase ouk oida hymas pothen este ('I do not know where you come from') is not a statement of ignorance but of non-recognition — the master refuses to acknowledge a relationship. This echoes Matthew 7:23's 'I never knew you.'
26. The claims offered — eating together and hearing his teaching — represent proximity without commitment. They have been near Jesus but have not entered through the narrow door of genuine discipleship. Luke's version (eating in his presence, hearing his street teaching) is more concrete than Matthew's (prophesying and casting out demons in his name), focusing on passive proximity rather than active ministry.
27. The repeated denial and the command to depart (apostēte ap' emou) echoes Psalm 6:8 (LXX). The phrase ergatai adikias ('workers of unrighteousness, practitioners of injustice') identifies the excluded not as strangers but as people whose lives were characterized by injustice — their proximity to Jesus did not translate into righteous living.
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 6:8. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. The 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' (klauthnos kai brygmōs tōn odontōn) is a fixed formula for the anguish of exclusion that appears six times in Matthew but only here in Luke. The particular torment is not physical pain but the sight of the patriarchs and prophets inside the kingdom while the self-assured are 'thrown out' (ekballomenous) — the verb for casting out demons is used for casting out the presumptuous.
29. The four compass points (anatolōn, dysmōn, borra, notou) represent universal inclusion — people from all directions, meaning all nations. The verb anakhthēsontai ('will recline at table') indicates the messianic banquet, a well-established Jewish image for the kingdom's fulfillment (cf. Isaiah 25:6-8). The irony is that those who considered themselves insiders (v. 26) are excluded while outsiders from every direction take their places.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 25:6-8. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. This great reversal saying summarizes the preceding teaching: those who assume priority (Israel's religious establishment) may find themselves displaced, while those considered last (Gentiles, sinners, the marginalized) may find themselves first. Luke's version is more balanced than some parallels — 'some' (eisin) in each category, not universal condemnation of 'the first' or universal elevation of 'the last.'
31. This episode is unique to Luke. Remarkably, it is Pharisees who warn Jesus — demonstrating that not all Pharisees were hostile (cf. Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea). Whether their warning was genuinely protective or an attempt to divert Jesus from his mission is debated. The threat from Herod Antipas continues the thread from 9:7-9.

32. Calling Herod 'that fox' (tē alōpeki tautē) is a pointed insult — in Jewish tradition, the fox was associated with cunning, destructiveness, and insignificance (as opposed to the lion's nobility and power). The phrase 'today and tomorrow and the third day' (sēmeron kai aurion kai tē tritē) is not a literal timetable but an idiom for 'a short, complete period.' The verb teleioumai ('I will be completed, I will reach my goal, I will be perfected') carries the sense of reaching the destined completion — the cross.
33. The word dei ('it is necessary, I must') again introduces divine necessity (cf. 9:22). The bitter irony of 'it is impossible for a prophet to perish outside Jerusalem' (ouk endechetai prophētēn apolesthai exō Ierousalēm) is devastating — Jerusalem, the holy city, is identified as the prophet-killing city. Herod cannot kill Jesus because that role belongs to Jerusalem. Jesus is not fleeing from death but walking toward it in the appointed place.
34. The double address 'Jerusalem, Jerusalem' echoes prophetic lament (cf. 'Martha, Martha' in 10:41; 'Simon, Simon' in 22:31). The hen image (ornis tēn heautēs nossian hypo tas pterygas) is strikingly maternal — Jesus expresses divine love through a mother-bird metaphor, echoing Deuteronomy 32:11 and Psalm 91:4, where God shelters Israel under protective wings. The tension between divine desire (ēthelēsa, 'I wanted') and human resistance (ouk ēthelēsate, 'you were not willing') preserves both God's initiative and human responsibility.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 32:11. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 91:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
35. The phrase 'your house' (ho oikos hymōn) likely refers to the temple, which is now 'abandoned' (aphietai, 'left, forsaken') — God's protective presence is departing. The SBLGNT does not include 'desolate' (erēmos), which appears in some manuscripts. The quotation from Psalm 118:26 ('Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord') will be fulfilled at the triumphal entry (Luke 19:38), though whether that fulfillment is genuine or ironic is debated. The statement 'you will not see me' frames Jesus's departure as both judgment and future hope.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Psalms 118:26 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.

Summary: Luke 14 takes place entirely at a Sabbath meal in the house of a prominent Pharisee, where Jesus heals a man with dropsy, then delivers a series of teachings on humility, hospitality, and the cost of following him. He tells the parable of the great banquet — where the invited guests refuse to come and the host fills the hall with the poor, the crippled, and outsiders from the highways. The chapter closes with three stark sayings about counting the cost of discipleship: the tower builder, the warring king, and the demand to renounce everything.

What Makes This Remarkable: The entire chapter is structured as a symposium — a Greco-Roman literary form in which teaching occurs at a banquet. Jesus subverts every expectation of the dinner party: he heals on the Sabbath (violating the host's assumptions), critiques the guests' jockeying for honor, instructs the host to invite the uninvitable, and tells a parable in which the original guests are replaced by social outcasts. The progression from table manners to radical discipleship is seamless — Luke presents following Jesus as a total social reorientation. The three 'cannot be my disciple' statements (vv. 26, 27, 33) are among the most demanding sayings in the Gospels.

Translation Friction: The healing of the man with dropsy (hydrops, fluid retention) on the Sabbath follows a pattern of Sabbath controversies in Luke (6:1-11; 13:10-17). Jesus's argument from the lesser to the greater (if you rescue a son or an ox, surely you can heal a person) assumes a shared ethical framework. The saying about hating father and mother (v. 26) uses miseō in its Semitic comparative sense — 'love less by comparison' — not as a command to feel hatred. The parable of the great banquet has a parallel in Matthew 22:1-14 but differs significantly in details.

Connections: The Sabbath healing connects to Luke 6:6-11 and 13:10-17. The banquet parable echoes Isaiah 25:6-8 (the messianic feast) and anticipates the eschatological meal themes of Luke 22. The cost-of-discipleship sayings connect to Luke 9:23-26 (taking up the cross) and 18:18-30 (the rich ruler). The 'salt' saying at the end parallels Mark 9:50 and Matthew 5:13.

1One Sabbath, when he went to eat at the house of a ruler of the Pharisees, they were watching him closely. 2And there in front of him was a man suffering from dropsy. 3Jesus responded to the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath, or not?" 4But they remained silent. So he took hold of the man, healed him, and sent him away. 5And he said to them, "Which of you, having a son or an ox that has fallen into a well, will not immediately pull him out on a Sabbath day?" 6And they could not reply to this. 7He told a parable to those who had been invited, when he noticed how they were choosing the places of honor, saying to them, ⁸"When you are invited by someone to a wedding feast, do not recline at the place of honor, in case someone more distinguished than you has been invited by him. ⁹Then the host who invited both of you will come and say to you, 'Give your place to this person,' and then in disgrace you will begin to take the lowest place. ¹⁰But when you are invited, go and recline at the lowest place, so that when the one who invited you comes, he will say to you, 'Friend, move up higher.' Then you will have honor in the presence of all who are reclining at the table with you. ¹¹For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and the one who humbles himself will be exalted." ¹²He also said to the one who had invited him, "When you give a lunch or a dinner, do not invite your friends or your brothers or your relatives or rich neighbors, so that they may not invite you in return and you be repaid. ¹³But when you give a feast, invite the poor, the crippled, the lame, and the blind. ¹⁴And you will be blessed, because they have nothing with which to repay you. For you will be repaid at the resurrection of the righteous." ¹⁵When one of those reclining at the table with him heard these things, he said to him, "Blessed is the one who will eat bread in the kingdom of God!" ¹⁶But he said to him, "A man once gave a great banquet and invited many. ¹⁷At the time of the banquet, he sent his servant to say to those who had been invited, 'Come, for everything is now ready.' ¹⁸But they all alike began to make excuses. The first said to him, 'I have bought a field, and I must go out and see it. Please have me excused.' ¹⁹Another said, 'I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I am going to examine them. Please have me excused.' ²⁰And therefore I cannot come, another said, I have married a wife. ²¹So the servant came and reported these things to his master. Then the master of the house became angry and said to his servant, 'Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in the poor and crippled and blind and lame.' ²²And the servant said, 'Sir, what you commanded has been done, and still there is room.' ²³Then the master said to the servant, 'Go out to the roads and hedgerows and compel them to come in, so that my house may be filled. ²⁴For I tell you, none of those men who were invited will taste my banquet.'" ²⁵Now large crowds were traveling with him, and he turned and said to them, ²⁶"If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and sisters, yes, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple. ²⁷Whoever does not carry his own cross and come after me cannot be my disciple. ²⁸For which of you, wanting to build a tower, does not first sit down and calculate the cost, to see whether he has enough to complete it? ²⁹Otherwise, when he has laid a foundation and is not able to finish, all who see it will begin to mock him, ³⁰And was not able to finish, and declared, This man began to build. ³¹Or what king, going out to encounter another king in war, will not first sit down and deliberate whether he is able with ten thousand to meet the one who comes against him with twenty thousand? ³²If not, while the other is still far away, he sends a delegation and asks for terms of peace. ³³So therefore, any of you who does not renounce all that he has cannot be my disciple. ³⁴"Salt is good, but if even salt has lost its taste, with what will it be seasoned? ³⁵It is of no use either for the soil or for the manure pile. It is thrown away. The one who has ears to hear, let him hear."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase paraterēmenoi auton ('watching him closely') carries the sense of hostile surveillance. The Sabbath meal was a formal occasion, and Jesus's presence at a Pharisee's table shows that he maintained social engagement with his critics even while challenging them. The 'ruler of the Pharisees' (archontōn tōn Pharisaion) was likely a synagogue leader who belonged to the Pharisaic party.
2. Hydrops (δρωπικός, 'dropsical') refers to edema — abnormal fluid retention causing visible swelling. This is the only occurrence of this condition in the New Testament. Whether the man was a guest or was placed there as a test is left ambiguous by Luke.
3. Jesus takes the initiative, addressing the tension directly. The nomikoi ('lawyers, experts in the Torah') and Pharisaioi ('Pharisees') represent the religious establishment's interpretive authority. The question forces them to articulate their position openly rather than hiding behind passive observation.
4. Their silence (hēsychasan) is telling — they cannot say healing is unlawful without appearing callous, nor can they affirm it without conceding Jesus's point. Jesus acts physically (epilabomenos, 'taking hold of') and then releases the man, removing him from the charged atmosphere.
5. The SBLGNT reads huios ('son') rather than onos ('donkey') — a textual variant with significant implications. If 'son,' the argument moves from human compassion; if 'donkey,' from animal husbandry. Either way, the qal wahomer ('lesser to greater') reasoning is clear: if emergency rescue is permissible, how much more healing? The Sabbath debates assume that saving life overrides Sabbath rest.

6. The verb antapokrithēnai ('to answer back, respond in opposition') implies they had no counter-argument. Jesus's logic has left them unable to defend their position without contradicting their own practice.
7. The prōtoklisias ('first couches, places of honor') were the reclining positions nearest the host at a formal meal. Jockeying for these positions was a visible display of social ambition. Jesus observes the behavior and uses it as a teaching occasion — the parable arises from direct observation of human vanity.
8. The wedding feast (gamous) setting raises the social stakes — weddings were the most public and hierarchical of ancient meals. The verb katakliths ('recline') reflects the ancient practice of reclining on couches rather than sitting at tables. The advice echoes Proverbs 25:6-7.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Proverbs 25:6-7 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The public humiliation (meta aischnēs, 'with shame') of being demoted would be devastating in an honor-shame culture. The scenario is socially realistic — hosts managed seating hierarchies carefully, and miscalculating one's status had real consequences.
10. The strategy of deliberate self-lowering leads to public elevation — a pattern that mirrors the theological principle stated in the next verse. The address 'Friend' (Phile) adds warmth to the public honor. The word doxa ('glory, honor') is the same used for God's glory — here applied to social standing, but pointing toward a deeper reality.
11. This axiom appears multiple times in Luke (1:52; 18:14) and throughout the Gospels. The passive voice ('will be humbled... will be exalted') is the divine passive — God is the implied agent. What appears as social advice becomes a statement about God's eschatological reversal of human hierarchies.
12. Jesus now turns from the guests to the host. The four categories — friends, brothers, relatives, rich neighbors — represent the entire network of reciprocal obligation in ancient Mediterranean society. The verb antikalessōsin ('invite in return') and the noun antapodoma ('repayment') expose the economy of social exchange: hospitality given to peers is an investment, not generosity.
13. The four categories — poor, crippled, lame, blind — are the same groups who will fill the banquet hall in the parable that follows (v. 21). These are people who cannot reciprocate, making the invitation pure grace. In the Qumran community (Dead Sea Scrolls), these same groups were explicitly excluded from the messianic banquet; Jesus inverts that exclusion.
14. The promise of repayment at 'the resurrection of the righteous' (tē anastasei tōn dikaiōn) shifts the reward from social reciprocity to eschatological recompense. The Pharisees believed in resurrection (unlike the Sadducees), so this appeal meets them on their own theological ground. True generosity is not unrewarded — it is rewarded by God, not by social peers.
15. This exclamation, perhaps pious but self-satisfied, triggers the parable of the great banquet. The speaker assumes he will be among those eating at the messianic feast. Jesus's parable will challenge exactly that assumption — the originally invited guests may find themselves excluded.
16. The 'great banquet' (deipnon mega) evokes the messianic feast of Isaiah 25:6. In ancient practice, a formal banquet involved two invitations: the initial announcement and a second summons when the meal was ready. The 'many' (pollous) who are invited represent Israel, the covenant people.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 25:6. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The second summons ('Come, for everything is now ready') represents the present moment of Jesus's ministry — the kingdom feast is being prepared and the invitation is going out. The single servant (doulon, 'slave') contrasts with Matthew's version, which has multiple servants.
18. The phrase apo mias ('with one accord, unanimously') emphasizes the collective nature of the refusal. The excuse is transparently absurd — no one buys a field without first inspecting it. The polite formula 'have me excused' (eche me parētimenon) masks the insult of rejecting a prepared feast.
19. Five yoke of oxen (ten animals) represents significant wealth — this is a man of means. Again, the excuse is implausible: one tests oxen before purchasing. The pattern of three excuses follows the rule of three in ancient storytelling.
20. This third excuse echoes Deuteronomy 24:5, where a newly married man is exempt from military service for one year. But a banquet is not military service, and this excuse — the most blunt of the three, without even asking to be excused — reveals that the refusals escalate in rudeness. Property, possessions, and family relationships all become obstacles to accepting the invitation.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 24:5 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The master's anger (orgistheis) is justified — to refuse a prepared banquet was a grave social insult. The four groups summoned — poor, crippled, blind, lame — are the same groups from verse 13, now given narrative embodiment. These are the people who cannot repay the invitation, making this the feast of pure grace that Jesus commanded.
22. The report that 'still there is room' (eti topos estin) is theologically charged — the feast has capacity for more. God's banquet is not a zero-sum table. The inclusion of the marginalized does not fill the hall to capacity; grace expands to accommodate all who will come.
23. The movement extends beyond the city to 'roads and hedgerows' (hodos kai phragmous) — the places where travelers and the homeless would be found. The verb anankason ('compel, urge strongly') does not imply violence but the insistence needed to overcome the resistance of those who would never imagine themselves invited to such a feast. This second sending likely represents the Gentile mission.

24. The shift from 'his' banquet to 'my' banquet (mou tou deipnou) is striking — the master of the parable speaks in a way that bleeds into Jesus's own voice. The exclusion is self-imposed: the original guests chose not to come. The door remains open to the unexpected guests who did accept.
25. The scene shifts from the Pharisee's house to the open road. Jesus 'turned' (strapheis) — a deliberate, confrontational gesture directed at those who were following casually. What follows are the most stringent discipleship demands in the Gospels.
26. The verb misēi ('hate') must be understood in its Semitic sense of 'love less by comparison' (cf. Genesis 29:31, where Leah is 'hated' meaning 'less loved'; Malachi 1:2-3). Matthew's parallel (10:37) clarifies: 'loves father or mother more than me.' The demand is not emotional hostility but absolute priority — when loyalties conflict, Jesus claims first allegiance over every human bond, including self-preservation (tēn psychēn heautou, 'his own life/soul').
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 29:31. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Malachi 1:2-3. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The stauros ('cross') was not a religious symbol in Jesus's time but an instrument of Roman execution — the most shameful and painful death available. To 'carry one's cross' meant to walk to one's own execution. The image would have been shocking and literal for Jesus's audience. This is the second 'cannot be my disciple' statement.
28. The tower (pyrgon) could be a farm watchtower or a defensive structure. The verb psēphizei ('calculate, count with pebbles') gives us the concept of 'counting the cost.' Jesus is not discouraging discipleship but demanding informed commitment — the parable warns against starting what one cannot finish.
29. The abandoned foundation becomes a permanent monument to failed ambition. The verb empaizein ('to mock, ridicule') carries the sting of public shame — the same word used for the mocking of Jesus at his trial (Luke 22:63; 23:11).
30. The mockers' words are devastating in their simplicity. The verb ērxato ('began') paired with ouk ischysen ('was not able') creates a stark contrast between aspiration and failure.
31. The second parable escalates from personal construction to national warfare. The odds are two-to-one against — the question is whether the king can realistically prevail. Like the tower builder, the king must assess his resources before committing. The parallel to discipleship is clear: following Jesus is a total commitment with opposition guaranteed.
32. The word presbeian ('delegation, embassy') is the root of 'presbyter' and 'ambassador.' The wise king who cannot win negotiates — but Jesus does not offer a negotiation option for discipleship. The parable's logic demands total commitment because there is no middle ground with God.
33. The third 'cannot be my disciple' statement specifies the cost: apotassetai pasin tois heautou hyparchousin ('renounce all his own possessions'). The verb apotassomai means 'to say farewell to, take leave of, renounce.' This is not merely spiritual detachment but literal willingness to release everything. Luke's Gospel consistently highlights the danger of wealth (6:20-26; 12:13-21; 16:19-31; 18:18-25).
34. The salt saying (also in Matthew 5:13 and Mark 9:50) serves as a warning metaphor following the discipleship demands. Salt that has lost its saltiness (mōranthē, literally 'become foolish' — the same root as 'moron') is useless. A disciple who will not pay the cost is like flavorless salt — purposeless. Chemically, pure sodium chloride cannot lose its salinity, but the impure salt from the Dead Sea region could leach and lose effectiveness.
35. Useless salt cannot even serve as fertilizer (eis gēn, 'for the land') or as a catalyst in a compost heap (eis koprian, 'for the manure pile'). It has absolutely no remaining function. The chapter closes with the same formula that concluded the Sower parable in chapter 8: 'The one who has ears to hear, let him hear' — an urgent call to active listening and obedience.

Summary: Luke 15 is the Lost Chapter — three parables of loss, search, and joyful recovery, told in response to Pharisees and scribes who grumble that Jesus 'welcomes sinners and eats with them.' A shepherd leaves ninety-nine sheep to find one lost lamb. A woman tears her house apart to find one lost coin. A father watches the horizon for a son who squandered his inheritance in a far country. Each parable culminates in extravagant celebration, and together they form Jesus's most sustained defense of his scandalous welcome of outcasts. The Parable of the Prodigal Son (15:11-32) is widely regarded as the greatest short story ever told — a narrative that moves from ruin to restoration, from death to life, and closes with an unanswered question to the older brother standing outside the party.

What Makes This Remarkable: The three parables form a deliberate progression: a shepherd (male, outdoors, one of a hundred), a woman (female, indoors, one of ten), and a father (domestic, one of two). The ratio of lost to found intensifies — one percent, ten percent, fifty percent — making the stakes increasingly personal. The Prodigal Son parable is unique to Luke and contains some of the most psychologically complex characterization in ancient literature. The father's running (v. 20) would have been considered undignified for an elder in Middle Eastern culture — a deliberate humiliation undertaken for love. The older brother's refusal to enter the feast mirrors the Pharisees' refusal to celebrate Jesus's ministry to sinners. The parable has no resolution: we never learn whether the older brother enters.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'righteous persons who need no repentance' (v. 7) may be ironic — Jesus may be describing the Pharisees as they see themselves rather than as they truly are. The younger son's descent to feeding pigs (v. 15) represents the ultimate defilement for a Jewish audience, as pigs were unclean animals. The 'far country' (chōran makran) symbolizes moral and spiritual distance from the father. The father's statement 'this son of mine was dead and is alive again' (v. 24) uses resurrection language for a spiritual restoration — the same death-to-life pattern that defines Christian conversion.

Connections: The parables respond to the Pharisees' complaint in verse 2, which echoes Luke 5:30 and 19:7. The joy-in-heaven theme connects to Luke 10:20. The Prodigal Son anticipates the Zacchaeus story (19:1-10) and Jesus's declaration that 'the Son of Man came to seek and save the lost' (19:10). The father's compassion (splanchnistheis, v. 20) uses the same word applied to Jesus in Luke 7:13. The older brother's anger mirrors Jonah's anger at God's mercy toward Nineveh (Jonah 4).

¹Now all the tax collectors and sinners were drawing near to him to hear him. ²And the Pharisees and the scribes were grumbling, saying, "This man receives sinners and eats with them." ³So he told them this parable: ⁴"What man among you, having a hundred sheep and losing one of them, does not leave the ninety-nine in the open country and go after the one that is lost until he finds it? ⁵Rejoicing, when he has found it, he layeth it on his shoulders. ⁶Rejoice with me, when he comes home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, and declared to them. For I have found my sheep which was lost. ⁷I tell you, in the same way there will be more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents than over ninety-nine righteous persons who need no repentance. ⁸"Or what woman, having ten silver coins, if she loses one coin, does not light a lamp and sweep the house and search carefully until she finds it? ⁹And when she has found it, she calls together her friends and neighbors, saying, 'Rejoice with me, for I have found the coin that I had lost!' ¹⁰In the same way, I tell you, there is joy before the angels of God over one sinner who repents." ¹¹And he said, "A man had two sons. ¹²The younger of them said to his father, 'Father, give me the share of the property that is coming to me.' So he divided his livelihood between them. ¹³Not many days later, the younger son gathered everything together and traveled to a distant country, and there he squandered his property in dissolute living. ¹⁴When he had spent everything, a severe famine arose in that country, and he began to be in need. ¹⁵So he went and hired himself out to one of the citizens of that country, who sent him into his fields to feed pigs. ¹⁶And he was longing to be fed with the carob pods that the pigs ate, and no one gave him anything. ¹⁷But when he came to himself, he said, 'How many of my father's hired servants have more than enough bread, but I am perishing here with hunger! ¹⁸I will get up and go to my father, and I will say to him, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you. ¹⁹I am no longer worthy to be called your son. Treat me as one of your hired servants.'" ²⁰And he got up and came to his father. But while he was still a long way off, his father saw him and was moved with compassion, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him. ²¹Then the son said to him, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you. I am no longer worthy to be called your son.' ²²But the father said to his servants, 'Quickly, bring out the best robe and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand and sandals on his feet. ²³And bring the fattened calf and slaughter it, and let us eat and celebrate. ²⁴For this son of mine was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found!' And they began to celebrate. ²⁵He heard musick and dancing, and now his elder son was in the field — and as he arrived and drew nigh to the house. ²⁶And asked what these things meant, and he called one of the servants. ²⁷The servant said to him, 'Your brother has come, and your father has slaughtered the fattened calf, because he has received him back safe and sound.' ²⁸But he was angry and refused to go in. His father came out and was pleading with him, ²⁹He answering said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve you, neither transgressed I at any time your commandment — and yet you never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends:. ³⁰But when this son of yours came, who has devoured your livelihood with prostitutes, you slaughtered the fattened calf for him!' ³¹But he said to him, 'Child, you are always with me, and everything that is mine is yours. ³²But it was necessary to celebrate and be glad, because this brother of yours was dead and is alive, and was lost and is found.'"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word pantes ('all') is hyperbolic but emphasizes that Jesus attracted the very people the religious establishment avoided. 'Tax collectors' (telōnai) were despised as collaborators with Rome and assumed to be corrupt. 'Sinners' (hamartōloi) was a catch-all term for those who did not observe the Torah as the Pharisees defined it. That they came 'to hear him' (akouein autou) shows they were drawn to his message, not merely his miracles.
2. The verb diegongyzon ('were grumbling') echoes Israel's grumbling in the wilderness (Exodus 16:7-8; Numbers 14:27) — Luke draws a deliberate parallel between the Pharisees and rebellious Israel. Table fellowship (synesthiein, 'eats with') in ancient Judaism implied acceptance and equality; eating with sinners was not merely socializing but a theological statement. This complaint provides the occasion for all three parables that follow.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 16:7-8. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Numbers 14:27. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. Luke introduces all three stories as one parable (tēn parabolēn tautēn, singular), suggesting they form a unified literary whole — three variations on one theme of loss, search, and celebration.
4. The opening 'What man among you' (tis anthrōpos ex hymōn) invites the audience to place themselves in the shepherd's role. The expected answer is 'Of course you would go.' Leaving ninety-nine in the erēmō ('wilderness, open country') is risky — the argument is that the lost sheep's value justifies the risk. A hundred sheep represented substantial wealth in first-century Palestine.
5. The image of the shepherd carrying the sheep on his shoulders (epi tous ōmous) became one of the earliest Christian artistic motifs. The lost sheep does not walk back on its own — the shepherd carries it. The participle chairōn ('rejoicing') is emphatic: this is not dutiful retrieval but exuberant recovery. The image echoes Isaiah 40:11 and Ezekiel 34:11-16, where God himself is the shepherd who seeks the lost.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 40:11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Ezekiel 34:11-16 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The verb syncharēte ('rejoice together with') demands communal celebration — joy over recovery cannot be experienced alone. This detail sets up the application in verse 7: heaven itself celebrates communally over one repentant sinner. The shepherd does not scold the sheep; he throws a party.
7. The phrase 'righteous persons who need no repentance' (dikaiois hoitines ou chreian echousin metanoias) may be gently ironic — Jesus may be describing the Pharisees as they perceive themselves. Alternatively, it may acknowledge genuinely faithful people while insisting that recovery of the lost produces a particular kind of joy. The word metanoēō ('to repent, change one's mind') involves a complete reorientation of life, not merely feeling sorry.
8. The drachma was a Greek silver coin roughly equivalent to a day's wage. Ten drachmas may represent her entire savings, or they may have been sewn into a headband worn as a marriage token (similar to coins on a Palestinian bridal headdress). Losing one-tenth of her wealth warrants a thorough search. The lamp, sweeping, and diligent searching reflect the dark, windowless interior of a typical Palestinian peasant home with a packed-earth floor.
9. The exact same pattern as the shepherd's celebration: communal joy over recovery. The feminine forms (tas philas kai geitonas, 'her female friends and neighbors') reflect the social world of women in a gender-segregated society. Jesus's willingness to cast God in a female role (a woman searching for what is precious) is remarkable in its cultural context.
10. The phrase 'joy before the angels' (chara enōpion tōn angelōn) is a reverential circumlocution — the joy is God's own, expressed 'in the presence of his angels. This second application reinforces the first: heaven's economy values the recovery of the lost above all else.
11. The opening is deceptively simple. 'Two sons' immediately signals a story about contrasting responses — a familiar pattern in the Hebrew Bible (Cain/Abel, Esau/Jacob, Joseph and his brothers). The father, not either son, is the central character — some scholars prefer the title 'The Parable of the Prodigal Father' (prodigal in the sense of extravagantly generous).
12. The request is culturally outrageous — asking for one's inheritance while the father is still alive is tantamount to wishing the father dead. Under Jewish law (Deuteronomy 21:17), the younger son would receive one-third of the estate. The father's compliance (dieilen, 'he divided') without argument or rebuke is the first sign of his extraordinary character. The word bion ('livelihood, means of living') emphasizes that the father is giving away his actual resources, not merely liquid assets.

12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Deuteronomy 21:17. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The phrase chōran makran ('distant country') represents both geographic and spiritual distance from the father. The adverb asōtōs ('dissolutely, wastefully') gives us the English word 'prodigal' — it means reckless extravagance. The verb dieskorpisen ('scattered, squandered') is vivid: he did not merely spend his inheritance but scattered it like seed on barren ground.
14. The convergence of personal bankruptcy and natural disaster creates complete destitution. The verb hystereisthai ('to be in need, lack, fall short') is the same word Paul uses for the human condition in Romans 3:23 ('all have sinned and fall short'). The son's self-inflicted poverty is compounded by circumstances beyond his control.
15. The verb ekollēthē ('joined himself to, attached himself to') suggests desperation rather than genuine employment — he clung to this foreigner for survival. For a Jewish audience, feeding pigs (choirous) represents the absolute nadir of defilement. Pigs were unclean (Leviticus 11:7), and tending them placed the son in daily contact with what the Torah forbade. He has reached the furthest possible point from his father's house.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 11:7 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The keratia ('carob pods') were used as animal feed — long, dark pods from the carob tree, sometimes called 'St. John's bread.' The son is now lower than the pigs: they eat while he goes hungry. The phrase 'no one gave him anything' (oudeis edidou autō) underscores his total abandonment — in the far country, there is no community, no compassion, no father.
17. The phrase eis heauton elthōn ('coming to himself') is a turning point — it implies he had been 'beside himself,' alienated from his true identity. This is the moment of self-awareness that precedes repentance. His reasoning is initially pragmatic rather than spiritual: the hired servants (misthioi, day laborers with no family status) eat better than he does. Whether his motive is genuine contrition or strategic self-interest, the movement toward the father begins.
18. The verb anastas ('rising up') is the same root as 'resurrection' (anastasis) — the son's return begins with rising from his degradation. His prepared speech echoes David's confession in Psalm 51:4 ('Against you, you only, have I sinned'). 'Against heaven' (eis ton ouranon) is a reverential circumlocution for 'against God' — the sin is not merely against the father but against the divine order.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalm 51:4 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The son's planned demotion from son to hired servant (misthios) shows he understands he has forfeited his status. A hired servant had no family rights but received wages and food. The son's self-assessment is accurate — he has squandered everything — but the father's response will overturn this calculation entirely.
20. This is the emotional center of the parable. That the father 'saw him while still far off' implies he had been watching — scanning the road, waiting. The verb esplanchnisthē ('was moved with compassion') describes a visceral, gut-level response (from splanchna, 'intestines, inward parts'). The father's running (dramōn) would have required him to lift his robes, exposing his legs — an act considered deeply undignified for an elder in Middle Eastern culture. He humiliates himself to reach his son before the village can shame him. The verb katephilēsen ('kissed fervently, kissed repeatedly') is intensive — not a formal greeting but an outpouring of affection.
21. The son delivers his rehearsed speech (from vv. 18-19) but never gets to finish — the crucial last line ('make me as one of your hired servants') is cut off by the father's instructions to the servants. The father does not allow the demotion to be spoken. The confession is received; the proposed terms are overridden by grace.
22. Every item is a symbol of restored sonship, not servanthood. The 'best robe' (stolēn tēn prōtēn, literally 'the first robe') is the father's own finest garment — clothing him in the father's honor. The ring (daktylion) signifies authority, likely a signet ring used for sealing documents and transacting business. The sandals (hypodēmata) distinguish a free son from a slave, who went barefoot. The father does not negotiate or set conditions — he restores fully and immediately.
23. The 'fattened calf' (ton moschon ton siteuton) was grain-fed and reserved for the most significant occasions — its slaughter would feed the entire village. This is not a private family meal but a community feast, paralleling the communal celebrations of the lost sheep and lost coin parables. The verb euphranthōmen ('let us celebrate, be glad') is the same word used in the Septuagint for feasting in God's presence.
24. The father uses resurrection language: nekros ēn kai anezēsen ('was dead and has come alive'). The son's departure was a kind of death; his return is a kind of resurrection. The parallel 'lost and found' (apolōlōs kai heurethē) connects this parable to the lost sheep and lost coin — all three stories culminate in the same recovery and the same celebration. The verb ērξαντο ('they began') implies the celebration is just getting started — setting up the older brother's arrival.
25. The older son enters the story for the first time, and he enters from the outside — he has been working in the field, dutifully serving his father. The symphōnias ('music,' literally 'sounds together') and chorōn ('dancing') indicate a major celebration. He approaches the party as an outsider, which is precisely the Pharisees' position relative to Jesus's welcome of sinners.
26. That the older son must ask a servant what is happening reveals his emotional distance from his father's household — he is physically present but relationally absent. The verb epynthaneto ('was inquiring') is in the imperfect, suggesting ongoing questioning.

- 27. The servant's report is matter-of-fact: 'your brother' (ho adelphos sou) and 'your father' (ho patēr sou) — family language that the older son will shortly reject. The word hygiainonta ('healthy, safe and sound') is the root of 'hygiene' — the father is celebrating not just the son's return but his physical survival.
- 28. The older son's anger (ōrgisthē) and refusal to enter parallels the Pharisees' anger at Jesus's table fellowship with sinners. His refusal to enter is as much an insult as the younger son's departure — in both cases, a son rejects the father's household. And in both cases, the father goes out: he ran to meet the younger son, and now he comes out to plead with the older. The verb parekalei ('was pleading, urging, entreating') is in the imperfect — sustained, patient appeal.
- 29. The older son's complaint reveals a servile mentality: douleuō soi ('I have slaved for you') — he sees himself as a servant, not a son. He has obeyed commands (entolēn, 'commandment') but missed the relationship. The contrast between a young goat (eriphon, the cheapest animal for a feast) and the fattened calf underscores his sense of injustice. His complaint is factually plausible but spiritually blind — he has had access to everything his father owned (v. 31) and never realized it.
- 30. The older son refuses to say 'my brother,' using instead the distancing 'this son of yours' (ho huios sou houtos) — a deliberate disowning. He adds the detail 'with prostitutes' (meta pornōn), which the narrative never mentioned — he either knows more than the story tells or is embellishing to strengthen his case. The verb kataphagōn ('devoured, consumed') is contemptuous. His resentment is directed as much at the father's generosity as at the brother's sin.
- 31. The father's response begins with teknon ('child') — an intimate, affectionate address. The statement 'you are always with me' (sy pantote met' emou ei) is both reassurance and gentle rebuke: the older son has always had access to the father's presence and possessions but has experienced neither as gift. 'Everything that is mine is yours' (panta ta ema sa estin) is a staggering declaration — the father withholds nothing. The older son's poverty is not material but relational.
- 32. The father gently corrects the older son's language: where the son said 'this son of yours' (v. 30), the father says 'this brother of yours' (ho adelphos sou houtos) — insisting on the fraternal bond. The verb edei ('it was necessary') carries divine compulsion — the celebration is not optional but morally required by the nature of what has happened. The parable ends without resolution: we do not know whether the older brother enters the feast. The open ending forces the Pharisees — and every reader — to decide: will you join the celebration or remain outside in your resentment? The repeated death-to-life, lost-to-found formula seals the chapter's theology: God's joy over the recovery of the lost is the heartbeat of the kingdom.

Summary: Luke 16 contains two of Jesus's most provocative teachings about wealth. The Parable of the Shrewd Manager (16:1-13) presents a dishonest steward who, facing termination, reduces his master's debtors' bills to secure future friendships — and is commended for his shrewdness. Jesus draws the paradoxical lesson that worldly people are more strategic than 'children of light' and urges his followers to use wealth to gain eternal friends. A series of sayings on faithfulness, the impossibility of serving both God and money, and the enduring authority of the Law follows. The chapter culminates in the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (16:19-31), where a wealthy man who ignored a beggar at his gate finds their positions reversed in the afterlife — and Abraham refuses to send a warning to the rich man's brothers, declaring that Moses and the Prophets are sufficient.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The Parable of the Shrewd Manager is perhaps the most debated parable in the Gospels. Jesus appears to commend dishonesty, but the commendation is for shrewdness (phronimōs), not for the fraud itself — the steward's cleverness in using present resources to secure a future relationship becomes an analogy for how disciples should use material wealth to secure eternal outcomes. The Rich Man and Lazarus is the only parable in which a character is named (Lazarus), and it provides the most detailed picture of the afterlife in Jesus's teaching. The rich man is never condemned for a specific sin — his offense is indifference to suffering at his own gate. The final line ('neither will they be convinced even if someone rises from the dead') is deeply ironic in light of Jesus's own resurrection and the continued unbelief it met.*

Translation Friction: *The Shrewd Manager parable's moral logic has troubled interpreters for centuries. The manager may have been removing his own commission from the bills (making his action honest), or he may have been canceling usurious interest forbidden by Torah (making his action just), or he may simply be a rogue whose worldly cleverness Jesus repurposes as a spiritual lesson. We render the Greek as given and let the translator notes present the interpretive options. The word 'Hades' (hadēs) in verse 23 is the Greek equivalent of Hebrew Sheol — the realm of the dead — not the later Christian concept of hell. The 'great chasm' (chasma mega) is unique to this passage.*

Connections: The Shrewd Manager continues Luke's sustained focus on wealth and discipleship (12:13-34; 14:33; 18:18-30; 19:1-10). The Pharisees' love of money (v. 14) connects to their role throughout Luke as opponents who misunderstand the kingdom. The Rich Man and Lazarus echoes the Magnificat's reversal theme (1:52-53) and the Beatitudes/Woes of 6:20-26. Abraham's refusal to send Lazarus back foreshadows the resurrection appearances and the persistent unbelief of Acts. The 'Law and Prophets' (v. 16) connects to Luke 24:27, 44.

¹He also said to his disciples, "There was a rich man who had a manager, and this manager was reported to him as squandering his possessions. ²So he called him and said to him, 'What is this I hear about you? Turn in the account of your management, for you can no longer be manager.' ³The manager said to himself, 'What shall I do, since my master is taking the management away from me? I am not strong enough to dig, and I am ashamed to beg. ⁴I know what I will do, so that when I am removed from the management, people will receive me into their homes.' ⁵So, summoning his master's debtors one by one, he said to the first, 'How much do you owe my master?' ⁶He said, 'A hundred measures of olive oil.' He said to him, 'Take your bill, sit down quickly, and write fifty.' ⁷Then he said to another, 'And how much do you owe?' He said, 'A hundred measures of wheat.' He said to him, 'Take your bill and write eighty.' ⁸The master commended the dishonest manager because he had acted shrewdly. For the children of this age are more shrewd in dealing with their own generation than the children of light. ⁹And I tell you, make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous wealth, so that when it fails, they may receive you into the eternal dwellings. ¹⁰The one who is faithful in a very little is also faithful in much, and the one who is dishonest in a very little is also dishonest in much. ¹¹If then you have not been faithful with unrighteous wealth, who will entrust to you the true riches? ¹²And if you have not been faithful with what belongs to another, who will give you what is your own? ¹³No servant can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and money." ¹⁴The Pharisees, who were lovers of money, heard all these things, and they ridiculed him. ¹⁵He said to them, "You are those who justify yourselves before people, but God knows your hearts. For what is exalted among people is an abomination in the sight of God. ¹⁶The Law and the Prophets were until John; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is being proclaimed, and everyone is urged forcefully into it. ¹⁷But it is easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one stroke of a letter of the Law to fall. ¹⁸Everyone who divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery, and the one who marries a woman divorced from her husband commits adultery. ¹⁹"There e was a rich man who was clothed in purple and fine linen, feasting sumptuously every day. ²⁰And a poor man named Lazarus was laid at his gate, covered with sores, ²¹Longing to be nourished with the scraps that fell from the rich man's table — moreover the dogs arrived and licked his sores. ²²The poor man died and was carried by the angels to Abraham's side. The rich man also died and was buried. ²³And in Hades, being in torment, he lifted up his eyes and saw Abraham far off, and Lazarus at his side. ²⁴And he called out, 'Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus to dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue, for I am in anguish in this flame.' ²⁵But Abraham said, 'Child, remember that you received your good things during your life, and Lazarus likewise bad things. But now he is comforted here, and you are in anguish. ²⁶And besides all this, between us and you a great chasm has been fixed, so that those who want to cross from here to you cannot, nor can anyone cross from there to us.' ²⁷He said, 'Then I beg you, father, to send him to my father's house, ²⁸For I have five brothers and sisters. That he may testify to them, lest they also come into this location of torment. ²⁹But Abraham said, 'They have Moses and the Prophets; let them listen to them.' ³⁰He said, 'No, father Abraham, but if someone goes to them from the dead, they will repent.' ³¹He said to him, 'If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be convinced even if someone rises from the dead.'"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The oikonomos ('manager, steward') was responsible for administering the master's estate — a position of significant trust and authority. The verb diaskorpizōn ('squandering, scattering') is the same word used for the prodigal son's waste in 15:13, creating a verbal link between the two parables. The passive dieblēthē ('was reported, was accused') does not confirm whether the accusation was true.
2. The demand apodos ton logon ('give the account, render the reckoning') uses commercial language for a financial audit. The phrase ou dynē eti oikonomein ('you are no longer able to manage') is a termination notice. The manager is given a brief window to close the books — a window he will exploit.

3. The internal monologue (eipen en heautō, 'said within himself') parallels the prodigal son's self-reflection in 15:17. The manager's self-assessment is brutally honest: he cannot do manual labor (skaptein, 'to dig') and will not beg (epaitein). He is a white-collar worker facing unemployment with no fallback skills. His dilemma forces the creative — if ethically questionable — solution that follows.
4. The verb egnōn ('I know, I have realized') marks the eureka moment. His strategy is to create a network of obligation: by reducing the debtors' bills, he will have friends who owe him favors when he loses his position. The phrase dexōntai me eis tous oikous autōn ('they will receive me into their houses') will be echoed in verse 9 with 'eternal dwellings.'
5. The chreopheiletōn ('debtors') were likely tenant farmers or merchants who owed the master commodities as rent or payment. The manager acts individually with each debtor (hena hekaston, 'one by one'), creating personal obligation rather than a collective arrangement.
6. A batos was approximately eight to nine gallons; a hundred batous of olive oil was a substantial debt — roughly 800-900 gallons, the yield of about 150 olive trees. The reduction of fifty percent is enormous. The urgency (tacheōs, 'quickly') reflects the need to act before the termination takes effect. Whether the reduction represents the manager's commission, the master's usurious interest, or outright fraud is debated.
7. A koros was approximately ten to twelve bushels; a hundred koroi of wheat equaled roughly 1,000-1,200 bushels — a very large commercial quantity. The reduction here is only twenty percent, compared to fifty percent for the oil. The different percentages may reflect different commission rates or interest structures on different commodities.
8. The crucial question: does 'the master' (ho kyrios) refer to the rich man in the parable or to Jesus? Most interpreters read it as the rich man, who grudgingly admires the manager's cleverness even though it cost him money. The commendation is for phronimōs ('shrewdly, wisely') — strategic thinking about the future — not for the dishonesty (adikias). The contrast between 'children of this age' (huiōi tou aiōnos toutou) and 'children of light' (huiōus tou phōtos) is a wisdom observation: worldly people invest more strategic effort in their temporal futures than God's people invest in their eternal ones.
9. Jesus now applies the parable. The mamōna tēs adikias ('mammon of unrighteousness') is Aramaic mammon ('wealth, property') modified by a genitive of quality — 'wealth characterized by its worldly nature.' The instruction is: use material resources to build relationships that have eternal significance. The 'eternal dwellings' (aiōnious skēnas, literally 'eternal tents') contrast with the temporary shelters of this life. The identity of 'they' (dexōntai) is debated — the poor who benefit from generosity, the angels, or God himself.
10. This proverb establishes the principle that character is consistent across scale. Small responsibilities reveal the character that will govern large ones. The adjective elachistō ('very little, least') applied to wealth frames material possessions as the smallest arena of faithfulness — preparation for greater spiritual responsibilities.
11. The contrast between adikō mamōna ('unrighteous wealth') and to alēthinon ('the true, genuine thing') is sharp. Material wealth is not the 'real' treasure — it is a test, a proving ground. Failure in this lesser arena disqualifies one from receiving the greater spiritual treasure. The question format (tis hymin pisteusei, 'who will entrust to you?') implies God as the one who evaluates and entrusts.
12. The word allotriō ('another's, belonging to someone else') reframes all material wealth as borrowed — it belongs to God, and humans are stewards, not owners. The 'your own' (to hymeteron) refers to spiritual inheritance that becomes genuinely one's own. The implication is radical: everything material is on loan; only the spiritual treasure is truly yours.
13. Luke adds oiketēs ('household servant') to the saying found also in Matthew 6:24. The word douleuein ('to serve as a slave') implies total ownership — a slave cannot divide loyalty. The personification of mamōna as a competing kyrios ('master') is the climax of the wealth teaching: money is not neutral but a power that demands allegiance. The final statement is absolute: ou dynasthe ('you are not able') — this is not a recommendation but a declaration of impossibility.
14. Luke's editorial comment — philargyroi ('lovers of money,' literally 'lovers of silver') — is pointed. The verb exemyktērizon ('ridiculed, sneered at,' literally 'turned up their noses') suggests contemptuous dismissal. Their mockery reveals that Jesus's teaching about wealth has struck a nerve.
15. The phrase dikaious tes heautous ('justifying yourselves') means constructing a public reputation of righteousness. The word bdelygma ('abomination') is the strongest term of revulsion in biblical Greek — the same word used for the 'abomination of desolation' in Daniel 9:27 and Mark 13:14. What humans celebrate (wealth, status, prestige), God may find detestable. The reversal is total.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 9:27 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. This compressed saying divides salvation history: the era of 'the Law and the Prophets' extends to John the Baptist, after which the kingdom of God is actively proclaimed. The verb biazetai is ambiguous — it can mean 'everyone forces their way in' (middle voice) or 'everyone is being urged/pressed in' (passive). We render the passive sense, which fits Luke's theology of God's initiative, but the middle sense ('everyone is pressing into it eagerly') is also possible.
17. The keraia ('horn, stroke, serif') refers to the tiny decorative marks distinguishing similar Hebrew letters (such as beth and kaph). Jesus affirms the Law's enduring authority in the strongest possible terms — the cosmos will dissolve before the smallest detail of Torah fails. This statement prevents the previous verse from being read as abrogation of the Law.
18. This saying, placed between statements about the Law's permanence and the Rich Man and Lazarus parable, may serve as a concrete example of the Law's enduring moral authority. The prohibition is absolute in Luke's version — no exception clause appears as in Matthew 19:9. The verb moicheuei ('commits adultery') applies to both scenarios.

- 19. The porphyran ('purple') was the most expensive dye in the ancient world, extracted from murex sea snails. The bysson ('fine linen') was imported Egyptian fabric. Together they represent extreme luxury. The phrase euphrainomenos kath' hēmeran lamprōs ('celebrating splendidly every day') means his entire life was one continuous feast — while Lazarus starved at his gate. The rich man is traditionally called 'Dives' (Latin for 'rich'), but the text never names him.
- 20. Lazarus (Lazaros) is the Greek form of the Hebrew Eleazar ('God helps') — the name itself is ironic, as no human helps him. He is the only named character in any of Jesus's parables, which may suggest a historical basis or may serve to personalize the poor man in contrast to the unnamed rich man. The passive ebeblēto ('had been placed, was lying') suggests he was too weak to position himself. The pylōna ('gate, entrance') implies a large, wealthy estate.
- 21. The parallel with the prodigal son's hunger is deliberate (epithymōn chortasthēnai, 'longing to be fed' — cf. 15:16). But whereas the prodigal chose his degradation, Lazarus's suffering is involuntary. The dogs (kynes) are unclean street scavengers, not pets — their licking adds humiliation to misery. Whether Lazarus actually received the fallen scraps is left unclear; the text says he 'longed' for them.
- 22. The contrast in death is stark: Lazarus is escorted by angels to 'Abraham's bosom' (ton kolpon Abraam) — the place of honor at the patriarchal feast, the position of the beloved guest reclining next to the host. The rich man simply 'died and was buried' (etaphē) — his funeral was presumably grand, but no angels attend him. The reversal from their earthly conditions has begun.
- 23. The Greek hadēs corresponds to the Hebrew Sheol — the realm of the dead, not the later Christian concept of hell as a place of final punishment. In Jewish thought of this period, Hades contained both the righteous and the unrighteous in separate compartments. The rich man can see Abraham and Lazarus but cannot cross to them — proximity without access. The word basanois ('torments') originally referred to a touchstone for testing metals, then came to mean torture or torment.
- 24. Even in Hades, the rich man treats Lazarus as a servant to be dispatched on errands — 'send Lazarus' (pempson Lazaron). He has learned Lazarus's name (he always knew who was at his gate) but has not grasped the reversal. The request for a finger-dip of water is pathetically minimal, measuring the depth of his suffering. The address 'Father Abraham' claims covenant identity — he considers himself Abraham's heir despite his behavior.
- 25. Abraham addresses him as teknon ('child') — acknowledging the covenant relationship while denying the request. The principle is reversal: ta agatha sou ('your good things') in life are spent; Lazarus's suffering is now compensated. The verb parakaleitai ('is comforted') is the same root as paraklētos ('comforter, advocate'). The reversal echoes the Beatitudes and Woes of Luke 6:20-26.
- 26. The chasma mega ('great chasm') represents the irreversible finality of the afterlife condition. The perfect passive estēriktai ('has been fixed, established') indicates a permanent divine arrangement, not a temporary boundary. The impossibility of crossing in either direction means there is no post-mortem remedy — choices made in life determine one's eternal state.
- 27. The rich man's second request is to send Lazarus as a messenger — still treating him as an errand-runner. But the request also reveals that the rich man now understands something he failed to grasp in life: his choices had consequences, and his brothers are making the same ones.
- 28. The five brothers suggest a large, wealthy family. The verb diamartyrētai ('warn, solemnly testify') is a compound verb intensifying the urgency. The 'place of torment' (topon touton tēs basanou) is the first time the rich man names his location. His compassion for his brothers, absent for Lazarus in life, arrives too late.
- 29. Abraham's response is that the existing revelation — the Torah ('Moses') and the Prophets — is sufficient. The Hebrew Scriptures already command justice for the poor, generosity to the needy, and compassion for the suffering (Deuteronomy 15:7-11; Isaiah 58:6-7; Amos 2:6-7). No additional supernatural sign is needed. The imperative akousatōsan ('let them hear, let them listen') echoes the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:4) and the repeated refrain 'let him hear' from the parables.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 15:7-11. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 58:6-7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Amos 2:6-7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 6:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. The rich man contradicts Abraham — ouchi ('No!') — insisting that a supernatural visitor from the dead would succeed where Scripture has failed. His assumption is that the problem is insufficient evidence, not hardness of heart. The verb metanoēsousin ('they will repent') is confident but mistaken, as the next verse will make clear.
- 31. Abraham's final word is devastating in its irony. The verb anastē ('rises,' from anistēmi, the standard word for resurrection) points beyond the parable to Jesus's own resurrection — and the fact that many still did not believe even after it occurred (cf. Acts 4:1-2; 17:32). The verb peisthēsontai ('they will be convinced, persuaded') suggests that the problem is not evidence but willingness. Those who ignore the witness of Scripture will not be moved by miracles. The parable ends on this note of solemn warning: no sign can substitute for listening to what God has already spoken.

Summary: Luke 17 contains a collection of Jesus's teachings on stumbling blocks, forgiveness, faith, and duty, followed by the healing of ten lepers (only the Samaritan returns to give thanks), and a discourse on the coming of the kingdom of God. Jesus teaches that the kingdom does not come with observable signs but is 'in your midst,' then warns of the sudden, visible nature of the Son of Man's coming, comparing it to the days of Noah and Lot.

What Makes This Remarkable: The healing of the ten lepers is unique to Luke and highlights his recurring theme of Samaritan faithfulness contrasted with Jewish ingratitude. The phrase 'the kingdom of God is among you' (entos hymōn) is one of the most debated sayings in the Gospels — does it mean 'within you' (interior/spiritual) or 'in your midst' (present in Jesus's person)? The discourse on the Son of Man's coming blends language from Daniel 7 with flood and fire imagery from Genesis, creating an eschatological tapestry that resists neat systematization.

Translation Friction: Verse 21's entos hymōn is genuinely ambiguous — 'within you' and 'in your midst' are both linguistically defensible. We render 'in your midst' as the more contextually appropriate reading (Jesus is addressing Pharisees, to whom 'within you' seems unlikely), but note the alternative. The servant parable in verses 7-10 uses the language of slavery, which we render transparently.

Connections: The ten lepers narrative connects to 2 Kings 5 (Naaman the Syrian leper) — another foreigner healed when Israelites were not. The Noah and Lot comparisons draw from Genesis 6-7 and 19. The 'days of the Son of Man' language echoes Daniel 7:13-14. The faith-as-mustard-seed saying appears also in Matthew 17:20, though in a different context.

¹He said to his disciples, "It is inevitable that causes of stumbling will come, but woe to the one through whom they come. ²It would be better for him if a millstone were hung around his neck and he were thrown into the sea than for him to cause one of these little ones to stumble. ³Watch yourselves. If your brother sins, rebuke him, and if he repents, forgive him. ⁴Even if he sins against you seven times in a day, and seven times turns back to you saying, 'I repent,' you must forgive him." ⁵The apostles said to the Lord, "Increase our faith!" ⁶The Lord said, "If you had faith like a mustard seed, you could say to this mulberry tree, 'Be uprooted and planted in the sea,' and it would obey you. ⁷"Which of you, having a slave who is plowing or tending sheep, would say to him when he comes in from the field, 'Come at once and recline at the table'? ⁸Instead, would he not say to him, 'Prepare something for me to eat, and dress yourself for service and wait on me while I eat and drink; after that, you may eat and drink'? ⁹Does he thank the slave because he did what was commanded? ¹⁰So you also, when you have done everything you were commanded, say, 'We are unworthy slaves; we have only done what was our duty.'" ¹¹While traveling to Jerusalem, Jesus passed along the border between Samaria and Galilee. ¹²As he entered a village, ten men with a skin disease met him. They stood at a distance ¹³They raised up their voices, and stated, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. ¹⁴When he saw them, he said, "Go and show yourselves to the priests." And as they went, they were cleansed. ¹⁵One of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, praising God in a loud voice. ¹⁶He fell facedown at Jesus's feet, thanking him — and he was a Samaritan. ¹⁷Jesus responded, "Were not all ten cleansed? Where are the other nine? ¹⁸Was no one found to return and give glory to God except this foreigner?" ¹⁹Then he said to him, "Get up and go on your way. Your faith has saved you." ²⁰When asked by the Pharisees when the kingdom of God would come, Jesus answered them, "The kingdom of God does not come with signs to be observed. ²¹Nor will people say, 'Look, here it is!' or 'There it is!' For the kingdom of God is in your midst." ²²Then he said to the disciples, "The days are coming when you will long to see one of the days of the Son of Man, and you will not see it. ²³People will say to you, 'Look, there!' or 'Look, here!' Do not go out or chase after them. ²⁴For just as lightning flashes and lights up the sky from one end to the other, so will the Son of Man be in his day. ²⁵And he rejected of this generation, and but first must he suffer many things. ²⁶Just as it was in the days of Noah, so it will be in the days of the Son of Man. ²⁷They were eating, drinking, marrying, and being given in marriage, up to the day Noah entered the ark. Then the flood came and destroyed them all. ²⁸It was the same in the days of Lot: they were eating, drinking, buying, selling, planting, and building. ²⁹But on the day Lot left Sodom, fire and sulfur rained from heaven and destroyed them all. ³

◦It will be just like this on the day the Son of Man is revealed. ³¹On that day, the one who is on the housetop with his belongings in the house must not go down to get them. Likewise, the one who is in the field must not turn back. ³²Remember what happened to Lot's wife. ³³Whoever seeks to preserve his life will lose it, and whoever loses his life will keep it alive. ³⁴I tell you, on that night two will be in one bed; one will be taken and the other left. ³⁵Two women will be grinding grain together; one will be taken and the other left. ³⁶Two will be in the field; one will be taken and the other left." ³⁷They asked him, "Where, Lord?" He said to them, "Where the body is, there the vultures will gather."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Greek anendekton ('impossible not to happen, inevitable') is stronger than a mere prediction — it acknowledges the fallen reality of the world. The word skandala ('stumbling blocks, snares') refers to anything that causes someone to fall away from faith, not merely 'offenses' in the modern sense.
2. The lithos mylikos ('millstone') refers to the large upper stone of a donkey-driven mill — heavy enough to guarantee drowning. The 'little ones' (mikrōn) likely refers to new or vulnerable believers, not only children. The hyperbolic comparison — drowning is preferable to leading others astray — underscores the gravity of spiritual harm.
3. The Greek prosechete heautois ('watch yourselves, be on guard') shifts the focus from the one who causes stumbling to the disciples' own responsibility. The verb epitimēson ('rebuke') carries the sense of a corrective confrontation, not mere criticism. The sequence — rebuke, repentance, forgiveness — presents reconciliation as a structured process, not an automatic response.
4. The number 'seven' (heptakis) represents completeness and fullness in biblical numerology — the point is not a literal count but an unlimited willingness to forgive. The verb epistrepō ('turns back') carries the same turning/returning imagery as the Hebrew teshuvah. The command aphēseis ('you will forgive') is a future indicative used as an imperative, making forgiveness not optional but obligatory.
5. This is one of only six times Luke uses the term apostoloi ('apostles') rather than mathētai ('disciples') during the ministry narrative. Their request reveals that they recognize the demands of verses 3-4 as exceeding their current capacity. The verb prosthes ('add to, increase') suggests they view faith as something quantifiable — a misunderstanding Jesus corrects in the next verse.
6. The sykaminō ('mulberry tree') is distinct from the sykomorea ('sycamore-fig') of 19:4. Luke's version uses a mulberry tree rather than Matthew's mountain (17:20), but the point is identical: the issue is not the quantity of faith but its genuine presence. A mustard seed (kokkon sinapeōs) was proverbially the smallest seed known in Palestine. The conditional ei echete ('if you had') is a contrary-to-fact condition, implying they do not yet possess even this minimal faith.
7. The Greek doulos means 'slave,' not merely 'servant' — the parable depends on the absolute obligation of a slave to his master. The verb anapese ('recline') refers to the Greco-Roman dining posture of reclining on a couch, the standard position for meals in Jesus's context.
8. The verb perizōsamenos ('having girded yourself') refers to tucking up the outer garment into a belt for active work — a practical preparation for serving. The sequence is clear: the master's needs come first, the slave's needs second. This is not an endorsement of slavery but a parable using a familiar social structure to make a theological point about duty.
9. The expected answer is 'no.' The Greek charin echei ('have gratitude toward') implies that obedience to clear commands does not earn special recognition. The KJV's 'I trow not' is an addition — the Greek simply asks the rhetorical question and moves on.
10. The word achreioi ('unworthy, useless, unprofitable') is striking — Jesus instructs his followers to consider themselves 'useless' even after full obedience. This counters any theology of merit: complete obedience is the baseline, not an achievement deserving reward. The verb ōpheilomen ('we were obligated') frames service as debt, not generosity.
11. The phrase dia meson Samareias kai Galilaias ('through the middle of Samaria and Galilee') is geographically unusual — traveling south to Jerusalem, one would pass through Galilee first, then Samaria. 'Along the border between' captures the sense that Jesus was traveling the boundary region where the two territories met, which is the most coherent geographical reading.
12. The Greek leproi ('lepers') covers a range of skin conditions beyond what modern medicine calls leprosy (Hansen's disease). Levitical law (Leviticus 13-14) required those with such conditions to remain isolated. Their standing 'at a distance' (porrōthen) reflects the social and ritual separation required by the Torah.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 13-14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The title epistata ('master, commander') is used exclusively in Luke among the Gospels and always by disciples or those seeking help — it implies recognized authority. Their loud cry from a distance reflects both their desperation and the physical separation their condition imposed.
14. The command to show themselves to the priests follows the Levitical procedure for certifying a healed skin condition (Leviticus 14:1-32). The healing occurs en route — 'as they went' (en tō hypagein) — requiring them to act in faith before seeing results. This is the only mass healing of lepers recorded in the Gospels.

14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Leviticus 14:1-32. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The verb hypestrepsen ('turned back, returned') contrasts with the obedient departure of the nine — this one interrupts his journey to the priest in order to give thanks. His loud praise (phōnēs megalēs, 'great voice') echoes the loud cry of verse 13, transforming a plea for mercy into a shout of gratitude.
16. Luke delays the revelation that the man is a Samaritēs ('Samaritan') until the end of the verse for dramatic effect. The Samaritans were despised by Jews as religious and ethnic outsiders (cf. John 4:9). The posture — falling on his face at Jesus's feet — is the posture of worship. The verb eucharistōn ('giving thanks') is the root of 'Eucharist,' linking gratitude to the deepest form of worship.
17. Jesus's two rhetorical questions expose the ingratitude of the nine — they received healing but did not return to give glory to God. The verb ekatharisthēsan ('were cleansed') recalls the Levitical language of ritual purification, connecting physical healing with spiritual restoration.
18. The word allogēnēs ('foreigner, one of another race') is a loaded term — it was inscribed on the warning stones in the Jerusalem temple prohibiting non-Jews from entering the inner courts. Jesus uses it to highlight the irony: the one deemed unfit for God's temple is the only one who returns to glorify God.
19. The phrase hē pistis sou sesōken se ('your faith has saved you') uses sōzō, which means both 'to heal' and 'to save.' All ten were cleansed (katharizō, v. 14), but only this one is 'saved' (sōzō). Luke distinguishes between physical healing (which all ten received) and the deeper salvation that comes through faith and gratitude. This same phrase appears in 7:50 (the sinful woman) and 8:48 (the hemorrhaging woman).
20. The word paratērseōs ('observation, watching') suggests watching for visible, datable signs — the kind of apocalyptic timetable the Pharisees were seeking. Jesus rejects the premise: the kingdom cannot be tracked like a military campaign or astronomical event.
21. The phrase entos hymōn estin is one of the most debated in the Gospels. Entos can mean 'within' (interior, spiritual) or 'among/in the midst of' (present in the community). Since Jesus is addressing Pharisees hostile to his message, 'within you' seems unlikely as a commendation of their spiritual state. 'In your midst' better captures the idea that the kingdom is present in Jesus's own person and activity, standing right before them whether they recognize it or not. The alternative reading 'within you' is noted for completeness.
22. Jesus shifts from addressing the Pharisees to the disciples. The phrase 'one of the days of the Son of Man' is unusual — it may mean 'even a single day' of the messianic age, suggesting a period of absence or suffering during which the disciples will yearn for his visible presence. The title 'Son of Man' (huios tou anthrōpou) draws from Daniel 7:13.
22. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 7:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
23. The warning against following false messianic claims echoes the Pharisees' question in verse 20. The verbs apelthēte ('go out') and diōxēte ('pursue, chase') suggest an active and potentially dangerous quest that Jesus forbids.
24. The simile of lightning (astrapē) makes two points: the Son of Man's coming will be sudden (no time to prepare) and universally visible (no need to search for it). This directly answers both the Pharisees' question about timing and the warning against localized messianic claims. Some manuscripts omit 'in his day' (en tē hēmera autou), but the SBLGNT retains it.
25. The word dei ('it is necessary, must') indicates divine necessity — the suffering is not accidental but part of God's plan. The verb apodokimasthēnai ('to be rejected after examination') implies a deliberate evaluation and verdict: this generation examines Jesus and officially declares him unfit. This passion prediction interrupts the eschatological discourse to anchor future glory in present suffering.
26. The comparison to Noah's days (Genesis 6-7) emphasizes not the wickedness of that generation but their obliviousness — they were living normally, unaware of impending judgment. The Greek Nōe is the Septuagint spelling of the Hebrew Noah.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 6-7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The four imperfect verbs (ēsthion, epinon, egamoun, egamizonto) describe ongoing, routine activities — the emphasis is on normalcy, not depravity. The shift to the aorist 'came' (ēlthen) and 'destroyed' (apōlesen) marks the sudden, decisive interruption of judgment. The kibōton ('ark, chest') is the same word used for the ark of the covenant in the Septuagint.
28. The Lot comparison (unique to Luke's version) adds commercial and agricultural activities to the list — buying, selling, planting, building. These are not sinful activities but routine preoccupations that blinded people to coming judgment. Six imperfect verbs create a rhythm of uninterrupted normalcy.
29. The reference is to Genesis 19:24-25. The Greek theion ('sulfur, brimstone') combined with fire from heaven represents total divine judgment. As with Noah, the transition from imperfect (routine activity) to aorist (sudden destruction) is abrupt and decisive.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 19:24-25. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. The verb apokalypsetai ('is revealed') is a present tense used for future certainty. The passive voice implies that God is the one doing the revealing — the Son of Man does not simply appear but is unveiled by divine action. This is the theological climax of the Noah-Lot comparison.

31. The flat rooftops of Palestinian houses were used as living and working spaces, accessed by an external staircase. The instruction not to go back inside emphasizes the urgency and suddenness of the coming judgment. The parallel with Lot's escape (Genesis 19:17, 'Do not look back') is explicit.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 19:17. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The shortest verse in this discourse — three words in Greek (mnēmoneuete tēs gynaikos Lōt). Lot's wife looked back at Sodom and became a pillar of salt (Genesis 19:26). She serves as the paradigmatic example of attachment to what is being left behind. The imperative 'remember' (mnēmoneuete) is plural, addressed to all disciples.
32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 19:26. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
33. The Greek psychē means both 'life' and 'soul,' creating a deliberate double meaning. The verb peripoiēsasthai ('to preserve, to acquire for oneself') suggests self-protective hoarding. The contrasting verb zōgonēsei ('will give life to, will keep alive') is vivid — it means to generate life, to bring to life. The paradox: grasping at life kills it; releasing it generates it.
34. The Greek does not specify 'men' — the masculine form is generic, and the reference to sharing a bed could apply to any two people in a household. The verbs paralēmphthēsetai ('will be taken') and aphethēsetai ('will be left') are both passive — the agent of separation is not specified, leaving the meaning deliberately open: taken in judgment or taken in rescue? The text does not resolve this.
35. The participle alēthousai ('grinding') is feminine, so 'women' is explicit in the Greek here. Grinding grain with a hand mill was a daily domestic task typically done by women. The imagery pairs with the previous verse: whether in rest (bed) or work (grinding), the separation is sudden and total.
36. This verse is absent from many early manuscripts and is likely assimilated from Matthew 24:40. The SBLGNT includes it in brackets. We include it here following the SBLGNT text but note its disputed status. The pattern of three pairs (bed, mill, field) creates a comprehensive picture: judgment reaches into every sphere of life.
37. The Greek aetoi can mean either 'eagles' or 'vultures.' Since eagles do not typically feed on carrion while vultures do, and the saying describes gathering around a corpse (sōma, 'body'), 'vultures' is the more accurate zoological rendering. The proverb is enigmatic — it may mean that judgment, like vultures, finds its target inevitably, or that the signs of the end will be as unmistakable as vultures circling over death. Jesus answers the 'where' question with a riddle rather than a map coordinate.

Summary: Luke 18 opens with two parables on prayer — the persistent widow and the unjust judge, followed by the Pharisee and the tax collector — then moves through Jesus's teaching on children and the kingdom, the encounter with the rich ruler, a third passion prediction, and the healing of a blind man near Jericho. The chapter traces a thematic arc from persistent, humble prayer to radical surrender of wealth and status, culminating in faith-driven healing.

What Makes This Remarkable: The parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (unique to Luke) is a masterclass in reversal: the righteous man leaves unjustified while the sinner goes home right with God. The rich ruler episode reveals that salvation is 'impossible' for humans but 'possible with God' — a statement that redefines the entire framework of religious achievement. Peter's question about the disciples' own sacrifice and Jesus's response promise both present-age restoration and eternal life.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'justified rather than the other' (v. 14) uses dikaiōtheis in a way that anticipates Pauline theology — we render it without importing later theological systems. The 'camel through the eye of a needle' (v. 25) is rendered literally; we do not adopt the later medieval legend about a small gate called 'The Needle's Eye,' as there is no historical evidence for it.

Connections: The persistent widow connects to the eschatological discourse of chapter 17 — God will vindicate his elect. The Pharisee-tax collector parable connects to Luke's programmatic concern with reversal (1:52-53, 14:11, 16:15). The rich ruler parallels Mark 10:17-31 and Matthew 19:16-30. The blind man's healing (paralleling Mark 10:46-52) serves as the final healing miracle before the Jerusalem entry.

¹Then Jesus told them a parable about their need to pray always and not give up, ²Declaring, There was in a city a pass judgment on, which feared not God, neither regarded man. ³There was a widow in that city, and she kept coming to him, saying, 'Grant me justice against my adversary.' ⁴For a time he refused. But afterward he said to himself, 'Even though I do not fear God or respect anyone, ⁵Yet because this widow troubles me, I will give justice to her, so that not by her continual coming she wear out me. ⁶And the Lord said, "Listen to what the unjust judge says. ⁷Will not God bring about justice for his chosen ones, who cry out to him day and night? Will he keep putting them off? ⁸I tell you, he will bring about justice for them quickly. But when the Son of Man comes, will he find faith on the earth?" ⁹He also told this parable to some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and looked down on everyone else: ¹⁰"Two men went up to the temple to pray, one a Pharisee and the other a tax collector. ¹¹The Pharisee stood and prayed about himself: 'God, I thank you that I am not like other people — swindlers, the unjust, adulterers — or even like this tax collector. ¹²I fast twice a week; I give a tenth of everything I acquire.' ¹³But the tax collector, standing far off, would not even lift his eyes toward heaven, but beat his chest, saying, 'God, be merciful to me, a sinner!' ¹⁴I tell you, this man went home justified rather than the other. For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and the one who humbles himself will be exalted." ¹⁵People were also bringing infants to him so that he might touch them. When the disciples saw this, they rebuked them. ¹⁶But Jesus called them to himself, saying, "Let the children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of God belongs to such as these. ¹⁷Truly I tell you, whoever does not receive the kingdom of God like a child will never enter it." ¹⁸A certain ruler asked him, "Good Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" ¹⁹Jesus said to him, "Why do you call me good? No one is good except God alone. ²⁰You know the commandments: 'Do not commit adultery, do not murder, do not steal, do not bear false witness, honor your father and mother.'" ²¹He said, "I have kept all these since my youth." ²²When Jesus heard this, he said to him, "You still lack one thing. Sell everything you have and distribute it to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me." ²³When he heard this, he became deeply grieved, because he was extremely wealthy. ²⁴Jesus, seeing his grief, said, "How difficult it is for those who have wealth to enter the kingdom of God! ²⁵For it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the kingdom of God." ²⁶Those who heard this said, "Then who can be saved?" ²⁷He said, "What is impossible with people is possible with God." ²⁸Peter said, "Look, we have left what we had and followed you." ²⁹He said to them, "Truly I tell you, there is no one who has left house or wife or brothers or parents or children for the sake of the kingdom of God ³⁰Indeed, who will not accept manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting. ³¹Taking the Twelve aside, he said to them, "Look, we are going up to Jerusalem, and everything written by the prophets about the Son of Man will be fulfilled. ³²For he will be handed over to the Gentiles and will be mocked and mistreated and spit upon. ³³After flogging him, they will kill him. And on the third day he will rise." ³⁴But the disciples understood none of this. This saying was hidden from them, and they did not grasp what was being said. ³⁵As Jesus approached Jericho, a blind man was sitting beside the road, begging. ³⁶Hearing a crowd passing by, he asked what was happening. ³⁷They told him, "Jesus the Nazarene is passing by." ³⁸He called out, "Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!" ³⁹Those in front rebuked him, telling him to be silent. But he cried out all the more, "Son of David, have mercy on me!" ⁴⁰Jesus stopped and ordered the man to be brought to him. When he came near, Jesus asked him, ⁴¹"What do you want me to do for you?" He said, "Lord, let me see again." ⁴²Jesus said to him, "Receive your sight. Your faith has saved you." ⁴³Gave praise to god, immediately he received his sight, and followed him, glorifying God — and all the people, when they saw it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Luke provides the interpretive key before the parable itself — an unusual technique. The verb enkakein ('to lose heart, to give up, to grow weary') suggests the temptation to stop praying when answers are delayed. The infinitive dein ('it is necessary') frames persistent prayer as a divine requirement, not merely a recommendation.
2. The judge is characterized by two negatives: no fear of God (the vertical relationship) and no respect for people (the horizontal relationship). The verb entrepomenos ('regarding, respecting, having shame before') implies a complete absence of social conscience. This is not a model of God but a foil — if even this judge eventually responds, how much more will a just God?
3. The imperfect ērchetō ('she kept coming') indicates repeated, persistent visits — not a single request. The verb ekdikēson ('vindicate, grant justice to') does not mean 'avenge' in the modern sense of retaliation but rather 'render a just verdict.' A widow in the ancient world had no male advocate and was legally vulnerable — her persistence was her only leverage.
4. The phrase epi chronon ('for a time') indicates a significant delay, not a brief pause. The judge's internal monologue (eipen en heautō, 'said within himself') reveals that his eventual action is motivated entirely by self-interest, not justice — making the a fortiori argument of verses 6-8 even more powerful.

5. The verb hypopiazē ('wear out, strike under the eye, give a black eye') is a boxing metaphor — the judge fears the widow will figuratively beat him into submission. The coarse humor is deliberate: a powerful judge is being pummeled by a powerless widow's persistence. The word kopon ('trouble, weariness') reinforces that her persistence is her only weapon.
6. Luke calls Jesus 'the Lord' (ho kyrios), his characteristic title for Jesus in the narrative framework. The phrase ho kritēs tēs adikias ('the judge of unrighteousness') is a Semitic genitive construction meaning 'the unrighteous judge.' Jesus draws attention to the judge's own words as the basis for the argument from lesser to greater.
7. The phrase eklektōn autou ('his chosen ones, his elect') carries covenantal weight — these are people God has specifically chosen and bound himself to. The verb makrothymeī ('is patient, delays') is ambiguous: is God patient with the elect (sustaining them during the wait) or patient regarding their enemies (delaying judgment)? We render as a second rhetorical question to preserve the ambiguity.
8. The phrase en tachei ('quickly, speedily, without delay') creates a tension with the parable's emphasis on prolonged waiting — 'quickly' is from God's perspective, not the petitioner's. The final question (ara heurēsei tēn pistin, 'will he indeed find the faith?') is haunting and unanswered. The article tēn before pistin ('the faith') may specify the kind of faith described in this parable — persistent, trusting prayer. Jesus leaves the question open, challenging the listener.
9. Luke again provides the interpretive key before the parable. The perfect participle pepoithotas ('having trusted, being confident') indicates a settled, ongoing self-assurance. The verb exouthenountas ('despising, treating as nothing') is strong — it means to regard others as utterly worthless. The combination of self-righteousness and contempt for others is the target of what follows.
10. The verb anebēsan ('went up') reflects Jerusalem's topography — the temple was on the highest point. The pairing of a Pharisee (the religious elite, known for scrupulous Torah observance) with a telōnēs ('tax collector,' despised as a collaborator with Rome and assumed to be corrupt) creates the maximum possible social and moral contrast for a Jewish audience.
11. The phrase pros heauton ('to himself' or 'about himself') is ambiguous — it could mean he prayed silently or that his prayer was self-directed rather than God-directed. His prayer is technically a thanksgiving (eucharisteō) but functions as self-congratulation. Every comparison is negative: he defines himself by what he is not rather than by who God is. The climactic 'or even like this tax collector' (ē kai hōs houtos ho telōnēs) drips with contempt — he has noticed the man and judged him.
12. The Torah required fasting only on the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 16:29-31). Fasting twice weekly (Monday and Thursday, the traditional days) was a voluntary Pharisaic practice that exceeded the law's requirements. Similarly, tithing 'everything I acquire' (panta hosa ktōmai) goes beyond the Torah's agricultural tithe — he tithes even purchased goods, in case the seller had not tithed. His claims are probably truthful, which makes the parable's verdict all the more startling.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Leviticus 16:29-31. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. Every detail contrasts with the Pharisee: the tax collector stands 'far off' (makrothen) rather than prominently, refuses to raise his eyes (the normal posture of prayer), and beats his chest (etypon to stēthos, a gesture of grief and self-condemnation). The verb hilasthēti ('be merciful, be propitiated') is related to hilastērion ('mercy seat, place of atonement') — he is essentially asking God to do for him what the Day of Atonement sacrifice does: to cover his sin. The article tō hamartōlō ('the sinner') is significant — he does not say 'a sinner' but 'the sinner,' as though he is the only one.
14. The perfect participle dedikaiōmenos ('having been justified, declared righteous') is a divine passive — God is the one who justifies. This is startling: the tax collector, who offered nothing but confession, leaves in right standing with God, while the Pharisee, who exceeded every requirement, does not. The concluding proverb (repeated from 14:11) is Luke's signature reversal theme. The verb katebē ('went down') contrasts with anebēsan ('went up') in verse 10 — the physical descent from the temple mirrors the spiritual descent of humility.
15. Luke uses brephē ('infants, babies') rather than Mark's paidia ('children'), emphasizing that these were very young — too young to come on their own. The verb haptētai ('to touch') implies a blessing through physical contact. The disciples' rebuke (epetimōn) uses the same word used for rebuking demons and storms, suggesting they viewed the interruption as inappropriate and beneath Jesus's dignity.
16. Jesus shifts from brephē ('infants') to paidia ('children') — a broader term that includes the infants but extends the principle. The present imperative with mē (mē kōlyete, 'stop hindering') implies the disciples are currently doing something that must cease. The phrase tōn toioutōn ('of such as these, to such ones') clarifies that the kingdom belongs not to children per se but to those who share their characteristics — dependence, receptivity, lack of status.
17. The double negative ou mē ('never, by no means') is the strongest form of negation in Greek — there are no exceptions. The comparison 'like a child' (hōs paidion) is about how one receives, not about innocence or purity. Children in the ancient world had no legal standing, no achievements to present, no leverage — they could only receive what was given. This connects directly to the Pharisee-tax collector parable: the one who receives God's mercy without presenting credentials is the one who enters.
18. Luke identifies the man as an archōn ('ruler, official') — Matthew calls him 'young' (neaniskos) and Mark simply 'a man.' The title 'Good Teacher' (didaskale agathe) is unusual and becomes the basis for Jesus's response. The question itself contains a tension: 'inherit' (klēronomēsō) implies receiving a gift, while 'what must I do' (ti poiēsas) implies earning it.

19. Jesus's response does not deny his own goodness but challenges the ruler's casual use of the term. The statement 'No one is good except God alone' (oudeis agathos ei mē heis ho theos) establishes an absolute standard that will prove relevant: if only God is truly good, then human moral achievement alone cannot secure eternal life. The implicit question is whether the ruler understands the full weight of calling someone 'good.'
20. Jesus cites five of the Ten Commandments — all from the second table (duties toward other people) — but conspicuously omits the tenth: 'You shall not covet.' Given the story's outcome, this omission may be deliberate. The order differs from the Hebrew Bible (Exodus 20) but follows the Septuagint order in some manuscripts (Deuteronomy 5:17-18 LXX places adultery before murder).
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 20 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 5:17-18 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. The verb ephylaxa ('I have guarded, kept, observed') implies careful, watchful obedience. The phrase ek neotētos ('from youth') refers to the age of accountability (around twelve or thirteen in Jewish practice). Jesus does not dispute his claim — this man may genuinely have lived an outwardly commandment-keeping life. The problem lies elsewhere.
22. The phrase eti hen soi leipei ('one thing still remains lacking for you') pierces through the ruler's self-assessment. The command is fourfold: sell (pōlēson), distribute (diados), come (deuro), follow (akolouthēi). Luke's version specifies 'everything' (panta hosa echeis) and 'distribute to the poor' (diados ptōchois), making the demand as radical as possible. The promise of 'treasure in heaven' (thēsauros en tois ouranois) reframes wealth: true riches are stored elsewhere.
23. The adjective perilypos ('deeply grieved, exceedingly sorrowful') is the same word used of Jesus in Gethsemane (Mark 14:34). Luke adds sphodra ('exceedingly, extremely') to plousios ('rich'), emphasizing the magnitude of what is being asked. The man's sorrow confirms both his genuine desire and his inability to pay the cost. Luke does not record him leaving — a subtle openness that Mark's account resolves more definitively (Mark 10:22).
24. The adverb dyskolōs ('with difficulty, hardly') is the key word — entering the kingdom is not impossible for the wealthy (as verse 27 will clarify) but extremely difficult. The phrase ta chrēmata echontes ('those having possessions') describes not merely the rich but those who hold onto their possessions as defining possessions.
25. The image is deliberately absurd — a kamēlon ('camel'), the largest animal in Palestine, through a trēmatis belonēs ('eye of a needle'), the smallest opening. There is no historical evidence for a medieval legend about a small gate called 'The Needle's Eye' in Jerusalem. Some manuscripts read kamilon ('rope') instead of kamēlon ('camel'), which would create a more logical comparison (rope through needle), but the harder reading (camel) is almost certainly original. The hyperbole underscores the impossibility of wealth-based entry into the kingdom.
26. The question reveals the audience's assumption: if the wealthy — who were commonly viewed as blessed by God — cannot enter the kingdom, then salvation seems impossible for anyone. The verb sōthēnai ('to be saved') broadens the discussion from kingdom entry to salvation itself. Their shock is genuine and theologically significant.
27. This is the theological center of the passage. The adjective adynata ('impossible things') is unqualified — Jesus does not soften it to 'difficult.' Human effort cannot achieve salvation; only divine power can accomplish it. This echoes the angel's word to Mary in 1:37: 'Nothing will be impossible with God' (ouk adynatēsei para tou theou pan rhēma).
28. Peter's statement is an implicit question: if the rich ruler failed to give up everything, what about those who did? The phrase ta idia ('our own things, what belonged to us') is more modest than Mark's panta ('everything') — Luke's Peter does not claim to have left 'everything' but rather 'what was ours.' The aorist verbs aphentes ('having left') and ēkolouthēsamen ('we followed') present the decision as completed and definitive.
29. Luke's list of what might be left behind includes 'wife' (gynaika), which is unique among the Synoptic parallels and provocative — it does not necessarily advocate abandoning a spouse but recognizes that discipleship may require separation (cf. 14:26). The phrase heneken tēs basileias tou theou ('for the sake of the kingdom of God') replaces Mark's 'for my sake and the gospel's,' focusing on the kingdom rather than Jesus personally.
30. The promise is twofold: pollaplasiona ('many times more, manifold') in this present age (en tō kairō toutō), plus eternal life (zōēn aiōnion) in the age to come. Luke omits Mark's specification of 'houses, brothers, sisters, mothers, children, and fields' as well as 'with persecutions,' offering a more streamlined promise. The two-age framework (this age/the coming age) reflects standard Jewish eschatology.
31. This is Jesus's third and most detailed passion prediction in Luke (cf. 9:22, 9:44). The phrase telesthēsetai panta ta gegrammena ('everything written will be completed/fulfilled') frames the passion as the fulfillment of scripture, not a tragic accident. Luke's version uniquely emphasizes prophetic fulfillment — Mark and Matthew focus more on the events themselves.
32. The sequence of passive verbs (paradothēsetai, empaiχthēsetai, hybristhēsetai, emptysthēsetai) creates a crescendo of humiliation. The 'Gentiles' (ethnesin) refers to the Roman authorities — Jesus specifies that his death will involve both Jewish and Roman agency. The verb hybristhēsetai ('to be treated with hubris, outrageously mistreated') implies deliberate degradation.
33. The verb mastigōsantes ('having flogged') refers to the Roman flagellum — a whip with embedded bone and metal that tore flesh. The prediction moves from humiliation through death to resurrection in a single sentence. The phrase tē hēmera tē tritē ('on the third day') is the standard early Christian formula for the resurrection (cf. 1 Corinthians 15:4).
34. Luke's threefold emphasis on incomprehension is unique and emphatic: they did not understand (synēkan), the meaning was hidden (kekrymmenon) from them, and they did not know (eginōskon) what was said. The passive kekrymmenon ('having been hidden') suggests divine concealment — God deliberately veiled the meaning until after the resurrection (cf. 24:45, where the risen Jesus 'opens their minds'). This is not merely intellectual failure but a divinely imposed limitation.

35. Luke places the healing as Jesus approaches Jericho, while Mark 10:46 places it as Jesus leaves Jericho — a well-known discrepancy. Various harmonizations have been proposed (two Jerichos, two healings), but we render Luke's text as written. Mark names the man Bartimaeus; Luke does not. The blind beggar sat beside the road (para tēn hodon), the only location where a beggar could access passing travelers.
36. The imperfect epythnato ('he was asking, he kept asking') suggests repeated inquiry — the blind man could hear but not see the commotion and persistently sought information. The optative eiē ('might be') indicates indirect discourse in a formal literary style characteristic of Luke.
37. The designation Nazōraios ('Nazarene') identifies Jesus by his hometown of Nazareth. The present tense parerchetai ('is passing by') conveys immediacy — the opportunity is now and will not last. The crowd serves as intermediary between the blind man and Jesus.
38. The title 'Son of David' (huie Daid) is a messianic title — the blind man confesses Jesus as the expected Davidic Messiah. This is remarkable: a blind beggar sees what the disciples cannot (v. 34). The plea eleēson me ('have mercy on me') uses the same verb as the tax collector's prayer in 18:13, connecting the two stories thematically.
39. As with the parents bringing children (v. 15), the crowd tries to prevent access to Jesus, and as with the persistent widow (vv. 1-8), refusal only intensifies the plea. The imperfect ekrazen ('he kept crying out') paired with pollō mallon ('much more, all the more') shows an escalation — he refuses to be silenced. His persistence mirrors the parable that opened this chapter.
40. The verb statheis ('having stood still, having stopped') is significant — Jesus halts his journey to Jerusalem for this one man. The verb ekeleusen ('commanded, ordered') shows authority — Jesus directs the same crowd that tried to silence the man to now bring him forward. The question that follows (v. 41) is not for information but for the man's own confession of need.
41. Jesus asks the same question he implicitly asked the rich ruler — 'What do you want?' The blind man's answer is direct and humble: anablepsō ('to see again, to look up') implies he was not born blind but had lost his sight. His address kyrie ('Lord') may be simple respect ('sir') or a deeper confession, given his use of 'Son of David' earlier.
42. The imperative anablepsō ('see again!') is a command, not a prayer — Jesus speaks healing into existence with a word. The phrase hē pistis sou sesōken se ('your faith has saved you') is identical to 17:19 (the grateful leper), again using sōzō to indicate that physical healing and spiritual salvation are bound together. The blind man's faith was demonstrated in his persistent refusal to be silenced.
43. The adverb parachrēma ('immediately, at once') is a Lukan favorite for emphasizing the instantaneous nature of divine action. The healed man ēkolouthēi ('was following') Jesus — the imperfect tense suggests ongoing discipleship, not a one-time response. Unlike the rich ruler who went away grieving, the blind man follows. The chapter ends with communal praise (pas ho laos, 'all the people'), a characteristic Lukan conclusion that frames the miracle as a public revelation of God's power.

Summary: Luke 19 narrates Zacchaeus's conversion in Jericho, the parable of the ten minas (pounds), Jesus's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, his weeping over the city, and the cleansing of the temple. The chapter marks the decisive transition from the travel narrative (9:51-19:27) to Jesus's Jerusalem ministry. Themes of wealth, repentance, judgment, and kingship converge as Jesus enters his final week.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Zacchaeus story (unique to Luke) is the counterexample to the rich ruler of chapter 18 — another wealthy man who, unlike the ruler, actually surrenders his wealth and receives salvation. The parable of the minas differs from Matthew's parable of the talents (25:14-30) in key details: the nobleman goes to 'receive a kingdom,' and his citizens send a delegation rejecting his rule — likely an allusion to Archelaus's contested succession in 4 BC, an event the original audience would have recognized. Jesus's weeping over Jerusalem (unique to Luke) is one of only two recorded instances of Jesus weeping, the other being at Lazarus's tomb (John 11:35).

Translation Friction: The parable of the minas and Matthew's parable of the talents share significant overlap but differ enough to be treated as separate traditions. We render Luke's version on its own terms without harmonizing. The 'cleansing of the temple' is placed differently in John (2:13-22); we follow Luke's chronology. The phrase 'today salvation has come to this house' (v. 9) is rendered without importing later systematic theology about the mechanism of salvation.

Connections: Zacchaeus connects to the theme of tax collectors throughout Luke (3:12, 5:27-32, 7:29, 15:1, 18:10-14). The parable of the minas echoes the parable of the talents (Matthew 25) but with distinctive political overtones. The triumphal entry fulfills Zechariah 9:9 (though Luke does not quote it explicitly, unlike Matthew 21:5). Jesus's weeping connects to the prophetic lament tradition (Jeremiah 8:18-9:1). The temple cleansing quotes Isaiah 56:7 and Jeremiah 7:11.

¹Jesus entered Jericho and was passing through it. ²A man was there named Zacchaeus. He was a chief tax collector and was wealthy. ³He was trying to see who Jesus was, but he could not because of the crowd, since he was short in stature. ⁴So he ran ahead and climbed up into a sycamore-fig tree to see him, because Jesus was about to pass that way. ⁵When Jesus reached the spot, he looked up and said to him, "Zacchaeus, hurry and come down, for I must stay at your house today." ⁶He hurried down and welcomed Jesus joyfully. ⁷When the people saw this, they all grumbled, "He has gone to be the guest of a man who is a sinner." ⁸But Zacchaeus stood and said to the Lord, "Look, Lord, I am giving half of my possessions to the poor, and if I have cheated anyone of anything, I am paying back four times as much." ⁹Jesus said to him, "Today salvation has come to this house, because he too is a son of Abraham. ¹⁰For the Son of Man came to seek and to save the lost." ¹¹While they were listening to this, he went on to tell a parable, because he was near Jerusalem and they supposed that the kingdom of God was about to appear immediately. ¹²He said, "A man of noble birth went to a distant country to receive a kingdom for himself and then return. ¹³He called ten of his slaves and gave them ten minas, saying, 'Conduct business with this until I come back.' ¹⁴But his citizens hated him and sent a delegation after him, saying, 'We do not want this man to rule over us.' ¹⁵When he returned, having received the kingdom, he ordered the slaves to whom he had given the money to be called to him so that he could find out what they had earned by conducting business. ¹⁶The first came forward, saying, 'Master, your mina has earned ten minas more.' ¹⁷He said to him, 'Well done, good slave! Because you have been faithful in a very small matter, you shall have authority over ten cities.' ¹⁸The second came, saying, 'Master, your mina has produced five minas.' ¹⁹He said to this one also, 'You shall be over five cities.' ²⁰Then another came, saying, 'Master, here is your mina. I kept it stored away in a cloth. ²¹For I was afraid of you, because you are a harsh man. You take out what you did not put in, and reap what you did not sow.' ²²He said to him, 'I will judge you by your own words, you wicked slave! You knew that I am a harsh man, taking out what I did not put in and reaping what I did not sow? ²³Then why did you not put my money in the bank? At least when I returned, I could have collected it with interest.' ²⁴Then he said to those standing by, 'Take the mina from him and give it to the one who has ten minas.' ²⁵They said to him, 'Master, he already has ten minas!' ²⁶I tell you, to everyone who has, more will be given, but from the one who does not have, even what he has will be taken away. ²⁷But as for these enemies of mine who did not want me to rule over them — bring them here and slaughter them in front of me.'" ²⁸After saying this, he went on ahead, going up to Jerusalem. ²⁹As he approached Bethphage and Bethany, near the hill called the Mount of Olives, he sent two of the disciples, ³⁰Declaring, Go you into the village over opposed to you. In the which at your entering you will find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat — loose him, and bring him hither. ³¹If anyone asks you, 'Why are you untying it?' you are to say, 'The Lord has need of it.'" ³²Those who were sent went and found everything just as he had told them. ³³As they were untying the colt, its owners said to them, "Why are you untying the colt?" ³⁴They said, "The Lord has need of it." ³⁵They brought it to Jesus, and throwing their cloaks on the colt, they put Jesus on it. ³⁶As he rode along, people spread their cloaks on the road. ³⁷As he was now approaching the descent of the Mount of Olives, the whole crowd of disciples began to praise God joyfully with a loud voice for all the mighty works they had seen, ³⁸Declaring, Blessed be the King that comes by the authority of the Lord — peace in heaven, and glory in the highest. ³⁹Some of the Pharisees in the crowd said to him, "Teacher, rebuke your disciples." ⁴⁰He answered, "I tell you, if these were silent, the stones would cry out." ⁴¹As he drew near and saw the city, he wept over it, ⁴²Declaring, If you hadst known, even you, at least in this your day, the things which belong to your peace! but now they are hid from your eyes. ⁴³For the days will come upon you when your enemies will build an embankment against you and surround you and hem you in on every side. ⁴⁴They will dash you to the ground — you and your children within you. They will not leave one stone upon another in you, because you did not recognize the time of your visitation." ⁴⁵Then he entered the temple and began to drive out those who were selling, ⁴⁶Declaring to them, It is written, My home is the home of petition — but you have made it a den of thieves. ⁴⁷He was teaching daily in the temple. The chief priests, the scribes, and the leading men of the people were seeking to destroy him, ⁴⁸Could not find what they might do — for all the people were very eager to listen to him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The imperfect diērcheto ('was passing through') suggests Jesus intended to travel through Jericho without stopping — the encounter with Zacchaeus will interrupt his transit. Jericho was a prosperous city near the Jordan River, a major customs and taxation center on the trade route from the east.
2. The name Zakchaïos is the Greek form of the Hebrew Zakkai ('pure, innocent, righteous') — an ironic name for a man whose profession made him ritually and socially impure. The title architelōnēs ('chief tax collector') appears only here in the New Testament and indicates he supervised other tax collectors in the Jericho district, profiting from their collections. The detail 'he was wealthy' (autos plousios) immediately connects him to the rich ruler of 18:18-23.
3. The imperfect ežētei ('he was seeking, he kept trying') indicates persistent effort. The phrase tē hēlikia mikros ('small in stature/height') is stated without judgment — Luke simply explains the physical obstacle. The detail is practical: the crowd would not have made way for a despised tax collector, so his short stature compounded his social exclusion.
4. The verb prodramōn ('having run ahead') shows undignified haste — a wealthy man running was socially inappropriate in the ancient Near East (cf. the father in 15:20). The sykomorea ('sycamore-fig') is a distinct species from the sykaminō ('mulberry') of 17:6 — it has a short trunk with wide, low branches, making it easy to climb. Luke specifies that Jesus was going to pass by that exact spot, setting up the 'chance' encounter that is anything but accidental.
5. Jesus calls Zacchaeus by name — unexplained by the narrative, suggesting either prior knowledge or supernatural perception. The verb dei ('it is necessary, I must') indicates divine compulsion, the same word used for the necessity of the passion (9:22, 18:31). The word sēmeron ('today') is a theologically loaded term in Luke, always marking the present moment of salvation (2:11, 4:21, 23:43). Jesus does not ask permission but announces his intention.
6. Zacchaeus's response mirrors Jesus's urgency: speusas ('having hurried') echoes Jesus's speusas in verse 5. The verb hypedexato ('welcomed, received as a guest') implies formal hospitality. The participle chairōn ('rejoicing') shows that the encounter is received as gift, not imposition. The contrast with the rich ruler's grief (18:23) is stark — same demand for radical surrender, opposite emotional response.
7. The verb diegongyzon ('they were grumbling, murmuring') echoes Israel's wilderness complaints and is a recurring response to Jesus's association with sinners in Luke (5:30, 15:2). The word pantes ('all') indicates universal disapproval — not just Pharisees but the entire crowd. The verb katalysai ('to find lodging, to be a guest') means Jesus accepted the full hospitality of the house, sharing table and shelter with a 'sinner' (hamartōlō).
8. The verb statheis ('having stood') indicates a formal, public declaration. The present tense didōmi ('I am giving') and apodidōmi ('I am paying back') may indicate a new resolution or may describe an existing practice — the Greek is ambiguous. The fourfold restitution (tetraploun) exceeds the Torah's requirement (Numbers 5:7 requires the principal plus one-fifth) and matches the penalty for stealing and slaughtering a sheep (Exodus 22:1). The verb esykophantēsa ('extorted, defrauded') is the same word used for the soldiers' question in 3:14.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Numbers 5:7 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Exodus 22:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The word sēmeron ('today') echoes verse 5 and is the fulfillment of the divine necessity announced there. 'Salvation' (sōtēria) comes to the 'house' (oikō) — extending beyond Zacchaeus to his entire household. The phrase 'son of Abraham' (huios Abraam) reclaims Zacchaeus's identity: despite his profession and reputation, he belongs to the covenant people. Jesus does not say Zacchaeus has become a son of Abraham but that he is one — his covenant identity was never lost, only obscured.
10. This verse functions as a mission statement for Jesus in Luke's Gospel, summarizing the theology of chapter 15 (the lost sheep, lost coin, lost son) in a single sentence. The two infinitives zētēsai ('to seek') and sōsai ('to save') present Jesus as active searcher, not passive recipient — he goes to the lost, not the other way around. The neuter participle to apolōlos ('the lost thing, that which has been destroyed') encompasses anyone in the state of lostness. This verse directly answers the crowd's grumbling in verse 7.
11. Luke explicitly states the parable's purpose: to correct the expectation that the kingdom would arrive instantly (parachrēma, 'immediately') upon Jesus's entry into Jerusalem. The proximity to Jerusalem (engys einai Ierousalēm) and the crowd's eschatological excitement provide the interpretive context. The verb anaphainesthai ('to appear, to be revealed') suggests they expected a dramatic, visible manifestation of God's rule.
12. The scenario closely mirrors the historical precedent of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, who traveled to Rome in 4 BC to receive confirmation of his kingship from Augustus. The Jericho audience would have recognized the allusion immediately, as Herod had built a winter palace near Jericho. The verb hypostrepsai ('to return') foreshadows the return of the Son of Man.
13. A mna ('mina') was a Greek unit of currency worth about 100 denarii — roughly three to four months' wages for a laborer. Unlike Matthew's parable of the talents (where different amounts are given to different servants), here each slave receives one mina each, making the different outcomes purely a matter of effort and skill. The verb pragmateusasthe ('do business, trade, conduct commerce') is a clear commercial term.

14. This detail is unique to Luke's parable and has no parallel in Matthew's version. Historically, a Jewish delegation of fifty traveled to Rome to oppose Archelaus's appointment (Josephus, Antiquities 17.11.1). In the parable, the citizens (politai, those who owe civic allegiance) represent those who reject the nobleman's — and by extension, Jesus's — kingship. The verb basileuein ('to rule as king') makes the political and theological stakes explicit.
15. The nobleman returns with the kingdom secured — his authority is now confirmed. The verb diepragmateusanto ('they had gained by trading') is a compound form of the commercial verb from verse 13. The accounting scene represents final judgment: the absent king returns and demands an account.
16. A tenfold return (1,000 percent) represents extraordinary stewardship. The slave attributes the success to 'your mina' (hē mna sou), acknowledging that the capital belonged to the master. The address kyrie ('master, lord') maintains the master-slave relationship.
17. The exclamation euge ('well done, excellent') is rare in the New Testament. The phrase en elachistō ('in a very small thing') is startling — a mina was not an insignificant sum, yet compared to ruling ten cities it is tiny. The principle: faithfulness with small trust leads to responsibility over much greater things. The reward is authority (exousian), not rest — kingdom service expands rather than ends.
18. A fivefold return is still excellent, though less than the first slave's tenfold. The verb epoiēsen ('made, produced') differs from the first slave's prosērgasato ('earned in addition'), perhaps reflecting a slight narrative variation without theological significance.
19. The reward is proportional: ten minas earned yields authority over ten cities; five minas earned yields five cities. This proportionality distinguishes Luke's parable from Matthew's, where both the five-talent and two-talent servants receive the same commendation. The brevity of the response — no 'well done' or 'good slave' — may reflect the proportional nature of the reward.
20. The soudarion ('cloth, face-cloth, handkerchief') was a small piece of fabric — storing money in it rather than investing it represents the deliberate choice to do nothing. The slave returns exactly what was given, with no increase. The verb apokeimenēn ('stored away, laid aside') suggests hiding rather than protecting.
21. The adjective austēros ('harsh, strict, exacting') is the slave's characterization of the master, not the narrator's. The accusations — taking what he did not deposit and reaping what he did not sow — portray the master as exploitative. Whether this reflects the slave's genuine perception or a self-serving excuse is left to the reader. In the parabolic context, it represents a distorted view of God that produces paralysis rather than faithful action.
22. The master turns the slave's own characterization against him: 'Out of your own mouth' (ek tou stomatos sou) means 'by your own testimony.' The address ponēre doule ('wicked slave') contrasts sharply with 'good slave' (agathe doule) in verse 17. The master does not deny being austēros but uses the slave's own assessment to condemn his inaction: if you believed I was demanding, you should have been more motivated, not less.
23. The trapezan ('table, bank') refers to a money-changer's table where deposits could earn interest (tokos, 'interest, offspring'). Even the minimal action of depositing the money would have produced some return. The Torah prohibited charging interest to fellow Israelites (Deuteronomy 23:19-20) but allowed it with foreigners — Jesus uses banking as a parabolic illustration, not an endorsement of lending practices.
23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 23:19-20 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
24. The redistribution is counterintuitive: the mina goes to the one who already has the most, not to the one with five. The 'those standing by' (tois parestōsin) are courtiers or attendants, emphasizing the king's authority to command. The principle of compounding faithfulness — more is given to those who have used what they were given — is made explicit in the next verse.
25. This interjection by the bystanders (or possibly the other slaves) expresses surprise at what seems unfair — giving more to the one who has the most. The protest highlights the counterintuitive logic of the kingdom, which defies human expectations of equal distribution.
26. This saying appears in multiple contexts across the Gospels (Matthew 13:12, 25:29; Mark 4:25), always articulating the same principle: faithfulness increases capacity while unfaithfulness diminishes it. 'The one who has' refers not to material wealth but to productive use of what has been entrusted. The passive verbs (dothēsetai, arthēsetai) are divine passives — God is the agent of both giving and taking.
27. This is the most violent conclusion to any of Jesus's parables. The verb kataspaxate ('slaughter, butcher') is graphic — it was used for killing sacrificial animals. Historically, Archelaus did execute his opponents upon receiving his kingdom. Within the parable, this represents the fate of those who actively oppose the king's rule (v. 14). Whether this maps directly onto eschatological judgment or functions as a warning within the parabolic world is a matter of interpretation. We render the Greek as stated.
28. The imperfect eporeueto ('he was going') resumes the travel narrative, and anabainōn ('going up') reflects Jerusalem's elevation — all roads to Jerusalem ascend. The phrase 'went on ahead' (emprosthen) shows Jesus leading, with the crowd and disciples following. The transition from parable to narrative is abrupt: the warning about rejected kingship gives way to the very journey that will lead to its fulfillment.
29. Bethphage ('house of unripe figs') and Bethany ('house of affliction' or 'house of dates') were villages on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, about two miles from Jerusalem. The Mount of Olives (to oros to kaloumenon Elaiōn) held eschatological significance: Zechariah 14:4 prophesied that the LORD would stand on it in the last days. Jesus's approach from this direction is symbolically charged.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Zechariah 14:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.

30. The pōlon ('colt, young animal') in Luke is not specified as a donkey's colt (Matthew and John make this explicit). The detail that no one had ever sat on it (oudeis pōpote anthrōpōn ekathisen) indicates a ritually unused animal — in the Old Testament, animals dedicated to sacred purposes were to be unworked (Numbers 19:2, Deuteronomy 21:3, 1 Samuel 6:7). Jesus's foreknowledge of the colt's presence and status is either prophetic or pre-arranged.
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 19:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 21:3 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 1 Samuel 6:7 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
31. The phrase ho kyrios autou chreian echei ('the Lord has need of it') is ambiguous: kyrios could mean 'the Lord' (Jesus, making a divine claim), 'the master' (the colt's owner, who has authorized the borrowing), or 'its owner' (explaining the action). In context, 'the Lord' as a reference to Jesus seems most likely, as the phrase serves as a password of sorts that the disciples are told will be sufficient.
32. The phrase kathōs eipen autois ('just as he had told them') emphasizes Jesus's prophetic accuracy and sovereign knowledge. The narrative moves briskly through the fulfillment of his instructions.
33. The plural hoi kyrioi autou ('its owners') is noteworthy — the colt was jointly owned, perhaps by a family. The question matches Jesus's prediction exactly (v. 31), further confirming his foreknowledge.
34. The disciples repeat Jesus's exact words, and the response is apparently sufficient — the owners do not object further. This suggests either that Jesus was known to the owners, that 'the Lord' functioned as an agreed-upon authorization, or that the narrative compresses a longer exchange.
35. The casting of garments (himatia, 'outer cloaks') over the animal serves as an improvised saddle but also echoes the coronation of Jehu, where supporters threw their cloaks under him on the steps (2 Kings 9:13). The verb epebibasan ('they set upon, they mounted') indicates the disciples physically helped Jesus onto the animal — a formal enthronement gesture.
35. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Kings 9:13 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
36. The imperfect hypestrōnnyon ('they were spreading') indicates a continuous action as the procession moved — people kept laying cloaks in his path. This echoes 2 Kings 9:13 more directly. Luke omits the palm branches mentioned in John 12:13 and the 'branches from the fields' in Mark 11:8.
36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 2 Kings 9:13. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
37. Luke specifies the location precisely: the katabasei ('descent, downward slope') of the Mount of Olives, where the panoramic view of Jerusalem and the temple would have come into full sight. Luke's version attributes the praise to 'the whole crowd of disciples' (hapan to plēthos tōn mathētōn) rather than the general crowd. The dynameis ('mighty works, miracles') they had witnessed become the basis for their praise.
38. The acclamation quotes Psalm 118:26 but Luke inserts 'the king' (ho basileus) into the psalm citation — making the royal claim explicit where the original psalm was more general. The phrase 'peace in heaven and glory in the highest' (en ouranō eirēnē kai doxa en hypsistois) echoes the angels' song at Jesus's birth (2:14) but reverses the direction: at the nativity, peace was proclaimed on earth; here, peace is proclaimed in heaven. The inclusio (literary bookend) connecting birth and entry into Jerusalem is deliberate.
38. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalms 118:26 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
39. The Pharisees are 'in the crowd' (apo tou ochlou), not separate from it — they are witnesses to the procession. Their demand that Jesus silence the disciples reveals their alarm at the messianic implications of the acclamation. The address 'Teacher' (didaskale) rather than 'Lord' reflects their refusal to acknowledge Jesus's royal claim.
40. Jesus's response is among his most memorable sayings (unique to Luke). The imagery of stones crying out may echo Habakkuk 2:11 ('the stone will cry out from the wall'). The declaration implies that the praise is cosmically necessary — creation itself would testify if humans fell silent. The conditional ean ... siōpēsousin ('if they should be silent') uses a future indicative in a conditional clause, expressing a vivid, almost impossible hypothetical.
40. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Habakkuk 2:11 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
41. The verb eklausen ('he wept') indicates audible weeping or sobbing, not silent tears (for which dakryō would be used, as in John 11:35). This is unique to Luke and profoundly ironic: the crowd is celebrating while Jesus mourns. He weeps at the moment of his greatest public triumph because he sees what the crowd cannot — the city's coming destruction.
42. The sentence breaks off — an anacoluthon (grammatically incomplete sentence) that mimics the emotion of the speaker. The phrase kai sy ('even you') is emphatic: Jerusalem, of all cities, should have recognized the moment. The ta pros eirēnēn ('the things pertaining to peace') echoes the city's name (Yerushalayim, traditionally connected to shalom). The passive ekrybē ('they have been hidden') is a divine passive — God has concealed from Jerusalem what it needed to see, a judicial act of divine hardening.

43. The military language precisely describes a Roman siege: charaka ('palisade, siege embankment') refers to the wooden and earthen rampart that encircled a besieged city. The verb perikyklōsousin ('will encircle') and synexousin ('will press in, constrict') describe progressive tightening of the siege. This was fulfilled literally in AD 70 when Titus's forces built a circumvallation wall around Jerusalem (Josephus, War 5.12.1-2).
44. The verb edaphiousin ('dash to the ground, level, raze') is violent — it includes the image of smashing against the ground. The inclusion of 'your children within you' (ta tekna sou en soi) makes the prophecy personal and devastating. The phrase ton kairon tēs episkopēs sou ('the time of your visitation') is the theological crux: episkopē means 'visitation, inspection' — God has come to inspect his city and found it wanting. The kairos ('appointed time, decisive moment') is distinguished from chronos ('ordinary time'); this was the unique, unrepeatable moment of divine visitation that Jerusalem missed.
45. Luke's account of the temple cleansing is the most compressed of all four Gospels — he mentions only sellers (pōlountas), not buyers, money changers, or dove sellers. The verb ekballein ('to drive out, to throw out') is the same word used for casting out demons, giving the action a purging quality. The temple commerce, though necessary for sacrifice, had apparently expanded beyond appropriate bounds, commercializing sacred space.
46. Jesus combines two prophetic texts: Isaiah 56:7 ('my house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations') and Jeremiah 7:11 ('Has this house become a den of robbers in your eyes?'). Luke omits Isaiah's 'for all nations' (which Mark 11:17 includes). The word lēstōn ('robbers, bandits') is stronger than 'thieves' — it implies violent, predatory exploitation. Jeremiah's original context was a warning that the first temple's destruction was imminent because the people treated it as a safe haven for injustice; Jesus implies the same fate for the second temple.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 56:7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Jeremiah 7:11. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
47. The imperfect ēn didaskōn ('he was teaching') and ezētoun ('they were seeking') establish two ongoing, simultaneous activities: Jesus teaches publicly while the authorities plot privately. Luke adds hoi prōtoi tou laou ('the leading men of the people') to Mark's chief priests and scribes, broadening the opposition to include the lay aristocracy. The verb apolesai ('to destroy, to kill') is the same word used for what the flood did to Noah's generation (17:27).
48. The verb exekremeto ('hung upon, was suspended from') is a vivid metaphor — the people literally 'hung from him listening.' It appears only here in the New Testament. The popular support for Jesus creates a political obstacle that forces the authorities to seek covert means, which they eventually find through Judas (22:1-6). This verse sets up the tension that drives the passion narrative: the leaders want Jesus dead, but the people's devotion makes open action impossible.

Summary: Luke 20 records a series of confrontations between Jesus and the Jerusalem authorities during his final week of teaching in the temple. The chapter moves through the question of Jesus's authority, the parable of the wicked tenants, the question about paying taxes to Caesar, the Sadducees' question about the resurrection, and Jesus's counter-question about David's son. Each encounter escalates the conflict that will lead to his arrest.

What Makes This Remarkable: The parable of the wicked tenants is one of the clearest allegorical parables in the Synoptic tradition, with the vineyard owner representing God, the tenants representing Israel's leaders, the servants representing the prophets, and the beloved son representing Jesus. The 'render to Caesar' saying is one of the most cited and debated pronouncements in Christian political theology. The Sadducees' resurrection question provides rare insight into an intra-Jewish theological dispute that Jesus adjudicates by appealing to the Torah itself — the only scripture the Sadducees accepted.

Translation Friction: The parable of the wicked tenants has been historically misused to justify antisemitism. The parable targets the leadership class, not the Jewish people as a whole. We render the Greek as written and note the parable's allegorical dimensions without importing supersessionist theology. The 'render to Caesar' passage is deliberately ambiguous — Jesus does not resolve the tension between divine and imperial claims, and we do not resolve it either.

Connections: The vineyard parable draws on Isaiah 5:1-7 (the Song of the Vineyard). The rejected cornerstone quotation comes from Psalm 118:22, the same psalm quoted during the triumphal entry (19:38). The resurrection argument cites Exodus 3:6 (the burning bush). The 'David's son' question quotes Psalm 110:1, the most frequently cited Old Testament text in the New Testament.

¹One day, as he was teaching the people in the temple and proclaiming the good news, the chief priests and the scribes, together with the elders, confronted him. ²Spoke to him and stated, Tell us, by what authority doest you these things? or who is he that offered you this authority? ³He answered them, "I will also ask you a question. Tell me: ⁴Was the baptism of John from heaven, or from human origin?" ⁵They discussed it among themselves, saying, "If we say, 'From heaven,' he will say, 'Why did you not believe him?' ⁶But if we say, 'From human origin,' all the people will stone us, because they are convinced that John was a prophet." ⁷So they answered that they did not know where it came from. ⁸Jesus said to them, "Neither will I tell you by what authority I do these things." ⁹He began to tell the people this parable: "A man planted a vineyard, leased it to tenant farmers, and went away for a long time. ¹⁰At harvest time he sent a slave to the tenants so they would give him his share of the vineyard's fruit. But the tenants beat him and sent him away empty-handed. ¹¹He sent yet another slave, and they beat that one too, dishonored him, and sent him away empty-handed. ¹²He sent still a third, and they wounded this one too and threw him out. ¹³Then the owner of the vineyard said, 'What shall I do? I will send my beloved son. Perhaps they will respect him.' ¹⁴But when the tenants saw him, they discussed it among themselves, saying, 'This is the heir. Let us kill him, so that the inheritance will be ours.' ¹⁵They threw him out of the vineyard and killed him. What then will the owner of the vineyard do to them? ¹⁶He will come and destroy those tenants and give the vineyard to others." When they heard this, they said, "May it never be!" ¹⁷But Jesus looked directly at them and said, "Then what is the meaning of this scripture: 'The stone the builders rejected has become the cornerstone'? ¹⁸Everyone who falls on that stone will be broken to pieces, and the one on whom it falls — it will crush him." ¹⁹The scribes and the chief priests wanted to seize him at that very hour, but they feared the people, for they knew he had told this parable against them. ²⁰Watching for an opportunity, they sent spies who pretended to be sincere, so that they might catch him in something he said, in order to hand him over to the authority and jurisdiction of the governor. ²¹They questioned him, saying, "Teacher, we know that you speak and teach correctly and show no partiality, but teach the way of God truthfully. ²²Is it lawful for us to pay taxes to Caesar, or not?" ²³But he saw through their craftiness and said to them, ²⁴"Show me a denarius. Whose image and inscription does it bear?" They said, "Caesar's." ²⁵He said to them, "Then give back to Caesar what belongs to Caesar, and to God what belongs to God." ²⁶They were unable to catch him in anything he said in front of the people, and amazed by his answer, they fell silent. ²⁷Some of the Sadducees, who say there is no resurrection, came to him and asked, ²⁸"Teacher, Moses wrote for us that if a man's brother dies leaving a wife but no children, the man should marry the widow and raise up offspring for his brother. ²⁹Now there were seven brothers. The first married a wife and died childless. ³⁰The second ³¹The third picked up her. And in like manner the seven also — then they departed no children, and died. ³²Finally, the woman also died. ³³In the resurrection, therefore, whose wife will the woman be? For all seven had her as wife." ³⁴Jesus said to them, "The people of this age marry and are given in marriage. ³⁵But those who are considered worthy to attain that age and the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage. ³⁶For they cannot die anymore, because they are like angels and are children of God, being children of the resurrection. ³⁷But that the dead are raised, even Moses showed in the passage about the bush, where he calls the Lord 'the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob.' ³⁸He is not the God of the dead but of the living, for all are alive to him." ³⁹Some of the scribes responded, "Teacher, you have spoken well." ⁴⁰For they no longer dared to ask him anything. ⁴¹Then he said to them, "How can they say that the Christ is David's son? ⁴²For David himself says in the Book of Psalms, 'The Lord said to my Lord, "Sit at my right hand, ⁴³Till I make your enemies your footstool. ⁴⁴David thus calls him 'Lord' — so how can he be his son?" ⁴⁵While all the people were listening, he said to his disciples, ⁴⁶"Watch out for the scribes, who like to walk around in long robes, and love greetings in the marketplaces, the best seats in the synagogues, and the places of honor at banquets. ⁴⁷They devour the houses of widows and make long prayers for appearance's sake. These will receive a more severe judgment."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Luke uses the verb euangelizomenou ('proclaiming good news, preaching the gospel'), unique to his version of this scene. The three groups — chief priests (archiereis), scribes (grammateis), and elders (presbyteroi) — constitute the Sanhedrin, the supreme Jewish governing council. Their approach is described as epestēsan ('stood upon, confronted'), implying an official and possibly hostile approach.

2. The double question targets both the nature ('what kind of authority') and the source ('who authorized you') of Jesus's actions. The word exousia ('authority, right, power') is a legal and religious term — they are demanding his credentials. The phrase tauta poieis ('you are doing these things') refers to the temple cleansing and the teaching; both require rabbinic or priestly authorization that Jesus has not sought.
3. Jesus's counter-question is a standard rabbinic technique — answering a question with a question was not evasion but a recognized form of argumentation. By establishing that they must answer first, Jesus shifts the power dynamic of the exchange.
4. The dichotomy is absolute: ex ouranou ('from heaven,' meaning 'from God') or ex anthrōpōn ('from humans,' meaning 'of merely human invention'). There is no middle ground. The question is strategically brilliant because the authorities' answer to this question will logically determine the answer to their own question about Jesus's authority — since John endorsed Jesus.
5. The verb synlogisanto ('they reasoned together, calculated together') reveals that their deliberation is political calculation, not theological inquiry. They evaluate each possible answer not for its truth but for its consequences. If John's baptism was from God, their failure to submit to it indicts them.
6. The verb katalithasei ('will stone') may be literal or hyperbolic — stoning was the Torah-prescribed punishment for blasphemy and false prophecy, and denying a true prophet could be perceived as blasphemous. The perfect participle pepeismenos ('having been convinced, firmly persuaded') indicates a settled, unshakeable popular conviction about John's prophetic status.
7. Their answer mē eidenai pothen ('not to know from where') is an admission of either ignorance or cowardice — the religious leaders of Israel profess inability to evaluate a major prophetic movement. The admission damages their own credibility: if they cannot assess John, how can they assess Jesus?
8. Jesus does not refuse to answer because he cannot but because they have refused to engage honestly. The logical implication is clear to the audience: if they had acknowledged John's divine authority, the answer about Jesus's authority would follow naturally. Their dishonesty forfeits their right to a direct answer.
9. The parable draws directly on Isaiah 5:1-7, where the vineyard represents Israel and the owner represents God. The geōrgois ('farmers, vine-dressers, tenants') are those entrusted with caring for what belongs to another. The detail apedēmēsen chronous hikanous ('went away for a considerable time') explains why the tenants might grow presumptuous — the owner's long absence leads them to act as though the vineyard were their own.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 5:1-7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The kairō ('at the appointed time, at the season') refers to the harvest — the owner sends for what is rightfully his. The verb deirantes ('having beaten, having flayed') indicates a physical assault. The slave represents the prophets sent to Israel's leaders demanding the fruit of faithful obedience. Being sent away kenon ('empty') means the owner received nothing of what was owed.
11. The verb prosetheto ('he added, he proceeded') is a Septuagintalism — a Hebrew idiom (vayosef, 'he added again') rendered literally in Greek. Each subsequent sending represents another prophetic mission. The addition of atimasantes ('having dishonored, having treated shamefully') escalates the violence beyond the first episode.
12. The escalation continues: the first slave was beaten, the second beaten and dishonored, the third traumatisantes ('wounded') and exebalon ('thrown out, expelled'). Luke uses three slaves (Mark has multiple unnamed servants); the threefold pattern creates a climactic buildup to the sending of the son. The history of Israel's treatment of the prophets (cf. Nehemiah 9:26, 2 Chronicles 36:15-16) is compressed into three episodes.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Nehemiah 9:26. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
12. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on 2 Chronicles 36:15-16. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
13. The phrase ton huion mou ton agapēton ('my beloved son') is identical to the divine voice at Jesus's baptism (3:22) and transfiguration (9:35), making the allegorical identification unmistakable. The word isōs ('perhaps') reveals the owner's vulnerability — he sends his most precious envoy without certainty of success, an astonishing portrayal of divine risk-taking. The question ti poiēsō ('what shall I do?') humanizes the owner's deliberation.
14. The tenants' reasoning reflects first-century land law: if an owner died without clear succession and the land was unclaimed, those working it could potentially claim it by possession. Their calculation is both logical and monstrous. The word klēronomos ('heir') and klēronomia ('inheritance') are covenantal terms — the inheritance of Israel's promises is at stake. The verb apokteinōmen ('let us kill') is a deliberative subjunctive expressing a cold, calculated decision.
15. Luke reverses Mark's order: in Mark 12:8, they kill the son first and then throw the body out; in Luke, they throw him out first and then kill him. Luke's order may reflect Jesus's actual death outside the walls of Jerusalem (Hebrews 13:12). The question ti oun poiēsei ('what then will he do?') turns the audience into judges of their own case — they must pronounce the verdict before realizing it applies to them.
16. In Luke (unlike Mark and Matthew), Jesus answers his own question rather than letting the audience answer. The phrase allois ('to others') is deliberately unspecified — it could refer to Gentiles, to new leaders, or to a renewed community. The audience's response mē genoito ('may it never happen!') is a strong deprecation indicating they understood the parable's implication and recoiled from it. This phrase is Paul's characteristic expression of horror (Romans 6:2, 9:14, etc.).

17. The verb emblepsas ('having looked intently at, having fixed his gaze upon') conveys a penetrating, searching look. Jesus quotes Psalm 118:22, which was already a messianic text in Jewish interpretation. The 'builders' (oikodomountes) are the temple authorities — those responsible for constructing God's house. The kephalēn gōnias ('head of the corner, cornerstone') is the stone that determines the alignment of the entire structure. The rejected stone becomes the most important one.
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalms 118:22. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. This expansion of the stone imagery draws on Isaiah 8:14-15 (a stone of stumbling) and Daniel 2:34-35, 44-45 (the stone that crushes the statue). Two fates are described: those who stumble over the stone are 'shattered' (synthlasthēsetai), and those the stone falls upon are 'winnowed to dust' (likmēsei). The verb likmēsei ('will winnow, will scatter like chaff') is agricultural imagery — total pulverization. There is no neutral response to the cornerstone.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 8:14-15 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Daniel 2:34-35 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The phrase en autē tē hōra ('at that very hour') indicates an immediate, rage-driven impulse. The verb epibalein tas cheiras ('to lay hands upon, to seize') is a technical term for arrest. Their recognition that the parable was pros autous ('against them, directed at them') confirms the allegorical reading: they are the wicked tenants. Fear of the people (ephobēthēsan ton laon) is the only restraint, not conscience or uncertainty.
20. The word enkathetous ('spies, secret agents, persons planted in ambush') appears only here in the New Testament. The verb hypokrinomenous ('pretending, play-acting') is the root of 'hypocrite' — they perform sincerity. The ultimate goal is paradounai ('to hand over, to betray') Jesus to the Roman governor (hēgemonos, Pontius Pilate). The authorities have moved from wanting to kill him (19:47) to a concrete strategy for using Roman power to accomplish it.
21. The flattery is elaborate and calculated. The phrase ou lambaneis prosōpon ('you do not receive a face, you show no partiality') is a Septuagintalism translating the Hebrew nasa panim, a judicial term meaning to judge without favoritism. By praising Jesus's impartiality, the spies set up a question designed to force a politically compromising answer regardless of which side he takes.
22. The word phoron ('tribute, tax') refers specifically to the Roman poll tax (tributum capitis), which was deeply resented as a symbol of subjugation. The question exestin ('is it lawful/permitted?') frames the issue in terms of Torah compliance. If Jesus says 'yes,' he alienates Jewish nationalists; if 'no,' he can be reported to Rome as a seditious revolutionary. The trap is a masterpiece of political engineering.
23. The verb katanoēsas ('having perceived, having seen through') implies thorough understanding. The noun panourgian ('craftiness, cunning, trickery') is a strong word — it suggests malicious cleverness. Luke omits Jesus's counter-accusation 'Why are you testing me?' (found in Mark 12:15 and Matthew 22:18), moving directly to his response.
24. The dēnariou ('denarius') was a Roman silver coin worth a day's wage, bearing the image (eikona) of the emperor (likely Tiberius) and an inscription (epigraphēn) reading 'Tiberius Caesar, Son of the Divine Augustus.' The word eikōn ('image') is the same word used in Genesis 1:26-27 (Septuagint) for humanity made in God's 'image' — a connection Jesus will exploit in the next verse. The fact that the spies can produce a Roman coin in the temple precincts is itself ironic.
24. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Genesis 1:26-27. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
25. The verb apodote ('give back, return, repay') implies returning what already belongs to someone — the coin bears Caesar's image and therefore is already his. The parallel structure (ta Kaisaros Kaisari ... ta tou theou tō theō) creates an apparent equivalence, but the second clause subverts the first: if the coin bearing Caesar's image belongs to Caesar, then human beings bearing God's image belong to God. The claim of God is total and ultimate; the claim of Caesar is derivative and limited. Jesus neither endorses nor condemns Roman taxation but reframes the entire question.
26. The verb ischysan ('they were able, they had the strength') with the negative ouk indicates complete failure of their strategy. The verb thaumasantes ('having been amazed, astonished') indicates genuine surprise — even his enemies recognize the brilliance of his response. The verb esigēsan ('they became silent, they held their peace') marks the end of this confrontation: the spies withdraw, speechless.
27. Luke explains the Sadducees' theological position (antilegontes anastasin mē einai, 'denying that there is a resurrection') for his predominantly Gentile audience. The Sadducees were the priestly aristocracy who accepted only the Torah (five books of Moses) as authoritative and rejected the oral tradition, angels, spirits, and bodily resurrection — doctrines they considered innovations without Pentateuchal support.
28. The Sadducees cite the levirate marriage law from Deuteronomy 25:5-6, which required a surviving brother to marry his deceased brother's widow and produce an heir in the dead brother's name. The verb exanastēsē ('raise up') is ironic — they use 'resurrection' language (anastasis) in the context of procreation while denying actual resurrection. The law's purpose was to preserve the deceased brother's name and inheritance in Israel.
28. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Deuteronomy 25:5-6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
29. The number seven represents completeness — seven brothers ensures the scenario is exhaustive. The hypothetical case is likely a stock argument the Sadducees used regularly in debates with Pharisees about the resurrection.

- 30. Luke compresses the narrative here. The SBLGNT has only kai ho deuteros ('and the second') with the remaining details implied from context. Some manuscripts expand the verse, but the critical text is remarkably terse.
- 31. The phrase hōsautōs de kai hoi hepta ('likewise also the seven') telescopes the remaining four brothers into a single statement. The cumulative effect — seven marriages, seven deaths, no children — is designed to make the resurrection scenario seem absurd: whose wife would she be if all seven rise?
- 32. The word hysteron ('lastly, finally') closes the scenario. All eight parties are now dead, setting up the question in the next verse. The woman's death is mentioned without comment — she is the silent center of a legal puzzle constructed entirely by men.
- 33. The question assumes that resurrected life is simply a continuation of earthly life with all its social structures intact. The Sadducees consider this reductio ad absurdum proof that resurrection is logically impossible. Their error, as Jesus will show, lies in their assumption about the nature of the resurrected state.
- 34. The phrase hoi huiōi tou aiōnos toutou ('the sons of this age') is a Semitism meaning 'those who belong to the present age' — people living in the current world order. The two verbs gamousin ('marry,' active, typically of men) and gamiskontai ('are given in marriage,' passive, typically of women) reflect the ancient social reality of arranged marriages.
- 35. The phrase hoi kataxiōthentes ('those considered worthy, those deemed deserving') raises the question of who determines worthiness — the passive voice suggests God makes this determination. 'That age' (tou aiōnos ekeinou) is the age to come, the new creation. Jesus's answer demolishes the Sadducees' premise: resurrected life is qualitatively different from present life, not merely a continuation of it. Marriage, as a social institution tied to procreation and mortality, is unnecessary in a state where death no longer exists.
- 36. The word isangeloi ('equal to angels, angel-like') appears only here in the New Testament. The comparison is specific: like angels, the resurrected do not die and do not procreate — it does not mean they become angels. The chain of logic: no death no need for marriage (which exists partly to replace the dying) the Sadducees' question is based on a false premise. The phrase huiōi theou ('children of God') is defined by the following phrase: they are God's children precisely because they are huiōi tēs anastaseōs ('children of the resurrection').
- 37. Jesus's brilliance lies in citing the Torah itself — the only scripture the Sadducees accepted. The phrase epi tēs batou ('at the bush') uses a common method of scriptural reference (naming a passage by its prominent feature), referring to Exodus 3:6. The argument: God identifies himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob long after their deaths. If they no longer exist, the statement is meaningless — God would be the God of nothing.
- 37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 3:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 38. The concluding statement is devastating to the Sadducean position: if God is the God of the living, and if he identifies himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, then Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob must be alive. The phrase pantes gar autō zōsin ('for all are alive to him') is unique to Luke and extends the principle beyond the three patriarchs: from God's perspective, all the covenant dead are living. This is not a proof of bodily resurrection per se but of continued personal existence after death — which is the necessary precondition for resurrection.
- 39. The scribes who commend Jesus here are likely Pharisees, who affirmed the resurrection and would have been delighted to see the Sadducees' argument dismantled. The phrase kalōs eipas ('you have spoken well, you have answered beautifully') is a genuine academic compliment from theological allies on this particular point.
- 40. The verb etolmōn ('they dared, they had the courage') with the negative ouketi ('no longer') indicates that Jesus's series of responses has silenced all challengers. The progression through the chapter — Pharisees, Herodians (via spies), Sadducees — represents every major faction, and all have been defeated. The intellectual conflict is over; only political violence remains as their option.
- 41. Having silenced all challengers, Jesus now poses his own question. The 'they' (legousin) is impersonal — 'how is it said?' The question does not deny Davidic descent (which Matthew and Luke's genealogies affirm) but challenges whether 'son of David' adequately describes the Messiah's identity. The question introduces a christological riddle that the audience cannot resolve.
- 42. Jesus quotes Psalm 110:1, the most frequently cited Old Testament text in the New Testament. The Greek has kyrios ('Lord') for both the Hebrew YHWH and Adonai, creating an ambiguity that the Hebrew original distinguishes: 'YHWH said to my lord (adoni).' The psalm is attributed to David, and Jesus accepts Davidic authorship as the basis for his argument. The 'right hand' position (ek dexiōn) is the position of supreme honor and shared authority.
- 42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalms 110:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 43. The image of enemies as a footstool (hypopodion tōn podōn) derives from the ancient Near Eastern practice of a conqueror placing his foot on the neck of a defeated king (cf. Joshua 10:24). The 'until' (heōs an) does not imply a time limit on the enthronement but marks the completion of the conquest.
- 43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Psalms 110:1 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Joshua 10:24 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.

44. The argument is straightforward: in the culture of the ancient Near East, a father never calls his son 'lord' — the honor flows upward, from son to father. If David calls the Messiah 'my Lord,' the Messiah must be greater than David, not merely his descendant. Jesus does not deny that the Messiah is David's son but implies that he is also something more — a claim the audience must work out for themselves. The question is left unanswered, hovering over the narrative.
45. The phrase akouontos pantos tou laou ('all the people listening') specifies that Jesus's warning about the scribes is delivered publicly, not privately. The people hear his critique of their religious leaders, adding to the leaders' humiliation and rage.
46. The stolais ('long robes') were distinctive garments that marked the wearer as a person of learning and status. Four desires are listed in ascending order of social privilege: public recognition in the streets (greetings), public honor in commerce (marketplaces), religious honor (synagogue seats), and social honor (banquet positions). The verb philountōn ('loving, desiring') reveals that these are not incidental perks but actively sought status markers.
47. The verb katesthousin ('they devour, they consume') is visceral — the metaphor of eating someone's house evokes predatory exploitation. Widows (chērōn) were the most vulnerable members of society, the very people the Torah commanded to protect (Exodus 22:22, Deuteronomy 10:18). The phrase prophasei ('for a pretext, for appearance') exposes their prayers as performance. The 'greater judgment' (perissoteron krima) implies degrees of accountability — those who exploit the vulnerable while performing piety face the most severe divine reckoning.

Summary: Luke 21 opens with the widow's offering, transitions to Jesus's prediction of the temple's destruction, and then delivers the extended eschatological discourse — sometimes called the Olivet Discourse, though Luke does not locate it on the Mount of Olives. Jesus describes the signs preceding Jerusalem's fall and the coming of the Son of Man: wars, earthquakes, persecution, the siege of Jerusalem, cosmic disturbances, and the command to watch and pray. The chapter concludes with a summary of Jesus's daily teaching routine during his final week.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's version of the eschatological discourse is notably more specific about the fall of Jerusalem (AD 70) than Mark's or Matthew's versions. Verse 20's reference to 'Jerusalem surrounded by armies' replaces Mark's more cryptic 'abomination of desolation' (Mark 13:14), suggesting Luke writes for an audience that either witnessed or is aware of the Roman siege. The parable of the fig tree and the declaration that 'this generation will not pass away' create one of the most debated interpretive puzzles in the Gospels.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the destruction of Jerusalem and the coming of the Son of Man is ambiguous — whether Jesus describes one event, two events separated by time, or two aspects of one reality is debated. We render the text without harmonizing or imposing a particular eschatological framework. 'This generation' (v. 32) is rendered literally; its referent (Jesus's contemporaries, or the generation that sees the signs) is left to the reader.

Connections: The widow's offering connects thematically to 20:47 (scribes who devour widows' houses). The temple destruction prophecy fulfills 19:44. The persecution predictions anticipate Acts (where they are fulfilled in detail). The cosmic signs draw on Isaiah 13:10, Joel 2:30-31, and Daniel 7:13-14. The fig tree parable echoes the cursed fig tree of Mark 11 (which Luke omits). The command to 'watch and pray' prepares for Gethsemane (22:40-46).

¹He looked up and saw the rich putting their gifts into the temple treasury. ²He also saw a poor widow putting in two small copper coins. ³He said, "Truly I tell you, this poor widow has put in more than all of them. ⁴For all these others contributed out of their abundance, but she out of her poverty put in all the livelihood she had." ⁵When some were speaking about the temple, how it was adorned with beautiful stones and dedicated gifts, he said, ⁶"As for these things you are looking at, the days will come when not one stone will be left on another — every one will be torn down." ⁷They asked him, "Teacher, when will these things happen? And what will be the sign when these things are about to take place?" ⁸He said, "Watch out that you are not deceived. For many will come in my name, saying, 'I am he,' and, 'The time is near.' Do not follow them. ⁹When you hear of wars and uprisings, do not be terrified. These things must happen first, but the end will not come immediately." ¹ Then he said to them, "Nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. ¹¹ There will be great earthquakes, and famines and plagues in various places, and there will be terrifying events and great signs from heaven. ¹² But before all this, they will seize you and persecute you, handing you over to synagogues and prisons, and you will be brought before kings and governors because of my name. ¹³ This will be your opportunity to testify. ¹⁴ So resolve in your hearts not to prepare your defense in advance, ¹⁵ For I will provide you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries will not be able to oppose nor resist. ¹⁶ You will be handed over even by parents, brothers, relatives, and friends, and they will put some of you to death. ¹⁷ You will be hated by everyone because of my name. ¹⁸ But not a hair of your head will perish. ¹⁹ By your endurance you will gain your lives. ²⁰ "When you see Jerusalem being surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has drawn near. ²¹ Then let those in Judea flee to the mountains, let those inside the city get out, and let those in the countryside not enter it. ²² For these are days of vengeance, so that everything that has been written will be fulfilled. ²³ How terrible it will be for those who are pregnant and for those who are nursing infants in those days! For there will be great distress upon the land and wrath against this people. ²⁴ They will fall by the edge of the sword and be led away as captives to all the nations, and Jerusalem will be trampled by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled. ²⁵ "There will be signs in the sun, moon, and stars, and on the earth distress among nations, bewildered by the roaring and surging of the sea. ²⁶ People will faint from fear and dread of what is coming upon the inhabited world, for the powers of the heavens will be shaken. ²⁷ Then will they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with authority and remarkable glory. ²⁸ When these things begin to happen, stand up and raise your heads, because your redemption is drawing near." ²⁹ He told them a parable: "Look at the fig tree and all the trees. ³⁰ When they sprout leaves, you can see for yourselves and know that summer is already near. ³¹ In the same way, when you see these things happening, know that the kingdom of God is near. ³² Truly I tell you, this generation will certainly not pass away until all these things have happened. ³³ Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will never pass away. ³⁴ "Watch yourselves, so that your hearts are not weighed down with carousing, drunkenness, and the worries of this life, and that day closes on you suddenly ³⁵ Because as a snare will it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. ³⁶ Stay alert at all times, praying that you may have strength to escape all these things that are going to take place, and to stand before the Son of Man." ³⁷ During the day he was teaching in the temple, but at night he would go out and spend the night on the hill called the Mount of Olives. ³⁸ And all the people would come to him early in the morning in the temple to listen to him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The gazophylakion ('treasury') was located in the Court of the Women, where thirteen trumpet-shaped collection boxes lined the wall, each designated for a specific type of offering. The verb ballontas ('throwing, casting') suggests the coins made audible noise as they fell — the rich would have made a conspicuous display.
2. The adjective penichran ('needy, poor') is stronger than the usual word for poor (ptōchos); it implies destitution. The lepta ('small coins') were the smallest denomination in circulation — each worth about one-128th of a denarius. Two lepta made a quadran, the Roman minimum for a transaction. She gives the absolute smallest possible offering.
3. The phrase pleion pantōn ('more than all') is a comparative that reverses human arithmetic: by every measurable standard, her gift is the smallest, yet Jesus declares it the largest. The adverb alēthōs ('truly') emphasizes the counterintuitive nature of the claim. Jesus measures giving not by amount but by cost to the giver.
4. The contrast is between perisseuontos ('surplus, abundance, what overflows') and hysterēmatos ('deficit, lack, poverty'). The phrase panta ton bion hon eichen ('all the life/livelihood she had') uses bios, which means both 'life' and 'livelihood' — she gave not just her money but her means of survival. This connects directly to 20:47's denunciation of scribes who devour widows' houses: the temple system that should protect her consumes her last resources.
5. Herod's temple was one of the ancient world's architectural wonders. The lithois kalois ('beautiful stones') likely refers to the massive white limestone blocks (some weighing over 500 tons) that formed the walls. The anathēmasin ('dedicated gifts, votive offerings') included golden vine decorations and shields donated by wealthy patrons. Josephus describes the temple as covered in gold plates that blazed in the morning sun.
6. The prophecy lithos epi lithō ('stone upon stone') predicts total destruction. This was fulfilled in AD 70 when Titus's legions dismantled the temple, reportedly prying apart stones to recover gold that had melted into the crevices during the fire. The verb katalythēsetai ('will be torn down, demolished') is emphatic. The double negative construction (ouk ... hos ou) means 'there will not be a single stone left standing upon another that is not torn down' — comprehensive destruction without exception.

7. The two questions — 'when?' (pote) and 'what sign?' (ti to sēmeion) — shape the rest of the discourse. Luke's version has only two questions (unlike Matthew's three in 24:3, which adds 'and of the end of the age'). This gives Luke's discourse a tighter focus on the destruction of Jerusalem rather than the end of the world.
8. The first warning is against deception (planēthēte, 'be led astray'). The phrase ego eimi ('I am he') echoes the divine self-revelation formula (Exodus 3:14; Isaiah 43:10), suggesting false messiahs who claim divine status. Luke uniquely adds ho kairos ēngiken ('the time has drawn near'), warning against those who claim the end is imminent. The command mē poreuthēte opisō autōn ('do not go after them') prohibits joining their movements.

8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 43:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. Luke uses akatastasias ('disorders, instabilities, uprisings') instead of Mark's 'rumors of wars,' a term that better fits the political turbulence of the 60s AD in Judea. The verb ptoēthēte ('be terrified, be startled') implies a visceral, panicked fear. The phrase ouk eutheōs to telos ('not immediately the end') is another distinctly Lukan addition, tempering eschatological urgency: wars are not the end itself but precursors.
10. The formula ethnos ep' ethnos kai basileia epi basileian ('nation against nation and kingdom against kingdom') echoes Isaiah 19:2 and 2 Chronicles 15:6, drawing on prophetic language for catastrophic upheaval. The scope is international, not merely local — the entire political order will be convulsed.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Isaiah 19:2 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes 2 Chronicles 15:6 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. Luke combines seismoi ('earthquakes'), limoi ('famines'), and loimoi ('plagues, pestilences') — the last two form a near-rhyme in Greek (limoi kai loimoi), which may be a mnemonic device. The phobētra ('terrifying things, terrors') and sēmeia megala ('great signs') from heaven are unique to Luke and expand the catalog of portents beyond the natural to the cosmic.
12. The phrase pro de toutōn pantōn ('but before all these things') establishes a chronological marker: persecution of the disciples precedes the cosmic upheavals. The progression from synagogue trials to prison to royal courts mirrors exactly what happens in Acts: apostles before the Sanhedrin (Acts 4-5), Stephen's synagogue trial (Acts 6-7), James and Peter in prison (Acts 12), Paul before governors Felix and Festus and King Agrippa (Acts 24-26). Luke's Jesus prophesies what Luke the historian later narrates.
13. The phrase apobēsetai hymin eis martyron ('it will result for you in testimony') reframes persecution as opportunity. The word martyron ('testimony, witness') is the root of 'martyrdom' — in early Christianity, the two concepts were inseparable. What the persecutors intend as silencing becomes a platform for proclamation.
14. The phrase thete en tais kardiais hymōn ('set in your hearts, settle it firmly') indicates a decided commitment. The verb promeletān ('to practice beforehand, to rehearse') was used for rehearsing speeches — Jesus forbids the kind of anxious preparation that suggests reliance on human eloquence rather than divine provision.
15. Unlike Mark 13:11, which attributes the words to the Holy Spirit, Luke has Jesus say 'I will give' (egō dōsō) — a first-person divine promise. The pair stoma kai sophian ('a mouth and wisdom') means both the content of speech and the skill to deliver it. The two verbs antistēnai ('to resist, withstand') and anteipein ('to contradict, speak against') cover both physical intimidation and intellectual rebuttal — opponents will fail on both fronts. This is fulfilled in Acts: Stephen's opponents 'could not withstand the wisdom and the Spirit with which he was speaking' (Acts 6:10).
16. The verb paradothēsethe ('you will be handed over, betrayed') is the same word used for Judas's betrayal of Jesus (22:4, 6). The escalating list — parents, brothers, relatives, friends — describes the disintegration of the most intimate bonds. The phrase thanatōsousin ex hymōn ('they will kill some of you') is blunt: following Jesus will cost some disciples their lives. This is fulfilled in Acts with the deaths of Stephen (Acts 7) and James (Acts 12:2).
17. The phrase hypo pantōn ('by all') is hyperbolic but communicates the universality of the hostility — opposition will come from every direction. The phrase dia to onoma mou ('because of my name') identifies Jesus's name as the cause of hatred, connecting back to verse 12. Bearing his name marks the disciples as targets.
18. This creates an apparent paradox with verse 16 ('some of you will be put to death'): how can not a hair perish if some will die? The resolution lies in the eschatological perspective — physical death does not represent ultimate loss for those who belong to Christ. The double negative ou mē ('by no means, absolutely not') is the strongest Greek negation, expressing absolute divine protection of the disciples' ultimate destiny, even through martyrdom.
19. The word hypomonē ('endurance, steadfast persistence, patient endurance under suffering') is a key virtue in early Christianity. The verb ktēsasthe can be either imperative ('gain!') or future indicative ('you will gain') — the ambiguity may be intentional, functioning as both command and promise. The psychas ('souls, lives') echoes 17:33: the way to preserve one's life is not through self-protection but through faithful endurance.
20. This is Luke's most distinctive departure from the Markan parallel: where Mark 13:14 has the cryptic 'abomination of desolation standing where it should not,' Luke has the concrete image of Jerusalem surrounded by armies (stratopedōn, 'military camps'). The word erēmōsis ('desolation, devastation, depopulation') echoes Daniel 9:27 and 12:11, connecting Jesus's prophecy to the Danielic tradition. This verse is often cited as evidence that Luke wrote after AD 70, though prophetic specificity does not require post-event composition.

- 20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Daniel 9:27 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 21. Three groups receive three commands: those in Judea (flee to mountains), those inside Jerusalem (leave immediately), those in the surrounding countryside (do not seek refuge in the city). According to Eusebius (Church History 3.5.3), the Jerusalem Christians did flee to Pella in Transjordan before the Roman siege, possibly in response to this prophecy. The verb ekchōreitōsan ('let them depart, withdraw') is unique to Luke among the Synoptics.
- 22. The phrase hēmerai ekdikēseōs ('days of vengeance/retribution') echoes Hosea 9:7 and Isaiah 63:4 — prophetic language for divine judgment on a faithless people. The phrase panta ta gegrammena ('everything written') refers to the prophetic warnings in the Hebrew Bible about judgment on Jerusalem (cf. Deuteronomy 28:49-57, Daniel 9:26-27). Luke frames the destruction not as a Roman political action but as the fulfillment of prophetic scripture.

- 23. The 'woe' (ouai) is an expression of grief, not a curse — Jesus mourns the suffering of the most vulnerable. Pregnant women and nursing mothers would be the least able to flee. The phrase anankē megalē ('great distress, dire necessity') describes the extreme suffering of the siege. Luke adds orgē tō laō toutō ('wrath against this people'), making explicit what is implicit in Mark — the siege is an expression of divine judgment.
- 24. This verse is unique to Luke and describes the post-destruction fate of Jerusalem with remarkable precision: stomati machairēs ('by the mouth/edge of the sword') — Josephus reports that 1.1 million Jews died in the siege; aichmalōtisthēsontai ('will be taken captive') — Josephus reports 97,000 taken prisoner. The phrase kairoi ethnōn ('times of the Gentiles') introduces a mysterious period of Gentile domination over Jerusalem with a definite end (achri hou, 'until'). This implies eventual restoration, but the timeline is deliberately unspecified.
- 25. The discourse shifts from Jerusalem's destruction to cosmic upheaval, drawing on prophetic imagery from Isaiah 13:10, Joel 2:30-31, and Amos 8:9. Whether these cosmic signs are literal or metaphorical for political upheaval is debated — in Old Testament prophetic literature, cosmic language often describes the fall of political powers (cf. Isaiah 13:10 about Babylon, Ezekiel 32:7 about Egypt). The word synochē ('distress, anguish, constriction') suggests a tightening, suffocating fear. The aporia ('bewilderment, perplexity, helplessness') adds cognitive paralysis to the emotional distress.

- 26. The verb apopsychontōn ('fainting, breathing out, expiring from fear') is unique to the New Testament — literally 'breathing away,' suggesting people will be so terrified they lose consciousness or die of fright. The oikoumenē ('inhabited world') is the entire civilized world, not merely Judea. The dynameis tōn ouranōn ('powers of the heavens') may refer to celestial bodies (sun, moon, stars as cosmic forces), angelic powers, or both — the shaking (saleuthēsontai) of these powers represents the dissolution of the created order itself.
- 27. This alludes directly to Daniel 7:13-14, where 'one like a son of man' comes 'with the clouds of heaven' to receive dominion from the Ancient of Days. Luke uses the singular nephelē ('a cloud,' not 'clouds'), emphasizing the theophanic quality — in the Old Testament, the cloud is associated with God's presence (Exodus 13:21, 40:34). The combination of dynamis ('power') and doxa ('glory') marks this as a divine appearance. The verb opsontai ('they will see') indicates universal visibility — this is not a secret or spiritual event.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 7:13-14. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 13:21. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 28. While the world faints from terror (v. 26), the disciples are told to stand up (anakypsate, 'straighten up, look up with confidence') and raise their heads (eparate tas kephalas, 'lift your heads') — postures of hope, not fear. The word apolytrōsis ('redemption, liberation, ransom') is a commercial term for buying a slave's freedom. The same events that terrify the world signal liberation for believers. This verse is the emotional heart of the discourse: the coming of the Son of Man is not a threat but a rescue.

- 29. Luke adds 'and all the trees' (kai panta ta dendra) to Mark's 'fig tree,' universalizing the analogy — any deciduous tree demonstrates the same principle. In Palestine, the fig tree's leaf cycle was a particularly reliable seasonal marker because it was one of the last trees to leaf out in spring.
- 30. The verb probalōsin ('put forth, sprout') refers to the visible budding of leaves. The phrase aph' heautōn ('from yourselves, on your own') emphasizes that this is observable common sense — no special revelation is needed. The analogy is simple: just as natural signs indicate coming seasons, the events described in this discourse will indicate the coming of the kingdom.
- 31. Luke has 'the kingdom of God' (hē basileia tou theou) where Mark 13:29 has simply 'he is near' or 'it is near' — Luke makes the referent explicit. The signs described in this discourse do not predict the kingdom's arrival but signal its proximity. The present imperative ginōskete ('know, recognize') demands ongoing awareness.
- 32. The phrase hē genea hautē ('this generation') is among the most debated expressions in the Gospels. It could mean: (1) Jesus's contemporaries (fulfilled if 'all these things' refers to AD 70), (2) the generation alive when the signs begin (making it future-referential), (3) 'this kind of people' (the faithless generation, making it a moral category). The double negative ou mē ('certainly not, by no means') expresses absolute certainty. We render the Greek literally and leave the interpretive question to the reader.
- 33. The claim is extraordinary: the most permanent things in human experience — heaven and earth — are declared temporary, while Jesus's words are declared eternal. The same verb pareuasetai ('will pass away') is used for both, creating a direct contrast. This is an implicit claim to divine authority — only God's word endures forever (Isaiah 40:8). Jesus places his own words on par with the word of God.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 40:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. The warnings are uniquely Lukan. The verb barēthōsin ('be weighed down, be made heavy') echoes the Gethsemane scene (22:45, where the disciples are 'weighed down with grief'). Three dangers are listed: kraipale ('carousing, hangover, dissipation'), methē ('drunkenness'), and merimnais biōtikais ('worries of daily life, anxieties about livelihood'). The third is as dangerous as the first two — ordinary anxieties can dull spiritual alertness as effectively as excess.
- 35. The word pagis ('trap, snare') describes something that springs shut suddenly and inescapably. The scope is universal: epi pantas tous kathēmenous epi prosōpon pasēs tēs gēs ('upon all who sit/dwell upon the face of all the earth'). No one is exempt. The imagery connects to the Noah and Lot comparisons of 17:26-30 — the day catches people in the midst of ordinary life.
- 36. The verb agrypneite ('stay awake, be vigilant, be sleepless') is stronger than the usual grēgoreite ('watch') — it implies a state of constant wakefulness. The verb katischysēte ('have strength, prevail, be able') emphasizes that escaping the coming tribulations and standing before the Son of Man requires divine empowerment obtained through prayer. The goal is dual: ekphygein ('to escape') the coming calamities and stathēnai ('to stand') — to be found standing rather than fallen when the Son of Man appears. This verse bookends the discourse with verse 8's opening warning: the proper response to eschatological expectation is not calculation but prayer.
- 37. This summary verse establishes Jesus's routine during his final week: temple teaching by day, withdrawal to the Mount of Olives by night. The verb ēlizeto ('lodged, spent the night, bivouacked') suggests sleeping outdoors rather than in a house — possibly at the garden of Gethsemane on the olive-tree-covered hillside. This pattern explains how Judas knew where to find Jesus at night (22:39).
- 38. The verb ōrthrizen ('came early, rose at dawn') indicates the people's eagerness — they arrived at the temple at first light to hear Jesus teach. This popular devotion explains the authorities' dilemma (19:47-48, 20:19): the people's intense attachment to Jesus makes a public arrest politically impossible, forcing the leaders to seek a covert opportunity, which Judas will provide.

Summary: Luke 22 narrates the final hours before Jesus's arrest: Judas's conspiracy with the chief priests, preparations for the Passover meal, the institution of the Lord's Supper, the dispute about greatness among the disciples, the prediction of Peter's denial, the agony in Gethsemane, the arrest, Peter's denial, the mocking and beating of Jesus, and his appearance before the Sanhedrin at dawn. This is the longest chapter in Luke and the most theologically dense, encompassing the transition from ministry to passion.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's Last Supper account contains unique material not found in the other Gospels: the dispute about greatness occurring during the meal (not earlier as in Mark/Matthew), Jesus's declaration that he has earnestly desired to eat this Passover, the two-cup structure, and the extended farewell discourse. The Gethsemane account includes the textually disputed verses 43-44 (the angel strengthening Jesus and his sweat becoming like drops of blood), which are among the most famous textual variants in the New Testament. Luke alone records Jesus healing the ear of the high priest's servant during the arrest.

Translation Friction: Verses 43-44 (the strengthening angel and the bloody sweat) are absent from important early manuscripts (P75, Aleph, A, B, T, W) but present in others (Aleph-2, D, L, Theta, family 13, and most Byzantine manuscripts). Their authenticity is disputed. We include them following the SBLGNT's double-bracketed text but note the manuscript evidence. The two-cup structure (vv. 17-18 and v. 20) is debated — some scholars see it as a Passover seder with its multiple cups, while others view it as a textual issue.*

Connections: The Passover setting connects to Exodus 12 (the original Passover). The words of institution ('this is my body... this cup is the new covenant in my blood') connect to Jeremiah 31:31-34 (the new covenant promise) and Exodus 24:8 (the blood of the covenant). Peter's denial fulfills Jesus's prediction. The Sanhedrin trial fulfills the passion predictions of 9:22, 18:31-33. Jesus's prayer in Gethsemane connects to the Lord's Prayer (11:2-4) and the teaching on persistent prayer (18:1-8).

¹Now the Festival of Unleavened Bread, called the Passover, was approaching. ²The chief priests and the scribes were looking for a way to put him to death, for they feared the people. ³Then Satan entered into Judas, the one called Iscariot, who was numbered among the Twelve. ⁴He went and discussed with the chief priests and temple officers how he might hand Jesus over to them. ⁵They were delighted and agreed to give him money. ⁶He agreed and began looking for an opportunity to hand him over to them when no crowd was present. ⁷Then the day of Unleavened Bread came, on which the Passover lamb had to be sacrificed. ⁸He sent Peter and John, saying, "Go and prepare the Passover for us, so that we may eat it." ⁹They asked him, "Where do you want us to prepare it?" ¹⁰He said to them, "When you have entered the city, a man carrying a jar of water will meet you. Follow him into the house he enters, ¹¹You will say to the goodman of the house, The Master says to you, Where is the guestchamber, where I will eat the passover with my followers? ¹²He will show you a large upper room, furnished and ready. Make preparations there." ¹³They went and found everything just as he had told them, and they prepared the Passover. ¹⁴When the hour came, he reclined at the table, and the apostles with him. ¹⁵He said to them, "I have earnestly desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer. ¹⁶For I tell you, I will not eat it again until it is fulfilled in the kingdom of God." ¹⁷Then he took a cup, and after giving thanks, he said, "Take this and divide it among yourselves. ¹⁸For I tell you, from now on I will not drink of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes." ¹⁹Then he took bread, gave thanks, broke it, and gave it to them, saying, "This is my body, which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me." ²⁰In the same way, after the meal he took the cup, saying, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is poured out for you. ²¹But look — the hand of the one who betrays me is with me on the table. ²²For the Son of Man goes as it has been determined, but woe to that man by whom he is betrayed!" ²³They began to question among themselves which of them it could be who was going to do this. ²⁴A dispute also arose among them as to which of them was considered the greatest. ²⁵He said to them, "The kings of the Gentiles lord it over them, and those in authority over them are called 'Benefactors.' ²⁶But you are not to be like that. Instead, the greatest among you should become like the youngest, and the leader like the one who serves. ²⁷For who is greater, the one who reclines at the table or the one who serves? Is it not the one reclining? Yet I am among you as the one who serves. ²⁸You are those who have stood by me in my trials. ²⁹And I confer on you a kingdom, just as my Father conferred one on me, ³⁰And sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom. ³¹"Simon, Simon, look — Satan has demanded to sift all of you like wheat. ³²But I have prayed for you that your faith may not fail. And when you have turned back, strengthen your brothers." ³³Peter said to him, "Lord, I am ready to go with you both to prison and to death." ³⁴Jesus said, "I tell you, Peter, the rooster will not crow today before you have denied three times that you know me." ³⁵Then he said to them, "When I sent you out without a money bag, a traveler's bag, or sandals, did you lack anything?" They said, "Nothing." ³⁶He said to them, "But now, the one who has a money bag should take it, and likewise a traveler's bag. And the one who has no sword should sell his cloak and buy one. ³⁷For I tell you, this scripture must be fulfilled in me: 'And he was counted among the lawless.' Indeed, what is written about me is reaching its fulfillment." ³⁸They said, "Lord, look, here are two swords." He said to them, "It is enough." ³⁹He went out and made his way to the Mount of Olives, as was his custom, and the disciples followed him. ⁴⁰When he arrived at the place, he said to them, "Pray that you will not fall into temptation." ⁴¹He withdrew from them about a stone's throw, knelt down, and prayed, ⁴²"Father, if you are willing, take this cup from me. Yet not my will but yours be done." ⁴³An angel from heaven appeared to him, strengthening him. ⁴⁴And being in anguish, he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat became like drops of blood falling to the ground. ⁴⁵When he rose from prayer and went to the disciples, he found them sleeping from grief. ⁴⁶He said to them, "Why are you sleeping? Get up and pray, so that you will not fall into temptation." ⁴⁷While he was still speaking, a crowd appeared, and the one called Judas, one of the Twelve, was leading them. He approached Jesus to kiss him, ⁴⁸However, Jesus stated to him, Judas, betrayest you the Son of Man with a kiss? ⁴⁹When those around him saw what was about to happen, they said, "Lord, should we strike with the sword?" ⁵⁰And one of them struck the high priest's servant and cut off his right ear. ⁵¹But Jesus responded, "No more of this!" And he touched the man's ear and healed him. ⁵²Then Jesus said to the chief priests, temple officers, and elders who had come for him, "Have you come out with swords and clubs as if against a revolutionary? ⁵³When I was with you day after day in the temple, you did not lay a hand on me. But this is your hour — and the power of darkness." ⁵⁴They seized him and led him away, bringing him to the high priest's house. Peter was following at a distance. ⁵⁵When they had kindled a fire in the middle of the courtyard and sat down together, Peter sat among them. ⁵⁶A servant girl saw him sitting in the firelight and, staring at him, said, "This man was with him too." ⁵⁷But he denied it, saying, "Woman, I do not know him." ⁵⁸A little later, someone else saw him and said, "You are one of them too." But Peter said, "Man, I am not." ⁵⁹About an hour later, another person insisted, saying, "Certainly this man was with him too, for he is a Galilean." ⁶⁰Peter said, "Man, I do not know what you are talking about." And immediately, while he was still speaking, the rooster crowed. ⁶¹The Lord turned and looked at Peter, and Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had told him, "Before the rooster crows today, you will deny me three times." ⁶²And he went outside and wept bitterly. ⁶³The men who were holding Jesus in custody began mocking and beating him. ⁶⁴They blindfolded him and kept asking, "Prophecy! Who is it that struck you?" ⁶⁵And they said many other blasphemous things against him. ⁶⁶When day came, the council of the elders of the people assembled — both chief priests and scribes — and they led him before their Sanhedrin. ⁶⁷Art you the Christ? tell us. Then he stated to them, If I tell you, you will not trust:. ⁶⁸If I as well ask you, you will not answer me, nor let me depart. ⁶⁹But from now on, the Son of Man will be seated at the right hand of the power of God." ⁷⁰They all said, "Are you then the Son of God?" He said to them, "You say that I am." ⁷¹They said, "What further testimony do we need? We have heard it ourselves from his own mouth."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Technically, the Passover and the Festival of Unleavened Bread were distinct celebrations (Passover on Nisan 14, Unleavened Bread from Nisan 15-21), but by the first century, the terms were used interchangeably in popular speech. Luke's phrase hē legomenē pascha ('which is called Passover') reflects this common usage. The imperfect ēngizen ('was approaching') creates narrative tension — the reader knows what the festival will bring.
2. The imperfect ezētoun ('they were seeking') indicates ongoing, frustrated plotting. The verb anelōsin ('to destroy, to kill, to do away with') is a euphemism for execution. Their fear of the people (ephobountos ton laon) has been the obstacle since 19:47-48 and 20:19. What changes the equation is Judas's offer in the next verses.
3. Luke and John (13:27) are the only Gospels that attribute Judas's betrayal to Satan's direct intervention. Luke last mentioned Satan in 4:13, where the devil departed from Jesus 'until an opportune time' (achri kairou) — this is that opportune time. The epithet 'Iscariot' (Iskariōtēn) may mean 'man of Keriōth' (a Judean town) or may derive from the Latin sicarius ('dagger-man, assassin'). The phrase onta ek tou arithmou tōn dōdeka ('being from the number of the twelve') underscores the horror: the betrayer comes from within the innermost circle.
4. Luke uniquely includes stratēgois ('temple officers, captains of the temple guard'), the security force that controlled the temple precincts. Their involvement is practical — any arrest in or near the temple would require their cooperation. The verb paradō ('hand over, betray') is the same word used for Jesus being 'handed over' to the Gentiles (18:32) and for God 'handing over' his Son — the word carries multiple theological layers.
5. The verb echarēsan ('they rejoiced, were delighted') reveals the authorities' emotional state — they are pleased to have found their solution. The verb synthēto ('they agreed, covenanted together') is a formal term for making an agreement. Luke does not specify the amount (Matthew 26:15 names 'thirty pieces of silver'). The word argyriōn ('silver, money') is generic.
6. The verb exōmologēsen ('he consented, agreed, confessed') here means 'he assented to the arrangement.' The phrase ater ochlou ('without a crowd, in the absence of the multitude') is the crucial tactical detail — Judas's value to the authorities is his ability to deliver Jesus at a time and place where public reaction cannot interfere. This solves the problem identified in 19:48, 20:19, and 22:2.
7. The phrase edei thyesthai to pascha ('it was necessary to sacrifice the Passover') refers to the afternoon of Nisan 14, when the Passover lambs were slaughtered in the temple. The verb dei ('it was necessary') indicates Torah requirement (Exodus 12:6). The chronological relationship between Luke's account and John's (where Jesus dies at the hour the lambs are slaughtered) is a well-known harmonization challenge that we do not attempt to resolve.

7. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Exodus 12:6. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
8. Luke alone names the two disciples sent — Peter and John, the inner circle. Preparing the Passover involved acquiring a lamb, having it sacrificed at the temple, roasting it, and preparing the accompanying elements (unleavened bread, bitter herbs, wine, charoset). This was a substantial task requiring several hours.
9. The question is practical — Jerusalem would have been packed with pilgrims for the festival, and securing a suitable room for the meal was not trivial. The subjunctive hetoimasōmen ('should we prepare') expresses deference to Jesus's choice.
10. A man carrying a keramion ('earthenware jar') of water would have been conspicuous — water-carrying was typically women's work, and men used leather skins rather than clay jars. This detail would make the man easy to identify in a crowded city. Whether this was a prearranged signal or prophetic knowledge is debated; Luke's narrative implies the latter.
11. The title ho didaskalos ('the Teacher') functions as a recognized identifier, suggesting an existing relationship between Jesus and the homeowner. The word katalyma ('guest room, lodging place') is the same word used for the place where there was 'no room' at Jesus's birth (2:7) — creating a subtle literary connection between the beginning and end of Luke's narrative.
12. The anagaion ('upper room') was a second-story room, typically the best room in the house, used for important gatherings. The participle estrōmenon ('furnished, spread out, arranged') indicates the room already has the necessary carpets, cushions, and dining arrangements for a Passover meal. This level of preparation suggests prior arrangement.
13. The phrase kathōs eirēkei autois ('just as he had told them') echoes the preparation for the triumphal entry (19:32) — the same pattern of prophetic instruction followed by exact fulfillment. The verb hetoimasan ('they prepared') covers the extensive work of Passover preparation, compressed into a single word.
14. The phrase hē hōra ('the hour') carries theological weight beyond mere clock time — this is the appointed hour, the kairos toward which the entire Gospel has been moving. The verb anepesen ('he reclined') describes the dining posture: reclining on the left side on cushions around a low table, the standard practice for formal meals and required for the Passover seder. Luke uses 'apostles' (apostoloi) rather than 'disciples,' emphasizing their commissioned role.
15. The phrase epithymia epethymēsa ('with desire I have desired') is a Semitic intensifying construction (cognate accusative) that expresses the deepest possible longing. This statement is unique to Luke and reveals Jesus's emotional state — he has longed for this meal. The phrase pro tou me pathein ('before I suffer') shows Jesus's full awareness of what lies ahead.
16. The double negative ou mē ('I will by no means eat') is emphatic — this is Jesus's last Passover. The word plērōthē ('is fulfilled, completed') implies that the Passover itself is a type that points forward to a greater reality to be consummated in the kingdom. The Passover lamb, the exodus from Egypt, the covenant meal — all find their fulfillment in what Jesus is about to accomplish through his death.
17. This is the first of two cups in Luke's account (the second appears in v. 20). The Passover seder traditionally included four cups of wine. This first cup likely corresponds to one of the earlier seder cups. The verb eucharistēsas ('having given thanks') is the root of 'Eucharist' and refers to the Jewish blessing over wine (likely the kiddush: 'Blessed are you, LORD our God, King of the universe, who creates the fruit of the vine').
18. The phrase genēmatos tēs ampelou ('fruit of the vine') is the traditional liturgical term for wine in Jewish blessings. The eschatological vow — not drinking wine until the kingdom comes — mirrors the Nazirite vow's abstinence from wine as a sign of consecration. Jesus consecrates himself for his coming sacrifice. The phrase 'until the kingdom of God comes' (heōs hou hē basileia tou theou elthē) holds the future open — this is not the end of fellowship but a temporary suspension until its consummation.
19. The four actions — took (labōn), gave thanks (eucharistēsas), broke (eklasen), gave (edōken) — become the foundational pattern of Christian worship. The phrase to hyper hymōn didomenon ('which is being given for you') uses the present participle, indicating an ongoing action — Jesus's body is being given in the very act of the meal. The command touto poieite eis tēn emēn anamnēsin ('do this in remembrance of me') establishes the meal as a repeated memorial. The word anamnēsis ('remembrance, memorial') in Jewish thought means not merely mental recall but active re-presentation — making the past event present again.
20. The phrase meta to deipnēsai ('after having eaten the meal') places this second cup after the main course, likely corresponding to the third cup of the Passover seder (the 'cup of blessing,' cf. 1 Corinthians 10:16). The phrase hē kainē diathēkē ('the new covenant') explicitly invokes Jeremiah 31:31-34, the only Old Testament passage that uses 'new covenant.' The diathēkē ('covenant, testament') is not a contract between equals but God's sovereign arrangement. The phrase en tō haimati mou ('in my blood') echoes Exodus 24:8 ('This is the blood of the covenant'), where Moses sealed the Sinai covenant with sacrificial blood.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jeremiah 31:31-34 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
20. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 24:8 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
21. In Luke's arrangement (unlike Matthew and Mark), the betrayal announcement comes after the institution of the supper, not before. This means Judas participates in the covenant meal, intensifying the horror of the betrayal. The phrase hē cheir tou paradidontos me ('the hand of the one handing me over') places the betraying hand literally on the same table where Jesus has just given his body and blood. Psalm 41:9 (quoted in John 13:18) provides the background: 'Even my close friend in whom I trusted, who ate my bread, has lifted his heel against me.'

21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 41:9. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. The phrase kata to hōrismenon ('according to what has been determined, decreed') uses the same root as horizō ('to fix, to decree, to appoint'), which Luke uses elsewhere for God's sovereign plan (Acts 2:23, 10:42, 17:26, 31). The tension between divine determination and human responsibility is held without resolution: the Son of Man's death is God's plan (kata to hōrismenon), yet the betrayer bears full moral culpability (ouai). Luke does not collapse either side of this tension.
23. The verb syzētein ('to discuss, to dispute, to investigate') indicates animated debate rather than quiet reflection. The optative eiē ('might be') expresses uncertainty and speculation. Their inability to identify the betrayer reveals both their self-awareness (each apparently considers himself capable) and their ignorance (no one suspects Judas specifically).
24. The word philoneikia ('rivalry, love of strife, contentiousness') appears only here in the New Testament. The timing is staggering — at the very meal where Jesus gives his body and blood and announces his betrayal, the disciples argue about rank. In Mark and Matthew, this dispute occurs earlier in the ministry; Luke's placement at the Last Supper maximizes the contrast between Jesus's self-giving and the disciples' self-seeking.
25. The verb kyrieuousin ('exercise lordship, dominate') describes coercive, top-down power. The title euergetai ('Benefactors') was an actual honorific title given to Hellenistic rulers — Ptolemy III and VIII of Egypt were both called 'Euergetes.' The irony: those who dominate are called 'benefactors,' wrapping exploitation in the language of generosity. Jesus exposes the fundamental dishonesty of power structures.
26. The 'youngest' (neōteros) held the lowest status in ancient households — they served the eldest. The 'one who serves' (ho diakonōn) is literally 'the one who waits tables.' Jesus inverts the hierarchy completely: greatness is defined by service, leadership by the willingness to take the lowest position. The word diakonōn is the root of 'deacon,' later institutionalized as a church office.
27. Jesus asks a question with an obvious cultural answer — the one reclining is always greater than the one serving — and then claims the server's role for himself. The phrase egō de en mesō hymōn eimi hōs ho diakonōn ('I am among you as the one serving') is the most radical leadership statement in the Gospels. The present tense eimi ('I am') makes this a permanent identity, not a temporary condescension. John's Gospel dramatizes this with the foot-washing scene (John 13:1-17).
28. The perfect participle diamemenēkotes ('having remained throughout, having continued steadfastly') acknowledges the disciples' loyalty despite everything. The word peiramois ('trials, testings, temptations') encompasses the full range of opposition Jesus has faced. Despite their failures (which will become more apparent in the hours ahead), Jesus credits them with faithfulness.
29. The verb diatithēmai ('I confer, I covenant, I bequeath') is related to diathēkē ('covenant') — Jesus is making a covenant grant of royal authority. The chain of conferral runs from the Father to Jesus to the disciples, establishing a succession of delegated authority. This is a testamentary act — the last will of someone about to die.
30. The promise has two dimensions: table fellowship (eating and drinking with Jesus) and governmental authority (sitting on thrones judging the tribes). The verb krinontes ('judging') echoes the judges of Israel who both governed and adjudicated. The 'twelve tribes' indicates the restoration of all Israel, not merely the existing southern tribes. This promise is given to the same men who moments ago were arguing about rank — Jesus answers their ambition with a grant that far exceeds anything they imagined.
31. The double name 'Simon, Simon' (Simōn Simōn) signals urgency and tenderness. The verb exētēsato ('demanded, asked for, claimed') echoes Job 1-2, where Satan requests permission to test Job. The 'you' (hymas) is plural — Satan targets all the disciples, not Peter alone. The sifting metaphor (siniasai, 'to sift') describes violent shaking to separate grain from chaff; the trials ahead will expose what each disciple is truly made of.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Job 1-2. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
32. The 'you' (sou) switches to singular — Jesus prays specifically for Peter. The verb edeēthēn ('I have prayed, I have besought') is an aorist indicating a specific, completed prayer. The phrase eklipē hē pistis sou ('your faith might fail, give out, be eclipsed') uses a word that means to cease or be extinguished — like a lamp going out. The verb epistrepsas ('having turned back, having returned') acknowledges that Peter will fall but also promises restoration. The command stērison ('strengthen, establish, make firm') gives Peter a post-failure ministry: his own recovery becomes the basis for strengthening others.
33. Peter's declaration is sincere but overconfident. He offers willingness for the extreme scenarios (prison and death) but will stumble at a far lesser test (a servant girl's question). Luke places Peter's boast in the context of the Last Supper discourse rather than on the Mount of Olives (as in Mark 14:29-31), integrating it into the farewell conversation.
34. Jesus uses Peter's apostolic name (Petre) rather than 'Simon,' sharpening the personal address. The specificity is devastating: not merely a general prediction of failure but a precise count (three denials), a precise timeframe (before the rooster crows), and a precise content (denying that he knows Jesus). Luke adds eidenai ('to know me'), specifying that Peter will deny the relationship itself, not just association.
35. Jesus refers back to the mission of the seventy-two (10:1-12), where he sent them out with no provisions and they lacked nothing. The three items — ballantion ('money bag'), pēra ('traveler's bag, knapsack'), and hypodēmata ('sandals') — represent financial resources, food supplies, and basic equipment. Their unanimous answer 'Nothing' (outhenos) confirms that divine provision was sufficient during the earlier, more receptive phase of ministry.

36. The phrase alla nyn ('but now') marks a dramatic shift in circumstances. The earlier instructions (travel without provisions) are reversed — the time of hospitality and reception is over; a time of hostility and self-provision has arrived. The instruction to sell one's himation ('outer cloak,' essential for warmth and sleeping) to buy a machaira ('sword, large knife') is startling. Whether Jesus speaks literally (prepare for danger) or figuratively (the situation has become dire) is debated. The next verses suggest the disciples take it literally and Jesus corrects them.
37. Jesus quotes Isaiah 53:12 ('he was numbered with the transgressors'), the fourth Servant Song. The word anomōn ('lawless ones, transgressors') foreshadows his crucifixion between two criminals (23:32-33). The phrase to peri emou telos echei ('what concerns me has its end/completion') can mean either 'is being fulfilled' or 'is coming to its conclusion.' Luke's Jesus frames his death as the fulfillment of Isaiah's suffering servant prophecy — the only explicit quotation of Isaiah 53 by Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels.
37. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
38. The disciples take Jesus's words literally and produce two swords. Jesus's response hikanon estin ('it is enough') is often read as weary dismissal: 'Enough of this' — they have missed his point entirely. Two swords would be militarily useless against a Roman cohort; Jesus was not calling for armed resistance. Alternatively, 'it is enough' may mean two swords suffice to fulfill the prophecy of being 'counted among the lawless' (v. 37) — mere possession of weapons classifies them as armed rebels.
39. The phrase kata to ethos ('according to custom, as was his habit') connects to 21:37 — Jesus regularly spent nights on the Mount of Olives. This habitual pattern is what enabled Judas to know where to find him (v. 47). Luke does not name Gethsemane (as Mark and Matthew do) but simply refers to the Mount of Olives.
40. The phrase epi tou topou ('at the place') is vague in Luke — no garden is named. The command proseuchē the mē eiselthein eis peirasmon ('pray not to enter into temptation/testing') echoes the Lord's Prayer (11:4) and frames what follows: the disciples' failure to pray will lead to their failure in the testing. The peirasmos ('temptation, trial, testing') refers specifically to the crisis of Jesus's arrest and death.
41. The verb apespasthē ('he was torn away, he withdrew') carries the connotation of painful separation — the passive voice may suggest reluctance. The distance 'about a stone's throw' (hōsei lithou bolēn) is roughly 50-100 feet — close enough to be seen but far enough for privacy. Kneeling (theis ta gonata, 'placing the knees') was not the usual Jewish prayer posture (standing with uplifted hands was standard), suggesting intense supplication.
42. Luke's version of the prayer is more concise than Mark's. The address 'Father' (Pater) without 'Abba' (which Mark includes) still conveys intimate filial relationship. The 'cup' (potērion) is a biblical metaphor for suffering and divine judgment (Psalm 75:8, Isaiah 51:17, Jeremiah 25:15). The conditional ei boulei ('if you are willing') respects the Father's sovereignty. The concluding mē to thelēma mou alla to son ginesthō ('not my will but yours be done') is the model of perfect submission — the same petition Jesus taught in the Lord's Prayer (11:2, 'your will be done') now enacted at infinite personal cost.

43. TEXTUAL NOTE: This verse and the next (v. 44) are absent from several important early manuscripts (P75, Codex Vaticanus, the original hand of Codex Sinaiticus) but present in others (the corrected Sinaiticus, Codex Bezae, and most later manuscripts). The SBLGNT places them in double brackets, indicating their disputed status. If original, they are unique to Luke and present a portrait of Jesus's genuine human vulnerability — the Son of God needs angelic strengthening. If later additions, they reflect early Christian reflection on Jesus's humanity. We include them but note the evidence. The verb enischyōn ('strengthening') implies giving power to endure rather than removing the cause of distress.
44. TEXTUAL NOTE: See note on verse 43 regarding the disputed status of this verse. The word agōnīa ('agony, anguish, intense struggle') is a contest metaphor — it describes the strain of an athlete in the arena. The comparative ektenesteron ('more earnestly, more intensely') shows prayer escalating under pressure. The phrase hōsei thromboi haimatos ('like clots/drops of blood') uses hōsei ('as if, like'), indicating a comparison — Luke says the sweat resembled blood drops in appearance (thick, heavy drops), not necessarily that it was blood. The medical condition hematidrosis (sweat mixed with blood under extreme stress) is rare but documented.
45. Luke compresses Mark's three prayer episodes into one and offers an explanation for the disciples' sleep: apo tēs lypēs ('from grief, because of sorrow'). This is a compassionate detail unique to Luke — they are not merely indifferent but emotionally overwhelmed. Their grief, however, does not excuse their failure to pray.
46. Jesus's rebuke forms a bracket with verse 40 — the same command to pray against temptation opens and closes the Gethsemane scene. The question ti katheudete ('why are you sleeping?') is not merely rhetorical; it expresses genuine anguish that at the hour of greatest need, his closest companions have failed to keep watch. The imperative anastantes proseuchesthe ('having risen, pray!') demands immediate action.
47. The phrase eti autou lalountos ('while he was still speaking') emphasizes the abruptness — there is no pause between the prayer and the arrest. Judas is again identified as heis tōn dōdeka ('one of the Twelve'), a phrase that never loses its shock. The verb philēsai ('to kiss') refers to the standard greeting kiss between rabbi and disciple — Judas weaponizes a gesture of loyalty and affection. He proērchetō ('was going before, was leading') the crowd, placing himself at the head of the arrest party.

48. Jesus addresses Judas by name and exposes the horrifying irony: the gesture of devotion (philēmati, 'with a kiss') is the instrument of betrayal (paradidōs, 'you are handing over'). The question form allows Judas one final moment of self-awareness — Jesus does not merely accuse but invites recognition of what he is doing. The title 'Son of Man' frames the betrayal in its full cosmic significance.
49. The phrase hoi peri auton ('those around him') refers to the disciples. Their question is addressed to kyrie ('Lord') and shows they are prepared to fight — the two swords from verse 38 are at hand. The question pataxomen en machairē ('shall we strike with a sword?') uses the same verb (patassō) used in the Septuagint for the LORD striking Egypt with plagues (Exodus 12:12).
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 12:12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
50. Luke does not name the attacker (John 18:10 identifies him as Peter) or the victim (John 18:10 names him Malchus). The detail 'right ear' (to ous autou to dexion) is shared with John and adds realistic specificity. The verb apeilen ('cut off, removed') indicates a clean severing. The disciple acts without waiting for Jesus's answer to the question in verse 49.
51. The phrase eate heōs toutou ('permit until this point' or 'stop, that is enough') ends the violence. Jesus's healing of the servant's ear is unique to Luke and is his last recorded miracle — an act of mercy toward his enemy during his own arrest. The verb iasato ('he healed') indicates complete restoration. The juxtaposition of a disciple causing harm and Jesus healing it encapsulates the contrast between their understanding of the mission and his.
52. Luke uniquely specifies that the chief priests, temple officers, and elders themselves are present at the arrest — in Mark, they send subordinates. The word lēstēs ('bandit, revolutionary, insurrectionist') is the same word used for the men crucified with Jesus (Mark 15:27) and for Barabbas's associates. It carries political overtones of armed rebellion. Jesus's question exposes the absurdity: he taught openly in the temple every day (v. 53) and could have been confronted at any time.
53. The final phrase is unique to Luke and theologically profound: hautē estin hymōn hē hōra kai hē exousia tou skotous ('this is your hour and the authority of darkness'). Jesus concedes that this specific hour belongs to his enemies and to the cosmic power of darkness (skotous) behind them. The word exousia ('authority, power, right') indicates that darkness has been given temporary jurisdiction — not by its own power but by divine permission (cf. v. 53's connection to v. 22's 'as it has been determined'). This is not defeat but a controlled yielding.
54. The verbs syllabontes ('having seized'), ēgagon ('they led'), and eisēgagon ('they brought into') mark the progression from arrest to custody. Luke does not name the high priest (Caiaphas, according to Matthew 26:57). Peter's following makrothen ('from a distance') is an ominous detail — close enough to be tested, far enough to be alone. The imperfect ēkolouthei ('was following') indicates ongoing, hesitant pursuit.
55. The aulē ('courtyard') was the open-air interior space of the high priest's residence. The fire (pyr) provides both warmth (it was a spring night in Jerusalem, which can be cold) and light — the light that will illuminate Peter's face and lead to his identification. Peter sits mesos autōn ('in the middle of them'), surrounded by those loyal to the high priest. The setting is claustrophobic and dangerous.
56. The paidiskē ('servant girl, maid') holds no social power whatever — Peter, who declared readiness for prison and death (v. 33), is undone by the lowest-ranking person in the household. The verb atenisasa ('having fixed her gaze, having stared intently') indicates she studied his face carefully. The phrase syn autō ēn ('was with him') identifies Peter as a follower of Jesus.
57. The verb ἕρᾱσατο ('he denied') is the verb Jesus used in his prediction (v. 34). Peter denies knowing Jesus (ouk oida auton, 'I do not know him'), fulfilling the specific content predicted. The address gynai ('woman') is not disrespectful in Greek (Jesus uses it for his mother in John 2:4) but is dismissive in this context.
58. The second accuser is male (heteros, masculine), providing a different source for the identification. The accusation ex autōn ei ('you are of them') identifies Peter as belonging to Jesus's group. Peter's denial ouk eimi ('I am not') is a stark inversion of Jesus's egō eimi ('I am') declarations. Each denial drives Peter further from his declared identity.
59. The interval hōsei hōras mias ('about one hour') makes the third denial deliberate rather than impulsive. The verb diischyrizeto ('insisted, affirmed confidently, maintained vehemently') is a strong word — this accuser is certain. The evidence is Peter's accent: kai gar Galilaios estin ('for he is indeed a Galilean'). Galilean Aramaic had distinctive pronunciation features that were recognizable in Jerusalem.
60. Peter's final denial is not merely 'I don't know him' but 'I don't know what you're talking about' — he denies understanding the accusation itself. The phrase parachrēma eti lalountos autou ('immediately while he was still speaking') means the rooster crows before Peter finishes his sentence — the prediction is fulfilled with devastating precision.
61. This detail — the Lord turning and looking at Peter (strapheis ho kyrios eneblepsen tō Petrō) — is unique to Luke and is one of the most poignant moments in the Gospels. The verb eneblepsen ('looked intently at') is the same word used in 20:17 when Jesus 'looked directly at' the religious leaders. The look carries no recorded words — only the gaze that Peter must have remembered for the rest of his life. Jesus is apparently being led through the courtyard, making eye contact possible. The title ho kyrios ('the Lord') emphasizes the contrast: the Lord remembers and watches; Peter forgot and failed.
62. The verb eklausen ('he wept') indicates audible sobbing (the same word used for Jesus weeping over Jerusalem in 19:41). The adverb pikrōs ('bitterly') describes the quality of the tears — not merely sad but acutely painful. Peter leaves the courtyard (exelthōn exō, 'going out outside'), removing himself from the scene of his failure. This is the last we see of Peter in Luke's passion narrative until the empty tomb report reaches him (24:12).

63. The verb synechontes ('holding, guarding, keeping in custody') identifies the abusers as the guards. The verbs enepaizon ('were mocking, were ridiculing') and derontes ('beating, striking, flogging') describe sustained physical abuse and humiliation. In Luke, this abuse occurs before the trial (unlike Mark, where it follows the trial), placing it during the night while Peter's denial is still reverberating.
64. The verb perikalypsantes ('having covered around, having blindfolded') sets up the cruel game: they blindfold Jesus and then demand he identify who strikes him, mocking his prophetic claims. The imperative prophēteuson ('prophecy!') is deeply ironic — at this very moment, Jesus's prophecy about Peter's denial has just been fulfilled with exact precision. The guards mock a prophetic ability they do not realize has been demonstrated.
65. The verb blasphēmountes ('blaspheming, reviling') is notable — Luke uses 'blasphemy' for what the guards say to Jesus, a term the Sanhedrin will use against Jesus in verse 71. The irony is double: those who blaspheme accuse Jesus of blasphemy. The phrase hetera polla ('many other things') indicates the abuse was extensive and sustained.
66. Luke's trial before the Sanhedrin occurs at dawn (hōs egeneto hēmera, 'when it became day'), not during the night as in Mark. This may reflect Luke's knowledge of Jewish legal procedure, which prohibited capital trials at night. The presbyterion ('council of elders') is defined as consisting of archiereis ('chief priests') and grammateis ('scribes'). The synedrion ('Sanhedrin, council') was the supreme judicial body of Judaism.
67. The question ei sy ei ho christos ('if you are the Christ') demands a direct messianic claim. Jesus's response ean hymin eipō ou mē pisteusēte ('if I tell you, you will by no means believe') exposes their bad faith — they are not seeking truth but building a case. The double negative ou mē ('you will absolutely not believe') indicates Jesus's certainty about their disposition.
68. The second conditional extends the point: not only will they not believe his answer, they will not engage honestly with his questions. This recalls their refusal to answer his question about John's baptism (20:1-8). The trial is predetermined, not a genuine inquiry.
69. Jesus combines Daniel 7:13 (Son of Man) with Psalm 110:1 (seated at the right hand) — the two texts he brought together in 20:41-44. The phrase apo tou nyn ('from now on, henceforth') is a temporal marker unique to Luke, indicating that the exaltation begins immediately, not at some distant future point. The seated position (kathēmenos) is a position of completed authority. The circumlocution tēs dynamēōs tou theou ('the power of God') avoids speaking God's name directly, as was customary.
69. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 7:13. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
69. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 110:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
70. The question shifts from 'Christ' (v. 67) to 'Son of God' (huios tou theou) — the council draws the theological implication from Jesus's claim about the Son of Man. Jesus's answer hymeis legete hoti egō eimi ('you say that I am') is neither a direct affirmation nor a denial — it places the declaration in their mouths while not disowning it. The phrase egō eimi ('I am') echoes the divine name (Exodus 3:14), which the council would recognize.
70. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 3:14 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
71. The council declares that Jesus's own words constitute sufficient evidence (martyrias, 'testimony, witness') — no additional witnesses are needed. The phrase apo tou stomatos autou ('from his own mouth') emphasizes that Jesus has self-incriminated. Luke's trial account is more compact than Mark's — there are no false witnesses, no torn robes, no formal verdict of blasphemy. The council proceeds directly from Jesus's self-identification to the decision to bring him before Pilate (23:1). The speed of the proceedings underscores their predetermined outcome.

Summary: Luke 23 narrates the Roman trial and crucifixion of Jesus. The chapter moves through the trial before Pilate, the hearing before Herod Antipas (unique to Luke), the crowd's demand for Barabbas, the way to the cross with Simon of Cyrene and the weeping women of Jerusalem, the crucifixion between two criminals, the mocking by rulers and soldiers, the repentant criminal's plea and Jesus's promise of paradise, the darkness and torn curtain, Jesus's death, and the burial by Joseph of Arimathea. Luke's crucifixion narrative emphasizes Jesus's innocence (declared three times by Pilate and once by Herod) and his mercy even in death.

What Makes This Remarkable: Luke's passion narrative is distinguished by several unique elements: the Herod Antipas hearing, the weeping women of Jerusalem (with Jesus's prophecy about Jerusalem's coming destruction), the dialogue between the two criminals (with the promise 'Today you will be with me in paradise'), and the centurion's declaration that Jesus was 'righteous' (rather than Mark's 'Son of God'). The textually disputed verse 34a — 'Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing' — is one of the most famous sayings attributed to Jesus and epitomizes Luke's portrait of Jesus as merciful even to his executioners.

Translation Friction: Verse 34a ('Father, forgive them...') is absent from P75, Sinaiticus (original), Vaticanus, and other early witnesses, but present in Sinaiticus (corrected), Bezae, and most later manuscripts. Its authenticity is disputed among scholars. We include it following the SBLGNT's double-bracketed text and note the manuscript evidence. The historical details of Roman crucifixion are rendered without sanitizing. Luke's account of Pilate's three declarations of innocence (vv. 4, 14, 22) creates a more sympathetic portrait of Pilate than other sources support.

Connections: The Barabbas exchange echoes the Day of Atonement scapegoat ritual (Leviticus 16). The darkness at the crucifixion echoes the plague of darkness in Exodus 10:22 and the prophetic warnings of Amos 8:9. The torn curtain connects to the theology of access to God (Hebrews 10:19-22). Jesus's final words ('Father, into your hands I commit my spirit') quote Psalm 31:5. Joseph of Arimathea's burial fulfills Isaiah 53:9 ('with the rich in his death'). The women at the cross connect to the women who will discover the empty tomb (24:1-10).

¹Then the whole assembly rose and led him before Pilate. ²They began to accuse him, saying, "We found this man misleading our nation, forbidding the payment of taxes to Caesar, and claiming to be Christ, a king." ³Pilate asked him, "Are you the King of the Jews?" Jesus answered him, "You say so." ⁴Pilate said to the chief priests and the crowds, "I find no basis for a charge against this man." ⁵But they pressed their case more urgently, saying, "He stirs up the people with his teaching throughout all Judea, from Galilee all the way here." ⁶When Pilate heard this, he asked whether the man was a Galilean. ⁷When he learned that Jesus was under Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who was also in Jerusalem during those days. ⁸When Herod saw Jesus, he was greatly pleased, for he had been wanting to see him for a long time because he had heard about him, and he was hoping to see some sign performed by him. ⁹He questioned him at considerable length, but Jesus gave him no answer. ¹⁰The chief priests and the scribes stood there, accusing him vehemently. ¹¹Herod, along with his soldiers, treated him with contempt and mocked him. Dressing him in an elegant robe, he sent him back to Pilate. ¹²That day Herod and Pilate became friends with each other; before this they had been enemies. ¹³Pilate then called together the chief priests, the rulers, and the people ¹⁴Said to them, you have brought this man to me, as one that perverteth the people — and, take notice, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof you accuse him:. ¹⁵Neither has Herod, for he sent him back to us. Clearly, he has done nothing deserving death. ¹⁶Therefore, I will have him flogged and then release him." ¹⁸But they all cried out together, "Away with this man! Release Barabbas to us!" ¹⁹Barabbas had been thrown into prison for an insurrection that had taken place in the city and for murder. ²⁰Pilate, wanting to release Jesus, addressed them again. ²¹But they kept shouting, "Crucify! Crucify him!" ²²For the third time he said to them, "Why? What crime has this man committed? I have found no grounds for the death penalty in his case. Therefore I will have him flogged and release him." ²³But they were insistent, demanding with loud cries that he be crucified, and their voices prevailed. ²⁴So Pilate decided to grant their demand. ²⁵He released the man who had been thrown into prison for insurrection and murder — the one they asked for — but he handed Jesus over to their will. ²⁶As they led him away, they seized a man named Simon from Cyrene, who was coming in from the countryside, and placed the cross on him to carry behind Jesus. ²⁷A large crowd of the people followed him, including women who were mourning and wailing for him. ²⁸Jesus turned to them and said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, do not weep for me. Weep for yourselves and for your children, ²⁹For, take notice, the days are coming, in the which they will say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never offered suck. ³⁰Then they will begin to say to the mountains, 'Fall on us!' and to the hills, 'Cover us!' ³¹For if they do these things when the wood is green, what will happen when it is dry?" ³²Two other criminals were also led away with him to be executed. ³³When they came to the place called The Skull, they crucified him there, along with the criminals — one on his right, the other on his left. ³⁴Jesus said, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing." And they divided his garments among themselves by casting lots. ³⁵The people stood watching, and the rulers sneered at him, saying, "He saved others; let him save himself, if he is the Christ of God, the Chosen One." ³⁶The soldiers also mocked him, coming up and offering him sour wine, ³⁷Declaring, If you be the king of the Jews, save thyself. ³⁸There was also an inscription above him: "This is the King of the Jews." ³⁹One of the criminals hanging there hurled insults at him, saying, "Aren't you the Christ? Save yourself and us!" ⁴⁰But the other rebuked him, saying, "Do you not even fear God, since you are under the same sentence? ⁴¹We are getting what we deserve for what we have done, but this man has done nothing wrong." ⁴

²Then he said, "Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom." ⁴³Jesus said to him, "Truly I tell you, today you will be with me in paradise." ⁴⁴It was now about the sixth hour, and darkness came over the whole land until the ninth hour, ⁴⁵The sun stopped shining, and the curtain of the temple was torn down the middle. ⁴⁶Then Jesus called out with a loud voice, "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit." Having said this, he breathed his last. ⁴⁷When the centurion saw what had happened, he praised God, saying, "Surely this man was righteous." ⁴⁸And all the crowds that had gathered for this spectacle, when they saw what had taken place, went home beating their chests. ⁴⁹All those who knew him stood at a distance, including the women who had followed him from Galilee, watching these things. ⁵⁰Now there was a man named Joseph, a member of the council, a good and righteous man, ⁵¹Indeed, (The same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them;) he was of Arimathaea, a city of the Jews — who also himself waited for God's reign. ⁵²This man went to Pilate and asked for the body of Jesus. ⁵³He took it down, wrapped it in a linen cloth, and placed him in a rock-cut tomb where no one had yet been laid. ⁵⁴It was the day of Preparation, and the Sabbath was about to begin. ⁵⁵The women who had come with him from Galilee followed and saw the tomb and how his body was placed in it. ⁵⁶Then they returned and prepared spices and ointments. And on the Sabbath they rested according to the commandment.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase hapan to plēthos autōn ('the whole multitude of them') indicates a corporate decision by the full Sanhedrin. They bring Jesus to Pilate (Pontius Pilatus, Roman prefect of Judea, AD 26-36) because only the Roman governor had the authority to execute a death sentence (ius gladii). The transition from Jewish religious tribunal to Roman political court requires reframing the charges.
2. The charges are three, and all are political rather than religious: (1) diastephonta to ethnos ('misleading/perverting the nation') — sedition; (2) kōlyonta phorous Kaisari didonai ('forbidding taxes to Caesar') — a direct lie, since Jesus said the opposite in 20:25; (3) legonta heauton christon basilea einai ('claiming to be Christ, a king') — technically true but framed as a political claim against Caesar's sovereignty. The Sanhedrin transforms a religious charge (blasphemy) into a political one (treason) to engage Roman jurisdiction.
3. Pilate seizes on the only charge that matters to Rome: kingship. The question sy ei ho basileus tōn Ioudaiōn ('you are the king of the Jews?') is the charge that will appear on the cross (v. 38). Jesus's answer sy legeis ('you say so' or 'you are the one saying it') is identical in form to his answer before the Sanhedrin (22:70) — an acknowledgment that neither fully affirms nor denies, placing the characterization in the questioner's framework.
4. This is the first of Pilate's three declarations of Jesus's innocence (see also vv. 14 and 22). The phrase ouden heuriskō aition ('I find nothing blameworthy, no cause for accusation') is a formal legal verdict of acquittal. Despite this, Pilate does not release Jesus — the political pressure overrides the judicial finding. Luke's emphasis on Pilate's repeated acquittals serves his broader theme of Jesus's innocence.
5. The verb epischyon ('they were insistent, they pressed harder') shows escalating pressure. The verb anaseiei ('stirs up, incites, agitates') carries connotations of rebellion. The geographical sweep — 'from Galilee all the way here' — is designed to portray Jesus as a widespread, destabilizing influence. The mention of 'Galilee' (Galilaias) catches Pilate's attention, as the next verse shows.
6. Pilate's question about Galilean origin is not mere curiosity but jurisdictional — if Jesus is from Galilee, he falls under Herod Antipas's authority, and the case can be transferred. This offers Pilate a political exit: he can defer the decision to someone else.
7. Herod Antipas (son of Herod the Great, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea) was in Jerusalem for the Passover festival. The phrase ek tēs exousias Hērōdou ('from Herod's jurisdiction') refers to territorial authority. The Herod episode is unique to Luke and historically plausible — Roman officials sometimes deferred cases to local rulers. Pilate's referral is a political maneuver, not a legal requirement.
8. Herod's reaction echarē lian ('he was very glad') is grotesque in context — he treats Jesus as an entertainer. His desire to see a sēmeion ('sign, miracle') reduces Jesus's ministry to spectacle. This connects to 9:9, where Herod expressed curiosity about Jesus and tried to see him. His 'joy' at meeting Jesus contrasts with Jesus's silence, creating a scene of failed encounter between the fascinated ruler and the silent prisoner.
9. The phrase en logois hikanois ('with many words, at considerable length') indicates extensive questioning. Jesus's total silence (ouden apekrinat autō, 'he answered him nothing') echoes Isaiah 53:7 ('like a sheep before its shearers is silent, so he did not open his mouth'). Jesus, who answered both the Sanhedrin and Pilate, says nothing to Herod — the man who killed John the Baptist (9:9) receives no word at all.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 53:7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. The adverb eutonōs ('vehemently, vigorously, with great intensity') indicates aggressive prosecution. The religious leaders have followed Jesus from Pilate to Herod to maintain the pressure. The verb katēgorountes ('accusing') is a legal term for formal prosecution.
11. The verb exouthenēsas ('having treated with contempt, having despised') is the same word used in 18:9 for those who 'despised' others. The esthēta lampran ('bright/splendid garment') is a mock-royal robe, a parody of kingly attire. Herod's mockery is political theater: by dressing Jesus as a pretend king, he dismisses the charge as ridiculous. He does not condemn Jesus — his sending him back constitutes an implicit acquittal.

12. This detail is unique to Luke and deeply ironic: the trial of Jesus, the Prince of Peace, reconciles two political enemies. Their enmity (echthra) may have stemmed from the incident described in 13:1 (Pilate's slaughter of Galileans, which would have offended Herod as ruler of Galilee). The joint handling of the Jesus case creates a political bond: both can share responsibility while neither takes full blame.
13. Pilate reassembles all parties — religious leaders, civic leaders, and the general public. The inclusion of ton laon ('the people') is significant: Pilate makes his second acquittal public, presumably hoping popular opinion will support release.
14. The verb anakrinās ('having examined, having conducted a judicial investigation') is a legal technical term for a formal hearing. Pilate's second declaration of innocence is more detailed than the first (v. 4) — he specifies that the examination was thorough (enōpion hymōn, 'in your presence') and that none of the specific charges (hōn katēgoreite, 'of which you accuse') has substance.
15. Pilate appeals to Herod's verdict as corroboration: two independent authorities have found no capital offense. The phrase ouden axion thanatou ('nothing worthy of death') is a formal legal assessment. The perfect participle pepragmenon ('having been done') indicates a thorough review of Jesus's entire record, not just the current charges. The double acquittal should, in any fair legal system, result in release.
16. The verb paideusas ('having disciplined, having punished, having flogged') is a euphemism for a severe beating that typically preceded release in Roman provincial justice. Pilate's proposal is a compromise: punish Jesus enough to satisfy the accusers without executing an innocent man. The injustice is already apparent — Pilate proposes to flog someone he has just declared innocent.
17. Verse 17 is absent from the SBLGNT and most critical editions. It appears in some later manuscripts as an explanatory gloss about the custom of releasing a prisoner at the festival, drawn from Mark 15:6/Matthew 27:15. We follow the SBLGNT in omitting it from the rendering. The custom is referenced in verse 18 without this explanatory note.
18. The adverb pamplēthei ('all together, with the whole multitude') indicates a unified crowd reaction. The verb aire ('take away, remove, destroy') expresses violent rejection. The name Barabbas (Barabbas) means 'son of the father' (bar-abba) in Aramaic — an ironic name, as the crowd demands the release of 'the son of the father' while calling for the death of the Son of the Father. The crowd's demand for Barabbas is not explained in Luke — the reader must accept this sudden reversal from the people who 'hung on his words' (19:48).
19. Luke specifies Barabbas's crimes: stasin ('insurrection, revolt, sedition') and phonon ('murder'). The irony is devastating: Jesus, falsely accused of inciting revolt (v. 2), is condemned, while Barabbas, who actually committed insurrection and murder, is released. The charges the authorities fabricated against Jesus accurately describe Barabbas.
20. Luke emphasizes Pilate's desire (thelōn, 'wanting, wishing') to release Jesus — the Roman governor is portrayed as reluctantly pushed toward crucifixion rather than eagerly pursuing it. The verb prosephōnēsen ('called out to, addressed') suggests Pilate is trying to persuade the crowd.
21. The imperfect epephōnoun ('they kept shouting') indicates sustained, repeated demands. The doubled imperative staurou staurou ('crucify, crucify') is a demand for the most degrading Roman punishment — reserved for slaves, pirates, and those convicted of treason. The crowd's chant drowns out Pilate's appeal.
22. Luke explicitly notes this is the third time (triton) Pilate declares Jesus's innocence, creating a structural parallel with Peter's three denials. The question ti gar kakon epoiēsen houtos ('what evil has this man done?') demands a specific crime, which is never provided. Pilate repeats his compromise offer (flogging and release) word for word from verse 16, but the crowd's response will be different this time.
23. The verb epekeinto ('they pressed upon, they were insistent, they bore down') describes overwhelming pressure. The verb katischyon ('prevailed, won out, gained strength') is a legal term indicating that the crowd's demand overcame Pilate's resistance. Luke's account makes clear that Pilate capitulated to pressure rather than reaching a judicial decision — the voices (phōnai), not evidence, determined the outcome.
24. The verb epekrinen ('he pronounced judgment, he decided, he decreed') is a judicial term — Pilate formally grants the crowd's aitēma ('demand, request'). The sentence is technically illegal by Roman standards: the governor condemns a man he has three times declared innocent. Luke does not soften this injustice.
25. Luke restates Barabbas's crimes (stasis and phonos) to maximize the irony of the exchange. The phrase paredōken tō thelēmati autōn ('he handed over to their will') uses paradidōmi, the same verb used for Judas's betrayal and for God's sovereign handing-over. Pilate surrenders Jesus not to justice but to 'their will' — mob desire replaces legal verdict.
26. Roman practice required the condemned to carry the horizontal crossbeam (patibulum) to the execution site. Jesus's inability to carry it suggests extreme physical weakness from the flogging. Simon of Cyrene (a city in modern Libya) was likely a Jewish pilgrim in Jerusalem for Passover. The phrase pherein opisthen tou Iēsou ('to carry behind Jesus') takes on symbolic meaning in light of Jesus's teaching: 'Whoever does not carry his own cross and come after me cannot be my disciple' (14:27). Simon literally fulfills the discipleship metaphor.
27. This scene is unique to Luke. The women who mourn (ekoptonto, 'were beating their breasts') and wail (ethrēnoun, 'were lamenting with funeral dirges') perform the traditional Jewish mourning rites while Jesus is still alive. The distinction between 'the people' (tou laou) and 'women' (gynaikōn) may indicate that Luke sees the women as a distinct group within the larger crowd. Their grief is genuine, unlike the crowd's demand for crucifixion.
28. The address thygateres Ierousalēm ('daughters of Jerusalem') echoes the Song of Solomon (1:5, 2:7, 3:5, 5:8, 8:4) and the prophets. Jesus redirects their grief from himself to what awaits Jerusalem — the coming destruction he prophesied in 19:41-44 and 21:20-24. Even on the way to his own execution, Jesus is concerned for others. The phrase 'your children' (ta tekna hymōn) connects to 19:44 ('they will dash you to the ground — you and your children within you').

- 29. This is a devastating inversion of the normal beatitude: in Jewish culture, barrenness was considered a curse (cf. Elizabeth's 'disgrace' in 1:25), but Jesus declares that the coming siege will be so horrific that childless women will be the fortunate ones — they will have no children to watch suffer. Josephus records instances of cannibalism during the siege of Jerusalem (War 6.3.4), making this prophecy terrifyingly specific.
- 30. Jesus quotes Hosea 10:8, the prophet's description of Israel's desperate flight from divine judgment. The plea for mountains to crush them and hills to cover them expresses a preference for death over the horrors that are coming. This passage is later echoed in Revelation 6:16, where the kings of the earth cry the same words at the cosmic judgment.
- 30. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Hosea 10:8 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
- 31. This proverb is unique to Luke and enigmatic. The 'green wood' (hygō xylō) is fresh and difficult to burn; the 'dry wood' (xērō) catches fire easily. If Rome does this to an innocent man (the green wood, full of life), what will Rome do to a guilty, rebellious nation (the dry wood, ready to burn)? The proverb warns that the suffering Jesus endures is mild compared to what Jerusalem will face.
- 32. The word kakourgoi ('criminals, evildoers') is more general than Mark's lēstai ('revolutionaries, bandits'). The phrase syn autō ('with him') fulfills the Isaiah 53:12 quotation from 22:37: 'he was counted among the lawless.' The grammatical structure heteroi kakourgoi duo ('two other criminals') could be read as classifying Jesus as a criminal too — some manuscripts adjust the word order to avoid this implication.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 53:12. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. The Greek Kranion ('Skull') translates the Aramaic Golgotha (which only Mark and Matthew transliterate; Luke gives only the Greek). The traditional site was a rocky outcrop outside the city walls. Luke's account of the crucifixion itself is understated: estayrōsan auton ('they crucified him') — four words in Greek for the most agonizing form of execution the Roman world knew. The positioning of the two criminals on either side physically enacts Isaiah 53:12.
- 33. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 53:12 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
- 34. TEXTUAL NOTE: The first sentence ('Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing') is absent from P75, the original hand of Codex Sinaiticus, Codex Vaticanus, and other early witnesses. It is present in the corrected Sinaiticus, Codex Bezae, and most later manuscripts. The SBLGNT includes it in double brackets. The saying is consistent with Luke's portrait of Jesus (cf. the prayer for persecutors and Stephen's echo in Acts 7:60) and may have been removed by scribes who thought it inappropriate after the destruction of Jerusalem. We include it but note the disputed evidence. The imperfect elegen ('he was saying, he kept saying') may indicate repeated prayer. The casting of lots for garments echoes Psalm 22:18.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 22:18. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. Luke distinguishes between the people (ho laos) who simply watch (theōrōn, 'observing') and the rulers (hoi archontes) who actively mock (exemyktērizon, 'were sneering, were turning up their noses'). The taunt 'he saved others' (allous esōsen) is unwittingly true — Jesus did save others, and the irony is that saving himself would make saving others impossible. The title ho eklektos ('the Chosen One') echoes the divine voice at the transfiguration (9:35), spoken by God in affirmation and now by the rulers in mockery.
- 36. The soldiers' mockery adds a military dimension to the religious rulers' scorn. The oxos ('vinegar, sour wine') was posca, the cheap wine-vinegar mixture that Roman soldiers drank. Offering it to a crucified man was a form of taunting — the soldiers' drink, not a prisoner's comfort. The scene echoes Psalm 69:21 ('they gave me vinegar for my thirst').
- 36. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 69:21. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
- 37. The soldiers' mockery parallels the rulers' (v. 35) but uses the political title 'King of the Jews' (ho basileus tōn Ioudaiōn) rather than the religious title 'Christ.' Three groups now mock: rulers (v. 35), soldiers (vv. 36-37), and one of the criminals (v. 39). The conditional ei ('if') challenges Jesus to prove his claim through self-rescue — the fundamental misunderstanding of his mission.
- 38. The epigraphē ('inscription, titulus') was the charge plaque (titulus crucis) that Roman practice required to be displayed above the condemned, stating the crime. Luke's version is the shortest of the four Gospels. The charge — basileus tōn Ioudaiōn ('King of the Jews') — was political treason against Rome. Ironically, the inscription is theologically true: the crucified man is indeed the King of the Jews, enthroned on a cross.
- 39. The verb eblasphēmei ('was blaspheming, was reviling') is strong — the criminal does not merely ask for help but insults Jesus. The participle kremasthentōn ('hanging') uses a verb associated with the curse of Deuteronomy 21:23 ('cursed is anyone who hangs on a tree'). His demand echoes the rulers' and soldiers' mockery, adding 'and us' — he wants rescue without repentance.
- 39. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 21:23. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 40. The second criminal's response is unique to Luke and theologically remarkable. He rebukes (epitimōn) the first criminal — the same verb used for rebuking demons and storms. His question 'Do you not fear God?' (oude phobē sy ton theon) identifies the fundamental problem: even facing death, the first criminal lacks reverence for God. The phrase en tō autō krimati ('under the same judgment/condemnation') acknowledges that they share Jesus's fate.

41. The criminal confesses his own guilt (dikaiōs, 'justly, rightly') and declares Jesus's innocence (ouden atapon epraxen, 'he has done nothing out of place, nothing wrong'). The word atapon ('out of place, wrong, improper, evil') is a litotes — a profound understatement. This criminal becomes the fifth witness to Jesus's innocence in Luke's passion narrative (after Pilate three times and Herod). A condemned criminal sees what the religious and political authorities refuse to acknowledge.
42. The criminal addresses Jesus by name (Iēsou) without a title — an intimacy that goes beyond formality. The plea mnēsthēti mou ('remember me') echoes the language of the Psalms (Psalm 25:7, 106:4), where 'remember' means to act in someone's favor. The phrase hotan elthēs eis tēn basileian sou ('when you come into your kingdom') is astonishing: hanging beside a dying man, the criminal confesses faith in Jesus's kingship and future reign. This is perhaps the most radical act of faith in the Gospels.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalm 25:7. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. The response exceeds the request: the criminal asked to be remembered in a future kingdom; Jesus promises presence with him today (sēmeron) in paradise (paradeisō). The word paradeisos (borrowed from Persian, meaning 'enclosed garden, park') is used in the Septuagint for the Garden of Eden (Genesis 2:8) and in Jewish apocalyptic literature for the dwelling of the righteous dead. Luke's characteristic sēmeron ('today') — the same word used at Jesus's birth (2:11), in the Nazareth sermon (4:21), and at Zacchaeus's house (19:9) — marks the present moment as the time of salvation. The promise met' emou esē ('you will be with me') defines paradise not as a place but as communion with Jesus.
43. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Genesis 2:8 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
44. The 'sixth hour' (hōra hektē) is noon; the 'ninth hour' (hōras enatēs) is 3 PM — three hours of midday darkness. The darkness (skotos) echoes the plague of darkness over Egypt (Exodus 10:21-23) and the prophetic warnings of Amos 8:9 ('I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight'). The phrase eph' holēn tēn gēn ('over the whole land/earth') is ambiguous — it could mean the land of Israel or the entire earth. The phenomenon was not a normal solar eclipse (impossible during Passover's full moon).
44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 10:21-23. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Amos 8:9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
45. The verb eklipontos ('failing, being eclipsed') is the same root used in 22:32 for faith 'failing.' Luke places the tearing of the temple curtain before Jesus's death (unlike Mark, who places it after), making it a sign that accompanies the dying rather than follows it. The katapetasma tou naou ('curtain of the sanctuary') most likely refers to the inner curtain separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place (Exodus 26:33). Its tearing meson ('in the middle, in two') symbolizes the removal of the barrier between God and humanity — access to God's presence is opened through Jesus's death.
45. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 26:33 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
46. Luke's Jesus dies with the words of Psalm 31:5 on his lips — a psalm of trust in God's protection. This replaces Mark's cry of dereliction ('My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' from Psalm 22:1). Luke's last word is 'Father' (Pater), maintaining the intimate filial relationship that characterized Jesus's prayer life throughout the Gospel (10:21, 11:2, 22:42, 23:34). The verb paratithēmai ('I entrust, I commit, I deposit for safekeeping') is a banking term for depositing something valuable with a trusted guardian. The verb exepneusen ('he breathed out, he expired') is a dignified description of death — Jesus releases his spirit actively rather than having it taken from him.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalms 31:5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Psalm 22:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
47. Luke's centurion declares Jesus *dikaio*s ('righteous, innocent') rather than Mark's 'Son of God' (huios theou). This serves Luke's apologetic purpose: even the Roman executioner acknowledges Jesus's innocence. The verb edoxazen ('he was glorifying, praising') is a Lukan term — the centurion does not merely express an opinion but praises God. This is the sixth witness to Jesus's innocence in the passion narrative. The word ontōs ('truly, certainly, in reality') expresses firm conviction.
48. The crowds who had demanded crucifixion now return home typtones ta stēthē ('beating their chests') — a gesture of grief, mourning, and possibly repentance. Luke's portrait of the crowd is more nuanced than often recognized: they are not uniformly hostile but move from demand (v. 21) to grief (v. 48). The word theōrian ('spectacle, sight') reduces the crucifixion to public entertainment, which makes the crowd's emotional reversal all the more striking.
49. The 'acquaintances' (gnōstōi) and the Galilean women remain — they are witnesses who will bridge the gap between crucifixion and resurrection. Their position apo makrothen ('from a distance') echoes the ten lepers' position (17:12) and Peter's following (22:54). The women are named in 24:10 (Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Mary the mother of James). Their faithful watching (horōsai, 'seeing, observing') contrasts with the disciples' absence — Luke does not record any male disciple at the cross.

50. Joseph of Arimathea is described as a bouleutēs ('councilor'), meaning he was a member of the Sanhedrin — the very body that condemned Jesus. Luke's description of him as agathos kai dikaios ('good and righteous') uses the same language applied to Simeon (2:25) and to Barnabas (Acts 11:24). The dash at the end indicates the description continues.
51. The phrase ouk ēn synkatatetheimenos ('had not agreed, had not voted with') is a legal term indicating dissent from the Sanhedrin's verdict. This detail is unique to Luke and establishes Joseph's moral integrity — he opposed the plot. Arimathea (probably Ramathaim, Samuel's hometown in 1 Samuel 1:1) was a town in the Judean hills. The phrase prosedecheto tēn basileian tou theou ('was waiting expectantly for the kingdom of God') links Joseph to Simeon (2:25, 'waiting for the consolation of Israel') and Anna (2:38, 'looking forward to the redemption of Jerusalem').
51. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes 1 Samuel 1:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
52. Requesting the body of a crucified criminal required courage — it identified Joseph publicly as an associate of a condemned man. Under Roman law, the bodies of the executed usually belonged to the state; release to family or friends required special permission. Joseph's willingness to approach Pilate marks him as willing to bear the social cost of association with Jesus.
53. The verb kathelōn ('having taken down') implies Joseph personally removed the body from the cross — an act of extraordinary devotion. The sindoni ('linen cloth, linen shroud') was used for burial wrapping. The mnēmati laxeutō ('tomb hewn/cut from rock') was an expensive, newly excavated burial cave. The detail 'where no one had yet been laid' (hou ouk ēn oudeis oupō keimenos) ensures that the subsequent resurrection cannot be confused with another body's presence.
54. The paraskeuē ('Preparation') was Friday, the day before the Sabbath, when all work for the Sabbath had to be completed before sunset. The verb epephōskēn ('was dawning, was beginning') refers to the Jewish reckoning where a new day began at sunset, not sunrise — the Sabbath was 'dawning' as the sun set on Friday evening. The urgency of the burial is explained: once the Sabbath began, no burial work could be performed.
55. The women serve as witnesses to both the death (v. 49) and the burial — they know exactly where the tomb is and how the body was positioned. The verb etheasanto ('they observed carefully, they saw with attention') indicates deliberate observation, not a passing glance. This eyewitness knowledge will be critical when they return after the Sabbath (24:1) and find the tomb empty. Their role as witnesses is legally significant in Luke's narrative, even though women's testimony was not accepted in Jewish courts.
56. The women's preparation of arōmata kai myra ('spices and ointments') for proper burial anointing demonstrates both their devotion and their expectation that Jesus is permanently dead — they are preparing for a body, not awaiting a resurrection. The final clause kata tēn entolēn ('according to the commandment') refers to the Sabbath law of Exodus 20:8-11. Even in grief, they observe Torah. The chapter ends on the Sabbath rest — silence, stillness, waiting. Luke places the reader in the suspended moment between death and resurrection.
56. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 20:8-11. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.

Summary: Luke 24 narrates the resurrection and its aftermath: the women discover the empty tomb and receive the angelic announcement, Peter visits the tomb, the risen Jesus walks with two disciples on the road to Emmaus and is recognized in the breaking of bread, Jesus appears to the gathered disciples in Jerusalem, opens their minds to understand Scripture, commissions them as witnesses, and ascends into heaven. The chapter is a theological masterpiece that demonstrates how the resurrection transforms everything — grief becomes joy, confusion becomes understanding, and scattered disciples become commissioned witnesses.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Emmaus road narrative (unique to Luke) is one of the most carefully crafted resurrection accounts in the New Testament. The literary structure is exquisite: two disciples walk away from Jerusalem in despair, encounter the risen Jesus without recognizing him, receive a comprehensive Bible study on messianic suffering, recognize him in the breaking of bread, and immediately return to Jerusalem transformed. The phrase 'Did not our hearts burn within us?' captures the subjective experience of encounter with the risen Christ. Jesus's opening of their minds to understand Scripture (v. 45) resolves the incomprehension noted throughout the Gospel (9:45, 18:34). The ascension in verses 50-53 brings the Gospel full circle — it began in the temple (1:8-9) and ends in the temple (24:53).

Translation Friction: The Emmaus road episode raises questions about the nature of the resurrection body — Jesus walks, talks, and eats, yet is not recognized by people who knew him. The phrase 'their eyes were kept from recognizing him' (v. 16) uses a divine passive, suggesting God prevented recognition until the proper moment. We render the text as written without speculating about the physics of resurrection bodies. The ascension is described very briefly here (v. 51) and in more detail in Acts 1:9-11.

Connections: The empty tomb tradition is shared with all four Gospels. The Emmaus road echoes Genesis 18 (Abraham's hospitality to divine visitors) and the post-exile journey motif in Isaiah 40-55. Jesus's scriptural exposition connects to the promise of 21:15 ('I will give you words and wisdom'). The commission to be 'witnesses' (v. 48) is the programmatic statement that launches Acts. The blessing at Bethany (v. 50) connects to the priestly blessing of Numbers 6:24-26. The return to the temple (v. 53) completes the inclusio with Luke 1.

¹On the first day of the week, at early dawn, the women came to the tomb, bringing the spices they had prepared. ²They found the stone rolled away from the tomb, ³They entered in, and discovered not the body of the Lord Jesus. ⁴While they were puzzling over this, suddenly two men stood beside them in dazzling clothing. ⁵The women were terrified and bowed their faces to the ground, but the men said to them, "Why do you seek the living among the dead? ⁶He is not here; he has been raised. Remember how he told you while he was still in Galilee, ⁷Indeed, declaring, the Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day come back to life. ⁸Then they remembered his words. ⁹When they returned from the tomb, they reported all these things to the Eleven and to all the others. ¹⁰It was Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Mary the mother of James, and the other women with them who told these things to the apostles. ¹¹But these words seemed to them like nonsense, and they did not believe them. ¹²But Peter got up and ran to the tomb. Bending down, he saw the linen cloths by themselves. Then he went home, amazed at what had happened. ¹³Now that same day, two of them were walking to a village called Emmaus, about seven miles from Jerusalem. ¹⁴They talked as one of all these matters which had happened. ¹⁵While they were talking and discussing, Jesus himself came near and walked with them, ¹⁶However, their eyes were holden that they should not know him. ¹⁷He said to them, "What are you discussing with each other as you walk along?" They stood still, their faces downcast. ¹⁸One of them, named Cleopas, answered him, "Are you the only visitor to Jerusalem who does not know the things that have happened there in these days?" ¹⁹He asked them, "What things?" They said to him, "The things concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people — ²⁰How the leading religious leaders and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him. ²¹But we had hoped that he was the one who was going to redeem Israel. And besides all this, it is now the third day since these things happened. ²²Moreover, some women from our group astonished us. They went to the tomb early this morning ²³When they discovered not his body, they arrived and stated, that they had also seen a vision of angels, which stated that he was alive. ²⁴Some of those who were with us went to the tomb and found it just as the women had said, but him they did not see." ²⁵Then he said to them, "How foolish you are, and how slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! ²⁶Was it not necessary for the Christ to suffer these things and then enter into his glory?" ²⁷And beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he interpreted for them the things concerning himself in all the Scriptures. ²⁸As they approached the village where they were going, he acted as though he were going farther. ²⁹But they urged him strongly, saying, "Stay with us, because it is nearly evening and the day is almost over." So he went in to stay with them. ³⁰When he had reclined at the table with them, he took the bread, blessed it, broke it, and began giving it to them. ³¹Then their eyes were opened and they recognized him — and he vanished from their sight. ³²They said to each other, "Were not our hearts burning within us while he was speaking to us on the road, while he was opening the Scriptures to us?" ³³They got up that very hour and returned to Jerusalem. There they found the Eleven and those with them gathered together, ³⁴Declaring, The Lord is risen indeed, and has appeared to Simon. ³⁵Then they described what had happened on the road and how he had been made known to them in the breaking of the bread. ³⁶While they were saying these things, Jesus himself stood among them and said to them, "Peace to you." ³⁷They were startled and terrified, thinking they were seeing a ghost. ³⁸He said to them, "Why are you troubled, and why do doubts arise in your hearts? ³⁹Look at my hands and my feet — it is I myself! Touch me and see, because a ghost does not have flesh and bones as you can see that I have." ⁴⁰When he had said this, he showed them his hands and his feet. ⁴¹While they still could not believe it because of their joy and amazement, he said to them, "Do you have anything here to eat?" ⁴²They gave him a piece of broiled fish, ⁴³He picked up it, and did eat before them. ⁴⁴Then he said to them, "These are my words that I spoke to you while I was still with you — that everything written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms must be fulfilled." ⁴⁵Then he opened their minds to understand the Scriptures. ⁴⁶He said to them, "Thus it is written: the Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day, ⁴⁷That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name in the midst of all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. ⁴⁸You are witnesses of these things. ⁴⁹And look, I am sending what my Father promised upon you. But stay in the city until you have been clothed with power from on high." ⁵⁰Then he led them out as far as Bethany, and lifting up his hands, he blessed them. ⁵¹While he was blessing them, he parted from them and was carried up into heaven. ⁵²They worshipped him, and returned to Jerusalem with remarkable joy:. ⁵³They spent all their time in the temple, praising and blessing God. Amen.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase tē mia tōn sabbatōn ('on the first [day] of the Sabbaths/week') became the standard designation for Sunday, the day of resurrection. The phrase orthrou batheōs ('at deep dawn, very early') indicates the first light before sunrise — they came as early as possible after the Sabbath rest ended. The 'spices' (arōmata) are those prepared in 23:56. The women's visit is motivated by love and grief, not by any expectation of resurrection.
2. The perfect participle apokeklystmenon ('having been rolled away') indicates a completed action with ongoing results — the stone is already moved when they arrive. Rock-cut tombs in first-century Jerusalem were typically sealed with a large disc-shaped stone rolled in a channel across the entrance. Luke does not describe who moved the stone (Matthew attributes it to an angel; Mark leaves it unexplained).
3. Luke uses the full title tou kyriou Iēsou ('of the Lord Jesus'), which is more characteristic of Acts than of the Gospel — it reads from a post-resurrection perspective where the lordship of Jesus is established. The negative ouch heuron ('they did not find') is stark: the absence of the body is the first datum of the resurrection, though the women do not yet interpret it that way.
4. The verb aporeisthai ('to be at a loss, to be perplexed, to be puzzled') describes genuine confusion — the empty tomb is not self-interpreting. The 'two men' (andres duo) are later identified as angels (v. 23) and described as wearing esthēti astraptousē ('clothing that flashes like lightning'). Luke uses 'two men' rather than 'angels,' perhaps to emphasize the witness motif (two witnesses establish testimony, Deuteronomy 19:15). The same 'two men in white' appear at the ascension (Acts 1:10).
4. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 19:15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
5. The posture emphobōn ('terrified') and klinousōn ta prosōpa eis tēn gēn ('bowing their faces to the ground') is the standard response to angelic appearance. The question ti zēteite ton zōnta meta tōn nekrōn ('why do you seek the living one among the dead?') is one of the most theologically significant questions in the New Testament. The participle ton zōnta ('the living one') is not merely 'someone alive' but a title — Jesus is 'the Living One,' an attribute of God himself (cf. 'the living God'). The question reframes the entire situation: the tomb is the wrong place to look for someone who is alive.
6. The core proclamation is three words in Greek: ouk estin hōde ('he is not here') followed by alla ēgerthē ('but he has been raised'). The passive voice ēgerthē ('he was raised') is a divine passive — God raised Jesus from the dead. The command mnēsthēte ('remember!') redirects them to Jesus's own words. Luke's version refers to Galilee as the location of the prediction, not as the location where Jesus will appear (contrast Mark 16:7, 'he is going ahead of you to Galilee').
7. The angels quote Jesus's passion predictions (9:22, 9:44, 18:31-33), compressing them into a three-part summary: delivery (paradothēnai), crucifixion (staurōthēnai), and resurrection (anastēnai). The word dei ('must, it is necessary') reaffirms divine necessity — the passion was not an accident but a plan. The phrase anthrōpōn hamartōlōn ('sinful men') encompasses both Jewish and Roman agents, without singling out either group.
8. The verb emnēsthēsan ('they remembered') marks the turning point — the angelic reminder triggers recognition. What was hidden (18:34, 'this saying was hidden from them') is now uncovered. Remembering in Luke is not passive recall but the activation of understanding that transforms the present.
9. The women are the first witnesses and first proclaimers of the resurrection — they apēngeilan ('reported, announced') the news. The 'Eleven' (tois hendeka) reflects Judas's defection. The phrase pasin tois loipois ('all the rest') indicates a larger group of disciples beyond the Twelve.
10. Luke now names the women: Mary Magdalene (from whom seven demons had been cast out, 8:2), Joanna (wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, 8:3 — unique to Luke), and Mary the mother of James. The inclusion of Joanna connects the resurrection witness to the women who supported Jesus's ministry financially. Luke notes 'the other women with them' (hai loipai syn autais), indicating the named women were not the only witnesses.
11. The word lēros ('nonsense, idle talk, foolish chatter') is a medical term that Hippocrates used for the delirious talk of the feverish. Luke's use of it is devastatingly frank: the apostles dismiss the women's testimony as the ravings of grief-stricken, hysterical women. The verb ēpistoun ('they were disbelieving, they refused to believe') is in the imperfect tense, indicating sustained disbelief, not a momentary reaction. The early church would never have invented women as the primary resurrection witnesses in a culture where women's testimony was legally inadmissible — this detail's embarrassment guarantees its historicity.
12. Peter's response is somewhere between the women's belief and the apostles' dismissal — he runs to verify but does not yet fully understand. The verb parakypsas ('having bent down, having stooped to peer in') indicates he looked into the low tomb entrance without entering. The othonia ('linen cloths, strips of linen') lying mona ('by themselves, alone') are significant: if the body had been stolen, the wrappings would have been taken with it. Peter's reaction is thaumazōn ('wondering, marveling') — not yet faith, but no longer dismissal. Some manuscripts omit this verse, but the SBLGNT includes it.

13. The Emmaus road narrative (vv. 13-35) is unique to Luke and is considered one of the finest pieces of narrative art in the New Testament. The 'two of them' (duo ex autōn) are disciples (not apostles) — one is named Cleopas (v. 18); the other is unnamed. The distance stadiou hexēkonta ('sixty stadia') is approximately seven miles (11 km). The exact location of Emmaus is debated among archaeologists; several sites have been proposed.
14. The verb hōmiloun ('were conversing, were discussing') gives us the English word 'homily.' The perfect participle symbebēkotōn ('things that have happened and are still in effect') indicates events with ongoing impact — the crucifixion's effects are still reverberating. They are trying to make sense of what has occurred.
15. The phrase autos Iēsous ('Jesus himself') emphasizes the personal, physical presence of the risen Lord. The verb engisas ('having drawn near, having approached') shows Jesus taking the initiative — he joins their journey unsolicited. The verb syneporeueto ('was walking along with') indicates sustained companionship, not a brief encounter. Jesus enters the conversation already in progress.
16. The passive verb ektratounto ('were being held, were being restrained') is a divine passive — God prevents their recognition. The phrase tou mē epignōnai ('from knowing, from recognizing') uses the stronger compound verb (epignōnai, 'to recognize fully') rather than simple gnōnai ('to know'). This divine restraint serves a narrative and theological purpose: Jesus will first teach them from Scripture before being revealed in the breaking of bread. Understanding must precede sight.
17. The verb antiballete ('you are tossing back and forth, you are exchanging') suggests animated but inconclusive debate. Jesus's question draws them into conversation. The verb estathēsan ('they stopped, they stood still') indicates they halt in their tracks. The adjective skythrōpoi ('gloomy, sad-faced, with a dark expression') appears only here and in Matthew 6:16 (describing the faces of hypocritical fasters). Their faces mirror their grief.
18. Cleopas (Kleopas, possibly short for Kleopatros) is named but the other disciple is not — the unnamed companion has invited endless speculation (Cleopas's wife? Luke himself?). The question sy monos paroikeis Ierusalēm ('are you the only one residing as a stranger in Jerusalem?') implies that the crucifixion was the talk of the entire city — everyone knows except, apparently, this stranger. The dramatic irony is profound: they are explaining Jesus's death to Jesus.
19. Jesus's question poia ('what things?') draws out their testimony. Their description of Jesus as anēr prophētēs dynatos en ergō kai logō ('a man who was a prophet powerful in deed and word') is accurate but incomplete — they know him as a prophet but not yet as the risen Messiah. The phrase 'before God and all the people' (enantion tou theou kai pantos tou laou) acknowledges both divine and public approval. Their description echoes the characterization of Moses in Acts 7:22.
20. They identify the agents of Jesus's death as 'our chief priests and rulers' (hoi archiereis kai hoi archontes hēmōn) — 'our' indicates they still identify as part of the community whose leaders condemned Jesus. The phrase krima thanatou ('sentence of death, death penalty') is a legal term. The verb estaurōsan ('they crucified') assigns the crucifixion to the Jewish leaders even though Rome performed the execution — Luke's account emphasizes the instigators over the executioners.
21. The imperfect ēlpizomen ('we were hoping, we had been hoping') is one of the saddest verbs in the New Testament — their hope is stated in the past tense. The verb lytrouthai ('to redeem, to ransom, to liberate') echoes Zechariah's prophecy in 1:68 ('he has visited and accomplished redemption for his people') and connects to the concept of the go'el, the kinsman-redeemer. Their messianic expectation was political liberation; the crucifixion destroyed that hope. The mention of 'the third day' (tritēn tautēn hēmeran) is ironic — they note the timeframe that Jesus predicted for his resurrection but do not connect it.
22. The verb exestēsan ('astonished, amazed, disturbed') indicates that the women's report was not simply dismissed (as verse 11 might suggest) but created genuine disturbance among the group. The phrase genomenai orthrinai ('having been early-rising, having gone early') places the women's visit in context.
23. The word optasian ('vision, appearance') may reflect the disciples' interpretation of the women's experience — calling it a 'vision' allows them to acknowledge the report without accepting its implications. The final phrase hoi legousin auton zēn ('who say he is alive') is the heart of the Christian proclamation compressed into five Greek words. The disciples report this as information, not yet as belief.
24. The verification visit (tines tōn syn hēmin, 'some of those with us,' referring to Peter and possibly others) confirmed the empty tomb but not the resurrection itself — auton de ouk eidon ('but him they did not see'). The tomb's emptiness is a necessary but insufficient condition for belief. The physical absence of Jesus is confirmed; his living presence has not yet been encountered. The emphatic final position of ouk eidon ('they did not see') communicates the disappointment.
25. The exclamation ō anoētoi ('O senseless ones, O foolish ones') is not an insult but an expression of loving exasperation. The word anoētos means 'not understanding, not thinking through' — they have the data but have not drawn the conclusion. The phrase bradeis tē kardia ('slow of heart') locates the problem not in the intellect but in the will — they are sluggish to believe. The phrase epi pasin hois elalēsan hoi prophētai ('concerning all things the prophets spoke') indicates the prophetic witness is comprehensive, not piecemeal.
26. The question is rhetorical: ouchi tauta edei pathein ton christon ('was it not necessary for the Christ to suffer?'). The verb edei ('it was necessary') is the same word used throughout Luke for divine necessity (2:49, 4:43, 9:22, 13:33, 17:25, 22:37, 24:7). Jesus's argument is that messianic suffering was not a contradiction of God's plan but its fulfillment. The sequence — suffering first (pathein), then glory (eiselthein eis tēn doxan) — is the pattern the disciples had not grasped: the cross precedes the crown.
27. The phrase arxamenos apo Mōyseōs kai apo pantōn tōn prophētōn ('beginning from Moses and from all the prophets') indicates a comprehensive, canonical exposition — Jesus explains the entire Old Testament as pointing to himself. The verb diermēneusen ('he interpreted, he explained, he

- translated') is the root of 'hermeneutics' — Jesus provides the interpretive key that unlocks the whole of Scripture. The phrase ta peri heautou ('the things concerning himself') reveals that Jesus is the subject of the entire Bible. What we would give to have the content of this exposition — Luke records only that it happened, not what was said.
- 28. The verb prosepoiēsato ('he pretended, he acted as though, he made as if') indicates that Jesus created the impression he intended to continue walking. This is not deception but an invitation: he waits to be welcomed. The pattern is significant: the risen Christ does not force his presence on anyone but waits for invitation. The disciples must choose to extend hospitality.
- 29. The verb parebiasanto ('they strongly urged, they compelled by entreaty') indicates persistent, warm insistence. The phrase meionon meth' hēmōn ('stay with us') is a simple invitation that becomes the moment of grace. The time reference — evening approaching, day declining — is both practical (travel was dangerous after dark) and symbolic (spiritual darkness is about to give way to light). Jesus accepts their hospitality: eisēlthen tou meinai syn autois ('he entered to remain with them').
- 30. The four actions — took (labōn), blessed (eulogēsēn), broke (klasas), gave (epedidou) — mirror the Last Supper (22:19) and the feeding of the five thousand (9:16). The guest has become the host: the one invited to dinner takes the role of the host who distributes bread. This reversal is the moment of revelation. The imperfect epedidou ('was giving, began giving') suggests the recognition occurred during the distribution, not after.
- 31. The passive diēnoichthēsan ('were opened') reverses the divine closing of verse 16 — God who held their eyes shut now opens them. The verb epegnōsan ('they recognized fully, they knew him completely') is the same compound verb from verse 16 (epignōnai). Recognition comes through the breaking of bread, not through the Scripture exposition — though the exposition prepared them. The word aphantos ('invisible, unseen, vanished') occurs only here in the New Testament. Jesus does not walk away but simply ceases to be visible. The risen Christ's appearances are under his sovereign control.
- 32. The phrase hē kardia hēmōn kaiomenē ēn ('our heart was burning') describes the subjective experience of encountering the risen Christ through Scripture — warmth, illumination, and kindling of what was extinguished. The verb diēnoigen ('was opening') uses the same root as the opening of their eyes (v. 31) and the opening of their minds (v. 45) — opening is the central action of this chapter. Their hearts burned during the walk, but they did not understand the burning until after the recognition. Retrospectively, the Scripture exposition was already the presence of the risen Christ.
- 33. The phrase autē tē hōra ('that very hour') indicates they left immediately — despite the late hour and the seven-mile journey back to Jerusalem in the dark. The resurrection reverses their direction: they had walked away from Jerusalem in despair; now they rush back in joy. The verb hypestrepsan ('they returned') is significant in Luke — the faithful always return (the leper in 17:15, the women in 23:56). They find the Eleven already gathered (ēthroumeous), indicating the community has regathered despite the scattering.
- 34. Before the Emmaus disciples can share their news, they are greeted with a proclamation: ontōs ēgerthē ho kyrios ('the Lord has truly been raised'). The adverb ontōs ('truly, really, in fact') marks the shift from rumor to conviction. The appearance to Simon (Peter) is mentioned only here and in 1 Corinthians 15:5 — Luke does not narrate it, but this brief reference confirms that Peter had a personal encounter with the risen Jesus between verses 12 and 34, transforming his amazement into faith.
- 35. The verb exēgounto ('they were narrating, explaining in detail') gives us 'exegesis.' They share two things: what happened on the road (ta en tē hodō) and how recognition came in the breaking of bread (en tē klasei tou artou). The phrase 'the breaking of the bread' (tē klasei tou artou) uses the article, suggesting this is already becoming a technical term for the communal meal that would later be called the Eucharist (Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7). Jesus is recognized not in supernatural display but in the ordinary act of sharing a meal.
- 36. The appearance is sudden: autos estē en mesō autōn ('he himself stood in their midst'). The greeting eirēnē hymin ('peace to you') is the standard Hebrew shalom aleichem — but in this context it carries its full theological weight: the peace of the risen Christ, the restoration of all that was broken. This is not merely a greeting but a bestowal.
- 37. Despite having just heard the Emmaus report and having proclaimed 'The Lord has truly been raised,' the disciples react with terror (ptoēthentes, 'startled, frightened') and fear (emphoboi, 'filled with fear'). The word pneuma ('spirit, ghost') indicates they think they are seeing an apparition of a dead person, not a resurrected body. This detail underscores that the resurrection was not expected or easily believed, even by those who had reasons to expect it.
- 38. The verb tetaragmenoi ('disturbed, agitated, troubled') describes inner turmoil. The word dialogismoi ('reasonings, doubts, debates') can mean either 'thoughts' or 'doubts' — in context, the skeptical nuance predominates. The phrase anabainousin en tē kardia hymōn ('rise up in your hearts') locates doubt in the heart, not the mind, connecting to 'slow of heart to believe' in verse 25.
- 39. Jesus offers empirical evidence: visual (idete, 'look'), tactile (psēlaphēsate, 'touch, handle, feel'), and rational (a ghost lacks sarka kai ostea, 'flesh and bones'). The phrase egō eimi autos ('I am myself, it is I myself') is a strong identity claim — the same person who was crucified is now standing before them. The hands and feet (tas cheiras mou kai tous podas mou) bear the crucifixion wounds — the nail marks are the proof that this is the same body, transformed but continuous. The resurrection body is physical, tangible, and material.
- 40. The verb edeixen ('he showed, he displayed') indicates Jesus actively presented the evidence. The crucifixion wounds are not hidden or healed but displayed as identifying marks — the risen body retains the marks of the passion. This detail is theologically significant: the resurrection does not erase the cross but transforms it.
- 41. The phrase apistountōn apo tēs charas ('disbelieving from joy') is one of Luke's most psychologically acute observations: their joy is so overwhelming that they cannot yet fully absorb the reality. This is not skeptical unbelief but the stunned incredulity of receiving something too good to be true.

Jesus's request for food (brōsimon, 'something edible') serves as further evidence of physical reality — ghosts do not eat.

42. The ichthys optou ('broiled fish') is ordinary food — a common part of a Jerusalem meal. Some later manuscripts add 'and a honeycomb' (kai apo melissiou kēriou), but the SBLGNT follows the shorter reading. The fish connects to Jesus's ministry around the Sea of Galilee and to the post-resurrection breakfast in John 21:9-13.
43. The phrase enōpion autōn ('before them, in their presence, in front of them') emphasizes that the eating was publicly witnessed — this is a demonstration, not a private meal. The risen Jesus eats physical food with his physical body in the physical presence of witnesses. This detail served as crucial evidence against Docetism (the later heresy that Christ only appeared to have a physical body).
44. The phrase eti ōn syn hymin ('while I was still with you') is striking — Jesus speaks of his pre-resurrection ministry as a distinct, completed phase. The threefold division — nomō Mōyseōs ('Law of Moses'), prophētais ('Prophets'), and psalmois ('Psalms') — represents the three sections of the Hebrew Bible: Torah, Nevi'im, and Ketuvim (the Psalms representing the Writings as its largest and most prominent book). This is the earliest reference to the tripartite structure of the Hebrew canon. The verb dei ('must') reaffirms divine necessity for the final time.
45. The verb diēnoixen ('he opened') echoes the opening of eyes (v. 31) and the opening of Scriptures (v. 32). Now it is the nous ('mind, understanding, intellect') that is opened. This is a divine act — the disciples cannot understand Scripture on their own; the risen Christ must unlock their comprehension. This verse resolves the incomprehension that has been a motif throughout the Gospel (9:45, 18:34). What was hidden by divine design (18:34, 'this saying was hidden from them') is now revealed by divine action.
46. The formula houtōs gegraptai ('thus it is written, so it stands written') is a standard introductory formula for Scripture citation. The two elements — suffering (pathein) and resurrection (anastēnai ek nekrōn, 'to rise from the dead') on the third day — constitute the foundational Christian kerygma (proclamation), the same pattern found in 1 Corinthians 15:3-4, which Paul identifies as the tradition he received.
47. The infinitive kērychthēnai ('to be proclaimed, to be heralded') extends the 'it is written' formula: Scripture foretold not only the suffering and resurrection but also the resulting worldwide mission. The content of the proclamation is metanoian eis aphesin hamartiōn ('repentance leading to forgiveness of sins'). The scope is eis panta ta ethnē ('to all the nations') — the universal mission that Luke will narrate in Acts. The phrase arxamenoi apo Ierousalēm ('beginning from Jerusalem') provides the geographic starting point and the programmatic outline for Acts (cf. Acts 1:8, 'in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth').
48. The declaration hymeis martyres toutōn ('you are witnesses of these things') is the commission statement that bridges the Gospel and Acts. The word martyres ('witnesses') carries legal weight — they have seen and can testify. The 'these things' (toutōn) encompasses everything: the suffering, resurrection, and the scriptural interpretation. This single sentence defines the apostolic mission: to bear witness to what they have seen and heard.
49. The phrase tēn epangelian tou patros mou ('the promise of my Father') refers to the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 1:4-5, 2:33). The verb apostellō ('I am sending') is a present tense indicating certainty. The command kathisate en tē polei ('sit, stay, remain in the city') requires waiting — the disciples must not begin their mission until equipped. The metaphor endysēsthe ('you are clothed with') presents the Holy Spirit as a garment — power (dynamis) from on high (ex hypsous) that covers and transforms them. This promise is fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 2).
50. Bethany (Bēthanian) is on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, about two miles from Jerusalem (cf. 19:29). The gesture eparas tas cheiras ('having lifted his hands') is the priestly blessing posture (cf. Leviticus 9:22, where Aaron 'lifted his hands toward the people and blessed them'). Jesus departs not as a prophet or teacher but as a priest, bestowing the final benediction on his people. The verb eulogēsēn ('he blessed') connects to the Benedictus of Zechariah (1:68, 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel').
50. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Leviticus 9:22 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
51. The ascension occurs en tō eulogein auton autous ('while he was blessing them') — his last earthly act is benediction. The verb diestē ('he parted, he was separated, he withdrew') conveys gentle departure. The phrase anephereto eis ton ouranon ('he was being carried up into heaven') is in the imperfect passive, suggesting a gradual, visible ascent. Some manuscripts omit 'and was carried up into heaven,' but the SBLGNT includes it. Acts 1:9-11 provides the more detailed account.
52. The verb proskynēsantes ('having worshiped, having prostrated themselves') is the first unambiguous act of worship directed at Jesus in Luke's Gospel — his departure prompts what his presence did not. The phrase meta charas megalēs ('with great joy') is counterintuitive: their master has just left them, yet they are filled with joy rather than grief. This transforms the departure from loss into exaltation. The verb hypēstrepsan ('they returned') completes the movement: the Emmaus disciples returned to Jerusalem in verse 33; now all the disciples return, and the centripetal pull toward Jerusalem continues into Acts.
53. The Gospel ends where it began: in the temple (en tō hierō). Luke 1:8-9 opened with Zechariah serving in the temple; Luke 24:53 closes with the disciples worshipping in the temple. The phrase dia pantos ('continually, at all times') indicates this was not a single visit but a sustained practice of worship. The participle eulogountes ('blessing, praising') uses the same verb Jesus used in blessing them (v. 50) — they return to God the blessing they received from Christ. The Gospel of Luke concludes not with an ending but with a beginning: the community of praise that will, in the opening of Acts, receive the Spirit and become the church.

John

Summary: John 1 opens with one of the most theologically dense passages in the New Testament: the Prologue (1:1-18), which identifies Jesus as the eternal Word (logos) who was with God, was God, and became flesh to dwell among humanity. The chapter then introduces John the Baptist as a witness to the light, narrates the Baptist's testimony before the priests and Levites, and concludes with the calling of the first disciples — Andrew, Simon Peter, Philip, and Nathanael — as they begin to recognize Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God, and the King of Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Prologue draws on both Jewish Wisdom tradition (Proverbs 8, Sirach 24) and Greek philosophical vocabulary to present Jesus as the pre-existent, creative, and revelatory Word of God. The Greek logos carried immense weight in both traditions — for Jews, the word of God was the agent of creation (Genesis 1, Psalm 33:6); for Greeks, logos was the rational principle ordering the universe. John's genius is to take this loaded term and declare that it 'became flesh' — a claim that would have shocked both audiences. The 'I am' language that will dominate the Gospel appears implicitly in the Baptist's self-identification as 'not the Christ' and his pointing to 'one standing among you whom you do not know.'

Translation Friction: The relationship between the Prologue's logos theology and the narrative that follows requires careful handling. We render logos as 'Word' (capitalized) to preserve its theological weight as a title for Christ. The Baptist's denial sequence (1:19-28) requires attention to the political and religious expectations surrounding messianic figures. Nathanael's skepticism about Nazareth (1:46) reflects a real geographical prejudice in first-century Judaism. The title 'Son of Man' in verse 51 draws on Daniel 7:13 and will require expanded treatment.

Connections: The Prologue connects to Genesis 1:1 ('In the beginning'), Proverbs 8:22-31 (Wisdom as God's companion in creation), and Isaiah 40:3 (the voice in the wilderness). The 'Lamb of God' title (1:29, 36) connects to the Passover lamb of Exodus 12 and the suffering servant of Isaiah 53. Jacob's ladder (Genesis 28:12) is explicitly referenced in 1:51. The entire chapter establishes the identity claims that the rest of the Gospel will develop through signs and discourse.

¹In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. ²He was in the beginning with God. ³All things came into being through him, and apart from him not one thing came into being that has come into being. ⁴In him was life, and the life was the light of humanity. ⁵The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not overcome it. ⁶There

e came a man sent from God; his name was John. ⁷He came as a witness, to testify about the light, so that all might believe through him. ⁸He himself was not the light, but he came to testify about the light. ⁹The true light, which gives light to every person, was coming into the world. ¹⁰He was in the world, and the world came into being through him, yet the world did not recognize him. ¹¹He came to his own, and his own people did not receive him. ¹²But to all who received him — to those who believe in his name — he gave the right to become children of God, ¹³Which were brought into the world, not of lifeblood, nor of the will of the physical nature, nor of the will of man, but of God. ¹⁴And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we have seen his glory — glory as of the only Son from the Father — full of grace and truth. ¹⁵John testified about him and cried out, saying, "This is the one of whom I said, 'The one coming after me has surpassed me, because he existed before me.'" ¹⁶For from his fullness we have all received grace upon grace. ¹⁷For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. ¹⁸No one has ever seen God. The only God, who is at the Father's side — he has made him known. ¹⁹This is John's testimony, when the Jewish leaders sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, "Who are you?" ²⁰He confessed and did not deny it, but confessed, "I am not the Christ." ²¹They asked him, "What then? Are you Elijah?" He said, "I am not." "Are you the Prophet?" He answered, "No." ²²So they said to him, "Who are you? We need to give an answer to those who sent us. What do you say about yourself?" ²³He said, "I am 'a voice crying out in the wilderness: Make straight the way of the Lord,'" as the prophet Isaiah said. ²⁴Now they had been sent from the Pharisees. ²⁵They questioned him, "Then why are you baptizing, if you are not the Christ, nor Elijah, nor the Prophet?" ²⁶John answered them, "I baptize with water, but among you stands one whom you do not know — ²⁷He it is, who coming following me is preferred prior to me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose. ²⁸These things took place in Bethany beyond the Jordan, where John was baptizing. ²⁹The next day he saw Jesus coming toward him and said, "Look — the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" ³⁰This is the one about whom I said, 'A man is coming after me who has surpassed me, because he existed before me.' ³¹I myself did not know him, but the reason I came baptizing with water was so that he might be revealed to Israel." ³²And John testified, saying, "I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it remained on him. ³³I myself did not know him, but the one who sent me to baptize with water told me, 'The one on whom you see the Spirit descending and remaining — he is the one who baptizes with the Holy Spirit.' ³⁴And I have seen and have testified that this is the Son of God." ³⁵The next day John was standing again with two of his disciples, ³⁶Looking upon Jesus as he walked, he says, take notice the Lamb of God! ³⁷The two disciples heard him say this, and they followed Jesus. ³⁸Jesus turned and saw them following and said to them, "What are you looking for?" They said to him, "Rabbi" (which means Teacher), "where are you staying?" ³⁹He said to them, "Come and you will see." So they came and saw where he was staying, and they remained with him that day. It was about the tenth hour. ⁴⁰Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, was one of the two who heard John and followed Jesus. ⁴¹He first found his own brother Simon and said to him, "We have found the Messiah" (which is translated Christ). ⁴²He brought him to Jesus. Jesus looked at him and said, "You are Simon son of John. You will be called Cephas" (which is translated Peter). ⁴³The next day Jesus decided to go to Galilee. He found Philip and said to him, "Follow me." ⁴⁴Now Philip was from Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter. ⁴⁵Philip found Nathanael and said to him, "We have found the one Moses wrote about in the Law, and the prophets wrote about as well — Jesus son of Joseph, from Nazareth." ⁴⁶Nathanael said to him, "Can anything good come from Nazareth?" Philip said to him, "Come and see." ⁴⁷Jesus saw Nathanael coming toward him and said of him, "Look — a true Israelite, in whom there is no deceit!" ⁴⁸Nathanael said to him, "How do you know me?" Jesus answered him, "Before Philip called you, while you were under the fig tree, I saw you." ⁴⁹Nathanael answered him, "Rabbi, you are the Son of God! You are the King of Israel!" ⁵⁰Jesus answered him, "Do you believe because I told you I saw you under the fig tree? You will see greater things than these." ⁵¹And he said to him, "Truly, truly, I tell you, you will see heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase en arche ('in the beginning') deliberately echoes the opening of Genesis (bereshit in Hebrew, en arche in the Septuagint). The imperfect verb en ('was') denotes continuous past existence, not a point of origin — the Word already existed when the beginning occurred.

1. The preposition pros ('with') in 'the Word was with God' suggests not merely proximity but relational orientation — face-to-face communion. The Word was directed toward God, in dynamic relationship.
1. In the final clause, 'God' (theos) appears without the article, which in Greek grammar indicates qualitative force — the Word shared the nature and essence of God. This is distinct from saying 'the Word was the God' (which would conflate the persons) or 'the Word was a god' (which would diminish the claim). The rendering 'the Word was God' preserves the theological precision of the Greek.
1. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 1:1. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
2. The pronoun houtos ('this one, he') personalizes the logos — no longer 'it' but 'he.' This verse reaffirms what verse 1 stated, functioning as a summary transition before the creation theme of verse 3. The repetition is characteristic of John's literary style, where key ideas are restated with slight variation for emphasis.
3. The verb egeneto ('came into being') contrasts with the en ('was') of verses 1-2. The Word 'was' (eternal existence); all things 'came into being' (originated existence) through him. The preposition dia ('through') identifies the Word as the agent of creation, echoing Proverbs 8:30 and Colossians 1:16.
3. The punctuation of the final phrase ho gegonen ('that has come into being') is disputed. The SBLGNT places it with verse 3 as the conclusion of the creation statement. Some manuscripts and church fathers attach it to verse 4: 'What has come into being in him was life.' We follow the SBLGNT punctuation.
3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Proverbs 8:30 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
4. The Greek zoe ('life') in John always carries theological weight beyond mere biological existence — it points toward the 'eternal life' (zoe aionios) that becomes a central theme of the Gospel. The chain of identification — Word, life, light — establishes the conceptual framework for the entire book. 'Of humanity' renders ton anthronon more inclusively than the KJV's 'of men,' reflecting the universal scope of the claim.
5. The verb katelaben (from katalambano) carries a double meaning: 'to comprehend/understand' (as the KJV renders it) and 'to seize/overcome/extinguish.' Both senses are likely intended — the darkness neither understood the light nor was able to overpower it. We render 'overcome' as the primary sense, since the light-versus-darkness imagery suggests conflict rather than mere cognition.
5. The present tense phainei ('shines') amid past-tense narration may indicate that the light's shining is an ongoing reality, not merely a past event.
6. The verb egeneto ('there came, there appeared') contrasts with the en ('was') used of the Word in verses 1-2. John the Baptist 'came into being' — he is a creature, not the eternal Word. The participle apestalmenos ('sent') is from apostello, the root of 'apostle,' emphasizing John's divinely commissioned role.
7. The word martyria ('witness, testimony') and its verb martyreo ('to testify') appear prominently throughout John's Gospel. The Baptist's role is defined entirely in terms of witness — he is not the light but the one who points to it. The purpose clause 'so that all might believe' establishes that faith (pistis/pisteuo) is the intended response to testimony, a theme John develops throughout.
8. The emphatic ekeinos ('that one, he himself') underscores the distinction between the Baptist and the light. This careful distancing may reflect a historical situation in which some followers of John the Baptist continued to venerate him as a messianic figure (cf. Acts 19:1-7). John's Gospel consistently subordinates the Baptist to Jesus.
9. The adjective alethinon ('true, genuine, real') does not merely mean 'not false' but 'the authentic reality of which all other lights are shadows.' The participle erchomenon ('coming') can modify either 'light' (the true light was coming into the world) or 'person' (every person coming into the world). We attach it to 'light,' following the flow of the Prologue's narrative about the Word entering the world.
10. The threefold repetition of kosmos ('world') creates a devastating irony: the world that owed its very existence to the Word failed to recognize its maker. The verb egno ('knew, recognized') implies relational knowledge, not merely intellectual awareness — the world failed to acknowledge or receive the one through whom it was made.
11. The Greek shifts from neuter ta idia ('his own things/domain') to masculine hoi idioi ('his own people'). He came to his own place — Israel, the covenant people — and his own people rejected him. This verse encapsulates the tragic theme of the Gospel: the divine Word comes home and is turned away by those who should have recognized him.
12. The Greek exousia means 'right, authority, power' — not merely ability but authorized status. 'Children' (tekna) rather than 'sons' (huioi) is John's deliberate word choice, emphasizing the intimacy of the relationship rather than legal standing. The present tense 'believe' (pisteuousin) suggests ongoing faith, not a one-time act. 'In his name' means trusting in the person and character that the name represents.
13. The plural 'bloods' (haimaton) is unusual and may refer to the mixture of parental blood thought in antiquity to produce offspring. The threefold negation — not from blood, not from physical desire, not from human decision — systematically eliminates every natural means of generation. This divine birth is entirely God's initiative. Some early church fathers read the singular ('who was born') referring to Christ's virgin birth, but the plural is better attested in the manuscripts.

14. The verb eskenosen ('tabernacled, pitched his tent') is one of John's most theologically loaded words. It echoes the Hebrew shakan ('to dwell'), from which Shekhinah derives — God's indwelling presence in the tabernacle and temple. The Word does not merely visit but takes up residence in human flesh.
14. Monogenous ('only, unique, one-of-a-kind') is rendered 'only Son' rather than the KJV's 'only begotten.' The Greek does not emphasize manner of origin (begetting) but uniqueness of relationship. The Word is God's one-of-a-kind Son.
14. The pairing 'grace and truth' (charitos kai aletheias) corresponds to the Hebrew chesed ve'emet of Exodus 34:6, where God reveals himself as 'abounding in faithful love and truth.' John claims that this divine self-revelation is now embodied in a person.
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 34:6. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The perfect tense kekragen ('has cried out') indicates that John's testimony continues to resonate. The paradox is deliberate: the one who comes 'after' John in time (born later, began ministry later) 'was before' him in preexistence. The Greek protos mou en ('he was first/before me') points to the eternal existence affirmed in verse 1.
16. The phrase charin anti charitos ('grace upon grace') is notoriously difficult. The preposition anti can mean 'in place of,' 'in return for,' or 'upon.' The sense is likely wave upon wave — one expression of grace replaced and exceeded by the next, an inexhaustible supply. 'Fullness' (pleroma) indicates that the incarnate Word lacks nothing of the divine nature.
17. John does not set Moses and Jesus in opposition (note the absence of 'but' — the Greek has no adversative conjunction here, though the KJV adds one). The law was given (passive, from God) through Moses; grace and truth came (active, from their source) through Jesus Christ. The comparison is one of escalation, not contradiction. This is the first time the name 'Jesus Christ' appears in the Gospel.
18. The SBLGNT reads monogenes theos ('the only God' or 'the unique one, God') rather than the variant monogenes huios ('the only Son') found in later manuscripts. This is one of the strongest christological statements in the New Testament — the Word is not merely the only Son but 'the only God,' a second use of theos applied to the Word (cf. 1:1c).
18. The verb exegesato ('has made known, has explained') is the root of 'exegesis.' The Son 'exegetes' the Father — he is the authoritative interpretation and revelation of the invisible God. The image of being 'at the Father's side' (eis ton kolpon, literally 'in the bosom') conveys the most intimate possible relationship.
19. The term hoi Ioudaioi ('the Jews') in John's Gospel almost always refers to the religious authorities in Jerusalem, not the Jewish people as a whole. We render 'the Jewish leaders' to reflect this. The delegation of priests and Levites indicates an official inquiry from the temple establishment — John's activity in the wilderness had attracted enough attention to prompt an investigation.
20. The emphatic double statement — 'confessed and did not deny' — uses a literary device (litotes: affirming by negating the opposite) to stress the forcefulness of John's declaration. The ego ouk eimi ('I am not') is a deliberate contrast with Jesus's ego eimi ('I am') statements that will follow throughout the Gospel.
21. Three messianic expectations are probed: the Christ, Elijah (expected to return before the Messiah, per Malachi 4:5), and 'the Prophet' (the prophet like Moses promised in Deuteronomy 18:15-18). John denies all three. The synoptic Gospels identify John as Elijah (Matthew 11:14, 17:12-13), but John's Gospel has the Baptist himself deny this identification — a tension scholars have long noted. 'The Prophet' with the definite article indicates a specific expected figure, not just any prophet.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Malachi 4:5. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
21. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 18:15-18. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
22. The delegation's frustration is evident — they need a report for the authorities in Jerusalem. The question 'What do you say about yourself?' forces John to define his own identity positively after three negative denials.
23. John identifies himself not with a title but with a function — he is a voice, nothing more. The quotation is from Isaiah 40:3 (Septuagint), which in its original context announced the end of the Babylonian exile and God's return to his people. John applies this to Jesus's coming. In the Hebrew of Isaiah 40:3, 'in the wilderness' modifies 'prepare the way' (prepare in the wilderness a way for the LORD), but the Septuagint (and John) attach it to 'crying' — a voice crying in the wilderness.
23. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 40:3 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
24. This parenthetical note identifies the theological party behind the inquiry. The Pharisees, who were deeply concerned with ritual purity and proper religious practice, would have been particularly interested in an unauthorized baptizer operating in the wilderness. This explains the question that follows in verse 25 about John's authority to baptize.
25. The logic is clear: if John holds none of the recognized eschatological offices, by what authority does he perform a rite of purification? Baptism (immersion) was known in Judaism — proselyte baptism, Qumran immersions — but an unauthorized figure calling all Israel to repentance through baptism was unprecedented.

- 26. John deflects the question about his own authority by pointing to a greater figure already present but unrecognized. The verb hesteken ('stands,' perfect tense) suggests a settled, ongoing presence — the one they seek is already there. The irony is characteristic of John's Gospel: the religious authorities are investigating the wrong person.
- 27. Untying a master's sandal was considered too menial even for a Jewish slave — it was reserved for Gentile slaves. John declares himself unworthy of even the lowest servant's task in relation to the coming one. The image is vivid and culturally specific, conveying radical self-abasement.
- 28. This Bethany is distinct from the Bethany near Jerusalem (11:1). The SBLGNT reads 'Bethany' (Bethania) rather than 'Bethabara,' which is an early emendation by Origen, who could not locate a Bethany east of the Jordan in his day. The location 'beyond the Jordan' places the events in Perea or Transjordan.
- 29. The title 'Lamb of God' (ho amnos tou theou) is unique to John's Gospel and carries multiple Old Testament resonances: the Passover lamb (Exodus 12), the lamb led to slaughter in Isaiah 53:7, and possibly the daily tamid offerings in the temple. The verb airon ('takes away, bears, removes') can mean both 'to carry' and 'to remove,' and both senses may be intended — the lamb both bears sin and removes it.
- 29. The scope is universal — 'the sin of the world' (tou kosmou), not merely Israel. This fits the Prologue's universal vision of light for 'every person' (1:9).
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Exodus 12. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 53:7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. This repeats the testimony of verse 15, now spoken in narrative context rather than within the Prologue. The paradox remains: Jesus comes 'after' John chronologically but existed 'before' him eternally. The word aner ('man') is significant — the eternal Word (1:1) is now identified as a specific human being.
- 31. John's confession 'I did not know him' (ouk edein auton) is striking — even the forerunner required divine revelation to identify the one he was preparing for. His entire baptizing ministry had a single purpose: to create the occasion for Jesus's public unveiling to Israel. The passive 'might be revealed' (phanerothe) implies God as the agent of revelation.
- 32. John's Gospel does not narrate the baptism of Jesus directly but presents it through the Baptist's eyewitness testimony. The perfect tense tetheamai ('I have seen, I have observed') indicates a vivid, lasting impression. The dove imagery and the Spirit's descent connect to Genesis 1:2 (the Spirit hovering over the waters) and Isaiah 11:2 (the Spirit resting on the Messiah). The key detail is that the Spirit 'remained' (emeinen) — not a temporary empowerment but a permanent anointing.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Genesis 1:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 32. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 11:2. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
- 33. John's recognition of Jesus depended on a prior divine sign — the Spirit's descent and remaining. The description of Jesus as 'the one who baptizes with the Holy Spirit' defines his ministry in contrast to John's water baptism. The verb menon ('remaining') is a key Johannine word (meno, 'to remain, abide') that will become central to the Gospel's theology of relationship with God.
- 34. The perfect tenses heoraka ('I have seen') and memartyrika ('I have testified') indicate completed action with continuing relevance — John's witness is settled and permanent. Some manuscripts read 'the Chosen One of God' (ho eklektos tou theou) instead of 'the Son of God,' which would echo Isaiah 42:1. The SBLGNT reads 'Son of God,' which we follow.
- 34. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 42:1. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 35. This marks the third day in John's opening sequence (day 1: vv. 19-28; day 2: vv. 29-34; day 3: vv. 35-42). The progressive narrative builds toward Jesus's gathering of his first followers. That these are John's own disciples who will leave him for Jesus underscores the Baptist's role as a transitional figure.
- 36. The verb emblepsas ('having looked intently at') suggests a fixed, penetrating gaze — John does not casually glance but stares with recognition. The declaration is shorter than in verse 29, omitting 'who takes away the sin of the world,' as if the title alone now suffices. This is the second and final time John identifies Jesus as the Lamb.
- 37. The verb ekoloutheesan ('followed') carries both the literal sense of walking after someone and the theological sense of becoming a disciple. The Baptist's testimony achieves its intended purpose — his disciples transfer their allegiance to the one he has been pointing toward.
- 38. Jesus's first words in John's Gospel are a question — 'What are you looking for?' (ti zeteite) — which functions on multiple levels: practically (what do you want?), spiritually (what are you seeking in life?). John translates 'Rabbi' for his Greek-speaking audience as 'Teacher' (didaskalos). The verb meneis ('are you staying/remaining') connects to the Johannine theme of 'remaining/abiding' (meno) that pervades the Gospel.
- 39. Jesus's invitation 'Come and you will see' (erchesthe kai opsesthe) becomes a pattern in the Gospel — seeing leads to believing. The 'tenth hour' is approximately 4 PM by Roman reckoning (or 10 AM by Jewish reckoning, counting from sunrise). The precise time detail is the kind of eyewitness memory that suggests the narrator was one of the two disciples present.

40. Andrew is identified through his relationship to Simon Peter, who was evidently better known to the audience. The other unnamed disciple is traditionally identified as the author of the Gospel (the 'beloved disciple'), though the text does not say so explicitly.
41. This is one of only two places in the New Testament where the Hebrew/Aramaic title Messias ('Anointed One') is transliterated into Greek (the other is John 4:25). John translates it as Christos for his Greek audience. The adverb proton ('first') implies that Andrew found Simon before doing anything else — the discovery was too important not to share immediately.
42. The verb emblemsas ('having looked intently') is the same word used of the Baptist in verse 36 — a penetrating gaze that sees beyond the surface. Jesus demonstrates supernatural knowledge by naming Simon before being introduced. 'Cephas' is Aramaic (kepha, 'rock'); John translates it into Greek as Petros ('rock, stone'). The SBLGNT reads 'son of John' (Ioannou) rather than the variant 'son of Jonah' (Iona) found in some manuscripts.
43. This marks the fourth day in John's opening sequence. Unlike Andrew and the unnamed disciple who came to Jesus through the Baptist's testimony, Philip is called directly by Jesus. The command 'Follow me' (akolouthei moi) is the standard call to discipleship in the Gospels — a summons to leave one's current path and walk with Jesus.
44. Bethsaida ('house of fishing') was located on the northern shore of the Sea of Galilee. The note connecting Philip to Andrew and Peter's hometown suggests a pre-existing social network that facilitated the chain of recruitment: John the Baptist to Andrew, Andrew to Peter, and now the connection extends to Philip.
45. Philip's identification of Jesus draws on the full breadth of Jewish Scripture — both the Torah (Moses) and the Prophets. The phrase 'Jesus son of Joseph from Nazareth' presents Jesus in purely human terms — his legal parentage and hometown. The irony is that the reader already knows from the Prologue that Jesus's true identity far transcends these categories. Nathanael is traditionally identified with Bartholomew in the Synoptic lists of the Twelve.
46. Nathanael's skepticism reflects a real geographical prejudice — Nazareth was a small, insignificant village in Lower Galilee with no prophetic associations. The Old Testament nowhere mentions Nazareth. Philip's response echoes Jesus's own invitation in verse 39 ('Come and you will see'), turning the method of encounter into a chain: come, see, and judge for yourself.
47. The phrase 'a true Israelite in whom there is no deceit' (dolos, 'guile, treachery, deceit') alludes to Jacob/Israel, whose name means 'supplanter/deceiver.' Nathanael is everything his ancestor Jacob was not — an Israelite without the craftiness. The allusion prepares for the Jacob's ladder reference in verse 51. The adverb alethos ('truly, genuinely') emphasizes that Nathanael embodies the ideal of Israel.
48. Sitting under a fig tree was associated in Jewish tradition with studying Torah (cf. Micah 4:4; Zechariah 3:10). If Nathanael was engaged in prayer or Scripture study, Jesus's supernatural knowledge of this private moment would be deeply startling. The verb eidon ('I saw') implies more than physical sight — Jesus perceived Nathanael's character and activity from a distance.
48. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Micah 4:4 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
48. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Zechariah 3:10 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
49. Nathanael's confession moves from skepticism ('Can anything good come from Nazareth?') to the highest christological titles in a single encounter. 'Son of God' and 'King of Israel' are parallel messianic titles drawn from Psalm 2:6-7 and Zephaniah 3:15. The rapid escalation of faith through personal encounter is characteristic of John's narrative theology.
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Psalm 2:6-7. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
49. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Zephaniah 3:15. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
50. Jesus's response affirms Nathanael's faith but points beyond it — the sign that prompted belief (supernatural knowledge) is only the beginning. 'Greater things' (meizo touton) anticipates the signs that will follow throughout the Gospel: water to wine, healing, raising the dead. Faith based on signs is accepted but will be surpassed by deeper revelation.
51. The double 'Amen, amen' (amen amen) is unique to John's Gospel and marks solemn, authoritative declarations — Jesus is speaking with the authority of God himself. The imagery draws directly from Jacob's dream at Bethel (Genesis 28:12), where a ladder connected heaven and earth with angels ascending and descending. Jesus replaces the ladder — he is the point of connection between heaven and earth.
51. The shift from singular 'you' (soi, verse 50) to plural 'you' (hymin) indicates that this promise extends beyond Nathanael to all disciples. 'Son of Man' (ho huios tou anthropou) is Jesus's preferred self-designation, drawing on Daniel 7:13 where the 'one like a son of man' receives dominion from the Ancient of Days.

Summary: John 2 presents two dramatically different scenes that together establish Jesus's authority over both celebration and worship. At the wedding in Cana, Jesus performs his first sign — transforming water into wine — revealing his glory and prompting his disciples to believe. In Jerusalem, he enters the temple and drives out the merchants and money changers, provoking the authorities to demand a sign of his authority. Jesus responds with a cryptic prophecy about destroying and raising 'this temple' in three days, which the narrator explains refers to his body and resurrection.

What Makes This Remarkable: John identifies the Cana miracle as the 'beginning of signs' (archen ton semeion), using his distinctive word semeion ('sign') rather than the Synoptic dynamis ('mighty work'). A sign in John is not merely a display of power but a revelation of identity — each sign points beyond itself to who Jesus is. The six stone water jars 'for Jewish purification rites' symbolically represent the old order that Jesus transforms. The temple action, placed at the beginning of Jesus's ministry rather than at the end as in the Synoptics, signals John's theological rather than chronological arrangement.

Translation Friction: Jesus's address to his mother as 'Woman' (gynai) sounds harsh in English but was a respectful form of address in Greek. His statement 'My hour has not yet come' introduces the 'hour' motif that runs through the Gospel, pointing to his death and glorification. The temple cleansing's placement differs from the Synoptics — scholars debate whether this represents a different event, a theological rearrangement, or a literary convention. We render without harmonizing.

Connections: The wine miracle connects to Old Testament imagery of wine as a sign of the messianic age (Isaiah 25:6, Amos 9:13-14, Joel 3:18). The temple action connects to Psalm 69:9 ('Zeal for your house will consume me'), Malachi 3:1-3 (the Lord suddenly coming to his temple), and the destruction/rebuilding motif that recurs at Jesus's trial (Mark 14:58). The pattern of sign followed by controversy will structure the entire first half of the Gospel.

¹On the third day there was a wedding in Cana of Galilee, and the mother of Jesus was there. ²Jesus and his disciples had also been invited to the wedding. ³When the wine ran out, the mother of Jesus said to him, "They have no wine." ⁴Jesus said to her, "Woman, what does that have to do with me? My hour has not yet come." ⁵His mother said to the servants, "Whatever he tells you, do it." ⁶Now six stone water jars were standing there for the Jewish rites of purification, each holding two or three measures. ⁷Jesus said to them, "Fill the jars with water." And they filled them to the brim. ⁸Then he said to them, "Now draw some out and take it to the master of the feast." So they took it. ⁹When the master of the feast tasted the water that had become wine — not knowing where it came from, though the servants who had drawn the water knew — he called the bridegroom ¹⁰Says to him, Every man at the beginning does set forth good wine. And when men have well drunk, then that which is worse — but you have kept the good wine until now. ¹¹Jesus did this as the first of his signs in Cana of Galilee, and he revealed his glory, and his disciples believed in him. ¹²After this he went down to Capernaum — he, his mother, his brothers, and his disciples — and they stayed there a few days. ¹³The Passover of the Jewish people was near, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. ¹⁴In the temple he found people selling cattle, sheep, and doves, and the money changers seated at their tables. ¹⁵So he made a whip out of cords and drove them all out of the temple, both the sheep and the cattle. He scattered the coins of the money changers and overturned their tables. ¹⁶To those selling doves he said, "Take these things away from here! Do not make my Father's house a marketplace!" ¹⁷His disciples remembered that it is written, "Zeal for your house will consume me." ¹⁸The Jewish leaders then responded and said to him, "What sign do you show us as your authority for doing these things?" ¹⁹Jesus answered them, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." ²⁰The Jewish leaders said, "This temple has been under construction for forty-six years, and you will raise it up in three days?" ²¹But he was speaking about the temple of his body. ²²So when he was raised from the dead, his disciples remembered that he had said this, and they believed the Scripture and the word that Jesus had spoken. ²³Now while he was in Jerusalem during the Passover festival, many believed in his name when they saw the signs he was performing. ²⁴But Jesus himself did not entrust himself to them, because he knew all people ²⁵Needed not that any should testify of man — since he recognized what was in man.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The 'third day' continues John's opening day-sequence (1:29, 1:35, 1:43, now 2:1). Some scholars see a symbolic connection to the resurrection 'on the third day.' John never names Jesus's mother — she is always 'the mother of Jesus' or 'woman,' a pattern that may emphasize her role rather than her personal identity.
2. The passive eklethe ('was called, invited') indicates Jesus attended as a guest, not as a host or official. The presence of 'his disciples' shows the group from chapter 1 is already functioning as a recognizable unit.
3. Running out of wine at a wedding was a serious social embarrassment in the ancient Near East, where hospitality obligations were paramount. The mother's statement is not merely informational but implicitly requests action. The Greek hysteresantos oinou ('the wine having failed') uses a genitive absolute construction indicating the wine was completely gone, not merely running low.
4. The address gynai ('woman') was a respectful form in Greek, comparable to 'ma'am' — not dismissive as it sounds in English. The idiom ti emoi kai soi ('what to me and to you?') is a Semitic expression creating distance — 'what concern is that of ours?' or 'why involve me?' The 'hour' (hora) is a loaded theological term in John, referring to Jesus's death, resurrection, and glorification (cf. 7:30, 8:20, 12:23, 13:1, 17:1). Jesus's public ministry operates on a divine timetable.
5. Despite Jesus's apparent reluctance, his mother proceeds with confident expectation. Her instruction to the servants (diakonois, 'attendants, servants') echoes the language of covenant obedience — 'whatever he tells you, do it' resonates with Israel's response at Sinai (Exodus 19:8, 'All that the LORD has spoken we will do'). The word diakonos is the root of 'deacon.'
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Exodus 19:8 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The detail that the jars were 'for Jewish purification rites' (kata ton katharismenon ton Ioudaion) is theologically significant — Jesus transforms the water of ritual cleansing into the wine of celebration. A metretes was approximately 9 gallons (34 liters), making the total volume between 108 and 162 gallons — an extraordinary quantity, signaling the abundance of the messianic age. The number six (one short of seven, the number of completion) may symbolize the incompleteness of the old order that Jesus is about to fulfill.
7. The servants' immediate obedience follows the mother's instruction in verse 5. The phrase heos ano ('up to the top, to the brim') emphasizes completeness — there is no room for anyone to add wine, eliminating the possibility of fraud. The human action (filling jars) and the divine action (transforming the contents) work together.
8. The architriklinos ('master of the feast, head steward') was the person responsible for managing the banquet, including tasting and serving the wine. The verb antlesate ('draw out') was used for drawing water from a well — Jesus does not announce a miracle but simply instructs them to serve what they have drawn.
9. John creates a layered irony: the master of the feast has no idea what has happened, the servants know the physical fact but perhaps not its significance, and only the disciples will understand the sign. The word pothen ('from where') carries theological weight in John — the question of where Jesus and his gifts come from points to his divine origin (cf. 3:8, 7:27-28, 8:14, 9:29-30, 19:9).
10. The steward's observation follows common banquet logic — after guests have drunk enough to dull their palates, cheaper wine is served. The verb methysthosin ('have drunk freely, become intoxicated') is frank about the level of consumption at such feasts. The theological irony is profound: God has saved the best for last. The old covenant provisions (water for purification) are surpassed by the new (wine of the messianic age).
11. John uses semeion ('sign') rather than the Synoptic dynamis ('mighty work') or teras ('wonder'). A sign in John is not merely a display of power but a pointer — it reveals something about who Jesus is. This first sign reveals his 'glory' (doxa), connecting back to the Prologue's claim that 'we have seen his glory' (1:14). The sequence — sign, glory revealed, faith — establishes the pattern for the entire 'Book of Signs' (chapters 1-12).
12. The verb katebe ('went down') is geographically accurate — Cana is in the Galilean hills, while Capernaum sits on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, which is approximately 680 feet below sea level. The mention of 'his brothers' (hoi adelphoi autou) introduces Jesus's biological family, who will later express skepticism about his mission (7:3-5). The brief stay transitions to the Jerusalem scene.
13. This is the first of three Passovers mentioned in John's Gospel (cf. 6:4, 11:55), which is the basis for estimating Jesus's ministry at approximately three years. The verb anebe ('went up') is the technical term for pilgrimage to Jerusalem, which sits on a hill — one always 'goes up' to Jerusalem regardless of the starting point. 'Passover of the Jewish people' distinguishes the feast for John's mixed audience.
14. The hieron ('temple') refers to the broader temple complex, specifically the Court of the Gentiles where commercial activity took place. The animals were sold for sacrificial use — pilgrims traveling long distances needed to purchase offerings locally. Money changers exchanged foreign currency for Tyrian shekels, the only coinage accepted for the temple tax. The commerce was technically legitimate but had become exploitative.
15. The phragellion ('whip') made from schoinion ('cords, rushes') was likely improvised from materials at hand. The Greek syntax of pantas exebalen ('drove them all out') is ambiguous — 'all' could refer to the animals, the sellers, or both. The violent action recalls prophetic symbolic acts (cf. Jeremiah's breaking of the pot, Ezekiel's siege model). Jesus acts with prophetic authority to purify the place of worship.

16. The dove sellers are addressed separately, probably because doves could not be driven out but had to be carried in their cages. The phrase 'my Father's house' (ton oikon tou patros mou) is a bold claim to filial relationship with God and echoes the boy Jesus's words in Luke 2:49. The word emporion ('marketplace, trading house') is the root of 'emporium.' John's version differs from the Synoptics' quotation of Isaiah 56:7/Jeremiah 7:11 ('den of robbers').
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Isaiah 56:7. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
16. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Jeremiah 7:11. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
17. The quotation is from Psalm 69:9. The Septuagint uses the aorist katephagen ('consumed/ate'), but John changes to the future kataphagetai ('will consume'), shifting the reference from David's past experience to Jesus's future suffering. The disciples' 'remembering' (emnesthesan) is a characteristic Johannine device — Scripture is understood retrospectively in light of Jesus's actions (cf. 2:22, 12:16).
17. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Psalms 69:9. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
18. The demand for a semeion ('sign') is ironic — Jesus has just performed a prophetic sign-act, but the authorities want a legitimizing credential. Their question assumes that only someone with recognized authority (the Messiah, a prophet) could act this way in the temple. The request for signs will become a recurring tension in the Gospel (cf. 4:48, 6:30).
19. Jesus uses naos ('temple sanctuary, inner shrine') rather than hieron ('temple complex'), a shift the authorities do not catch. The imperative lysate ('destroy') is not a command but a conditional challenge — 'if you destroy this temple.' The word egerō ('I will raise') is the standard resurrection verb, and Jesus claims the authority to do it himself. This statement will be cited at his trial (Mark 14:58) and mocked at the cross (Mark 15:29).
20. The forty-six years of construction dates from Herod the Great's temple renovation, which began approximately 20-19 BC, placing this exchange around AD 27-28. The temple was not actually completed until AD 63, only seven years before its destruction. The authorities take Jesus's statement at face value — they assume he is making an absurd claim about the physical building.
21. This is the narrator's interpretive aside, a characteristic feature of John's Gospel (cf. 7:39, 11:51-52, 12:33). The identification of Jesus's body as the naos ('sanctuary') makes an extraordinary theological claim: the physical temple where God's presence dwelt is being replaced by the incarnate body of Christ. After the resurrection, God's dwelling place among humanity is no longer a building but a person.
22. This is the second post-Easter retrospective in the chapter (cf. v. 17). The passive egerthe ('was raised') could be divine passive (God raised him) or middle voice (he rose). The pairing of 'the Scripture' (te graphe) and 'the word that Jesus spoke' (to logo) places Jesus's own words on par with sacred Scripture — a remarkable claim about his authority.
23. This is the first mention of signs (semeia, plural) performed in Jerusalem — John does not describe them individually, focusing instead on the response they provoked. The belief described here is sign-based faith, which the next verses will show to be inadequate. The imperfect epoiei ('was performing') suggests multiple signs over a period of time.
24. The verb episteuen ('entrust') is the same word as 'believe' (pisteuo) in verse 23 — creating a deliberate wordplay. They 'believed' in him, but he did not 'believe in/entrust himself to' them. Their faith was based on signs alone; his knowledge of them was deeper than their knowledge of him. The imperfect tense suggests an ongoing posture of reserve.
25. This verse attributes to Jesus a divine prerogative — knowing the human heart (cf. 1 Samuel 16:7, Jeremiah 17:10). The phrase ti en to anthropo ('what was in a person') is deliberately general — it applies to all humanity, not just the Jerusalem crowds. This divine knowledge of human interiority prepares for the Nicodemus encounter that follows immediately in chapter 3.

Summary: John 3 opens with Nicodemus, a Pharisee and member of the Jewish ruling council, coming to Jesus at night. Their conversation moves from the necessity of being 'born from above' through the Spirit to one of the most quoted verses in Scripture (3:16), which declares that God's love for the world is the motivation for sending his Son. The chapter then transitions to John the Baptist's final testimony, in which the Baptist joyfully accepts his diminishing role as the 'friend of the bridegroom' and declares 'He must increase, but I must decrease.' The chapter concludes with a theological reflection on the relationship between the one who comes from above and the one who is from the earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Greek anōthen in verse 3 is a masterful double entendre — it means both 'again' and 'from above.' Nicodemus hears 'again' (and is confused); Jesus means 'from above' (and is revealing the divine origin of new birth). John 3:16 compresses the entire Gospel narrative — God's love, his sending of the Son, the world as the scope, belief as the means, and eternal life as the result — into a single sentence. The Baptist's self-designation as 'the friend of the bridegroom' (3:29) draws on ancient Near Eastern wedding customs where the friend managed the ceremony and then stepped aside for the groom.

Translation Friction: The boundary between Jesus's direct speech and the narrator's theological commentary is notoriously uncertain in this chapter. Most scholars place the transition somewhere between verses 12 and 21, with verses 16-21 possibly being John's own reflection rather than Jesus's words to Nicodemus. We render without quotation marks after verse 15, following the SBLGNT punctuation. Similarly, the Baptist's speech may end at verse 30, with verses 31-36 being the narrator's voice.

Connections: The 'born of water and Spirit' language connects to Ezekiel 36:25-27 (cleansing water and a new spirit). The bronze serpent reference (v. 14) connects to Numbers 21:4-9. The light-darkness judgment theme (vv. 19-21) echoes the Prologue (1:4-5). The bridegroom imagery (v. 29) connects to Old Testament depictions of God as Israel's husband (Hosea 2, Isaiah 54:5, Jeremiah 2:2). The 'wrath of God' in verse 36 is the only use of orge in John's Gospel.

¹Now there was a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus, a leader of the Jewish people. ²He came to Jesus at night and said to him, "Rabbi, we know that you are a teacher who has come from God, for no one could perform these signs that you do unless God were with him." ³Jesus answered him, "Truly, truly, I tell you, unless a person is born from above, they cannot see the kingdom of God." ⁴Nicodemus said to him, "How can a person be born when they are old? Can they enter their mother's womb a second time and be born?" ⁵Jesus answered, "Truly, truly, I tell you, unless a person is born of water and the Spirit, they cannot enter the kingdom of God. ⁶What is born of the flesh is flesh, and what is born of the Spirit is spirit. ⁷Do not be astonished that I said to you, 'You must be born from above.' ⁸The wind blows where it wishes, and you hear its sound, but you do not know where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone who is born of the Spirit." ⁹Nicodemus answered him, "How can these things be?" ¹⁰Jesus answered him, "You are the teacher of Israel, and you do not understand these things? ¹¹Truly, truly, I tell you, we speak of what we know, and we testify to what we have seen, but you do not accept our testimony. ¹²If I have told you about earthly things and you do not believe, how will you believe if I tell you about heavenly things? ¹³No one has ascended into heaven except the one who descended from heaven — the Son of Man. ¹⁴As Moses raised up the serpent in the wilderness, in the same way the Son of Man be raised up:. ¹⁵so that everyone who believes in him will not be destroyed but will have eternal life. ¹⁶For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him should not perish but have eternal life. ¹⁷For God did not send the Son into the world to condemn the world, but so that the world might be saved through him. ¹⁸The one who believes in him is not condemned, but the one who does not believe has been condemned already, because they have not believed in the name of the only Son of God. ¹⁹And this is the judgment: the light has come into the world, and people loved the darkness rather than the light, because their works were evil. ²⁰For everyone who practices evil hates the light and does not come to the light, so that their works may not be exposed. ²¹But the one who practices the truth comes to the light, so that it may be clearly seen that their works have been done in God. ²²After this, Jesus and his disciples went into the Judean countryside, and he spent time there with them and was baptizing. ²³John also was baptizing at Aenon near Salim, because there was plenty of water there, and people were coming and being baptized. ²⁴For John had not yet been thrown into prison. ²⁵Now a dispute arose between some of John's disciples and a Jewish man about purification. ²⁶They came to John and said to him, "Rabbi, the one who was with you beyond the Jordan, to whom you testified — look, he is baptizing, and everyone is going to him." ²⁷John answered, "A person cannot receive even one thing unless it has been given to them from heaven. ²⁸You yourselves can testify that I said, 'I am not the Christ, but I have been sent ahead of him.' ²⁹The one who has the bride is the bridegroom, but the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears him, rejoices greatly at the bridegroom's voice. So this joy of mine is now complete. ³⁰He must increase, and I must decrease." ³¹The one who comes from above is above all. The one who is from the earth belongs to the earth and speaks from an earthly perspective. The one who comes from heaven is above all. ³²He testifies to what he has seen and heard, yet no one accepts his testimony. ³³The one who has accepted his testimony has certified that God is true. ³⁴For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for he gives the Spirit without measure. ³⁵The Father loves the Son and has placed all things in his hand. ³⁶The one who believes in the Son has eternal life, but the one who disobeys the Son will not see life — instead, the wrath of God remains on them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Nicodemus is identified by three markers: he is a Pharisee (theological party), he has a Greek name meaning 'conqueror of the people,' and he is an archon ('ruler, leader') — likely a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish governing council. He appears three times in John (here, 7:50-52, 19:39), each time moving closer to faith. The connection to 2:25 is immediate — Jesus knows what is in a person, and now a specific person comes to him.
2. Nicodemus comes 'at night' (nyktos) — in John's symbolic world, night represents spiritual darkness and ignorance (cf. 9:4, 11:10, 13:30). Whether Nicodemus comes by night for secrecy, out of fear, or simply because rabbis often studied at night is debated, but the symbolic resonance is unmistakable. His use of the plural 'we know' (oidamen) may indicate he speaks for a group of sympathetic Pharisees. He acknowledges Jesus as a divinely authorized teacher based on the signs — precisely the inadequate sign-faith described in 2:23-25.
3. The Greek anōthen is deliberately ambiguous — it means both 'again' (a second time) and 'from above' (from a higher place, from God). Nicodemus hears the first meaning; Jesus intends the second (as confirmed by verse 31, where anōthen clearly means 'from above'). We render 'from above' to preserve Jesus's intended meaning, noting the wordplay. This is the only passage in John's Gospel where Jesus speaks of the 'kingdom of God' (basileia tou theou), a phrase dominant in the Synoptics but rare in John.
4. Nicodemus's response reveals he has heard anōthen as 'again' — he takes the statement with wooden literalism, imagining a physical re-entry into the womb. This misunderstanding is a Johannine literary device: a character takes Jesus's words at the surface level, prompting Jesus to explain the deeper spiritual meaning (cf. 4:11, 6:42, 8:33, 11:11-12). The word geron ('old man') may hint at Nicodemus's own age.
5. The phrase 'water and Spirit' (hydatos kai pneumatōs) has been interpreted in numerous ways: (1) water baptism and the Holy Spirit, (2) natural birth (amniotic fluid) and spiritual birth, (3) an echo of Ezekiel 36:25-27 where God promises to sprinkle clean water and give a new spirit. The Ezekiel connection is strongest, given that Jesus expects Nicodemus as 'the teacher of Israel' (v. 10) to understand this reference. One preposition (ek) governs both nouns, suggesting water and Spirit are aspects of a single birth, not two separate events.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Ezekiel 36:25-27 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. Jesus establishes a categorical distinction: flesh (sarx) produces flesh; Spirit (pneuma) produces spirit. Human effort cannot generate spiritual birth — it requires an entirely different source. 'Flesh' here does not mean 'sinful' (as often in Paul) but 'merely human, natural, limited.' The point is not that flesh is evil but that it cannot do what only the Spirit can accomplish.
7. The shift from singular 'you' (soi, addressing Nicodemus) to plural 'you' (hymas, 'you all must be born from above') indicates that the requirement is universal, not personal to Nicodemus. The verb dei ('must, it is necessary') expresses divine necessity — this is not optional spiritual advice but an absolute requirement. We maintain 'from above' for anōthen, consistent with verse 3.
8. The Greek pneuma means both 'wind' and 'spirit' — Jesus exploits this double meaning brilliantly. The wind/Spirit is real and observable in its effects but unpredictable and uncontrollable in its movements. The analogy teaches that spiritual birth, like wind, is sovereignly initiated by God, perceptible in its results but not subject to human management. The verb pnei ('blows') is etymologically related to pneuma, reinforcing the wordplay.
9. Nicodemus's third question ('How can these things be?') shows he remains at the level of human comprehension. His 'how' (pos) asks for mechanism — how does this work? — but spiritual birth is not a process to be understood and replicated. It is a divine act to be received. This is Nicodemus's last recorded word in this conversation; from this point, Jesus speaks alone.

10. The definite article is significant — ho didaskalos ('the teacher'), not merely 'a teacher.' Nicodemus holds a recognized position of authority in Israel's religious instruction. Jesus's mild rebuke implies that the Old Testament itself teaches spiritual renewal (Ezekiel 36-37, Jeremiah 31:31-34) — a scholar of Nicodemus's standing should already know this. The irony is that Israel's authorized teacher cannot grasp what the unauthorized teacher from Nazareth is explaining.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Ezekiel 36-37 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jeremiah 31:31-34 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The shift to the plural 'we' (oidamen, laloumen, heorakamen, martyroumen) is debated — it may be a majestic plural, or Jesus may be including the Spirit, or the narrator's voice may be beginning to merge with Jesus's. The plural 'you' (lambanete) indicates that the rejection extends beyond Nicodemus to the religious leadership as a whole. The vocabulary of seeing (heorakamen) and testifying (martyroumen) connects to the Gospel's central themes.
12. The distinction between 'earthly things' (ta epigeia) and 'heavenly things' (ta epourania) creates a vertical axis. The 'earthly things' are likely the analogy of wind/Spirit and the concept of new birth — observable realities used to explain spiritual truths. The 'heavenly things' are the divine realities themselves — God's love, the sending of the Son, the nature of judgment — which Jesus alone can reveal because he alone has been in heaven.
13. Jesus claims unique access to heavenly realities: no human has ascended to heaven to gain this knowledge — only the Son of Man, who came down from heaven, possesses it. The perfect tense anabebeken ('has ascended') may refer to Jesus's post-resurrection ascension, spoken from the narrator's post-Easter perspective, or may assert that no one has made the journey except the Son of Man. Some manuscripts add 'who is in heaven' (ho on en to ourano), but the SBLGNT omits this phrase.
14. The reference is to Numbers 21:4-9, where the Israelites bitten by poisonous serpents were healed by looking at a bronze serpent lifted up on a pole. The verb hypsothenai ('to be lifted up') carries a Johannine double meaning throughout the Gospel: it refers both to being lifted up on the cross (physical elevation) and to being exalted in glory (theological elevation). In John, the cross is simultaneously an instrument of death and the throne of glorification (cf. 8:28, 12:32-34).
14. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Numbers 21:4-9. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
15. The SBLGNT does not include 'should not perish' (me apoletai), which appears in some manuscripts under influence from verse 16. The parallel with Numbers 21 is complete: as the Israelites looked at the serpent and lived, so those who believe in the lifted-up Son of Man receive eternal life. 'Eternal life' (zoe aionion) in John is not merely endless duration but a quality of life — the life of the coming age experienced now through faith.
15. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Numbers 21 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
16. The adverb houtos ('so, in this way, thus') modifies the verb — it describes the manner or extent of God's love: 'God loved the world in this way' or 'to this degree.' The aorist edoken ('gave') points to a specific, decisive act of giving. The scope is universal — ton kosmon ('the world'), not merely Israel. The verb apoletai ('perish, be destroyed') indicates total loss, not merely death. This verse compresses the entire Gospel narrative into a single sentence: the motive (God's love), the act (giving the Son), the condition (belief), and the result (eternal life versus perishing).
16. Whether this verse is spoken by Jesus or is the narrator's theological commentary is debated. The SBLGNT does not use quotation marks, and the language shifts from second-person dialogue to third-person theological reflection.
17. The verb krine ('judge, condemn') introduces the judgment theme that will dominate verses 18-21. The purpose of the incarnation is salvation (sothe, 'be saved'), not condemnation — though condemnation will result for those who refuse the light. The threefold repetition of kosmos ('world') emphasizes the universal scope: God sent his Son into the world, not to condemn the world, but to save the world.
18. The judgment described here is not a future event awaiting a final tribunal but a present reality determined by one's response to the Son. The perfect tense kekritai ('has been condemned') and pepisteuken ('has believed') indicate settled states with present consequences. The structure creates a stark binary: belief or condemnation, with no middle ground. 'In the name' (eis to onoma) means trusting in the person and character the name represents.
19. The judgment is not an arbitrary decree but a self-executing reality — when light appears, those whose deeds are evil flee from it. The perfect tense ellythen ('has come') indicates the light's arrival is a settled fact with ongoing consequences. The verb egapesan ('loved') is striking — the same word used of God's love for the world in verse 16 is now used of humanity's love for darkness. The moral failure is a disordered love: choosing darkness over light.
20. The verb elegchthe ('be exposed, reproved, convicted') means to bring hidden things into the open. The present participle phaula prasson ('practicing worthless/evil things') describes a habitual pattern, not isolated acts. The logic is psychological: evil deeds create an aversion to light because light reveals what people want hidden. This may retrospectively illuminate Nicodemus's choice to come 'at night' (v. 2).
21. The striking phrase 'practices the truth' (poion ten aletheian) combines action and truth — truth in John is not merely believed but done. This Hebrew-influenced idiom (cf. 1 John 1:6) treats truth as something lived out, not merely known. The passive phanerothe ('may be made visible') and the phrase en theo ('in God') indicate that righteous works originate from and are sustained by God — they are not independent human achievements but God-empowered deeds.

- 22. The transition moves from Jerusalem (where the Nicodemus conversation took place) to the Judean countryside. The statement that Jesus 'was baptizing' (ebaptizen) is qualified in 4:2, which notes that Jesus himself did not baptize but his disciples did. The imperfect tense suggests an ongoing ministry period. This is the only Gospel to describe a period of overlapping baptismal ministries between Jesus and John.
- 23. The location of Aenon ('springs') near Salim is debated — candidates include a site in the Jordan Valley and one in Samaria. The practical note about 'plenty of water' (hydata polla, literally 'many waters') indicates that immersion, not sprinkling, was the mode of baptism. The imperfect tenses (pareginonto, ebaptizonto) describe ongoing activity — people kept coming and being baptized.
- 24. This parenthetical note synchronizes John's narrative with the Synoptic timeline, where Jesus's Galilean ministry begins after John's arrest (Mark 1:14). John's Gospel uniquely preserves this period of overlapping ministries before the Baptist's imprisonment.
- 25. The SBLGNT reads the singular Ioudaiou ('a Jewish man') rather than the plural 'Jews' found in some manuscripts. The dispute about katharismou ('purification, cleansing') connects baptism to the broader Jewish purity system. The specific content of the dispute is not given — it serves primarily as the trigger for the question brought to John in the next verse.
- 26. John's disciples report Jesus's growing popularity with evident concern — their teacher is losing followers. They carefully avoid using Jesus's name, referring to him only as 'the one who was with you' and 'the one you testified about.' The hyperbolic 'everyone' (pantes) expresses their alarm. The irony is that this is exactly what John predicted and intended (1:26-27).
- 27. John's response begins with a statement of radical divine sovereignty — every role, every gift, every ministry is heaven's assignment. The principle applies both to Jesus (whose growing ministry is heaven-given) and to John himself (whose diminishing role is equally heaven-assigned). The perfect participle dedomenon ('having been given') emphasizes the settled, divine origin of each person's calling.
- 28. John appeals to his own earlier testimony (1:20) — his disciples heard him say it. The phrase apostalmenos eimi ('I have been sent') uses the perfect passive, emphasizing that his role as forerunner was divinely appointed. John's identity is entirely defined by his relationship to the one who follows.
- 29. The 'friend of the bridegroom' (ho philos tou nymphiou) was a recognized role in Jewish weddings — the shoshbin who arranged the wedding, guarded the bridal chamber, and announced the groom's arrival. His joy was in the groom's joy, not his own. John casts himself in this role: he prepared everything for the bridegroom's arrival, and now that the groom has come, his task is fulfilled. The bridegroom imagery echoes Old Testament depictions of God as Israel's husband (Hosea 2:16, Isaiah 62:5). The cognate accusative chara chairei ('rejoices with joy') is a Semitic intensifier expressing overwhelming gladness.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Hosea 2:16. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Isaiah 62:5. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
- 30. This is perhaps the most memorable statement of the Baptist in any Gospel. The verb dei ('must, it is necessary') again expresses divine necessity — this is not John's reluctant concession but his joyful acceptance of God's design. The verbs auxanein ('to grow, increase') and elattousthai ('to diminish, decrease') describe an inverse relationship: as Jesus's ministry expands, John's contracts. The present infinitives suggest an ongoing process, not a sudden event.
- 31. Whether this is the Baptist's continued speech or the narrator's theological commentary is uncertain — the language closely resembles the narrator's voice throughout the Gospel. The word anōthen ('from above') echoes verse 3, where it was the word Nicodemus misunderstood. The contrast between 'from above' and 'from the earth' parallels the flesh/Spirit contrast of verse 6. The repetition of 'above all' (epano panton) creates an inclusio bracketing the earthly description.
- 32. The perfect tense heoraken ('has seen') indicates firsthand, ongoing knowledge — the one from heaven testifies from direct experience of divine realities. The sweeping 'no one' (oudeis) is hyperbolic (as verse 33 immediately shows some do accept), expressing the general pattern of rejection that marks the Gospel's narrative. The language echoes verse 11, reinforcing whether this is narrator or Baptist speaking.
- 33. The verb esphragisen ('has sealed, certified, attested') is a legal metaphor — to affix one's seal to a document was to authenticate it. Accepting Jesus's testimony is equivalent to affirming God's truthfulness, because Jesus speaks God's words. Conversely, rejecting Jesus's testimony makes God a liar (cf. 1 John 5:10).
- 34. The phrase ou gar ek metrou ('not by measure, without limit') indicates that the Spirit is given to the Son without restriction or rationing. In rabbinic thought, the Spirit was given to prophets in limited portions for specific tasks; the Son receives the Spirit in unlimited fullness (cf. 1:32-33, where the Spirit 'remained' on Jesus). The subject of 'gives' (didōsin) could be God (giving the Spirit to the Son) or the Son (giving the Spirit to believers), but the former is more natural in context.
- 35. The verb agapa ('loves') is the present tense of agapao, indicating the Father's continuous, active love for the Son. The perfect tense dedōken ('has given, has placed') indicates a completed transfer of authority with lasting effect. 'All things' (panta) is comprehensive — nothing is withheld. The metaphor 'in his hand' (en te cheiri) denotes authority, power, and possession — a Semitic idiom for total control.
- 36. The present tense echei ('has') is significant — eternal life is a present possession, not merely a future hope, for those who believe. The contrasting verb apeithon ('disobeying, refusing to be persuaded') is stronger than 'not believing' — it implies active resistance, not mere ignorance. The word orge ('wrath') appears only here in John's Gospel. The verb menei ('remains, abides') is the same word used positively elsewhere for abiding in Christ — here it describes the settled, ongoing state of divine displeasure resting upon the disobedient. This verse serves as a summary of the entire chapter's theology: belief brings life, disobedience brings wrath.

Summary: John 4 narrates Jesus's encounter with a Samaritan woman at Jacob's well near Sychar. The conversation moves from physical water to 'living water,' from the woman's marital history to the nature of true worship, and culminates in Jesus's self-identification as the Messiah. The woman becomes the first evangelist in John's Gospel, bringing her town to Jesus. The chapter then transitions to a discourse on spiritual harvest with the disciples, and concludes with the healing of a royal official's son in Cana — the second sign in John's narrative.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the longest recorded conversation between Jesus and any individual in the Gospels. Jesus crosses three boundaries that a first-century Jewish teacher would normally observe: ethnic (Jew-Samaritan), gender (man-woman alone), and moral (righteous-sinful). The woman's progressive recognition of Jesus mirrors Nicodemus's failure to understand — she moves from 'a Jew' (v. 9) to 'sir' (v. 11) to 'prophet' (v. 19) to 'the Christ' (v. 29). The Messiah terminology in verse 25 is notable — the Samaritans awaited a Taheb ('restorer'), not a Davidic king, making this conversation cross-cultural at every level.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'living water' (hydor zon) carries a double meaning — it means 'running water' (as opposed to still cistern water) in ordinary usage, but Jesus uses it to mean the water that gives spiritual life. The woman's marital situation (five husbands and a current partner) has been read allegorically (representing the five foreign gods of 2 Kings 17:24-34) and literally. We render the text without imposing either reading. The worship discussion (vv. 20-24) addresses the Samaritan-Jewish dispute over the proper place of worship — Gerizim versus Jerusalem.

Connections: Jacob's well connects to the patriarch Jacob (Genesis 33:18-20). The 'living water' theme connects to Jeremiah 2:13 (God as the fountain of living water), Zechariah 14:8, and Ezekiel 47:1-12 (the river from the temple). The harvest imagery (vv. 35-38) connects to Joel 3:13 and Amos 9:13. The healing of the official's son parallels the Synoptic centurion's servant narrative (Matthew 8:5-13, Luke 7:1-10) but is likely a distinct event.

¹Now when Jesus learned that the Pharisees had heard he was making and baptizing more disciples than John — ²(Though Jesus himself baptized not, but his followers,). ³He departed Judaea, and departed again into Galilee. ⁴Now he had to pass through Samaria. ⁵So he came to a Samaritan town called Sychar, near the plot of land that Jacob had given to his son Joseph. ⁶Jacob's well was there, and Jesus, tired from the journey, sat down beside the well. It was about noon. ⁷A Samaritan woman came to draw water. Jesus said to her, "Give me a drink." ⁸For his disciples had gone into the town to buy food. ⁹The Samaritan woman said to him, "How is it that you, a Jew, ask for a drink from me, a Samaritan woman?" (For Jews do not share vessels with Samaritans.) ¹⁰Jesus answered her, "If you knew the gift of God, and who it is that is saying to you, 'Give me a drink,' you would have asked him, and he would have given you living water." ¹¹The woman said to him, "Sir, you have no bucket and the well is deep. Where then do you get this living water?" ¹²You are not greater than our father Jacob, are you? He gave us this well and drank from it himself, as did his sons and his livestock." ¹³Jesus answered her, "Everyone who drinks from this water will be thirsty again, ¹⁴However, whosoever drinketh of the water that I will give him will never thirst. But the water that I will give him will be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. ¹⁵The woman said to him, "Sir, give me this water so that I will not be thirsty and will not have to keep coming here to draw water." ¹⁶He said to her, "Go, call your husband, and come back here." ¹⁷The woman answered, "I have no husband." Jesus said to her, "You are right to say, 'I have no husband,' ¹⁸For you have had five husbands. Then he whom you now hast is not your husband — in that saidst you truly. ¹⁹The woman said to him, "Sir, I can see that you are a prophet. ²⁰Our fathers worshiped on this mountain, but you say that Jerusalem is the place where people must worship." ²¹Jesus said to her, "Believe me, woman, the hour is coming when you will worship the Father neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem. ²²You worship what you do not know; we worship what we know, because salvation is from the Jews. ²³But the hour is coming, and is now here, when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth, for the Father is seeking such people to worship him. ²⁴God is spirit, and those who worship him must worship in spirit and truth." ²⁵The woman said to him, "I know that the Messiah is coming" (the one called Christ). "When he comes, he will explain everything to us." ²⁶Jesus said to her, "I am he — the one speaking to you." ²⁷Just then his disciples returned. They were astonished that he was speaking with a woman, but no one said, "What are you looking for?" or "Why are you speaking with her?" ²⁸So the woman left her water jar and went back into the town and said to the people, ²⁹"Come, see a man who told me everything I have ever done! Could this be the Christ?" ³⁰They left the town and were coming to him. ³¹Meanwhile the disciples were urging him, "Rabbi, eat something." ³²But he said to them, "I have food to eat that you do not know about." ³³So the disciples said to one another, "No one brought him anything to eat, did they?" ³⁴Jesus said to them, "My food is to do the will of the one who sent me and to complete his work. ³⁵Do you not say, 'There are still four months and then comes the harvest'? Look, I tell you, lift up your eyes and see the fields — they are already white for harvest. ³⁶Already the reaper is receiving wages and gathering fruit for eternal life, so that the sower and the reaper may rejoice together. ³⁷For in this case the saying is true: 'One sows and another reaps.' ³⁸I sent you to reap what you did not labor for. Others have labored, and you have entered into their labor." ³⁹Many Samaritans from that town believed in him because of the woman's testimony: "He told me everything I have ever done." ⁴⁰So when the Samaritans came to him, they asked him to stay with them, and he stayed there two days. ⁴¹Numerous more believed because of his own word;. ⁴²Stated to the woman, Now we trust, not because of your declaring — since we have listened to him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world. ⁴³After the two days he departed from there to Galilee. ⁴⁴For Jesus himself had testified that a prophet has no honor in his own hometown. ⁴⁵So when he came to Galilee, the Galileans welcomed him, having seen all that he had done in Jerusalem at the festival, for they too had gone to the festival. ⁴⁶So he came again to Cana of Galilee, where he had turned the water into wine. Now there was a royal official whose son was ill in Capernaum. ⁴⁷When he heard that Jesus had come from Judea to Galilee, he went to him and asked him to come down and heal his son, for the boy was about to die. ⁴⁸Jesus said to him, "Unless you see signs and wonders, you will never believe." ⁴⁹The royal official said to him, "Sir, come down before my child dies." ⁵⁰Jesus said to him, "Go — your son lives." The man believed the word that Jesus spoke to him and started on his way. ⁵¹While he was still going down, his servants met him and told him that his boy was alive. ⁵²So he asked them the hour when his son began to recover, and they told him, "Yesterday at one in the afternoon the fever left him." ⁵³The father realized that this was the exact hour when Jesus had said to him, "Your son lives." And he himself believed, along with his entire household. ⁵⁴This was the second sign that Jesus performed after coming from Judea to Galilee.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The SBLGNT reads 'Jesus' (Iesous) rather than 'the Lord' (ho kyrios) found in some manuscripts. The Pharisees' attention to Jesus's growing movement creates the narrative motivation for his withdrawal northward through Samaria. The comparison with John frames the situation as a potential political complication.
2. This parenthetical correction qualifies 3:22 and 4:1. The narrator clarifies that Jesus directed the baptizing ministry but did not personally perform the rite. The distinction may reflect a theological concern about the relative authority of baptisms, or simply a factual correction.
3. Jesus withdraws from Judea to avoid premature confrontation with the Pharisees — his 'hour' has not yet come (cf. 2:4, 7:6, 7:30). The verb apheken ('left, departed from') suggests a deliberate decision, not flight.
4. The verb edei ('it was necessary') suggests more than geographical necessity — many Jews deliberately avoided Samaria by taking a longer route through Perea east of the Jordan. The 'necessity' may be divine — Jesus must pass through Samaria because there is a woman at a well whom the Father intends him to meet. The word carries the same divine compulsion as in 3:7, 3:14, 3:30.
5. Sychar is likely modern Askar, near ancient Shechem. The reference to Jacob's gift of land to Joseph connects to Genesis 33:19 and 48:22, and Joshua 24:32, where Joseph's bones were buried. The detail grounds the narrative in patriarchal history and establishes why this well is called 'Jacob's well' in the next verse.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Genesis 33:19 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Joshua 24:32 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. The word page ('spring, well, fountain') suggests a natural spring-fed well, though the site today is a deep cistern. The detail that Jesus was kekopiakos ('weary, exhausted') from the journey is a vivid human touch — the Word who became flesh (1:14) experiences genuine physical fatigue. The 'sixth hour' is noon by either Jewish or Roman reckoning, the hottest part of the day — an unusual time for a woman to come to draw water, suggesting she may have been avoiding the other women of the town.

7. Jesus initiates the conversation — a striking social reversal. A Jewish rabbi would not normally address an unknown woman in public, much less a Samaritan woman. The request 'Give me a drink' (dos moi peïn) places Jesus in a position of need, creating an opening for dialogue. The verb antlesai ('to draw') is the same used at the Cana wedding (2:8), creating a subtle verbal link between the two water-related narratives.
8. The narrator explains why Jesus is alone — the disciples are away buying provisions. The detail that they purchase food in a Samaritan town implies a less rigid attitude toward Samaritan uncleanness than some Pharisaic standards would permit. The absence of the disciples allows the private conversation that follows.
9. The woman immediately identifies the social boundary Jesus has crossed. The parenthetical explanation ou gar sunchrōntai Ioudaioi Samaritais has been debated — synchromai may mean 'use together with' (share utensils) rather than 'have dealings with.' The issue is ritual purity: drinking from a Samaritan's vessel would render a Jew ceremonially unclean. The hostility between Jews and Samaritans dated to the Assyrian resettlement (2 Kings 17) and the destruction of the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim in 128 BC.
9. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes 2 Kings 17. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
10. Jesus reverses the dynamic — the one asking for water is actually the one who has water to give. The phrase dorean tou theou ('gift of God') is deliberately ambiguous: it could refer to the living water itself, to the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 2:38), or to Jesus himself. The term hydor zon ('living water') means 'running/flowing water' in ordinary usage (as opposed to stagnant cistern water) but carries a deeper meaning that Jesus will develop. The conditional construction (if you knew... you would have asked) implies the woman does not yet know, but could.
11. The woman hears 'living water' at the physical level — running water from a deep well requires equipment. Her address kyrie ('sir, lord') marks a step up from 'Jew' (v. 9) but remains at the level of polite address. The question pothen ('from where') is one of John's theological keywords — the question of Jesus's origin runs through the Gospel (cf. 2:9, 7:27-28, 8:14, 9:29-30, 19:9).
12. The Greek particle me introduces a question expecting a negative answer: 'You're not greater than Jacob, are you?' The irony is that the reader knows Jesus is indeed greater than Jacob. The woman claims Jacob as 'our father' — the Samaritans traced their lineage to the northern tribes and regarded the patriarchs as their ancestors. The mention of Jacob drinking from the well authenticates it by ancestral use.
13. Jesus now contrasts the water from Jacob's well — which satisfies temporarily — with the living water he offers. The future tense dipsesei ('will thirst') states an inevitable limitation: physical water cannot permanently satisfy. The 'this water' (tou hydatos toutou) refers specifically to the well water, creating a bridge to the contrast in the next verse.
14. The double negative ou me dipsesei ('will never, ever be thirsty') is the strongest possible negation in Greek. The water Jesus gives does not merely satisfy — it transforms the recipient into a source: it becomes 'a spring' (pege) within them. The verb hallomenou ('springing up, leaping, bubbling') conveys dynamic, self-renewing energy. The destination is 'eternal life' (zōen aionion), the quality of divine life that is John's central theme. The image anticipates 7:37-39, where Jesus explicitly connects living water to the Holy Spirit.
15. Like Nicodemus (3:4), the woman remains at the literal level — she wants water that eliminates the daily chore of coming to the well. Yet her request 'give me this water' (dos moi touto to hydor) echoes the language of genuine petition. John's irony operates on multiple levels: the woman asks for more than she understands, and what she is about to receive will far exceed what she requested.
16. The abrupt shift in topic is a deliberate pastoral strategy — Jesus moves from theological discussion to personal reality. The request to bring her husband will expose the woman's life situation and demonstrate Jesus's supernatural knowledge, paralleling the Nathanael encounter (1:47-48). The verb phōneson ('call, summon') indicates Jesus intends the husband to be present for what follows.
17. The woman's reply is technically true but evasive — she has no husband, but the full story is more complex. Jesus affirms her statement with kalos epas ('you have spoken well/correctly') before revealing the deeper truth. The affirmation before the exposure demonstrates pastoral sensitivity.
18. Jesus reveals knowledge he could not have obtained naturally, demonstrating the same supernatural perception shown with Nathanael (1:47-48) and anticipated in 2:25. The five previous marriages could reflect widowhood, divorce, or a combination — the text does not moralize or explain. The current relationship is distinguished from marriage ('is not your husband'). Some scholars read the five husbands allegorically as the five foreign nations settled in Samaria (2 Kings 17:24), but the narrative functions powerfully at the literal level.
18. [TCR Cross-Reference] References 2 Kings 17:24 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
19. The woman's identification of Jesus advances from 'Jew' (v. 9) to 'sir' (v. 11) to 'prophet' (v. 19). Her recognition is based on Jesus's supernatural knowledge of her personal history. The Samaritans expected a prophetic figure — the Taheb ('restorer') modeled on Moses (Deuteronomy 18:15-18). Calling Jesus a prophet places him within this expectation.
19. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 18:15-18. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
20. 'This mountain' is Mount Gerizim, visible from Jacob's well, where the Samaritans had built their temple (destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 128 BC but still sacred). The Samaritan-Jewish dispute over the proper location of worship was one of the deepest divisions between the two communities. The woman may be testing the prophet with the central theological question of her tradition, or she may be deflecting from the personal topic Jesus has raised.
21. Jesus transcends the either/or framework of the woman's question. The coming 'hour' (hora) connects to the theological hour motif that runs through the Gospel (2:4, 7:30, 12:23) — the death and resurrection of Jesus will render both worship locations obsolete. The address 'woman' (gynai) is respectful, as in 2:4. The reference to 'the Father' (to patri) introduces a new dimension — worship is relational, directed to a Father, not merely performed at a location.

22. Jesus does not treat both traditions as equally valid — while transcending the location debate, he affirms the Jewish tradition's superiority in theological knowledge. The Samaritans accepted only the Torah (the five books of Moses) and rejected the Prophets and Writings, limiting their understanding of God. 'Salvation is from the Jews' (he soteria ek ton Ioudaion estin) is a remarkable statement given the Gospel's frequent criticism of 'the Jews' (religious leaders). Jesus identifies himself with Israel's heritage even as he transcends it.
23. The phrase 'is coming and is now here' (erchetai hora kai nyn estin) collapses future and present — the new age of worship is both imminent and already inaugurated in Jesus's ministry. 'In spirit and truth' (en pneumati kai aletheia) does not mean 'sincerely' or 'from the heart' in a vague sense — pneuma likely refers to the Holy Spirit, and aletheia to the truth revealed in Jesus (14:6). True worship is Spirit-empowered and Christ-centered. The astonishing statement that 'the Father is seeking' (ho pater zetei) such worshipers portrays God as the active pursuer, not merely the recipient of worship.
24. The statement pneuma ho theos ('God is spirit') is not a philosophical definition of God's essence but a statement about the nature of genuine encounter with God. Because God is spirit (not confined to physical locations), worship must be correspondingly spiritual — empowered by the Spirit, oriented toward truth. The verb dei ('must') expresses divine necessity: this is not one option among many but the only authentic mode of worship.
25. This is the second of only two uses of the Aramaic 'Messiah' in the New Testament (cf. 1:41). The Samaritan expectation was for the Taheb ('restorer'), a prophet-like-Moses who would restore true worship and reveal all things. The woman's statement 'he will explain everything to us' (anangelei hemin hapanta) reflects this expectation of a revealer figure. John translates 'Messiah' as Christos for his Greek audience.
26. The Greek ego eimi ('I am') is the first explicit 'I am' statement in the Gospel. On the surface, it means 'I am [the Messiah]' — a direct answer to the woman's expectation. But ego eimi also echoes the divine name revealed to Moses (Exodus 3:14, 'I AM WHO I AM') and will become Jesus's most characteristic self-identification in John (6:20, 8:24, 8:28, 8:58, 13:19, 18:5-6). This is the most explicit messianic self-declaration in any Gospel conversation — and it is given not to a Jewish leader but to a Samaritan woman.
26. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Exodus 3:14. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.
27. The disciples' astonishment (ethaumazon) is at the gender boundary being crossed — rabbinic teaching discouraged extended conversation with women (Pirke Avot 1:5: 'Do not talk much with a woman'). The fact that she is also Samaritan compounds the surprise. Their silence — not asking 'what do you want?' or 'why are you talking to her?' — suggests a combination of respect and bewilderment.
28. The detail that she 'left her water jar' (apheken ten hydrian) is vivid and significant — the original errand is forgotten in the urgency of her discovery. She came for physical water and leaves without it, having found something greater. The abandoned jar also ensures she will return (and perhaps serves as a pledge to Jesus that she will come back). She goes to tois anthropois ('the people'), not just the men — she evangelizes the entire town.
29. Her invitation 'Come, see' (deute idete) echoes the invitation chain of chapter 1 (1:39, 1:46). The hyperbolic 'everything I have ever done' (panta hosa epoiesas) reflects the overwhelming impression of Jesus's supernatural knowledge. The question meti houtos estin ho christos ('Could this be the Christ?') uses the particle meti, which expects an uncertain or negative answer — she frames her testimony as a question, inviting investigation rather than demanding belief. This is remarkably effective evangelism.
30. The imperfect erchonto ('were coming') describes the townspeople in process — they are on their way, creating a narrative pause during which Jesus will speak to his disciples about the harvest (vv. 31-38). The woman's testimony has set an entire town in motion toward Jesus.
31. The imperfect eroton ('were urging, kept asking') suggests repeated requests. The disciples have returned with the food they purchased (v. 8) and are concerned about Jesus's physical needs. The conversation about food that follows will parallel the water conversation with the Samaritan woman — physical need becomes a springboard for spiritual teaching.
32. As with the woman and water, Jesus transforms a physical topic (food) into a spiritual teaching. The word brosin ('food, nourishment') will be defined in verse 34. The disciples' ignorance ('that you do not know about') parallels the woman's incomprehension about living water.
33. Like Nicodemus (3:4) and the Samaritan woman (4:11, 15), the disciples misunderstand by taking Jesus's words at the literal, physical level. The particle me expects a negative answer — they are fairly sure no one brought food but are puzzled. This triple pattern of misunderstanding reinforces John's theme that spiritual truth requires more than natural comprehension.
34. Jesus defines his 'food' as obedience to the Father's mission. The verb teleiosas ('to complete, to bring to perfection') anticipates Jesus's dying word tetelestai ('it is finished,' 19:30). The phrase 'the one who sent me' (tou pempantos me) is a characteristic Johannine description of the Father, emphasizing Jesus's role as the authorized emissary. Doing God's will is not merely a duty but sustenance — it nourishes Jesus in the way food sustains the body.
35. The 'four months until harvest' may be a common proverb or a literal time marker (placing this scene in December/January, four months before the April/May barley harvest). Jesus contrasts agricultural patience with spiritual urgency — the spiritual harvest is ready now. 'Lift up your eyes and see' may gesture toward the Samaritans walking toward them from the town (v. 30). The 'white fields' could refer to the white garments of approaching Samaritans or is simply harvest imagery.

36. In normal agriculture, sowing and reaping are separated by months; in the spiritual harvest, they overlap. The 'fruit' (karpon) gathered is people brought to faith — the harvest goal is 'eternal life' (zoen aionion). The shared rejoicing of sower and reaper transcends the proverb of verse 37, where they are separate. This may envision Old Testament prophets (sowers) and Jesus/his disciples (reapers) celebrating together.
37. Jesus quotes what appears to be a common proverb, usually carrying a negative sense (one person labors and another benefits). Jesus reframes it positively: the division of labor in God's harvest is by design, not injustice. The sower's work is essential to the reaper's harvest.
38. Jesus explicitly assigns the disciples the role of reapers. The 'others' (alloi) who labored before them likely include the Old Testament prophets, John the Baptist, and possibly Jesus himself. The verb kekopiakate ('have labored') uses the same root as the word describing Jesus's weariness at the well (v. 6, kekopiakos) — there is real toil in sowing, and the reapers inherit its fruit.
39. The woman's testimony (martyrouses, from martyreo) uses the same vocabulary applied to John the Baptist's witness (1:7, 15, 32, 34). A Samaritan woman becomes a credible witness whose word leads to faith — a remarkable statement in a culture where women's testimony was often discounted. Her simple report of personal experience ('He told me everything') proves more effective than theological argument.
40. The Samaritans' invitation to 'stay' (meinai) and Jesus's response of 'staying' (emeinen) use the theologically loaded Johannine verb meno ('abide, remain'). A Jewish teacher staying in a Samaritan town for two days would have been scandalous to many. The hospitality extended and accepted across ethnic lines anticipates the Gospel's universal scope.
41. The progression is from believing through the woman's testimony (v. 39) to believing through Jesus's own word (ton logon autou). The growth from 'many' to 'many more' shows the expanding impact of direct encounter with Jesus. John presents a model of evangelism: personal testimony brings people to Jesus, and Jesus's own word deepens and confirms their faith.
42. The title 'Savior of the world' (ho soter tou kosmou) is the climactic confession of the chapter. Remarkably, it comes from Samaritans — not from Jewish disciples or leaders. 'Savior' (soter) was used for God in the Old Testament (Isaiah 43:3, 11) and for emperors in Greco-Roman culture. The Samaritans claim Jesus for the whole world (tou kosmou), not just for Israel or Samaria. The SBLGNT does not include 'the Christ' (ho Christos), which appears in some manuscripts.
42. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Isaiah 43:3. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
43. The narrative resumes the journey begun in verse 3. The two-day stay in Samaria delays but does not prevent the return to Galilee. The transition shifts from the Samaritan mission to the Galilean ministry.
44. This proverb (cf. Mark 6:4, Matthew 13:57, Luke 4:24) creates interpretive difficulty in context. If Galilee is Jesus's 'homeland' (patris), the statement seems to contradict the reception described in the next verse. Some scholars take 'homeland' as referring to Judea (the land of his birth in John's theology) or explain that the Galileans' reception is based on signs, not genuine honor. The proverb may serve as an ironic contrast: rejected at home, received abroad (in Samaria).
45. The Galileans' welcome is based on signs they witnessed in Jerusalem during Passover (cf. 2:23). This is the sign-based faith that Jesus did not trust (2:24-25) and that stands in contrast to the Samaritans' faith based on Jesus's word (4:41-42). The Galileans 'received' (edexanto) him, but the quality of their reception is ambiguous.
46. The return to Cana creates a literary frame with the first sign (2:1-11). The basilikos ('royal official') was likely an officer in the service of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. The word could mean 'king's man' or 'nobleman.' His son is in Capernaum, roughly 16 miles from Cana — a significant distance that will become important to the story.
47. The imperfect erota ('kept asking, was begging') indicates persistent, urgent pleading. The verb katabee ('come down') is geographically precise — Cana sits higher in the hills than Capernaum on the lake shore. The father assumes Jesus must be physically present to heal, a limitation Jesus will soon transcend. The son's condition is critical: emellen apothneskein ('was about to die').
48. The plural 'you' (idete, pisteusete) indicates this is addressed not only to the official but to the Galileans generally — their faith is sign-dependent (cf. v. 45). The pairing of semeia kai terata ('signs and wonders') is unique in John; usually John uses semeia alone. The addition of terata ('wonders, portents') may carry a mildly negative connotation — seeking spectacle rather than understanding. The double negative ou me ('never') is emphatic.
49. The official ignores Jesus's theological challenge and presses his desperate request. The urgency of a parent facing a child's death overwhelms theological debate. The word paidion ('little child') is more affectionate than huios ('son') used in verse 46, revealing the father's emotional vulnerability. The repeated katabethi ('come down') shows he still assumes Jesus must be physically present.
50. Jesus heals at a distance, without going to Capernaum — his word alone is sufficient. The present tense ze ('lives') is not a promise but a declaration of present reality. The man's response marks a significant step: he 'believed the word' (episteusen to logo) — not a sign he could see, but a word he could only trust. This contrasts with the sign-dependent faith critiqued in verse 48. The verb eporeueto (imperfect, 'was going, started on his way') shows him acting on faith before receiving confirmation.
51. The servants use the same verb ze ('lives') that Jesus spoke in verse 50, creating a verbal link between the word of healing and its confirmation. The word pais ('boy, child, servant') is used here for the son, echoing the affectionate paidion of verse 49. The fact that the servants came out to meet him suggests the recovery was so dramatic they did not wait for his arrival.

52. The father investigates the timing to verify the connection between Jesus's word and the healing. The 'seventh hour' is 1:00 PM by Roman reckoning or 1:00 PM by Jewish reckoning (counting from sunrise at approximately 6:00 AM). The word 'yesterday' (echthes) indicates the official traveled overnight or stayed somewhere along the way — a detail suggesting he did not rush home in anxious unbelief but traveled at a normal pace, trusting Jesus's word.
53. The temporal correspondence confirms the healing was not coincidence but the direct effect of Jesus's word. The father's faith deepens — from initial desperate request (v. 47) to trusting Jesus's word (v. 50) to full belief confirmed by evidence (v. 53). The conversion of 'his entire household' (he oikia autou hole) reflects the ancient pattern where a household head's decision affected the whole family unit. This is the first 'household faith' in the Gospel.
54. John explicitly numbers this as the 'second sign' (deuteron semeion), connecting it to the first sign at Cana (2:11). Both signs occur in Cana, creating a geographic frame. Both involve transformation: water to wine, death to life. The numbering system will cease after this, though John continues to record signs. The phrase 'coming from Judea to Galilee' frames both signs as occurring in the context of Jesus's movement from the south to the north.

Summary: John 5 opens with Jesus healing a man who had been disabled for thirty-eight years at the pool of Bethesda in Jerusalem on the Sabbath. When the Jewish leaders confront the healed man and then Jesus for violating Sabbath regulations, Jesus responds with a profound discourse on his relationship with the Father. He claims that 'my Father is still working, and I am working' — a statement the authorities correctly understand as a claim to equality with God. The extended discourse that follows develops themes of the Son's authority to give life and execute judgment, the reality of resurrection, and the witnesses that testify to Jesus's identity: John the Baptist, Jesus's own works, the Father himself, and the Scriptures.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Sabbath controversy triggers the most extended christological discourse in the first half of the Gospel. Jesus's claim that the Father 'shows' the Son everything he does (5:20) presents their relationship as one of intimate transparency. The authority claims escalate steadily: the Son gives life to whom he wills (v. 21), the Father has entrusted all judgment to the Son (v. 22), honoring the Son equals honoring the Father (v. 23), and the dead will hear the Son's voice and live (v. 25). The four witnesses (John, works, Father, Scripture) establish a legal case for Jesus's identity, using the courtroom language that pervades the Gospel.

Translation Friction: The SBLGNT omits verse 4 entirely (the angel stirring the water), regarding it as a later scribal addition. We follow the critical text. The thirty-eight years of the man's illness may allude to Israel's thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering (Deuteronomy 2:14), but this is uncertain. The transition from the healing narrative to the theological discourse is seamless in Greek, with no clear paragraph break. The 'works' Jesus refers to as witnesses (v. 36) likely include his signs but extend to his entire mission.

Connections: The Sabbath controversy connects to Genesis 2:2-3 (God's rest) and the ongoing Jewish debate about whether God observes the Sabbath. The resurrection theme connects to Daniel 12:2 and Ezekiel 37. The testimony of Scripture (vv. 39-47) specifically invokes Moses, connecting to Deuteronomy 18:15-18 and the entire Torah. The pool of Bethesda has been archaeologically confirmed, with its five-portico structure matching John's description.

¹After this there was a festival of the Jewish people, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. ²Now in Jerusalem by the Sheep Gate there is a pool called Bethzatha in Aramaic, which has five covered colonnades. ³In these lay a large number of disabled people — blind, lame, and paralyzed. ⁴One man was there who had been disabled for thirty-eight years. ⁵When Jesus saw him lying there and knew that he had already been there a long time, he said to him, "Do you want to get well?" ⁶The disabled man answered him, "Sir, I have no one to put me into the pool when the water is stirred up. While I am trying to get there, someone else goes in ahead of me." ⁷Jesus said to him, "Get up, pick up your mat, and walk." ⁸Immediately the man was made well, and he picked up his mat and began to walk. Now that day was a Sabbath. ⁹So the Jewish leaders said to the man who had been healed, "It is the Sabbath, and it is not lawful for you to carry your mat." ¹⁰But he answered them, "The man who made me well told me, 'Pick up your mat and walk.'" ¹¹They asked him, "Who is the man who told you, 'Pick it up and walk?'" ¹²But the man who had been healed did not know who it was, for Jesus had slipped away into the crowd that was there. ¹⁴Later Jesus found him in the temple and said to him, "See, you have been made well. Do not sin anymore, so that nothing worse happens to you." ¹⁵The man went away and told the Jewish leaders that it was Jesus who had made him well. ¹⁶For this reason the Jewish leaders began persecuting Jesus, because he was doing these things on the Sabbath. ¹⁷But Jesus answered them, "My Father is still working, and I also am working." ¹⁸For this reason the Jewish leaders were seeking all the more to kill him, because he was not only breaking the Sabbath but was also calling God his own Father, making himself equal with God. ¹⁹So Jesus answered them, "Truly, truly, I tell you, the Son can do nothing on his own, but only what he sees the Father doing. For whatever the Father does, the Son does likewise. ²⁰For the Father loves the Son and shows him everything that he himself is doing. And he will show him greater works than these, so that you will be astonished. ²¹For just as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, so also the Son gives life to whom he wishes. ²²For the Father judges no one but has given all judgment to the Son, ²³That all people should honour the Descendant, not even as they honour the Parent. He that honoureth not the Descendant honoureth not the Father which has dispatched him. ²⁴Truly, truly, I tell you, the one who hears my word and believes the one who sent me has eternal life and does not come under judgment but has passed from death to life. ²⁵Truly, truly, I tell you, the hour is coming and is now here when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live. ²⁶For just as the Father has life in himself, so also he has granted the Son to have life in himself. ²⁷Because he is the son of man, and has given him authority to execute judgment also. ²⁸Do not be astonished at this, for the hour is coming when all who are in the tombs will hear his voice ²⁹Indeed, will come forth. They that have done good, to the resurrection of life. Then they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation. ³⁰I can do nothing on my own. As I hear, I judge, and my judgment is just, because I do not seek my own will but the will of the one who sent me. ³¹"If I testify about myself, my testimony is not valid. ³²There is another who testifies about me, and I know that the testimony he gives about me is true. ³³You sent messengers to John, and he has testified to the truth. ³⁴Not that I accept human testimony, but I say these things so that you may be saved. ³⁵He was a burning and shining lamp, and you were willing to rejoice in his light for a while. ³⁶But I have a testimony greater than John's, for the works that the Father has given me to accomplish — the very works I am doing — testify about me that the Father has sent me. ³⁷And the Father who sent me has himself testified about me. You have never heard his voice nor seen his form, ³⁸You have not his word abiding in you — for whom he has dispatched, him you believe not. ³⁹You search the Scriptures because you think that in them you have eternal life, and it is they that testify about me. ⁴⁰You will not come to me, that you might have life. ⁴¹I do not accept glory from people. ⁴²But I know you — that you do not have the love of God in yourselves. ⁴³I have come in my Father's name, and you do not receive me. If another comes in his own name, you will receive that one. ⁴⁴How can you believe when you accept glory from one another and do not seek the glory that comes from the only God? ⁴⁵Do not think that I will accuse you before the Father. The one who accuses you is Moses, in whom you have placed your hope. ⁴⁶For if you believed Moses, you would believe me, because he wrote about me. ⁴⁷But if you do not believe his writings, how will you believe my words?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The SBLGNT reads heorte without the definite article ('a festival'), leaving the specific festival unidentified. Various proposals include Passover, Tabernacles, Pentecost, or Purim. The lack of specificity may be deliberate — John focuses on the event, not the calendar. The verb anebe ('went up') is the standard pilgrimage term for traveling to Jerusalem.
2. The SBLGNT reads 'Bethzatha' rather than 'Bethesda' (found in some manuscripts; the name means 'house of mercy') or 'Bethsaida.' The 'Sheep Gate' (probatike) is known from Nehemiah 3:1, 32; 12:39. Archaeological excavations near St. Anne's Church in Jerusalem have uncovered a pool with the five-colonnade structure John describes — four colonnades around the edges and one dividing the pool in two. The present tense estin ('there is') may suggest John writes before the pool's destruction in AD 70, or may simply be vivid narration.
2. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Nehemiah 3:1. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
3. The SBLGNT ends verse 3 after 'paralyzed' (xeron, literally 'withered, dried up'), omitting the phrase 'waiting for the moving of the water.' This phrase and all of verse 4 (about an angel stirring the water) are absent from the earliest and best manuscripts and are considered a later scribal addition explaining a local healing tradition. We follow the critical text. The three categories — blind, lame, paralyzed — represent the kinds of disabilities that Jesus will heal throughout the Gospel, echoing Isaiah 35:5-6.

3. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Isaiah 35:5-6 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
5. The duration of thirty-eight years exceeds any healing in the Synoptic Gospels and establishes the hopelessness of the man's condition. The possible allusion to Israel's thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering between Kadesh-Barnea and the crossing of the Wadi Zered (Deuteronomy 2:14) may suggest that this man represents Israel in its helpless, prolonged suffering. Verse 4 is omitted following the SBLGNT critical text.
5. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Deuteronomy 2:14 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
6. Jesus takes the initiative — the man does not call out, does not know who Jesus is, and does not ask for healing. The verb gnous ('knowing') implies supernatural knowledge, as in 1:47-48, 2:24-25, 4:18. The question theleis hygies genesthai ('do you want to become well?') seems obvious but is probing — after thirty-eight years, the man's identity may be bound up with his illness. The question also establishes the man's will as a factor in the encounter.
7. The man's answer reveals his isolation (no one to help him) and his assumption that the pool itself is the source of healing. The reference to water being 'stirred up' (tarachthe) reflects the local tradition about the pool's intermittent spring, which archaeological evidence confirms — the pool was fed by a spring that flowed irregularly. The man answers Jesus's question about desire with a description of his helplessness — he wants healing but has no means to obtain it.
8. Three imperatives in rapid succession: egire ('get up, rise'), aron ('pick up, carry'), peripatei ('walk'). The command requires no intermediate steps — no washing in a pool, no waiting for stirred water. The word krabatton ('mat, pallet, cot') indicates a poor man's bedding, light enough to carry. The command to carry the mat will become the point of Sabbath controversy (v. 10), since carrying objects on the Sabbath was prohibited by rabbinic interpretation of Jeremiah 17:21-22.
8. [TCR Cross-Reference] References Jeremiah 17:21-22 — the TCR OT rendering of that text provides the Hebrew source and explains the translation decisions involved.
9. The healing is instantaneous (eutheos, 'immediately') and complete (hygiees, 'sound, whole, healthy') — thirty-eight years of disability reversed in a moment. The man obeys all three commands. The narrator's final note — 'that day was a Sabbath' — is placed last for dramatic effect, signaling the conflict about to erupt. The Sabbath detail transforms a healing miracle into a legal controversy.
10. The prohibition against carrying objects on the Sabbath derives from Jeremiah 17:21-22 as interpreted by rabbinic tradition, particularly the Mishnah's listing of thirty-nine prohibited categories of work (Shabbat 7:2). The authorities focus on the legal violation rather than the miraculous healing — a priority that Jesus will address. They confront the healed man, not Jesus, whom they have not yet identified.
10. [TCR Cross-Reference] This verse quotes Jeremiah 17:21-22 — see the TCR rendering of that passage for the Hebrew source text and translation decisions.
11. The healed man shifts responsibility — he obeyed the one who healed him. His logic is implicit: if someone has the power to heal a thirty-eight-year disability, his authority to command actions on the Sabbath must be legitimate. The emphasis on 'the man who made me well' (ho poiesas me hygie) places the healing authority above the Sabbath regulation.
12. The authorities ask about the identity of the one who commanded the Sabbath violation, not the one who performed the healing. Their question focuses on the command to carry, not the miracle of restoration. The omission of the healing from their question reveals their theological priorities.
13. Unlike the Samaritan woman or Nathanael, this man does not know Jesus's identity even after being healed. The verb exeneusen ('turned aside, withdrew, slipped away') indicates Jesus deliberately avoided the attention. The crowd provided cover. This detail highlights the contrast with chapter 4 — the Samaritan woman sought out her community to tell them; this man cannot even identify his healer.
14. Jesus seeks the man out — the verb heuriskei ('finds') suggests a deliberate search. The warning 'do not sin anymore' (meketi hamartane) implies a connection between the man's past sin and his disability, though Jesus elsewhere denies a universal cause-and-effect between sin and suffering (9:3). The 'something worse' (cheiron ti) may refer to eschatological judgment rather than physical suffering. The man is now in the temple — having been healed, he can enter the sacred precincts from which his disability may have excluded him.
15. The man's action is ambiguous — is he naively reporting to those who asked (v. 12), or is he informing on Jesus? The verb anengeilen ('reported, announced') is neutral, but the result is that Jesus is now identified as the Sabbath violator. Unlike the Samaritan woman's testimony (4:29), which brings people to Jesus in faith, this man's report brings the authorities to Jesus in opposition.
16. The imperfect ediokon ('were persecuting, began to persecute') indicates the beginning of an ongoing campaign. The SBLGNT does not include 'and sought to kill him,' which appears in some manuscripts. The imperfect epoiei ('was doing') suggests a pattern of Sabbath activity, not just this single incident. The Sabbath issue becomes the initial flashpoint for the opposition that will eventually lead to the cross.
17. This is one of the most theologically explosive statements in the Gospel. The argument has a Jewish background: rabbis debated whether God himself observes the Sabbath. The prevailing view was that God continues to sustain creation (giving life, judging the dead) even on the Sabbath — if God stopped all work, the universe would collapse. Jesus claims to participate in this ongoing divine work. The phrase 'my Father' (ho pater mou) rather than 'our Father' claims a unique filial relationship. The conjunction kago ('and I also') places Jesus's work alongside and equivalent to the Father's.

18. The narrator confirms two charges: Sabbath violation and blasphemy. The phrase patera idion ('his own Father') with the adjective idion ('own, personal, particular') distinguishes Jesus's claim from the general Jewish understanding of God as Father of the nation. The authorities correctly perceive the implication: ison heauton poion to theo ('making himself equal with God'). Rather than deny this charge, Jesus's following discourse will elaborate and intensify it.
19. Jesus responds to the charge of 'making himself equal with God' not by denying equality but by clarifying its nature: the Son's equality is not independent autonomy but perfect dependent imitation. 'Cannot do nothing on his own' (ou dynatai poiein aph heautou ouden) expresses not inability but the Son's chosen submission to the Father's will. The analogy reflects the ancient apprenticeship model — a son learns his father's trade by watching and replicating. The Son's works are the Father's works made visible.
20. The verb philei ('loves') is used here rather than agapa — in this context, phileo conveys intimate, personal affection between Father and Son. The 'greater works' (meizona ergon) that will astonish them are specified in what follows: giving life (v. 21) and executing judgment (v. 22). The Father's showing (deiknusin, present tense) is ongoing and complete — nothing is hidden from the Son.
21. Giving life to the dead (zoopoiei, 'makes alive') was universally acknowledged as God's exclusive prerogative in Jewish theology. Jesus claims this power for himself without qualification — 'to whom he wishes' (hous thelei) asserts sovereign freedom, not arbitrary caprice. This is one of the most direct claims to divine authority in the Gospel.
22. The second divine prerogative — judgment — is now entrusted entirely to the Son. The perfect tense dedoken ('has given') indicates a completed, permanent transfer of authority. The claim is breathtaking: the God of Israel does not judge directly but has delegated all judgment to the Son. This redefines the Jewish understanding of the final judgment — the Son stands at the center of eschatology.
23. The purpose of delegated judgment is that the Son receives the same honor (time) as the Father. The word kathos ('just as, to the same degree as') demands equivalent honor — not similar, not lesser, but identical. The negative corollary is equally strong: dishonoring the Son is dishonoring the Father. This makes christology inseparable from theology — one's relationship to God is determined by one's response to the Son.
24. This verse presents realized eschatology — the future judgment and resurrection are experienced in the present through faith. The present tense echei ('has') and the perfect tense metabebeken ('has crossed over, has passed') indicate that eternal life is a current possession and the transition from death to life has already occurred for the believer. The believer does not await a future verdict but has already been acquitted.
25. As in 4:23, the phrase 'is coming and is now here' (erchetai hora kai nyn estin) collapses future and present. 'The dead' (hoi nekroi) operates on two levels: the spiritually dead who hear Jesus now and come to life (present reality), and the physically dead who will be raised at the last day (future hope, developed in vv. 28-29). The title 'Son of God' (tou huiou tou theou) is the most exalted title used so far in this discourse.
26. This may be the most profound christological statement in the Gospel. 'Life in himself' (zoen en heauto) means self-existent, uncaused, underived life — the very definition of God. The Father possesses this life by nature; the Son possesses it by the Father's gift (edoken, 'has given, granted'). The paradox is deliberate: the Son's self-existent life is a gift — he is eternally begotten, not self-generated, yet possesses the same quality of life as the Father.
27. The Greek huios anthropou ('Son of Man') appears without the definite article, which is unusual and may echo Daniel 7:13 in the Septuagint. The authority to judge is connected to his identity as Son of Man — the figure in Daniel who receives dominion from the Ancient of Days. The combined claims of this discourse are staggering: the Son gives life (v. 21), receives all judgment (v. 22), possesses self-existent life (v. 26), and exercises judicial authority (v. 27).
27. [TCR Cross-Reference] Draws on Daniel 7:13. Consult the TCR rendering of that passage for the underlying Hebrew and the rationale for key translation choices.
28. Here the eschatology shifts from realized (v. 25, 'and is now here') to purely future ('the hour is coming' — without the 'and is now here' qualifier). The reference to 'all who are in the tombs' (pantes hoi en tois mnemeios) is unambiguously about physical resurrection, not spiritual awakening. The scope is universal — 'all' in the tombs, not merely believers.
29. This is the clearest statement of a dual resurrection in John's Gospel, echoing Daniel 12:2 ('some to everlasting life, some to shame and everlasting contempt'). The distinction between 'resurrection of life' (anastasin zoes) and 'resurrection of judgment' (anastasin kriseos) describes two outcomes, not two events. The basis appears to be conduct ('done good' vs. 'practiced evil'), though this must be read alongside verse 24, where faith is the criterion for escaping judgment.
29. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Daniel 12:2. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
30. Jesus returns to the theme of verse 19 — his dependent relationship with the Father. His judgment is just (dikaia) precisely because it is not autonomous but aligned with the Father's will. The phrase 'as I hear' (kathos akouo) parallels 'what he sees the Father doing' (v. 19) — the Son both sees and hears from the Father, indicating complete communication. This self-limitation is paradoxically the basis of his authority.
31. Jesus now shifts to a legal argument about witnesses, following the principle of Deuteronomy 19:15 that a single witness is insufficient. The concession is formal, not substantive — Jesus is not saying his self-testimony is false but that it would not be accepted as legally sufficient standing alone. The courtroom language (martyro, martyria) introduces the four-witness section that follows.
31. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Deuteronomy 19:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.

32. The 'another' (allos) most likely refers to the Father (cf. v. 37), not to John the Baptist (who is mentioned separately in v. 33). Jesus asserts that the Father's testimony is true (alethes) — reliable and authoritative. This sets up the hierarchy of witnesses that follows: John the Baptist (human witness), Jesus's works (visible evidence), the Father (divine testimony), and the Scriptures (written witness).
33. Jesus references the delegation described in 1:19-27. The perfect tense memartyreiken ('has testified') indicates that John's testimony remains on the record — it is settled and permanent. The dative te aletheia ('to the truth') indicates that John's testimony aligned with and pointed toward the truth, which in John's Gospel is ultimately Jesus himself (14:6).
34. Jesus clarifies that he does not depend on human witnesses for his authority — he cites John the Baptist for the audience's benefit, not his own. The purpose clause 'so that you may be saved' (hina hymeis sothete) reveals a pastoral motive behind the legal argument. Even in the midst of controversy, Jesus's goal is the salvation of his opponents.
35. John the Baptist is called a lychnos ('lamp') — a portable, temporary, derivative light — not the phos ('light') that the Prologue attributes to Christ (1:4-5, 8-9). The distinction is deliberate: John was a lamp that burned with borrowed fire, not the source of light itself. The phrase 'for a while' (pros horan, 'for an hour') suggests the authorities' initial enthusiasm for John's ministry was temporary and superficial.
36. The second witness is Jesus's own works (ta erga) — the signs and the entire mission the Father has assigned. The verb teleioso ('to complete, accomplish, bring to perfection') echoes 4:34 and anticipates 19:30 (tetelestai, 'it is finished'). The works are not merely evidence of power but evidence of origin — they testify 'that the Father has sent me' (hoti ho pater me apostalken).
37. The third witness is the Father himself. The statement 'you have never heard his voice nor seen his form' is striking — did not Israel hear God's voice at Sinai? Jesus may be saying that his opponents have never truly heard or perceived God despite their religious activity. The word eidos ('form, appearance, shape') and phone ('voice') correspond to the two primary modes of divine revelation in the Old Testament — theophany and oracle. The audience has been blind and deaf to both.
38. The Johannine verb meno ('remaining, abiding') appears here negatively — God's word does not abide in them. The proof of this absence is their rejection of Jesus, whom God sent. The logic is circular by design: if they had God's word in them, they would recognize the one God sent; their failure to recognize him proves they do not have God's word.
39. The verb eraunate could be imperative ('Search!') or indicative ('You search'). We read it as indicative — Jesus is describing their practice, not commanding it. The fourth witness is Scripture itself. The irony is devastating: they study Scripture diligently believing it contains eternal life, and it does — but it points to Jesus, whom they refuse. The Scriptures are not an end in themselves but a witness that leads to the living Word.
40. The verb thelete ('you are willing, you want') frames the refusal as volitional — they do not come because they choose not to. The invitation remains open ('come to me') and the offer is unchanged ('to have life'), but the will is resistant. Jesus diagnoses the problem not as intellectual failure but as a failure of the will.
41. The word doxa ('glory, honor, praise') connects to the Prologue's theme (1:14). Jesus disclaims any need for human recognition — his glory comes from the Father alone. This sets up the contrast with his opponents in the next verse.
42. The perfect tense egnoka ('I have come to know, I know') asserts settled, deep knowledge. The 'love of God' (ten agapen tou theou) could mean their love for God or God's love in them — both senses may be intended. Their rejection of Jesus reveals an absence of love for God, despite their religious devotion. This is the root diagnosis beneath all the surface symptoms.
43. The contrast is between coming 'in my Father's name' (authorized by God) and coming 'in his own name' (self-authorized). The prediction that they will receive a self-appointed figure may refer to false messiahs generally or to specific historical figures. The irony is that the one with divine authorization is rejected while self-promoters are welcomed.
44. Jesus identifies the root obstacle to faith: a disordered desire for human approval. Those who live for peer recognition cannot receive the one who comes in God's name. The phrase tou monou theou ('the only God') echoes Deuteronomy 6:4 (the Shema) and is both a theological affirmation and an implicit charge — they claim to serve the only God but their honor system serves human opinion.
44. [TCR Cross-Reference] Echoes Deuteronomy 6:4. See the TCR's OT rendering for the Hebrew behind this passage and the translation rationale.
45. The courtroom language continues — kategoreso ('I will accuse') is a legal term for formal prosecution. Jesus will not need to accuse them because their own champion, Moses, will do so. The perfect tense elpikate ('have hoped, have placed your hope') indicates their settled trust in Moses and the Torah. The irony is that the very authority they claim will condemn them.
46. Jesus claims that Moses's writings point to him — not tangentially but centrally. The conditional construction (ei episteuete... episteuete an) is contrary to fact in the present: 'if you were believing Moses (but you are not), you would be believing me (but you are not)'. The specific Mosaic texts Jesus has in mind likely include Deuteronomy 18:15-18 (the prophet like Moses) and perhaps Genesis 3:15, 12:3, and 49:10.
46. [TCR Cross-Reference] Quotes Genesis 3:15. The TCR rendering of that OT passage preserves the Hebrew source text and documents the translation decisions behind it.

47. The discourse ends with a devastating rhetorical question. The distinction between grammatsin ('writings, letters') and remasin ('words, spoken utterances') contrasts Moses's written Torah with Jesus's oral teaching. If they cannot believe the written, established, revered text of Moses, how will they believe the spoken words of the one Moses wrote about? The question has no answer — it is an indictment that hangs in the air.

Summary: John 6 is the longest chapter in the Gospel, centered on the fourth sign — the feeding of five thousand — and the extended Bread of Life discourse that follows. After feeding the crowd with five barley loaves and two fish, Jesus walks on the Sea of Galilee to his disciples. The next day, the crowd pursues him to Capernaum, and Jesus delivers the Bread of Life discourse, declaring 'I am the bread of life' — the first of the great 'I am' statements with predicate. The discourse escalates from spiritual bread to eating his flesh and drinking his blood, provoking widespread desertion. The chapter ends with Peter's confession and Jesus's identification of one of the Twelve as 'a devil.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The feeding of the five thousand is the only miracle (aside from the resurrection) recorded in all four Gospels, making it central to early Christian memory. John alone records the walking on water as occurring in direct sequence, creating a Moses typology: as Moses provided manna and crossed the sea, so Jesus provides bread and masters the water. The Bread of Life discourse is structured as a synagogue homily on Exodus 16 (the manna), following a pattern of quotation, explanation, and application. The ego eimi ('I am') statement 'I am the bread of life' (6:35, 48) inaugurates the series of seven 'I am' declarations that define the Gospel.

Translation Friction: The eucharistic language of verses 53-58 ('eat my flesh,' 'drink my blood') has been interpreted sacramentally (referring to the Lord's Supper), metaphorically (referring to faith in Jesus's death), and both simultaneously. We render the Greek without imposing either reading. The verb trogo ('to chew, to munch') in verses 54-58 is more visceral than the earlier phago ('to eat'), intensifying the scandal. The mass desertion of disciples (v. 66) and Jesus's identification of Judas as 'a devil' (v. 70) create one of the Gospel's darkest moments.

Connections: The entire chapter is structured around Exodus 16 (manna) and Psalm 78:24 ('He gave them bread from heaven to eat'). The walking on water echoes Exodus 14 (the Red Sea crossing) and Psalm 77:19 ('Your way was through the sea'). The Bread of Life discourse connects to the Last Supper tradition (1 Corinthians 11:23-26) and to Wisdom's invitation to eat (Proverbs 9:5, Sirach 24:21). Peter's confession parallels the Synoptic confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:27-30).

¹After this, Jesus went across the Sea of Galilee, that is, the Sea of Tiberias. ²A large crowd kept following him because they were seeing the signs he was performing on the sick. ³Jesus went up on the mountain and sat down there with his disciples. ⁴Now the Passover, the festival of the Jewish people, was near. ⁵When Jesus looked up and saw a large crowd coming toward him, he said to Philip, "Where are we to buy bread for these people to eat?" ⁶He said this to test him, for he himself knew what he was going to do. ⁷Philip answered him, "Two hundred denarii worth of bread would not be enough for each of them to get even a little." ⁸Says to him,, one of his followers, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. ⁹"There is a boy here who has five barley loaves and two fish, but what are these among so many people?" ¹⁰Jesus said, "Have the people sit down." Now there was plenty of grass in that place. So the men sat down, numbering about five thousand. ¹¹Then Jesus took the loaves, and after giving thanks, he distributed them to those who were seated. He did the same with the fish, as much as they wanted. ¹²When they were satisfied, he said to his disciples, "Gather up the leftover pieces, so that nothing is wasted." ¹³So they gathered them up and filled twelve baskets with pieces from the five barley loaves left over by those who had eaten. ¹⁴When the people saw the sign that he had performed, they said, "This is truly the Prophet who is coming into the world!" ¹⁵So Jesus, knowing that they were about to come and seize him to make him king by force, withdrew again to the mountain by himself alone. ¹⁶When evening came, his disciples went down to the sea, ¹⁷Went into into a ship, and traveled over the lake toward Capernaum. And it was now dark, and Jesus was not arrive to them. ¹⁸The sea was becoming rough because a strong wind was blowing. ¹⁹When they had rowed about three or four miles, they saw Jesus walking on the sea and coming near the
